22. "Now listen to the fruit of this evil action, which has now come to pass." śrūyatām asya pāpasya karmaṇaḥ phalam āgatam: Literally, "Let the fruit that has come of this evil act be heard." A possible alternative reading of the line, and one that has been followed by some translators, is: "Listen! The fruit of this evil act has come." Ck and Ct understand that Rāvaṇa's evil action in the form of the abduction of the wives of others has born fruit in the form of the forcible abduction of his own sister by the asura Madhu (asya pāpasya karmaṇaḥ paradāragrahaṇarūpasya phalaṃ svīyasvasur madhvasureṇa balād dharaṇarūpam—so Ct; Ck similarly).

23–25. "of our maternal great uncle" mātāmahasya yo 'smākam: Literally, "who [is the brother] of our maternal grandfather." KK and VSP read bhrātā, "brother," for [a]smākam, lending the line the sense "He who was the brother of the maternal uncle was the elder brother of Sumālin." The reference is still to Mālyavān. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Here, as throughout the text, kinship names are generational rather than expressive of direct genealogical descent. The biological maternal grandfather of Rāvaṇa and his siblings is, of course, Sumālin, Mālyavān's younger brother. See, however, note to 6.26.5, where Cg states that some commentators understand Mālyavān to be Kaikasī's father. See Introduction, "Rākṣasas," pp. 47–48.

"the night-roaming rākṣasa known as Mālyavān" mālyavān iti vikhyātaḥ . . . niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one] known as 'Mālyavan.' " See 7.5.5 and notes.

"he is our mother's father's elder" pitur jyeṣṭho jananyāś ca: Literally, "he is the eldest of father and mother." Our translation appears to be the only logical way to read the passage and the only one that is in keeping with the genealogy of the rākṣasas. D6,7, 10,11,T3,4,M3,5,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pitā jyeṣṭho jananyā naḥ, "the eldest father of our mother," where again father has to be taken as a generational term for maternal uncle.

"and so our venerable grandfather" asmākaṃ tv āryako 'bhavat: Literally, "and he was our grandfather." The term āryaka generally means a grandfather or any venerable elder. Here we believe the term is used to indicate that Mālyavān is the eldest of the three brothers (Mālyavān, Sumālin, and Mālin) in the maternal grandparental generation. The critical edition contains a hiatus between pādas a and b. D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all avoid the hiatus by reading no hy [asmākam], "our, for [our]," for ca asmākaṃ tu, "[father] and [mother] and so our." The enclitic naḥ is then read with the first pāda, while asmākam is taken with the second.

"The daughter of his daughter is called Kumbhīnasī." tasya kumbhīnasī nāma duhitur duhitābhavat: As indicated in the next verse, Mālyavān's daughter is Analā (see 7.5.31). The Kumbhīnasī mentioned in this passage is the younger of two rākṣasa women with the same name who belong to Rāvaṇa's extended family. The elder is the daughter of Sumālin, and thus Mālyavān's niece, while the younger is the daughter of Analā, and thus Mālyavān's granddaughter and the niece of the elder Kumbhīnāsī. It is their eagerness to distinguish the two that has led the commentators to devote considerable energy to laying out the precise genealogical relationships of the various rākṣasas named here and others who belong to their lineage. The elder Kumbhīnasī, according to 7.5.35–36, is the youngest sister of Rāvaṇa's mother, Kaikasī, and so his maternal aunt. All commentators, with the exception of Cv, appear to agree with this identification. Cv understands that the elder Kumbhīnasī is the daughter of Mālyavān (see notes to 7.53.16). The rākṣasī who was abducted is the younger Kumbhīnasī, Rāvaṇa's cousin on his mother's side. And so, as Vibhīṣaṇa explains in verse 25, she is, in generational terms, to be regarded as their sister. All commentators except Cm identify this Kumbhīnasī as the daughter of Analā. Cm understands that she is the daughter of Puṣpotkaṭā (v.l. -kacā, -karā), whom he takes to be the daughter (or niece?) of Mālyavān (mālyavato duhituḥ puṣpotkaṭāyā duhitā kumbhīnasī). It would appear that the matter is of great concern to the commentators, because they wish to make it absolutely clear that it is the younger of the two rākṣasa women of this name who is abducted. See, too, 7.53.16 and notes. This episode is referenced in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. See notes to 6.7.7 for views of the commentators on Kumbhīnasī's identity here. See S. Goldman 2016.

"And that daughter born . . . of Analā" kanyā cānalodbhavā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition ca kanyānalodbhavā.

"is, according to proper custom, the sister of us brothers" bhavaty asmākam eṣā vai bhrātṝṇāṃ dharmataḥ svasā: Literally, "she is surely the sister of us brothers according to dharma." See note above. Ck and Ct observe that because Kumbhīnasī is the daughter of their aunt Analā, she is to be regarded by right, that is to say, by law, as being as much their sister as is Śūrpaṇakhā. (analāyā asmatkaniṣṭhamātṛtvāt. ata eṣā śūrpaṇakhāvad analākanyā kumbhīnasī dharmato nyāyataḥ svasā bhavati.)

26. "the . . . rākṣasa Madhu" madhunā . . . rākṣasena: See verse 20 and note above. See, too, sarga 53.

"while your son was performing his sacrifices" yajñapravṛtte putre te: Literally, "while your son was engaged in sacrifices." Ct observes that Meghanāda was barred from fighting [to protect Kumbhīnasī] because of his being consecrated for sacrifice. Ck and Cg both read a variant yajñapramatte, "distracted by sacrifice," known also to B3,M1,2,6–9. They understand the sense to be that because of this distraction, Meghanāda has neglected his household duties. (yajñapramatto yajñena pramattaḥ. vismṛtasvagṛhakṛtya ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly.) Ct notes the variant and explains it as do Cg and Ck, the latter of whom he is probably quoting. Ś1,Ñ2,V1,B1,D7,10,11,T1–3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tu, "but," for te, "your, of you."

"and I was dwelling underwater" mayi cāntarjaloṣite: Literally, "and while I was living in the water." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, Vibhīṣaṇa was doing this for the purpose of [practicing] austerities (taportham iti śeṣaḥ). The practice of performing penances while submerged in water is mentioned elsewhere in the epic and purāṇic literature. Compare, for example, the penance of Cyavana at MBh 13.50.3–19.

Following verse 26, D6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of one line [506*]: "And, great king, while Kumbhakarṇa was enjoying sleep[1] (kumbhakarṇe mahārāja nidrām anubhavaty uta)."

[1] "And, great king, while Kumbhakarṇa was enjoying sleep." kumbhakarṇe mahārāja nidrām anubhavaty uta: D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kumbhakarṇo mahārāja nidrām anubhavaty atha, "Then Kumbhakarṇa was enjoying sleep, great king." On Kumbhakarṇa's sleep, see R. Goldman 2006 and Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 75–77. For the commentators' views on the duration of his sleep, see note to 6.48.12.

27. "your" tava: D10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead iha, "here."

"your majesty" rājan: Literally, "O king." KK (7.25.28a) and VSP (7.25.27a) read instead sā tu, "but she."

"he carried her off, although she was guarded in your inner apartments" hṛtā . . . guptā hy antaḥpure tava: Literally, "[she] was carried off [and] surely guarded in your inner apartments." Ñ1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read [a]py, "even though," for hi, "surely." KK (7.25.28b) and VSP (7.25.27b) read suptā, "sleeping," for guptā, "guarded." This variant is unattested in the critical apparatus or in any commentary. Moreover, KK, which normally provides variant readings, shows none for this form. Both the 1905 and the 1913 editions of KK read suptā. The word suptam is attested only in one manuscript, D5. The reading suptā could possibly be an error on the part of KK, which was then replicated by VSP. See note to 7.24.1 on the violent abduction of women as a form of marriage.

28. "although we came to know of this" śrutvā tv etat: Literally, "but, having heard that." D6,7,10,11,T3,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śrutvāpi tat, "even though, having heard that."

"we let it pass" kṣāntam eva: Literally, "it was fully tolerated or forgiven." We follow Ck, who supplies "by us (asmābhiḥ)." Cs sees two reasons for Vibhīṣaṇa's failure to kill Madhu. He argues that it was because of the great prowess of Madhu [as a warrior] and the fact that they, i.e., the powerful rākṣasa warriors, were all engaged in some other business (sāmarthyādhikyāt tasyāsmākaṃ ca kāryāntarāsaktatvād iti bhāvaḥ).

"by those who are authorized to do so" dātṛbhiḥ: Literally, "by givers." D7,10,11,M6,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhrātṛbhiḥ, "by [her] brothers." Ck, Cg, and Cm make the reference more specific and add asmābhiḥ, "by us." The reference, then, is to the three brothers, Rāvaṇa, Vibhīṣaṇa, and Kumbhakarṇa.

"And, as you must realize, you have now suffered the consequences in this very world." asminn evābhisaṃprāptaṃ loke viditam astu te: Literally, "In this very world, it has been obtained, it should be known to you." The line is obviously elliptical and presumably refers back to the fruit of Rāvaṇa's evil action as mentioned in verse 22 above. The ellipsis is remedied by the majority of manuscripts; see 507* below. While most of the commentators repeat the notion that the abduction is the result of Rāvaṇa's wrongful carrying off of the wives of others, Cs, continuing to insist that he has only abducted young and virginal women (see Cs's comments at notes to 7.24.8), has his own unique proof of why this must the result of Rāvaṇa's karma. Cs, commenting on this line and 507* below, argues as follows: "'A maiden' refers to one born in one's own family. By 'husband,' the verse refers to someone who may be regarded as a husband in one's heart or thoughts. Even though a maiden must be given away in marriage, still the seizing of the girl by force, O evil-minded elder brother, must be the consequence of your evil actions in the form of seizing the waistband, etc., of a young girl belonging to another. Were this not the case, how would it be even thinkable for someone wrongfully to carry off a girl who was being guarded within Laṅkā with its insurmountable defensive installations, such as ramparts? (kanyā svakulaprasūtā. bhartre manasā bhartṛtvena saṃmatāya. yady api deyā kanyeti. tathāpi balād abalāharaṇaṃ tu durmate jyeṣṭhabhrātaḥ. asya tvadanuṣṭhitasya parataruṇīparikaraharaṇādirūpapāpasya phalam. no cec cetasāpi smartum aśakyaprākārādiprakāralaṅkāntarguptakanyānayanam anayena kathaṃ syād iti bhāvaḥ.)"

Following 28cd ("since a maiden must, of necessity, be given away to a husband by those who are authorized to do so [yasmād avaśyaṃ dātavyā kanyā bhartre hi dātṛbhiḥ]"), Ñ,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,S (except T4) insert a passage of one line [507*]: "This, indeed, is the fruit of the evil action of an evil-minded person[1] (tad etat karmaṇo hy asya phalaṃ pāpasya durmateḥ)."

[1] "of an evil-minded person" durmateḥ: Literally, "of an evil-minded [one]." D6,7,T2, 3,G1,2,M5–8, and KK and VSP read instead the vocative durmate, "O evil-minded [one]."

Following verse 28, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3,D1–5,7–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [508*]: "When Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, had heard these words of Vibhīṣaṇa, he, through his vicious nature, boiled over like an ocean of scalding water (vibhīṣaṇavacaḥ śrutvā rākṣasendraḥ sa rāvaṇaḥ / daurātmyenātmanoddhūtas taptāmbhā iva sāgaraḥ //)."

29. "his eyes reddened in his rage" kruddhaḥ saṃraktalocanaḥ: Literally, "angry, he whose eyes were red."

"my heroic warriors" śūrāḥ: Literally, "the heroes."

30. "who are foremost among the night-roaming rākṣasas" ye ca mukhyā niśācarāḥ: Literally, "and who [are] the foremost night-roaming [ones]."

"armed with all kinds of weapons" nānāpraharaṇāyudhāḥ: Literally, "having for their weapons every sort of praharaṇa." The two terms praharaṇa and āyudha are more or less synonymous when used generally. More technically a praharaṇa is a handheld weapon, such as a sword, and thus is a subtype of the more generic āyudha, "weapon." The commentators are silent.

31. "Indra's world" indralokam: D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suralokam, "the world of the gods."

32. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press omit this verse. KK admits the verse in brackets as 7.25.34, while VSP places it in a footnote that is marked between 7.25.32 and 7.25.33 (VSP, p. 1032).

"the highest heaven" tridivam: On the use of this term in the Rāmāyaṇa, see 7.22.43.

"contented . . . I shall enjoy myself" nirvṛtto viharişyāmi: KK and VSP (see above) read instead nirbhayo vicariṣyāmi, "fearless, I shall roam about."

33. "At once" āśu: Literally, "quickly."

"fearsome" ugrāṇi: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead agryāṇi, "elite."

"akṣauhiṇīs" akṣauhiṇī-: The word akṣauhiṇī is a technical term from ancient Indian military texts, where it refers to a vast fourfold military force consisting of 21,870 chariots, an equal number of elephants, 65,610 cavalry, and 109,350 infantry. Thus the total number of troops in a formal akṣauhiṇī is 218,700. For a detailed discussion, see 6.3.24; 6.31.83–84; and notes. For other occurrences and uses of the term akṣauhiṇī in the Rāmāyaṇa, see 1.19.3; 1.50.21; 1.53.12; 5.34.23; 7.38.2; and notes. Compare 7.56.4 and notes.

"marched forth" niryayuḥ: Literally, "they went out." For some reason, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 458) reads the verb as an imperative, thus making the verse part of Rāvaṇa's speech.

"eager for battle" yuddhakāṅkṣiṇām: The genitive plural ending is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

34. "Taking command of the troops" sainikān parigṛhya: Literally, "having taken or controlled the soldiers."

"Indrajit went ahead of the army" indrajit tv agrataḥ sainyam: Literally, "and Indrajit in front of the army." The adverb agrataḥ, "before or ahead of," normally construes with the genitive, but here it must take the same sense with the accusative. D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the ablative sainyāt for sainyam.

"Valorous Rāvaṇa was in the middle" rāvaṇo madhyataḥ śūraḥ: Literally, "The hero Rāvaṇa in the middle." D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jagāma rāvaṇo madhye, "Rāvaṇa went in the middle."

"Kumbhakarṇa brought up the rear" kumbhakarṇaś ca pṛṣṭhataḥ: Literally, "and Kumbhakarṇa behind." Ct and Cs are aware of the fact that by rights Kumbhakarṇa ought to be asleep. Ct comments: "One has to understand that Kumbhakarṇa just happened (lit., 'because of fate or chance') to wake up on that day and so went out to fight (kumbhakarṇas taddine daivāl labdhajāgaro yuddhāya nirgata iti bodhyam—so Ct; Cs similarly)."

35. "But, as for" tu: Ñ2,B4,D6,8,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"he practiced righteousness" dharmam ācarat: Ct notes that the phrase simply means that Vibhīṣaṇa stayed in Laṅkā (tatraiva sthita ity arthaḥ). V3,D1,2,4–6,9,10,T3,4,G3, M3–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the present participle ācaran, "practicing," for the critical edition's finite verb ācarat, "he practiced."

"while . . . those" te tu: D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śeṣāḥ, "the rest or the remaining [ones]."

36. "Filling the entire sky" kṛtvākāśaṃ nirantaram: Literally, "having made sky such that it had no intervals." The idiom is a favorite of the epics. See notes to 7.22.17 for references.

"mounted on chariots, elephants, donkeys, camels, horses, and great fiery serpents" rathair nāgaiḥ kharair uṣṭrair hayair dīptair mahoragaiḥ: Literally, "with chariots, elephants, donkeys, camels, horses, blazing great serpents." The placement of the adjective dīptaiḥ, "blazing," between hayaiḥ, "horses," and mahoragaiḥ, "great serpents," makes its referent ambiguous. We have linked it with the great serpents on the grounds that these beings are often said to possess fiery venom. For 36ab, D1,6–8,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [513*]: "with donkeys, camels, fiery horses, crocodiles, and great serpents (kharair uṣṭrair hayair dīptaiḥ śiśumārair mahoragaiḥ)." In this variant, of course, the adjective must be construed with hayaiḥ, "horses." Compare 7.27.37 and notes and 1335*, following notes to 6.60.11.

37. "who cherished enmity for the gods" kṛtavairāḥ suraiḥ saha: Literally, "having made hostility together with the gods." D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca daivataiḥ, "and with the divinities," for suraiḥ saha, "together with the gods."

"followed" avagacchanta: Literally, "they followed." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the parasmaipada avagacchan hi, "indeed, they followed," for the ātmanepada avagacchanta, "they followed."

38. "Once ten-faced Rāvaṇa reached Madhu's city, he entered it. He saw his sister there but not Madhu." sa tu gatvā madhupuraṃ praviśya ca daśānanaḥ / na dadarśa madhuṃ tatra bhaginīṃ tatra dṛṣṭavān: Literally, "But having gone to Madhu's city and having entered, the ten-faced [one] did not see Madhu there. He saw the sister there." We learn at verse 45 below that Madhu is off sleeping somewhere.

39. "sister" svasā: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"humbly cupped her hands in reverence" prahvā prāñjalir bhūtvā: Literally, "submissive, having become one whose hands were cupped in reverence." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous ca prahvāñjalir bhūtvā, "and, submissive, having become one whose hands were cupped in reverence." Ct glosses this phrase as "one who had made a cupping of the hands as a sign of submissiveness (kṛtanamratvacihnāñjaliḥ)."

40. "saying . . . said" bruvan: Literally, "speaking or saying." The verse has no finite verb of speech to introduce Rāvaṇa's second remark.

41. "immensely powerful" mahābala: D6,7,10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābhuja, "great-armed [one]."

"bestower of honor" mānada: The term is ambiguous, as it can also mean "humbler of pride." For a discussion of the uses of this term, see notes to 6.110.6.

Following verse 41, D6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [514*]: "For it is said that there is no other fear like this for women of good family.[1] Of all fears, widowhood is most calamitous. (na hīdṛśaṃ bhayaṃ kiṃcit kulastrīṇām ihocyate / bhayānām api sarveṣāṃ vaidhavyaṃ vyasanaṃ mahat //)"

[1] "no other fear like this for women of good family" na hīdṛśaṃ bhayaṃ kiṃcit kulastrīṇām: Literally, "for there is no fear whatsoever like this among women of good family." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the fear mentioned here is that arising from the killing of one's husband (īdṛśaṃ bhayaṃ bhartṛvadhasaṃbhavaṃ bhayam ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly). Cr and Cs understand similarly but note that by the term bhayam, "fear," is meant here "cause of fear." Cr understands, "Among all fears, that is to say, causes of fear, widowhood is the great calamity, that is to say, cause of fear; therefore it is said that there is no similar cause of fear for women of good family that is like the killing of their husbands (sarveṣāṃ bhayānāṃ tad hetūnāṃ madhye vaidhavyaṃ mahad vyasanaṃ bhayahetur ata īdṛśaṃ patihanasadṛśaṃ bhayaṃ kulastrīṇāṃ kiñcin nocyate)."

42. "Great-armed warrior" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]." Ś1,V3,D1,3–7,9–12,T1,3,4,M10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahārāja, "O great king."

"you yourself said" tvayā hy uktam: Literally, "for it was said by you." Ñ1,V3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G2,M2,4–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvayāpy uktam, "it was said by you as well."

"please have some consideration for me, I am begging you" mām avekṣasva yācatīm: Literally, "consider me, who am begging."

44. "surely . . . for victory" jayāya vai: Literally, "for victory indeed." The particle vai is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M2–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead jayāya hi, "indeed, for victory." KK (7.25.47b) and VSP (7.25.45b) read instead jayāvahe, "[that] we might be victorious."

"Because of my compassion and affection for you" tava kāruṇyasauhārdyāt: The expression is not unambiguous. We, together with most of the translators consulted, understand that it is a reference to Rāvaṇa's pity and love for his terrified sister that motivates his change of heart. We thus believe that the context supports reading the genitive pronoun "your or of you" as a sādhāraṇaṣaṣṭhī, here in the sense of "for you." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 492), followed by Benoît (1999, p. 1286), reads the genitive literally and so understands the reference to be to Kumbhīnasī's affection and compassion for her husband. He renders, "Ta tendre affection (pour lui)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 458), too, takes this approach, offering, "Because of the compassion and love that you bear him."

"I shall not kill Madhu" nivṛtto 'smi madhor vadhāt: Literally, "I am averted from the killing of Madhu."

45. "as if transported with joy" saṃprahṛṣṭeva: Literally, "as if delighted."

"roused . . . who had been sleeping" prasuptaṃ taṃ samutthāpya: Literally, "having caused him who was asleep to arise." D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition samutthāpya prasuptaṃ tam.

"her extremely wise husband" suvipaścitam: Literally, "the extremely wise [one.]" We have added the word "husband" for the sake of clarity. D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sā patiṃ vacaḥ, "she [said these] words to [her] husband."

"the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaram: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

46. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]." D6,7,10,11,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalaḥ, "immensely powerful [one]."

47. "of one who is affectionate and devoted" snigdhasya bhajamānasya: Ck and Ct understand that Rāvaṇa is affectionate toward Madhu out of consideration for his sister but is devoted to him because of his emotional connection with his brother-in-law. (snigdhasya matprekṣayā tvayi snigdhasya. bhajamānasya tvayi jāmātṛbhāvaṃ bhajataḥ.) Note that the term jāmātṛ here, normally, "son-in-law," is understood in its less common meaning of "brother-in-law" (MW s.v.). See 7.24.24 and note.

48. "He then received the foremost of rākṣasas with all due courtesy." dadarśa rākṣasaśreṣṭhaṃ yathānyāyam upetya saḥ: Literally, "Having approached the best of rākṣasas according to custom, he saw [him]." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss the expression yathānyāyam, "according to custom," as "courteously (upacārapūrvam—so Ct)." Ck and Cg add that Madhu's hospitality included the traditional offering of arghya (arghyādyupacāram ity arthaḥ). Cs explains, "in a way that is conformable to the proper behavior of a junior to his senior (jyaiṣṭhyakāniṣṭhyanyāyayogyam)." On the arghya, or "guest-offering," see 16*, note 1, following notes to 7.1.10.

49. "Having received this honor" prāptapūjaḥ: Literally, "he by whom worship had been received." D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M6,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous prāpya pūjām, "having received worship."

50. "When . . . had reached . . . he had . . . make camp" āsādya . . . / . . . upaniveśayat: Literally, "having reached, he caused to encamp."

Sarga 26

2. "equal in splendor to the mountain itself" tulyaparvatavarcasi: Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr point out that the compound means that the moon is as bright as Mount Kailāsa on which Rāvaṇa has camped (svaniviṣṭakailāsaparvatatulyaprabhe—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly).

"the beauty of the scene" guṇāṃs tatra: Literally, "the virtues or qualities there." Again Ck, Ct, and Cm flesh out the elliptical reference, understanding that the phrase means "all the enjoyable qualities of Mount Kailāsa (kailāsaparvatīyasakalakāmabhogārhadharmān—so Ck, Ct; Cm similarly)."

"now still further enhanced by the moonlight" candrapādopaśobhitān: Literally, "beautified by the moon's rays [lit., 'feet']." D10,11,T1,G2,3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead candrapādapaśobhitān, "beautified by the moon and the trees." Cs understands candra here to refer to karpūra, or camphor, and takes the compound candrapādapa to refer to camphor trees, which, oddly, he seems to regard as a type of plantain (karpūrapādapaiḥ kadalīviśeṣaiḥ). Alternatively, Cs proposes taking candra in its sense of "water." This would lend the compound, he notes, the sense of "beautified by the waters and the trees." Cs documents both meanings by citing the Viśvakośa. (candrair udakaiḥ pādapaiś ceti vā. tair upaśobhitān. candraḥ sudhāṃśukarpūrakampillasvarṇavāriṣv iti viśvaḥ.) Presumably Cs is thinking of the mountain streams or cascades that are often celebrated in Sanskrit kāvya. KK and VSP read instead candrapādasuśobhitān, "greatly beautified by the rays of the moon."

Following 2ab, Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,9–12,S insert passage of two lines [519*]: "The immense army, armed with every kind of weapon,[1] slept. But as for immensely powerful Rāvaṇa, he sat on the mountain's summit. (prasuptaṃ sumahatsainyaṃ nānāpraharaṇāyudham / rāvaṇas tu mahāvīryo niṣaṇṇaḥ śailamūrdhani //)"

[1] "armed with every kind of weapon" nānāpraharaṇāyudham: See 7.25.30 and notes.

3. "And it was yet further enhanced": The verse has no verbal element, and it requires us to carry forward the adjective -upaśobhitān, "beautified, enhanced," from the previous verse.

"heavenly" divyaiḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dīptaiḥ, "brilliant or shining."

"karṇikāra" karṇikāra-: This is a fragrant tree with creamy-white flowers (Pterospermum acerifolium [Willd.]).

"by . . . dense thickets of kadamba" kadambagahanaiḥ: The kadamba is a tree with orange-colored fragrant blossoms (Anthocephalus cadamba [Roxb.] or Nauclea cadamba). D7,10,11,M2,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read -bakulaiḥ for -gahanaiḥ, lending the compound the sense "with kadambas and bakulas." The bakula is a tree with fragrant blossoms, the Mimusops elengi (L.).

"lotus ponds in blossom" padminībhiś ca phullābhiḥ: Ck and Ct alternatively note that, given the time [i.e., at night], the reference to the blossoming lotus ponds must be to those plants that bloom at night. Ck lists a variety of such lotuses, including the kahlāra (v.l. kalhāra), the kaivara, and the indīvara. Brockington (1984, p. 102) identifies the kahlāra as Nymphaea lotus (L.) or N. pubescens (Willd.) and the indīvara as Nymphaea stellata (Willd.). Ct mentions only the kalhāra, etc. (sarasyaḥ padminyaḥ. tāsāṃ phullatvaṃ tatkālavikāsocitakalhārakairavendīvarādibhiḥ—so Ck.) Cv believes that the term padminī is a synecdoche for the ponds and all their flowers, noting that it is not only lotuses that bloom at moonrise (padminībhir iti. sarasīnām upalakṣaṇam etat. na hi kevalā padminī candrodaye vikasati). The critical apparatus, quoting Cv, reads surastrīṇām, "of the women of the gods," for which the editors tentatively propose the emendation sarasīnām, "of the ponds"; here, we follow the reading sarasīnām, which is found in the Adyar Library's manuscript of Cv.

"the Mandākinī River" mandākinī: This is alternative name of the Ganges River, especially in its heavenly and mountainous forms.

Following verse 3, V3,D6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of eight lines [521*]: "The forest was made bright with campakas, aśokas, puṃnāgas, mandāras, mangos, pāṭalas, lodhras, priyaṅgus, arjunas, ketakas,[1] āragvadhas, tamālas, priyālas, bakulas, and other trees.[2] And within it,[3] impassioned, sweet-voiced kinnaras tormented by the god of love, together sang a song[4] that increased one's heart's delight, while vidyādharas, intoxicated with wine, their eyes reddened with desire, united with their women, sported and took their pleasure."

[1] "campakas, aśokas, puṃnāgas, mandāras, mangos, pāṭalas, lodhras, priyaṅgus, arjunas, ketakas, āragvadhas, tamālas, priyālas, bakulas" campakāśokapuṃnāgamandārataru-bhis tathā / cūtalodhraiś ca pāṭalapriyaṅgvarjunaketakaiḥ: Except for the priyaṅgu, which is a creeper or vine, Aglaia odorata, all of the plants listed here are types of trees. The campaka is a tree with fragrant yellow flowers (Michelia campaka), while the aśoka has red flowers (Saraca indica [L.] or Jonesia asoka [Roxb.]). The puṃnāga is also known as nāgavṛksa (Rottleria tinctoria or Calophyllium inoplyllum [L.]). The mandāra is commonly known as the coral tree (Erythrina indica, syn. E. variegata), and the mango (cūta) is identified as Mangifera indica. The pāṭala is the trumpet flower tree (Bignonia suaveolens [Roxb.], syn. Stereospermum suaveolens), the lodhra is identified as Simplex racemosa, and the ketaka is a tree with fragrant white flowers (Pandanus odoratissimus, syn. Pandanus tectorius).

[2] "āragvadhas, tamālas, priyālas, bakulas, and other trees" āragvadhatamālaiś ca priyālabakulair api: This is marked as line 3 of 521*. KK (7.26.6) and VSP (7.26.5cd–6ab) insert an additional line prior to this line, which the editors of the critical edition regard as a repetition of line 3, although, in fact, the two lines only contain one word in common. Line 3 of 521* is not known to NSP or Gita Press. GPP places it in parentheses between 7.26.6ab and 7.26.6cd. The additional line as known to KK and VSP is: tagarair nārikelaiś ca priyālapanasais tathā, "with tagaras, nārikelas, priyālas, and jackfruits." GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read a slight variant of this additional line, reading nārikeraiḥ for nārikelaiḥ. The āragvadha is a tree that is identified as Cathartocarpus (Cassia) fistula, the tamāla is Garcinia xanthochymus (Hook f.), the priyāla is Buchanania latifolia, and the bakula is a tree with fragrant blossoms (Mimusops elengi [L.]). The tagara (Tabernaemontana coronaria, syn. T. divaricata) is a flowering plant that is sometimes made into a powder having medicinal properties. Brockington (1984, p. 104) gives its common name as grape jasmine. Nārikera/nārikela is the coconut palm, and the jackfruit tree (panasa) is identified as Artocarpus integrifolia.

[3] "The forest was made bright . . . And within it" bhāsitavanāntare: Literally, "in the interior of the brightened forest."

[4] "song" geyam: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yatra, "where."

4. "Kubera, the giver of wealth" dhanada-: Literally, "the giver of wealth."

"of the troupes of apsarases singing" apsarogaṇasaṃghānāṃ gāyatām: Literally, "of the assemblies of the troupes of apsarases, which were singing.

5. "fragrant with the sweetness of their nectar" madhumādhavagandhinaḥ: The compound is ambiguous and has lent itself to a number of interpretations. The commentators understand it in two different ways. Ct simply glosses, "fragrant with all the flowers of spring (vasantīyasarvapuṣpasugandhayaḥ)," without indicating exactly how he analyzes the compound. Ck and Cg take the terms in their senses, respectively, as the names of the first two months of spring, Caitra and Vaiśākha. Their understanding, then, is that the trees constantly have the fragrance associated with those months (nityam eva madhumādhavābhyāṃ caitravaiśākhābhyāṃ vasantamāsābhyāṃ gandhinas tatkṛtapuṣpagandhā ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly). Cv and Cm understand the terms in their senses, respectively, of nectar or honey (madhu) and honey-wine or rum (mādhava). They support this with a quotation from the lexicon, the Vaijayantī, which defines madhu as something made of sugar. (madhugandhino mādhavagandhinaś ca. mādhvaṃ mādhvīkaṃ tac ca śarkarāprakṛtikam. 'madhu śārkaro mādhavo 'striyām' iti vaijayantī—so Cv; Cm similarly.) Unlike the commentators and the translators who follow them, we see the compound madhumādhava- not as a dvandva but rather as a tatpuruṣa in the sense of "the sweetness of nectar."

7–8. "and the beauties of the mountain" guṇair gireḥ: Literally, "by the virtues or qualities of the mountain." See note to verse 2 above. The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead girer guṇāt, "through the quality of the mountain."

"immensely powerful Rāvaṇa fell under the sway of Kāma's arrows" rāvaṇaḥ sumahāvīryaḥ kāmabāṇavaśaṃ gataḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇaḥ sa [su—KK and VSP] mahāvīryaḥ kāmasya vaśam āgataḥ, "He, very powerful Rāvaṇa, came under the sway of Kāma."

9. "adorned with heavenly blossoms" divyapuṣpavibhūṣitā: The first two words of the compound divyapuṣpa- are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G (except for G2),M1–5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead divyābharaṇabhūṣitā, "adorned with heavenly ornaments."

"her face like the full moon" pūrṇacandranibhānanā: KK (7.26.14d) and VSP (7.26.14d) read instead divyapuṣpavibhūṣitā, "adorned with heavenly blossoms." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"happened to pass that way" tatra: Literally, "[was] there." Verses 9–11 of the critical edition, which describe Rambhā, contain no finite verb. The context makes it clear that Rambhā, on her way to see Nalakūbara (verse 24ff.), passes through the army, where she is seen by Rāvaṇa (see verse 11).

Following verse 9, V3,D3,5–7,10,11,T1–3,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [525*]: "Her limbs smeared with heavenly sandalpaste and her hair adorned with mandāra blossoms,[1][1] Rambhā, adorned with heavenly blossoms,[2] was making her way to a love tryst.[3][2] She flaunted her full hips.[4] Adorned with her girdle strings, they were ravishing to the eye and a supreme incitement to desire.[5]"

[1] "mandāra blossoms" mandāra-: Ck, Ct, and Cr note that the mandāra blossoms are the blossoms of the mythical wish-fulfilling tree of heaven, the kalpavṛkṣa (mandāraiḥ kalpavṛkṣakusumaiḥ kṛtālaṃkārā mūrdhajāḥ kacā yasyāḥ sā—so Ct).

[2] "adorned with heavenly blossoms" divyapuṣpavibhūṣitā: KK (7.26.15cd) and VSP (7.26.15cd) read instead pūrṇacandranibhānanā, "her face was like the full moon."

[3] "was making her way to a love tryst" ratotsavakṛtā: Literally, "prepared for a festival of lovemaking." D5–7,10,11,T2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead divyotsavakṛtā, "prepared for a divine festival." Ct understands the compound to mean "she by whom an undertaking in the form of setting forth for divine lovemaking had been made (divyarataye kṛta ārambho gamanarūpo yayā)." Several of the translators consulted seem uncomfortable with the erotic tone of the passage. Dutt (1894, p. 1659) avoids the compound completely, while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 494) simply renders, "elle s'en allait à un divin festival." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 464). Benoît (1999, p. 1287) translates similarly. Only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 460) follows the idea expressed by Ct, translating, "on her way to an assignation with a god."

[5] "incitement to desire" ratiprābhṛtam: Literally, "an offering to lust." Ct and Cm gloss, "a gift to lust (ratyupāyanabhūtam—so Ct; Cm similarly). Cm supports this with a quotation from the Amarakośa (2.8.27cd–28ab) to the effect that prābhṛtam means upāyanam. Cv, Ck, and Cg somewhat similarly gloss, "a gift to lust (ratyupadābhūtam)." Cg further glosses, "a stimulant to lust (rativardhakam ity arthaḥ)."

10. "With moist unguents applied as well as fragrant powders made from the flowers of all six seasons" kṛtair viśeṣakair ārdraiḥ ṣaḍartukusumotsavaiḥ: Literally, "with moist cosmetics applied, with fragrant powder of flowers of the six seasons." We understand with Ct that the term viśeṣaka should be taken here in its sense of cosmetic unguents applied to the cheeks, etc., and made of such things as yellow sandalpaste. (haricandanādikalpitaiḥ kapolādiṣu citrakaiḥ). Cr understands similarly. Cg, however, glosses simply, "ornaments (alaṃkāraiḥ)." The compound ṣaḍartukusumotsavaiḥ is addressed only by Cv among the commentators. He glosses śṛṅgāra, which must be taken in its sense of "fragrant powder," for utsava (ṣaḍṛtukusumānāṃ śṛṅgāraiḥ—Cv [Adyar Library mss.]). D7,10,11,T1,2,G,M5, and Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ṣaḍartukusumodbhavaiḥ, "produced from the flowers of the six seasons." In this variant, the compound becomes an adjective modifying viśeṣakaiḥ in pāda a. Ck, however, proposes adding the modificand alaṃkāraiḥ, "with ornaments," of which this would be the modifier. Cr wants to supply hāraiḥ, "necklaces," to which he applies the adjective ārdraiḥ, in its sense of "fresh, green," as opposed to dry, lending the pāda the sense "with unguents applied and with garlands of fresh flowers of all six seasons (ṣaḍartukusumodbhavaiḥ ādrair hāraiś ca)." For some reason, Cm, who reads with the vulgate, nonetheless glosses with Cv, perhaps under his influence.

Following 10ab, D5–7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [527*]: "In her abundance of beauty, radiance, and intellect, she was like a second Śrī, goddess of fortune[1] (babhāv anyatameva śrīḥ kāntidyutimatiśriyām /)."

[1] "In her abundance of beauty, radiance, and intellect, she was like a second Śrī, goddess of fortune." babhāv anyatameva śrīḥ kāntidyutimatiśriyām: Given the syntax, we are obliged to take the word śrī at the end of the compound in its sense of "abundance or wealth." D5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead babhāv anyatameva śrīḥ kāntiśrīdyutikīrtibhiḥ, "with her beauty, splendor, radiance, and fame, she was like a second Śrī." Ct and Cm explain the line as follows: "kānti is beauty in the form of splendor in every limb; śrī refers to an abundance of ornaments; dyuti is charm—with all of these things as well as fame, she resembled Śrī, that is, Lakṣmī. That is the meaning. (kāntyā pratyavayavaśobhārūpasaundaryeṇa śriyābharaṇasaṃpadā dyutyā lāvaṇyena kīrtyā ca . . . anyā śrīr iva lakṣmīr iva babhāv ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Cm and Cr similarly.)" M7 and KK and VSP read instead babhāv anyatameva śrīkāntidyutimatihriyām, "In her splendor, beauty, radiance, intellect, and modesty, she was like another . . ." Cg struggles with the syntax, fleshing out his elliptical reading by glossing, "she was like another of the most distinguished women of the gods (devastrīviśeṣāṇām anyatameva sthitā)."

11. "spied her" upalakṣitā: Literally, "[she was] observed." KK and VSP read the synonymous upavīkṣitā, "[she was] seen or looked at." This variant is unnoted in the critical apparatus.

12. "the lord of the rākṣasas" rakṣendraḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gacchantīm, "[her] who was going."

"tormented by the force of Kāma's arrows" kāmabāṇabalārditaḥ: D3,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāmabāṇavaśaṃ gataḥ, "[he who had] gone under the sway of Kāma's arrows."

"as she passed by" gacchantīm: Literally, "[her] who was going." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G, M4,5,7,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead lajjantīm, "[her] being bashful."

13. "What consummation of delight will you bestow?" kāṃ siddhiṃ bhajase svayam: Literally, "What fulfillment are you yourself bestowing?" We follow Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who understand siddhiḥ, "perfection or fulfillment," to mean "the fulfillment of enjoyment (bhogasiddhim ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck, Ct, and Cr similarly)."

14. "this very night" adya . . . adya: Literally, "today . . . today." The commentators do not remark on the repetition.

"on the nectar of your mouth" tavānanarasasya: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous variant tvadānanarasasya. Ct, who reads the variant, glosses the more conventional term "the nectar of [your] lower lip (adharāmṛtenety arthaḥ)."

"which is like the very essence of divine nectar" sudhāmṛtarasasya: Literally, "of the essence of the nectar of the nectar." The redundancy is intended, no doubt, to represent the unparalleled pleasure of Rambhā's kiss. Cg glosses, "of the essence [-rasa] of nectar [amṛta-] even with respect to nectar [amṛtāt] (amṛtād amṛtarasasyevety arthaḥ)."

15. "Against whose chest . . . will these breasts . . . crush" kasyorasthalasaṃsparśaṃ dāsyataḥ kucāv imau: Literally, "to whom will these two breasts give contact with [his] prominent chest?"

"so closely pressed" nirantarau: Literally, "devoid of an interval or space."

16. "And who will, this night, ascend to that very heaven in the form of your broad hips, which, adorned with golden girdle-strings, resemble a circle of gold?" suvarṇacakrapratimaṃ svarṇadāmacitaṃ pṛthu / adhyārokṣyati kas te 'dya svargaṃ jaghanarūpiṇam //: Literally, "Who this day will ascend to your heaven in the form of hips, [a heaven that is] broad, covered with golden strings, and the very image of a golden wheel." The verse as it is constructed in the critical edition, although poetically attractive, is grammatically defective. By making svargam, "heaven," the principal object of the verb adhyārokṣyati, "he will ascend or mount," the poet has reduced Rambhā's hips to a subordinate adjectival role through the creation of the compound jaghanarūpiṇam, "having the form of hips." This makes the remaining adjectives in the verse problematic, as by rights they must also modify svargam. This is not only contextually extremely awkward but also incorrect, since the adjective pṛthu, "broad," is in the neuter, as if it were intended to modify the noun jaghanam, which does not stand on its own in this verse. The remaining two adjectives in the first two pādas can be either neuter or masculine, but, given the context, are probably intended, like pṛthu, to be neuter as well. However, the adjective jaghanarūpiṇam is unambiguously masculine and thus properly subordinated to svargam. D2,5,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, by transposition, jaghanaṃ svargarūpiṇam, "[who will mount] your hips, which have the form of heaven." This is perhaps an attempt to remedy the problem, but if so, it is not entirely successful. Grammatically it still leaves the gender disagreement between the neuter noun jaghanam and the masculine adjective svargarūpiṇam. It is also, in our opinion, rhetorically inferior. Ct and Cr try to grapple with the now awkward metaphor by taking svargarūpiṇam as a bahuvrīhi compound with the sense "that of which the form is heaven, that is to say, unsurpassed pleasure. The meaning then is 'that which is a cause of unsurpassed pleasure.' (svargarūpiṇaṃ svargo niratiśayasukhaṃ tasya rūpaṃ yasyāsti. niratiśayasukhahetubhūtam ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly.)" Cs justifies the use of the term svarga, "heaven," in the sense of pleasure. He begins with a quotation claiming that pleasure that is obtained through desire, is accompanied by no pain, and is not immediately afflicted [regretted?] deserves the name svar, "heaven." Whatever has the form of that is said to have the form of heaven. Cs, alone among the commentators, notes that the use of the masculine for svargarūpiṇam here is irregular. (yan na duḥkhena saṃbaddhaṃ na ca grastam anantaram / abhilāṣopanītaṃ ca sukhaṃ svaḥpadāspadam // ity ukter niratiśayasukhaṃ svargaḥ. tasya rūpam asyāstīti sargarūpī tam. puṃliṅgatvam ārṣam.) The translators appear to be uneasy with the overtly sexual content of the verse. Of those consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1995) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 460) seem willing to confront its literal meaning. Gita Press renders, "Who is going to bestride today your broad hips resembling a disc of gold, encircled by a girdle of gold, and which is heaven incarnate?" Raghunathan amusingly quotes Fitzgerald's famous translation of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam (Edward Fitzgerald 1859, verse 11) in rendering, "Who shall mount this day on your stout loins which resemble a golden sphere, and are girded by a golden zone, and are 'paradise enow'?" Roussel (1903, vol. 3. p. 494) significantly bowdlerizes the passage, rendering, "Tes larges hanches, étincelantes comme des disques en or affiné, couvertes de guirlandes dorées, au céleste aspect, qui les touchera aujourd'hui?" In this approach he has been followed closely by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 464) and Benoît (1999, p. 1288).

17. "other person" pumān . . . anyaḥ: Literally, "other male or man." D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G3,M1,3,4,6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read adya, "today," for anyaḥ, "other."

"Śakra, Viṣṇu, or the Aśvins" śakro viṣṇur athāśvinau: Cs invests a considerable amount of energy in arguing for the ordering and inclusion of these particular deities. He notes that although Viṣṇu is the foremost of the gods, he is mentioned after Indra because he is Indra's younger brother. He raises an objection to the effect that it is improper to pass over such deities as Rudra to include the [relatively lowly] Aśvins. Cs acknowledges that this is a good point but argues first that they should be counted among the gods because of their being similar to another pair of praiseworthy twins, Nalakūbara and Maṇigrīva. Or, he argues, they are established among the gods because of their strength. Finally, Cs argues that one might understand that the mention of the two Aśvins is appropriate because of their being established as the physicians who treat the afflictions of the gods when the latter are suffering from the affliction caused by the god of love. (viṣṇur upendraḥ. sarvasuparvavarasyāpi kāniṣṭhyāt tad anantaragrahaḥ. aśvinau nanu rudrādikān surān vihāyānayor anayo graha iti cet satyam. nalakūbaramaṇigrīvayor yamalayoḥ prastutatvāt tatsamāv iti pramitatvena deveṣv etayor eva sattvād iti vā. manmathavyathātaḥ sureṣu vyathācikitsakatvena pramitayor anayor grahaṇaṃ yuktimad iti vā jñeyam.)

"on his account, you pass me by" mām atītya . . . yasya tvāṃ yāsi: Literally, "of whom you are going, having passed me." V3,D6,7,T3,M10, and KK and VSP read yaṃ ca for yasya, yielding the sense "and to whom you are going." Ñ1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yac ca for yasya. This lends the sequence the sense "and in that you are going [that is not right]."

18. "So rest here . . . on this . . . stone surface" viśrama . . . śilātalam idam: Literally, "rest or stop . . . this slab of rock or surface of a rock." The verb vi + √śam normally construes with the locative, so in effect each pāda is a separate syntactical unit. Thus Rāvaṇa is saying, "Rest. This is a stone surface." We read with Cr, who inserts the adverb tatra, "there, on it."

"for there is no lord in the triple world who is my equal" trailokye yaḥ prabhuś caiva tulyo mama na vidyate: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read madanyo naiva for tulyo mama na. This lends the line the sense "There is no lord in the three worlds other than I."

19. "It is I" eṣaḥ: Literally, "he." V1,3,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evam, "thus or in this fashion."

"and I am the lord and master" yaḥ prabhuś cāpi bhartā ca: Literally, "who am also lord and master." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhartur bhartā vidhātā ca, "[I am] the master of the master, and the disposer." Cr understands the sequence to mean "I am the master that is the ruler of the master, i.e., ruler of the triple world, and therefore I am the disposer, that is to say, the protector (trailokyasya bhartuḥ svāmino 'pi bhartā svāmy ata eva vidhātā pālayitā)." Cs seems to take the reference to be to Rambhā's husband [Nalakūbara]. He says, "I am the master, that is, the employer [lit., 'nourisher'], of him whom you honor as your master. (tvayā bhartṛtayābhimatasyāpi bhartā poṣakaḥ.)" For vidhātā, "disposer," Cs glosses, "maker or agent (kartā)."

20. "you are like a father to me" tvaṃ hi me guruḥ: Literally, "for you are my guru." The term guru in this context, as the following verses bear out, refers to a senior male relative in the same generation as one's father or father-in-law. See note to 7.25.23. Cr, the only commentator to address the term here, glosses, "king (rājā)."

21. "Indeed . . . by others" anyebhyo 'pi: Literally, "even from others." M2,7, and KK and VSP read hi, "for or indeed," for [a]pi, "even."

"For by rights, I am your daughter-in-law" dharmataś ca snuṣā te 'ham: D6,7,10,11, T3,4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tad dharmataḥ, "thus by rights or [as a compound taddharmataḥ] by rule of that," for dharmataś ca. Cs understands that the phrase "by rights of that (taddharmataḥ)" means "by the right of Rambhā's assignation, which she has made with Nalakūbara (taddharmato mayā nalakūbarakṛtasaṃketadharmataḥ—so Cs)." Ct, like Cs, takes the expression to mean "by the right or rule of assignation (saṃketadharmataḥ)." See Ct's comments at notes to verse 23 below.

"This" etat: D6,5,7,10,11,T3,M10, and KK and VSP read eva, "indeed."

22. "her eyes lowered to her feet" caraṇādhomukhīm: Literally, "her face lowered to the feet." Cr, whom we follow, glosses, "she who was the agent of a glance that was restricted to the tips of her own feet (svacaraṇāgramātrāvalokanakartrīm ity arthaḥ)." Compare 7.9.11 and notes, where Cr understands this phrase somewhat differently. Ct understands similarly but does not specify whose feet she is gazing at. The idea is that Rambhā's face is lowered in fear and modesty. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 494) understands, incorrectly, that Rambhā has prostrated herself at Rāvaṇa's feet. In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 465) and Benoît (1999, p. 1288).

"my son's" sutasya: Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to Indrajit.

Following 22ab, D6,7,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of one line [536*]: "Then to her, the hairs of whose body had bristled merely at the sight of him . . . (romaharṣam anuprāptāṃ dṛṣṭamātreṇa tāṃ tadā /)."

23. "For by rights" dharmataḥ: Literally, "according to dharma." Ct, like Cs (in notes to verse 21 above), takes the expression to mean "by the right or rule of assignation (saṃketadharmataḥ)."

24. "dearer to him than life itself" priyataraḥ prāṇaiḥ: Literally, "more dear than life breaths." The placement of the phrase makes it overwhelmingly likely that, as Cr suggests, it is Kubera to whom Nalakūbara is so dear. The less likely, but still plausible, interpretation would be to take the phrase, as Benoît (1999, p. 1288) does, to indicate that Rambhā is saying that her lover is dearer to her than life itself. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 465) impossibly forces the grammar, rendering, "I am the wife of thy son, and dearer to him than his life's breath."

"He is famed" khyāto yaḥ . . . asau: Literally, "who is known, he." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vikhyātaḥ . . . ayam, "[is] widely known, he."

25. "He is . . . He is" yaḥ . . . bhavet . . . bhavet /. . . bhavet: Literally, "[he] who would be . . . he would be . . . he would be."

"a brahman in respect to righteousness" dharmataḥ . . . vipraḥ: Cs notes that Nalakūbara is like a brahman with respect to vedic study and other such acts of piety and that the other equivalences should be read similarly. (dharmataḥ svādhyāyādidharmāt. vipras tatsamaḥ. evam uttaratrāpi.) Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "in respect to the practice of righteousness (dharmato dharmānuṣṭhānaviṣaye)."

26. "that world guardian" lokapāla-: Kubera is one of the eight protectors of the directions (lokapālas or dikpālas). He is the ruler of the northern quarter (region). See Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 3, especially verses 14–17 and notes.

"I have made an assignation" kṛtasaṃketā: As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr note, the reference is to a love tryst (kṛtaratisaṃketā—Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly).

"It is for his sake" tam uddiśya: Literally, "with reference to him."

"put on" kṛtam: Literally, "made or done."

27. "For it is he and none other who loves me . . . By the force of that truth you must release me" yathā tasya hi nānyasya bhāvo māṃ prati tiṣṭhati / tena satyena mām . . . moktum arhasi: Literally, "For just as there is emotion of him and of no other with respect to me . . . by that truth you ought to release me." It is apparent to us that Rambhā is taking recourse to the great weapon of the weak in traditional Indian texts, the so-called "truth act." She adjures Rāvaṇa to release her on the strength of the truth and purity of her exclusive emotional bond with her lover, Nalakūbara. See Cr's comments on this in notes to verse 28 below; see, too, W. N. Brown 1940 and 1972. Ck, Cg, and Ct see the relative clause beginning with yathā as an elliptical expression that needs to be completed by a parallel independent clause, which they supply. Thus they interpret: "Just as there is love of him and of no other toward me, so is there love of me toward him (yathā hi tasya bhāvo māṃ pratīti nānyasya tathā mamāpi bhāvas taṃ prati tiṣṭhatīti śeṣaḥ—so Ck; Cg and Ct similarly)." Cr understands the ellipsis slightly differently. He says: "Just as there is emotion, that is, love, of him, that is, Nalakūbara, toward me, in the same way there is no [love] on the part of any other (yathā tasya nalakūbarasya bhāvaḥ prema māṃ prati tiṣṭhati tathānyasya na)." Cs offers two interpretations. His first is similar to that of Cr. As an alternative, he proposes taking the term mām, which everyone else understands to be the accusative singular of the first person pronoun, as the accusative singular of the noun mā, which he glosses as śobhā, "splendor." His explanation is: "Just as there is love on my part directed toward [his] beauty and there is not any love directed to any other man, such as you. The meaning is that I have no desire for you. (yadvā yathā tasya viṣaye. māṃ śobhāṃ prati. mameti śeṣaḥ. bhāvaḥ. nānyasya puruṣasya tvadāder viṣaye na tiṣṭhati tvatkāmanā mama nāstīti bhāvaḥ.)" Ś,D2,8,12,M1, and KK and VSP read tathā, "thus," for yathā, "just as." See, too, W. N. Brown 1940, 1968, 1972.

28. "Right now that righteous man awaits, anxiously longing for me." sa hi tiṣṭhati dharmātmā sāmprataṃ matsamutsukaḥ: Literally, "For now that righteous one stands, longing for me." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read māṃ pratīkṣya, "having awaited me," for sāmprataṃ mat-, "now . . . for me." KK and VSP read the slight variant māṃ pratīkṣan, "expecting or awaiting me."

"So you ought not create an obstacle for your son here." tan na vighnaṃ sutasyeha kartum arhasi: D10 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tatra vighnaṃ tu tasyeha kartuṃ nārhasi, "In this you ought not create an obstacle for him here." B3,D7,9,11,12, and KK and VSP read instead tatra vighnaṃ sutasyeha kartuṃ nārhasi, "In this you ought not create an obstacle for [your] son here."

29. "and by the same token, I should be cherished by you" lālanīyā tathāsmi te: Literally, "in the same way I am to be fondled by you." The term lālanīyā, "to be fondled or cherished," is slightly awkward here, since the term can also have a sexual connotation of caressing, fondling, sporting, etc. Clearly here, in the context in which Rambhā is desperately trying to argue for a filial relationship with Rāvaṇa, she means it in the sense in which it is used for the fond or indulgent treatment of a child by its elders. V1,B1,3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M5,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, perhaps in an attempt at emendation, read instead the unambiguous pālanīyā, "I am to be protected."

30. "which was in accord with righteousness and proper conduct" dharmārthasahitam: Literally, "accompanied by dharma and artha." This phrase normally appears in debates concerning the propriety of political action in the epic, where artha has the sense in which it used in the arthaśāstra, that is to say, "proper political conduct on the part of kings." In the present context, one has to extend this meaning to refer to "proper conduct in general."

"cutting her off" tām . . . nirbhartsya: Literally, "having reviled, eclipsed, or threatened her." As we understand it, the present participle bruvāṇā, "as she was speaking," of pāda a, suggests that Rāvaṇa simply cuts her off as she is speaking and throws her down.

"inflamed with lust and infatuation" kāmamohābhisaṃrabdhaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāmabhogābhisaṃraktaḥ, "impassioned for sexual pleasure."

"he began to rape her" mithunāyopacakrame: Literally, "he began to couple [with her]." There are very few references to forcible rape in the epic literature, and three of them are in the Uttarakāṇḍa: here; at 7.30.27, where Indra rapes Ahalyā; and at 7.71.15, where Daṇḍa rapes Arajā. This exact phrase is used at 7.71.15.

For 30abcd, D5–7,10,11,S substitute a passage of five lines [541*]: "Addressed in this fashion, Daśagrīva replied with feigned modesty: 'What you said, "I am your daughter-in-law," would refer to the practice among faithful wives.[1] But this is the fixed[2] and unvarying custom among the gods in the heavenly world: "Apsarases cannot have a husband nor is there marriage with only one woman.[3]" ' And when he had spoken in this fashion, the rākṣasa threw her down[4] on the stone surface."

[1] "among faithful wives" ekapatnīṣu: The term ekapatnī must be taken, as suggested by Cr, in its sense of a woman who has only one husband and is faithful to him (ekapatinirūpitapatnītvaviśiṣṭāsu). Compare Meghadūta 10.

[2] "fixed" stihitā: Literally, "standing." D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead matā, "approved or sanctioned."

[3] "Apsarases cannot have a husband nor is there marriage with only one woman." patir apsarasāṃ nāsti na caikastrīparigrahaḥ: Ct comments: "Apsarases do not have a permanent husband. And the gods, too, do not take any particular apsaras to be their wife. That is what it means. (apsarasāṃ niyataḥ patir nāsti. surāṇām apy ekāpsaraḥparigraho bhāryatvena nāstīty arthaḥ.)" Cr understands similarly. Cs comments at some length on this line and, as is often the case with him, takes exception to the commentary of Ct and Cm. Cs argues that Rāvaṇa is saying to Rambhā that apsarases do not have husbands or lords in the sense that they do not go through the formal marriage ritual characterized by the clasping of hands of the married couple, and therefore this practice, i.e., making love to Rambhā, is legitimate, as is his taking her over and above his lawful wife, Mandodarī. He urges her, therefore, not to violate this rule (dharma). Further, Rāvaṇa's words are parsed by Cs as follows: "I am not a person who takes a single wife. I am a libertine (kāmukaḥ). And you are an amorous and wanton woman (kāminī kulaṭā). Therefore, my persistence is appropriate and it should not be met with resistance." Cs then goes on to quote Ct and Cm on the passage, for which see above. He quotes Ct accurately, but we must take his word that Cm says the same thing, as our versions of Cm do not include his comments. Cs argues that those earlier commentators are expressing a syntactical relationship that does not accord with the matter under consideration. He further argues that we are to understand that they fail to take into consideration the fact that, in this context of a man taking a single woman, the words "pati, etc.," have a much wider range of signification than just that of husband. (patir apsarasāṃ nāsti pāṇigrahaṇapūrvakaṃ patir nāsti. mamāstu tathā tava tu mandodary upary eva vartanarūpo dharmo 'sti. taṃ mā gamayety ata āha na ceti. aham ekastrīparigraho na ca. kāmuko 'haṃ kāminī kulaṭā tvam. ato nirnibandho yukto 'yaṃ nirbandha iti bhāvaḥ . . . iti tīrtho nāgojibhaṭṭaś ca prakṛtānupayuktānvayavādinau. na caikastrīparigraha ity etadarthasya patir ityādinaiva labdher ādhikyam api na nibhālayāmāsatur iti jñeyam.)

[4] "And when he had spoken in this fashion, the rākṣasa threw her down" evam uktvā sa tāṃ rakṣo niveśya: Literally, "having spoken in this fashion, that rākṣasa, having caused her to lie down." Cs argues that the word "rakṣaḥ," i.e., rākṣasa, is used pointedly here (line 5) to show that there is no humanity (literally, "human maleness") in rape. Or, he argues, Rāvaṇa speaks to Rambhā as he does with the intention of indicating that his male aggression is, in effect, not a sin, even though, in fact, it is a cause of sin by virtue of its bringing upon him a curse. (kāmavijaye puṃstvaṃ nāstīti rakṣa ity uktiḥ. idaṃ puṃstvaṃ śāpaupayikatayā pāpahetur iti vidyamānam apy avidyamānaprāyam ity abhiprāyeṇaivam uktir iti vā.)

31. Following verse 31, Ñ,V3,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,S, and Gorresio insert a passage of two lines [543*]: "With her locks and tresses flying loose[1] and her sproutlike hands shaking,[2] she resembled a blossoming creeper buffeted by the wind (lulitālakakeśāntā karavepitapallavā / pavanenāvadhūteva latā kusumaśālinī //)."

[1] "With her locks and tresses flying loose" lulitālakakeśāntā: Literally, "with locks and the ends of her hair disheveled." The expression is somewhat redundant, as it is not clear how to distinguish alaka from keśānta. B3,D6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead lulitākulakeśāntā, "her tresses flying free and disordered." In this case, the words lulita and ākula, both meaning "disheveled," are redundant.

[2] "her sproutlike hands shaking" karavepitapallavā: Literally, "whose sprouts were shaken by hand." We agree with Cv, Ck, Cg, and Ct in reading the compound as a paranipāta. (karavepitapallavā vepitakarapallavā). Cr appears to take the compound literally, arguing that Rambhā is actually holding a shaking lotus sprout in her hand, which he sees as tied up with the disordered condition of her ornaments and garlands as described in verse 31 (kare vepitaḥ pallavaḥ kamalaṃ yasyā ata eva bhraṣṭe pracyute mālyavibhūṣaṇe yasyāḥ sā).

32. "ran to Nalakūbara" nalakūbaram āsādya: Literally, "having reached or approached Nalakūbara."

33. "And" ca: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

34. "But" tu: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the emphatic particle vai.

"and" ca: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "but or and."

"with her hands cupped in supplication, then" [a]tha sāñjaliḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1, 3,4,6,7,10,11,T2–4,G1,2,M3,4,6,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṛtāñjaliḥ, "having cupped her hands in supplication."

"just as it had happened" yathātathyam: Literally, "according to the truth." The word -tathya-, "truth," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D1,4–7,10,11,T1,2,4,G1,3,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous yathātattvam.

35. "to Indra's heaven, Triviṣṭapa" triviṣṭapam: Literally, "to Triviṣṭapa." See notes to 7.19.26.

"he passed the night here" tena . . . niśeha pariṇāmyate: Literally, "the night was passed here by him." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tena . . . niśeyaṃ pariṇāmitā, "this night was passed here by him." In any case, Ck, Cg, and Ct all add the word iha, "here" (iheti śeṣaḥ). Cr alone proposes adding the phrase "together with me (mayā saheti śeṣaḥ)."

36. "Seizing me" gṛhītvā: Literally, "having seized." D6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the participle gṛhītā, "[I was] seized."

37. "And although I told him the whole truth" mayā tu sarvaṃ yat satyaṃ tad dhi tasmai niveditam: Literally, "But all that, which was truthful, was reported by me to him." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mayā tu sarvaṃ yat satyaṃ tasmai sarvaṃ niveditam, "But, all that was truthful, all of that was reported to him by me." Several of the commentators take note of the awkward repetition of the word sarvam, "all," in this reading. Ct claims that it is not a poetic fault because of Rambhā's being in the grip of fear (atra sarvapadasya dvirupādānaṃ bhayavaśān na doṣāya). Cs, somewhat similarly, as one of his alternate explanations, is willing to write off the apparent poetic flaw by noting that it was uttered during Rambhā's lamentation. (pralāpakālatvāt sarva iti dvirupādānaṃ na doṣāyeti vā). Before this explanation, Cs offers a rather more forced one. According to this, the first occurrence of the word sarvam belongs to Rāvaṇa's question and modifies Rambhā's ornamentation, so that she is being asked for whose sake she is wearing all this ornamentation. The second occurrence of the word then refers to her reporting to Nalakūbara the whole truth. (idaṃ sarvaṃ alaṃkaraṇaṃ kasya kam uddiśyeti tena rakṣasā pṛṣṭā. tu tadanantaraṃ mayā yan nivedanīyaṃ tat sarvaṃ satyaṃ yathā bhavati tathā niveditam.)

38. "My lord . . . Your majesty" deva . . . prabho: Literally, "O god . . . O lord." The referent of the vocative deva is ambiguous here. It is the term by which Rambhā addressed Nalakūbara in verse 35 above, and it might be used in that way here. But since she unambiguously calls Nalakūbara prabhu, "lord," in this verse, it is likely that the vocative deva, which is a common mode of address to a king, is intended to be included in the quotation within her speech to Nalakūbara and refers to Rāvaṇa.

"But brushing all that aside" tat sarvaṃ pṛṣṭhataḥ kṛtvā: Literally, "having put that all behind [him]."

39. "bestower of pride" mānada: See 7.4.11; 7.25.41; and notes. For a discussion of the use of this term, see notes to 6.110.6. D,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suvrata, "O [you] of excellent vows."

"For" ca: Literally, "and." D2,6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the particle hi, "indeed."

40. "about this" evam: Literally, "thus, in this fashion." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D,T3,4,M10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead etat, "this."

"egregious" parām: Literally, "high or extreme."

"he entered into meditation" dhyānaṃ saṃpraviveśa: Ck, Cg, Ct, Cr, and Cs all observe that Nalakūbara is meditating to determine whether Rambhā's account is true or not. Cs makes the misogynistic ideology underlying this explicit, observing: "Testimony given only by a woman is not trustworthy and therefore Nalakūbara meditates in order to determine the truth or falsity of her words (yoṣinmātrabhāṣaṇaṃ na viśvasanīyam iti tadvacanamithyātathyānirṇayārthaṃ dhyānam āsthitaḥ)."

41. "Rāvaṇa's actions" tasya tat karma: Literally, "that deed of his."

"his eyes red with rage" roṣatāmrākṣaḥ: D6,10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous krodhatāmrākṣaḥ.

"took water in his hand" toyaṃ jagrāha pāṇinā: Literally, "he grasped water with his hand." The taking up and/or sipping of water is a common purificatory practice before uttering a vow or a curse. See notes to verse 42 below. Compare 1006*, line 5 and note 1, following notes to 7.57.28. See, too, Hopkins 1932, esp. pp. 324–25.

42. "heavenly water . . . sipped it" salilaṃ divyam upaspṛśya: Literally, "having sipped heavenly water." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead salilaṃ sarvam upaspṛśya. This lends the phrase the sense "having sipped all that water." This, in turn, has led Ck, Cg, and Ct to understand that Nalakūbara applies the water to all of his sense organs, the eyes, etc. (cakṣurādīndriyagaṇaṃ sarvam ity arthaḥ—so Ck, Cg, and Ct). See 7.96.15 and notes.

"according to the ritual precepts" yathāvidhi: As noted by Benoît (1999, p. 1723), the sipping or sprinkling of water is a ritual action designed to purify Nalakūbara so that he may more effectively deliver his malediction.

"then" tadā: G1 and KK and VSP read instead yathā, "in such a way."

"pronounced" utsasarja: Literally, "he released."

43. "he shall never force himself upon . . . again" na . . . upayāsyati: Literally, "he shall not approach sexually."

44. "And if ever . . . he should assault" yadā tu dharṣayiṣyati: Literally, "but when he will assault." D6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hi, "for, indeed," for tu, "but." For a similar use of various derivations of the verb √dhṛṣ to indicate forcible rape, see 7.17.24; 7.30.27; and 637*, line 2, note 2, following notes to verse 7.30.37.

"his head" mūrdhā tu: Literally, "and his head." The syllables -dhā tu are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"shall burst into seven pieces" saptadhā . . . śakalībhavitā: Literally, "will be fragmented seven ways." Threats or curses involving someone's head shattering into various numbers of pieces are a common motif from the time of the Upaniṣads. On this motif, see Insler 1989.

45. "the war drums of the gods" devadundubhayaḥ: Ct observes that the sound of the drums and so forth is a sign of [the gods'] satisfaction (dundubhivādyādayaḥ saṃtoṣāt). Cs believes that the drums of the gods resound spontaneously through the force of fate. This, he argues, should indicate to us that Nalakūbara's curse is approved by the Lord and also that even Brahmā, etc., agree that Rāvaṇa's time is at hand. And, Cs continues, that is why the next verse says, "headed by Grandfather Brahmā." (devadundubhayo neduḥ svayam eva daivāt. etenāyaṃ śāpa īśvarasaṃmata iti jñāyate. na kevalam etāvat kiṃtu brahmāder api kāla āsann iti saṃmatir ity āha—pitāmahamukhā iti.) For other references to war drums, see 155*, note 2, following notes to 7.9.27 and 7.19.25.

46. "headed by Brahmā, Lord of creatures" prajāpatimukhāś cāpi: Literally, "and having Prajāpati at [their] head as well." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pitāmahamukhāś caiva, "and, indeed, having the Grandfather at [their] head."

"the overall state of the world" lokagatiṃ sarvām: Literally, "the entire state or condition of the world." Ck, Cg, and Ct explain that the reference is to the terrible condition of the world, the root of which is to be found in the oppression carried out by Rāvaṇa (lokasya tatkṛtapīḍāmūladurdaśām). Cs glosses, "injury to people (janahiṃsā)."

"the impending doom" mṛtyum: Literally, "death." Cs observes that the gods are delighted upon learning of the impending death of the rākṣasa and the means to that end in the form of that curse (tasya rakṣaso mṛtyuṃ ca śāparūpaṃ tatsādhanaṃ ca jñātvā praharṣitā iti).

Following verse 46, KK (7.26.56cd), VSP (7.26.59cd), and GPP (in brackets following its verse 7.26.58ab and 7.26.58cd and footnoted by the editor as extra in the text of Cg) insert a passage of one line [550*]: "And the seers and the ancestors experienced unsurpassed joy (ṛṣayaḥ pitaraś caiva prītim āpur anuttamām /)."

47. "he lost his desire to make love to unwilling women" maithunaṃ bhāvaṃ na . . . abhyarocayat: Literally, "he was not inclined toward erotic feelings." Ś1,3,Ñ2,V3,B1,D6–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read maithunībhāvam, "becoming engaged in sexual intercourse," for maithunaṃ bhāvam, "erotic feelings," while D2,3, and KK and VSP read maithune bhāvam, "the emotion connected with sexual intercourse." Interestingly Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Agastya is telling Rāma about Rāvaṇa's loss of sexual appetite for unwilling woman in order to fully reassure him that Sītā has not been violated by the rākṣasa (idaṃ vacanaṃ sītādevyā akṣatatvasya samyag rāmaṃ prati bodhanārtham—so Cg, Ct; Ck similarly).

Following verse 47, D6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [551*]: "When those women, faithful to their husbands, heard about that curse, so pleasing to their hearts, that had been uttered by Nalakūbara, they were reassured by that and attained happiness[1] (striyaś ca tena nirṇītāḥ prītim āpuḥ pativratāḥ / nalakūbaranirmuktaṃ śāpaṃ śrutvā manaḥpriyam //)."

[1] "When those women, faithful to their husbands . . . they were reassured by that and attained happiness" striyaś ca tena nirṇītāḥ prītim āpuḥ pativratāḥ: The line is rather awkward. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tena nītāḥ striyaḥ prītim āpuḥ sarvāḥ pativratāḥ, "All those women, faithful to their husbands, who had been carried off by him, attained happiness." Ck and Ct observe that by virtue of this [curse], the chaste wives—who had previously been carried off by Rāvaṇa to his inner apartments—upon hearing this curse so pleasing to them, would be reassured. (tena rāvaṇena nītāḥ prāk svāntaḥpuraṃ nītāḥ pativratāḥ striyaś ca taṃ sveṣṭaṃ śāpaṃ śrutvā prītim āpuḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.) Cr understands similarly.

1. "Then . . . Daśagrīva . . . along with his rākṣasas" atha daśagrīvaḥ sarākṣasaḥ: The sequence is ambiguous. It can also be read, as does Lahore (7.30.1), sa rākṣasaḥ, "he, the rākṣasa Daśagrīva." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sasainyabalavāhanaḥ, "together with [his] army, troops, and mounts." The terms sainya and bala are more or less synonymous here. Translators employ various strategies to try to cope with the redundancy. Gorresio (1870, p. 127) maintains the redundancy of the original, translating, "coll' esercito, coi carri e con tutte le sue forze." Dutt (1894, p. 1662) drops one term for "army" and the term for mounts, rendering simply, "with his army." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 496) collapses bala and sainya, translating, "avec son infanterie et sa cavalerie." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 467), who renders, "with his infantry and cavalry." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1999) takes the word bala in its sense of "strength," offering the unpersuasive "accompanied by the might of his army and vehicles." Raghunatha (1982, vol. 3, p. 462) renders, "along with his forces and mounts," while Benoît (1999, p. 1290) translates, "avec son armé et ses attelages." KK and VSP read instead daśagrīvaḥ sa rāvaṇaḥ, "he, Daśagrīva Rāvaṇa." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1, 3,7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tu, "but as for [Daśagrīva]," for atha, "then."

"passing beyond Mount Kailāsa . . . reached Indra's world" kailāsaṃ laṅghayitvā . . . / āsasāda . . . indralokam: Literally, "having gone beyond Kailāsa, he reached Indra's world." Ck and Ct note that Rāvaṇa must travel beyond Mount Kailāsa, as Indra's world is situated atop Mount Meru (tasya merūpari pratiṣṭhitatvāt).

"the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]." Ñ2,B1,3,4, D6,7,10,11,G1, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead daśānanaḥ, "the ten-faced [one]."

2. "its din . . . reached the world of the gods" devalokaṃ yayau śabdaḥ: Literally, "the sound went to the world of the gods." Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead devaloke babhau śabdaḥ, "the sound appeared in the world of the gods." Cs glosses, "that is to say, it was heard by those who were there (śrutas tatratyair iti yāvat)."

"like the roar of the ocean being shattered" bhidyamānārṇavopamaḥ: Literally, "like the ocean being shattered." One must follow the gloss of Cs, who notes "a sound similar to the sound of that (tatsvarasadṛśaḥ śabdaḥ)." D6,T,1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead mathyamānārṇavopamaḥ, "like the ocean being churned up."

3–4. "Indra trembled on his throne" indraḥ saṃcalitāsanaḥ: Literally, "Indra was one whose throne was shaken." This rather awkward compound could also, perhaps, be read as a paranipāta, āsanasaṃcalitaḥ, "shaken on or from his throne." Ñ,V1,3,B,3,4,D2–7,9–11,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead indraś calita āsanāt, "Indra was shaken or moved from his throne." The translators are divided as to whether Indra is shaken from or on his throne or rises from it voluntarily. Thus Dutt (1894, p. 1662), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 467), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 1999) all understand the former, while Gorresio (1870, p. 128), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 497), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 463), and Benoît (1999, p. 1290) all subscribe to the latter view.

"He addressed . . . the gods . . . there" abravīt tatra tān devān: Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D3,5–7,10,11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead devān athābravīt tatra, "then he addressed [the] gods there."

"the Ādityas, along with the Vasus, the Rudras, the Viśvas, the sādhyas, and the hosts of the Maruts" ādityān savasūn rudrān viśvān sādhyān marudgaṇān: The sādhyas are a class of semidivine celestial beings. See ManuSm 1.22; 3.195. The term is found elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa (2.22.2; 6.60.7; 6.105.7) but is most frequently encountered in the Utta- rakāṇḍa. See 7.28.25; 7.88.6; and 7.100.11. The word viśvāḥ is an abbreviated name for the class of vedic divinities more commonly called the Viśvedevas, "All-Gods." See, for example, 7.88.5–6. See Gonda 1975b, p. 102. Ñ2,D1,4,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ādityāṃś ca vasūn rudrān sādhyāṃś ca samarudgaṇān, "The Ādityas and the Vasus, the Rudras and the sādhyas, together with the hosts of Maruts."

5. "the immensely powerful . . . girded themselves for battle" saṃnahyante mahāsattvāḥ: Literally, "the immensely powerful ones equipped themselves." Ñ2,6,7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃnahya sumahāsattvāḥ, "having equipped themselves, those extremely powerful ones." The variant leaves the verse without an explicit finite verb.

6. "for he was fearful of Rāvaṇa" paritrastaḥ . . . rāvaṇaṃ prati: Literally, "frightened with respect to Rāvaṇa." Ck and Ct note that Indra's fear derives from the fact that he must not violate Lord Brahmā's word [i.e., his boon to Rāvaṇa] (bhagavadvacanasya paripālanīyatvād iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly). On Brahmā's boon, see notes to verse 8 below.

"Approaching" āgatya: Literally, "having approached." Ś2,3,Ñ1,V1,3,B4,D1–5,8,12, T1,2,4,G1,3,M2–10, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous āgamya.

7. "you who are endowed with immense power and valor, what shall we do" kathaṃ kariṣyāmo mahāvīryaparākrama: Literally, "How shall we act, O you who are endowed with immense power and valor?" Ñ2,B1,3,4,D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kathaṃ kariṣyāmi rāvaṇaṃ rākṣasaṃ prati, "How shall I act with respect to the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa?" T2,G1,M3,7–10, and KK and VSP read instead kathaṃ kariṣyāmi mahāvīryaparākramaḥ, "How shall I, who am endowed with immense power and valor, act?"

"For this mighty rākṣasa has come, seeking battle." asau hi balavān rakṣo yuddhārtham abhivartate: Literally, "For that mighty rākṣasa approaches for the sake of battle." Note the improper gender agreement between the masculine balavān and the neuter rakṣaḥ, "rākṣasa." Ñ2,B1,3,4,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read aho 'tibalavad rakṣaḥ, "Alas! the extremely mighty rākṣasa," for asau hi balavān rakṣaḥ. This reading corrects the gender disagreement. See notes to verse 15 below.

8. "because of the granting of that boon" varapradānāt: As Cr notes, this is, of course, a reference to the well-known boon of invulnerability to gods and other supernatural beings that was granted to Rāvaṇa as a reward for his austerities (devādyavadhyatvaṃ vacaḥ). On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see notes to 7.10.16.

"But, O God, those words of Prajāpati, must be rendered true." tac ca satyaṃ hi kartavyaṃ vākyaṃ deva prajāpateḥ: Literally, "And, O God, that speech of Prajāpati must be made true." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,3–7,10,11,T3,4 (both times), and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [555*]: "And that speech that was uttered by the lotus-born [one] must be made true (tat tu satyaṃ vacaḥ kāryaṃ yad uktaṃ padmayoninā)." KK and VSP read the compound satyavacaḥ, "that true speech," for satyaṃ vacaḥ.

9. "Please do as you did before when, relying upon your counsel, I burned up Namuci, Vṛtra, Bali, Naraka, and Śambara." tad yathā namucir vṛtro balir narakaśambarau / tvanmataṃ samavaṣṭabhya yathā dagdhās tathā kuru //: Literally, "Then just as, having relied on your counsel, Namuci, Vṛtra, Bali, Naraka, and Śambara were burned, you must act in the same way." The verse as it stands in the critical edition is awkward and elliptical. Few, if any, manuscripts collated appear to read both instances of the adverb yathā. Indeed, the majority of manuscripts across virtually all the subrecensions read mayā, "by me," for the second occurrence of yathā (Ś,Ñ,V1,3 [V2 missing],B1,4,D1–4,6–12,T3,4,G3 [G2 missing],M5,6). This appears to be a better textual and contextual reading. The majority of manuscripts that read the second yathā substitute purā, "long ago," for the first yathā (M1–3,7,8). T4 and M5 appear to read not yathā but rather purā and mayā. All printed editions consulted, except the critical edition, read yathā . . . mayā. Ś1,3,Ñ1,V1,3,D,T2–4,M1, and the texts of Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tvadbalam, "your strength," for tvanmatam, "your counsel." These variations lend the verse, as it appears in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, the sense of "You must act in the same way as when, having relied upon your might, I consumed Namuci, Vṛtra, Bali, Naraka, and Śambara." Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr generally understand Indra to be asking Viṣṇu to devise, that is to say, inform him of, some stratagem or means whereby Rāvaṇa can be killed (tathā rāvaṇasyāpi vadhopāyayatnaṃ kuru me ākhyāhi—so Ct). Most great demonic enemies of the gods acquire their power through some boon that they believe makes them invulnerable. The gods, chiefly Viṣṇu, thus need to devise some clever strategy to circumvent the boon.

"Namuci" namuciḥ: The story of Indra and Namuci is popular and known from the earliest literature. See 99*, lines 1–2 and notes, following notes to 7.6.32.

"Vṛtra" vṛtraḥ: The great primordial serpentine asura, Vṛtra, "the Encloser," is the paradigmatic enemy of the vedic divinity Indra. A version of the story of Vṛtra is told at Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 75–77. See notes to 7.75.4.

"Bali" baliḥ: See 7.29.16 and notes.

"Naraka, and Śambara" narakaśambarau: See 7.22.21–23 and notes.

10. "For, mighty God among gods . . . There is no one . . . in times of calamity" na hy anyo deva devānām āpatsu sumahābala: Literally, "For, O extremely mighty God among the gods, there is no other in calamities." One might also understand the line to mean "For, O extremely mighty God, there is no other among the gods in calamities."

Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3,4 and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na hy anyo deva deveśa tvām ṛte [tvadṛte—Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press] madhusūdana. This lends the line the sense "For, O God, O Lord of the gods, Madhusūdana, aside from you, there is no other . . . " There is a split in the printed editions in the rendering of the sequence deva deveśa, with Gorresio, KK, and VSP reading the sequence as two words, deva, "O God," and deveśa, "O Lord of the gods." The critical apparatus also supports this reading. This division is supported by Ct, Cg, and, according to the critical apparatus, Ck. Ct remarks, " 'O Lord' and 'O Lord of the gods' are both vocatives referring to Viṣṇu (deveti deveśeti ca viṣṇusaṃbodhanam)." Cg simply observes, " 'O God' is a vocative (deveti saṃbuddhiḥ)." Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press all read the sequence as a single compound, giving it the sense "O Lord of the god of gods." Among the translators consulted, only Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 497), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2000), and Benoît (1999, p. 1290) clearly translate this latter compound.

"you are the Supreme Spirit . . . other than you, who is our protector and recourse in times of calamity" gatiḥ parāyaṇaṃ vāsti tvām ṛte puruṣottama: Literally, "There is [no] refuge or highest recourse except for you, O Puruṣottama." The terms gatiḥ and parāyaṇam as they are used here overlap significantly in their meanings. We follow Ct and Cr, who gloss, "protector (rakṣakaḥ)" for the former and "refuge or highest refuge (āśrayaḥ [—so Ct] or paramāśrayaḥ [—so Cr]) for the latter." Ñ,B1,4,D6,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead gatiḥ parāyaṇaṃ cāpi trailokye sacarācare, "a protector and highest recourse in the triple world together with its fixed and moving contents." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead gatiḥ parāyaṇaṃ nāsti trailokye sacarācare, "there is not a protector [or] highest recourse in the triple world together with its fixed and moving contents." On the use of the term puruṣottama, see 7.9.2 and note.

11. "And it is you alone who have established me in the everlasting kingship of the gods." tvayāhaṃ sthāpitaś caiva devarājye sanātane: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [556*]: "It is by you that these worlds have been established and I, Śakra, as lord of the gods (tvayeme sthāpitā lokāḥ śakraś cāhaṃ sureśvaraḥ)."

Following 556*, Ñ1,D3,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of two lines [557*]: "It is you who have created this entire triple world together with its fixed and moving contents. And it is into you, O Lord, that they all enter at the end of a cosmic era. (tvayā sṛṣṭam idaṃ sarvaṃ trailokyaṃ sacarācaram / tvām eva bhagavan sarve praviśanti yugakṣaye//)"

12. "Therefore, please tell me . . . Will you . . . fight the enemy in battle yourself" tad ākhyāhi . . . mama svayam /. . . yudhyase saṃyuge ripum: We are inclined to agree with Ck, Cg, and Ct, who read the reflexive adverb svayam, "yourself," across the half-verse boundary to construe with the verb for fighting (yudhyase, "you fight,") in pāda d. This makes for a persuasive reading and has been followed by several translators, even though it seems to force the syntax a bit. Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous ācakṣva, "you must speak," for ākhyāhi. Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss the first half of the verse as follows: "That [tat], that is to say, therefore, please tell me truthfully a stratagem such that I would be victorious. Or will you fight yourself? The words 'Tell me that' should be supplied. (tat tasmān mama yathā jayaḥ syāt tathā tattvam upāyam ācakṣva. svayam eva vā yotsyase tad brūhīti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 463) incorporates this gloss into his translation, rendering, "Tell me, O Lord, how I may win, or will you fight Ravana yourself with sword and discus?" Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yotsyase rāvaṇaṃ prati, "will you fight against Rāvaṇa?" V1,D2, and KK and VSP read instead yotsyase rāvaṇaṃ prabho, "O Lord, will you fight Rāvaṇa?"

"sword" asi-: V3,D1,3,4,G3,M2,3,6,7, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead the indeclinable particle api, which explicitly marks pādas c and d as a question and lends the half line the sense "Will you fight Rāvaṇa with the aid of your discus?" The word asi is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

13. "You need have no fear" na paritrāsaḥ kāryas te: Literally, "Fear is not to be made by you." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kartavyaḥ for kāryas te, lending the line the sense "Fear is not to be made."

"Moreover" ca: Literally, "and."

14. "For the time being" tāvad: Literally, "for so long."

"this evil creature" eṣa durvṛttaḥ: Literally, "this one of evil conduct." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead duṣṭātmā, "evil-minded [one]," for durvṛttaḥ, "[one] of evil conduct."

"is impossible to kill . . . by the gods and dānavas" na . . . śakyo daivatadānavaiḥ / hantum: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,D2,6–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read śakyo jetuṃ surāsuraiḥ for śakyo daivatadānavaiḥ. This lends the passage the sense "is impossible to defeat by the gods or asuras [or] to kill [him]."

"in battle" yudhi: Ś1,Ñ2,B3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio (vāpi), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cāpi, "and even," but here in the sense of "or," lending the verse the sense that Rāvaṇa can be neither conquered nor killed.

15. "this rākṣasa . . . and assisted by his son" rakṣaḥ putrasahāyo 'sau: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasaḥ putrasahitaḥ, "the rākṣasa accompanied by his son." This reading essentially corrects the ongoing gender disagreement that continues in this passage by substituting the masculine rākṣasaḥ for the critical edition's neuter rakṣaḥ. The masculine form thus agrees with the various pronouns and adjectives in the verse. See notes to verse 7 above. We understand by the term putrasahāyaḥ, "assisted by his son," that the son in question is Meghanāda Indrajit. Rāvaṇa, however, does have other sons, and the term could be interpreted to mean "the rākṣasa, assisted by his sons." Translators are divided: Dutt (1894, p. 1663), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 468), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2000), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 463), like us, read the singular, while Gorresio (1870, p. 128), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 497) and Benoît (1999, p. 1291) opt for the plural. See notes to verse 19 below.

"mighty feats" mahat karma: Literally, "a great deed." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr are in agreement in understanding the great feat to be a feat of battle (mahat karma yuddhakarma—so Ck and Cg; Ct and Cr similarly).

"I know this through my inherent knowledge." dṛṣṭam etan nisargataḥ: Literally, "This is seen naturally." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand that Viṣṇu is referring to his own inherent power of omniscience, whereby he sees, that is to say, knows, this (nisargataḥ sahajajñānaśaktyā dṛṣṭam avagatam—so Cg and Ct; Ck similarly). Cr, for some reason, wants to twist the natural syntax of the verse to make the adverb nisargataḥ refer to the innate nature of the rākṣasas, whereby Rāvaṇa will perform great and terrible deeds. This leaves the participle dṛṣṭam detached syntactically, and Cr glosses it as "is known by me" (rākṣaso nisargato rākṣasasvabhāvān mahad ugraṃ karma kariṣyatīti dṛṣṭaṃ mayā jñātam). The word nisargataḥ, "naturally," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

16. "And as for what you asked me, Śakra—'Will you fight him in battle?'" bravīṣi yat tu māṃ śakra saṃyuge yotsyasīti ha: Literally, "What you say to me, O Śakra, 'Will you fight in battle . . .'" Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yat tu māṃ tvam ābhāṣiṣṭhā yuddhyasveti sureśvara, "And as for what you said to me, lord of the gods, 'You must fight . . .'"

"I . . . by no means" naivāham: The ham of the word aham is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,V1,3,B1,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nāhaṃ tam, "I [shall] not [fight] him."

"Rāvaṇa, the lord of the rākṣasas" taṃ rāvaṇaṃ rākṣasādhipam: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B4,D, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇaṃ rākṣasaṃ yudhi, "the rākṣasa Rāvaṇa in battle."

17. "For Viṣṇu never turns back without having killed his enemy." anihatya ripuṃ viṣṇur na hi pratinivartate: Ś,Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D1–4,6–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nāhatvā samare śatruṃ viṣṇuḥ pratinivartate, "Viṣṇu does not turn back without having killed his enemy in battle."

"And at this time what you desire with regard to that rākṣasa is not feasible, as he has acquired that boon." durlabhaś caiṣa kāmo 'dya varam āsādya rākṣase: Literally, "Today this desire is difficult to obtain with regard to the rākṣasa after his having acquired a boon." Ś,Ñ,V1,D1,2,4,6–12, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead durlabhaś caiva kāmo 'dya varaguptād dhi rāvaṇāt, "For this desire is now extremely difficult to obtain because Rāvaṇa is protected by a boon." In neither reading is it made clear whose desire is being addressed, but, given the context in which Indra is the petitioner and Viṣṇu is, at least for the moment, denying his request, we believe that the wish is Indra's. No commentator specifies this. Translators consulted vary in their understanding. Dutt (1894, p. 1663) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 463–64) understand it to be Viṣṇu's desire. Gorresio (1870, p. 129), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 497), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2000) are nonspecific, leaving it ambiguous whose wish it is. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 468) and Benoît (1999, p. 1291) ignore the term entirely.

18. "But . . . I promise you" pratijānāmi: Literally, "I promise." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pratijāne ca, "And I promise."

"standing right before you" tvatsamīpam: Literally, "in your presence." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D1, 3–12,T1–3,G3,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous but perhaps more grammatical tvatsamīpe, "in your presence."

"that I myself shall be the cause of this rākṣasa's death" rākṣasasyāham evāsya bhavitā mṛtyukāraṇam: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhavitāsmi yathāsyāhaṃ rakṣaso mṛtyukāraṇam, "such that I will be the cause of this rākṣasa's death." Cr believes that by saying, "I shall be the cause of the rākṣasa's death" rather than "I will kill him," Viṣṇu is suggesting that he will not do so in his own proper form (asya rakṣaso mṛtyukāraṇam ahaṃ yathāvad bhavitāsmīti tvatsamīpe pratijāne kāraṇaṃ bhavitāsmīty anena svasya sākṣād dhananakartṛtvābhāvaḥ sūcitaḥ). In other words, Cr believes that Viṣṇu is hinting at his own future incarnation as Rāma.

19. "When I recognize that the time is at hand . . . and so gratify the gods" devatās toṣayiṣyāmi jñātvā kālam upāsthitam: Literally, "I shall delight the gods, having recognized that the time has come." Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D2,3,6–12,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead devatā nandayiṣyāmi jñātvā kālam upāgatam, "I shall delight the gods having recognized that the time has come."

"I shall kill Rāvaṇa, together with his son, in battle" aham enaṃ vadhiṣyāmi rāvaṇaṃ sasutaṃ yudhi: D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aham eva nihantāsmi rāvaṇaṃ sapuraḥsaram, "I, indeed, shall kill Rāvaṇa along with his followers." The compound sasutam can mean either "together with his son," or "together with his sons." As noted above, we understand the reference to be to Meghanāda Indrajit, who will be killed in battle by Lakṣmaṇa at Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 78. See notes to verse 15 above.

Following verse 19, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3,4,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio (lines 1,2 only), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [560*]: "'I have told you this truthfully, king of the gods and Sacī's lord.[1] So, free from fear, you must fight along with the great gods.[1]'[2] Then, the Rudras, together with the Ādityas, the Vasus, the Maruts, and the Aśvins, girded for battle, quickly marched forth from the city toward the rākṣasas.[3–4]"

[1] "along with the great gods" suraiḥ saha mahātmabhiḥ: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead suraiḥ sārdhaṃ mahābala, "O mighty [one], along with the gods. KK and VSP read instead sarvaiḥ saha mahābala, "O mighty [one], along with all [the gods]."

20. "just at daybreak" rajanīkṣaye: Literally, "at the waning of night."

"was heard" śuśruve: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś2,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the parasmaipada śuśrāva, which nonetheless must be read as passive.

"which always fought fiercely" prayuddhasya: Literally, "fighting fiercely." Since the actual battle does not commence until the following verse, we agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr in taking this as a general descriptive adjective rather than in any participial sense. They gloss, "whose fighting was superior or extreme (prakṛṣṭaṃ yuddhaṃ yasya—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly)." On the term prayuddha, see notes to 7.23.6, 7.25.11, and 7.28.34.

Following verse 20, Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,3–7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1–3,5–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [561*]: "Those immensely powerful warriors, roused to action,[1] advanced[2] toward the battlefield eyeing one another[3] in great excitement.[1–2] Then, when they saw that vast and indestructible army, impossible to conquer,[4] the soldiers of the thirty gods[5] were shaken.[3–4]"

[1] "roused to action" prabuddhāḥ: Literally, "awakened or excited." T1–3,G1,3,M1,2, 5,6,8–12, and KK and VSP read instead prayuddhāḥ, "fighting or fighting fiercely." See note above.

[2] "advanced" abhyavartanta: KK and VSP read instead hy abhyavartanta, "they advanced," to avoid the hiatus. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[3] "those immensely powerful warriors . . . eyeing one another" mahāvīryāḥ . . . anyonyam abhivīkṣya: It seems apparent from the fact that the warriors are looking at one another that the noun is intended to refer to the troops on both sides of the conflict. However, Dutt (1894, p. 1663), Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2001), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 464) believe that lines 1–2 refer exclusively to the rākṣasas. V3 and KK and VSP read hy anyonyam, "indeed, one another," to avoid the hiatus.

[4] "impossible to conquer" paramadurjayam: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samaramūrdhani, "in the forefront of battle."

[5] "the thirty gods" tridaśa-: Literally, "the thirty." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,3–7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead daivata-, "the gods."

21. "Then . . . between the gods and the rākṣasas" atha . . . devarākṣasayos tadā: Literally, "Now . . . between the god and rākṣasa . . . then." Although the dual ending of the dvandva compound would restrict initial battle to Indra and Rāvaṇa, the context makes it clear that this is a battle involving a large number of forces on both sides. A number of manuscripts and editions avoid the problem, replacing the dual with the plural. Ñ,V1 (both times),3,B1,3,4,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ . . . devadānavarakṣasām, literally, "Then . . . among the gods, dānavas, and rākṣasas." The alignment of forces, of course, is that the rākṣasas and the dānavas are on one side facing off against the gods. The dānavas in Rāvaṇa's army would be those who joined him during his march because of their enmity toward the gods at 7.25.37, where they are called daityas. Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2001) explicitly gets this right. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 464) mistakenly places the gods and the dānavas on one side and the rākṣasas on the other. Other translators who share this reading simply list the three groups.

"involving all sorts of weapons" nānāpraharaṇāyudham: Literally, "having for its weapons every sort of praharaṇa." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3,4,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nānāpraharaṇodyatam, "prepared with all sorts of weapons." See notes to 7.25.30.

22. "ran forward" abhyadhāvanta: Literally, "they ran toward." Ñ,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samavartanta, "they went forward."

"at Rāvaṇa's command" rāvaṇājñayā: Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāvaṇasya te, "those [ministers] of Rāvaṇa."

23–24. "There were": We have added these words for the sake of clarity. The two verses consist primarily of a list of the proper names of several of the principal rākṣasas mentioned in the previous books, primarily in the Yuddhakāṇḍa.

"Saṃhrādi" saṃhrādiḥ: The final syllable is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D3,5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃhrādaḥ, "Saṃhrāda."

"Mahāmukha" mahāmukhaḥ: Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ghaṭodaraḥ, "Ghaṭodara."

"Mahāmālin" mahāmālī: The syllables -mālī are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāhrādaḥ, "Mahāhrāda."

Following verse 24, Ñ1,V1,3,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1–7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [562*]: "Suptaghna, Yajñakopa, Durmukha, Dūṣaṇa, Khara, Triśiras, Karavīrākṣa, and the rākṣasa Sūryaśatru (suptaghno yajñakopaś ca durmukho dūṣaṇaḥ kharaḥ / triśirāḥ karavīrākṣaś ca sūryaśatruś ca rākṣasaḥ //)." The verse extends the list of Rāvaṇa's ministers.

Following 562*, D7,10,11,T2,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [563*]: "Mahākāya, Atikāya, Devāntaka, and Narāntaka (mahākāyo 'tikāyaś ca devāntakanarāntakau //)." This extends the list further.

25. "Surrounded by all of those immensely powerful warriors, that bull among rākṣasas" etaiḥ sarvair mahāvīryair vṛto rākṣasapuṃgavaḥ: Literally, "surrounded by all those immensely powerful ones . . . the bull among rākṣasas." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead etaiḥ sarvaiḥ parivṛto mahāvīryair mahābalaḥ, "Surrounded by all of these immensely powerful ones, the one of great strength."

"plunged into the enemy hosts" sainyam . . . praviveśa: Literally, "he entered the army." As the context makes clear and Cr observes, Sumālin and his forces are penetrating the army of the gods (sainyaṃ devasenāṃ praviveśa).

26. "Together with those night-roaming rākṣasas, he scattered in his rage" vidhvaṃsayati saṃkruddhaḥ saha taiḥ kṣaṇadācaraiḥ: Literally, "enraged, together with those night-roaming [ones], he scattered." On the kenning "night-roaming [ones]" (kṣaṇadācarāḥ), see note to 7.6.14. Ñ2,B3,D7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vyadhvaṃsayat samaṃ kruddho vāyur jaladharān iva, "Enraged, he all at once scattered . . . as the wind might clouds." KK and VSP read instead vyadhvaṃsayat susaṃkruddho vāyur jalacarān iva, "In a towering rage, he scattered . . . as the wind might aquatic creatures." The image is a peculiar one, to say the least, and one has to wonder whether this is a typographical error for jaladharān iva in KK (1913) and repeated in VSP, as KK (1905) reads jaladharān iva.

Following verse 26, D6,T1,2,G1,3,M, and KK [in brackets numbered as verse 33] insert a passage of two lines [565*]. These lines are placed before 564* in KK: "Terrified in their fear of Sumālin, the gods, being slaughtered like deer terrified by a lion, fled in all directions[1] (sumālībhayasaṃtrastāḥ surāś te sarvato diśam / pradudruvur vadhyamānāḥ siṃhatrastā mṛgā iva//)."

[1] "in all directions" sarvato diśam: Literally, "to the direction from all sides." D6,T1,G3,M3 correct the singular diśam to the plural, diśaḥ, "directions," while KK provides the singular locative diśi, "in a direction." KK's variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

Following verse 26, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–4,7–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK (following 565*), and VSP insert a passage of two lines [564*]: "Then, Rāma, being slaughtered by the night-roaming rākṣasas, the army of the gods was driven in all directions like deer driven by lions (tad daivatabalaṃ rāma hanyamānaṃ niśācaraiḥ / praṇunnaṃ sarvato digbhyaḥ siṃhanunnā yathā mṛgāḥ //)."

27. "Sāvitra, eighth among the Vasus" vasūnām aṣṭamo vasuḥ / sāvitraḥ: Etymologically the name would appear to mean "the son of Savitṛ." This figure is largely unknown outside of this incident. The name Sāvitra does not appear in any of the six sets of offspring of Savitṛ found in the various purāṇas listed by Citrāv 1964, pp. 1026–27 (s.v. savitṛ). It is clearly not among those listed at MBh 1.60.16–18. It is, however, found in a list of names at MBh 12.201.19, but this appears to be a list of the Rudras. Additionally, the name Sāvitra is found in a few purāṇic lists, for example, at MatsyaP 5.30 and LiṅgaP 1.63.2. In both of these cases the name is listed among the eleven Rudras. The Mahābhārata does have one reference to the name Sāvitra as one of the Vasus, but this passage has been relegated to the critical apparatus (MBh [Chitrashala Edition, 1929–1933] 13.150.16–17 = MBh [critical edition] Anuśāsanaparvan, App. I, No. 18, lines 36–37). See Citrāv 1964, pp. 1026–27 (s.v. savitṛ).

"into that great battle" mahāraṇam: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D2–5,8–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raṇājiram, "to the battlefield."

Following verse 27, Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,9–12,T1–3,G1,3,M, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK (1905, in brackets, numbered as 1, between verses 7.27.34 and 7.27.35; 1913 = 7.27.36), and VSP (in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.27.34 and 7.27.35) insert a passage of four lines [566*]: "In great excitement and surrounded by his troops, armed with all sorts of weapons raised,[1] he terrified[2] the enemy troops as a lion might small deer.[3][1–2] Then, two other[4] mighty warriors, Tvaṣṭṛ and Pūṣan, both clad in armor,[5] suddenly[6] entered the battlefield[7] together with their host.[3–4]"

[2] "he terrified" trasayan: Literally, "terrifying." The sentence as reconstructed by the editors of the critical edition lacks a finite verb.

[3] "as a lion might small deer" siṃhaḥ kṣudramṛgān iva: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10–12, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead praviveśa raṇājiram, "he entered the battlefield," thus providing a finite verb lacking in the critical reconstruction.

[4] "Then, two other" athāparau: Ñ2,V3,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathādityau, "Similarly, two Ādityas."

[5] "both clad in armor" daṃśitau: Ñ,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tau samam, "those two, together."

[6] "suddenly" sahasā: Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nirbhayau, "[those two] fearless."

[7] "entered the battlefield" praviṣṭau tad raṇājiram: Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā prāviśatāṃ raṇe, "then those two entered the battle."

28. "Now there arose a battle between the gods—who were furious at the rākṣasas' boasting of never turning back in battle—and the rākṣasas." tato yuddhaṃ samabhavat surāṇāṃ rākṣasaiḥ saha / kruddhānāṃ rakṣasāṃ kīrtiṃ samareṣv anivartinām //: Literally, "Then there was a battle with the rākṣasas on the part of the gods angry at the fame of the rākṣasas, who did not turn back in battles." The construction of the second line is awkward, since it is not immediately apparent whether one should construe the genitive plural kruddhānām, "angry," with the word rakṣasām, "of the rākṣasas," that immediately follows it or with surāṇām, "of the gods," in the preceding line. We have translated the verse freely, following the reading of the majority of commentators. Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr offer a gloss on the verse that provides their understanding of the syntax. Cr notes: "A battle took place together with the rākṣasas on the part of the gods, who were angry with regard to the reputation of the rākṣasas, who did not turn back in battles. (samareṣv anivartināṃ rakṣasāṃ kīrtiṃ prati kruddhānāṃ surāṇāṃ rākṣasaiḥ saha yuddhaṃ samabhavad—so Cr; Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct similarly)." All translators consulted, who share this reading, understand similarly. The sequence rakṣasāṃ kīrtim, "the reputation of the rākṣasas," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D7,8,10–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition saha rākṣasaiḥ, "together with the rākṣasas."

29. "the gods . . . heroic . . . them" śūrā devāṃs tān: Literally, "the heroic [rākṣasas] [slaughtered] those gods." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarve vibudhān, "all [those rākṣasas] . . . the wise gods."

30. "But . . . the gods" surās tu: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead devāś ca, "and the gods."

"through their own blazing energy . . . immensely powerful" mahāvīryān svatejasā: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalaparākramān, "[those rākṣasas] of immense strength and valor."

"various" vividhaiḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vimalaiḥ, "shining."

"sent . . . to the abode of Yama" anayan yamasādanam: Literally, "they led [them] to Yama's abode." The word anayan, "they led," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous upaninyur yamakṣayam.

31. "heroic" śūraḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1–4,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative rāma, "O Rāma."

"entered the fray" raṇam evābhyavartata: Literally, "he approached the very battle." Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tat sainyaṃ so 'bhyavartata, "he approached that army." The variant is, perhaps, a correction, since in verse 25 above, Sumālin has already entered the battle. The reference here is, of course, to the army of the gods.

32. "he scattered" vidhvaṃsayati: Literally, "he scatters." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D1,4,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the ātmanepada imperfect vyadhvaṃsayata, "he scattered."

"the . . . army of the gods" devānāṃ tad balam: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5,7,9–11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa daivatabalam, "he . . . the army of the divinities."

"just as the wind might rain clouds" vāyur jaladharān iva: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vāyur jaladharaṃ yathā, "just as wind might a rain cloud." Cf. verse 26 above.

33. "Pelted" pīḍyamānāḥ: Literally, "being afflicted or oppressed." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10, 11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hanymānāḥ, "being struck or killed."

"lances, fearsome darts" śūlaiḥ prāsaiś ca dāruṇaiḥ: Ñ2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śūlaprāsaiḥ sudāruṇaiḥ, "with very fearsome lances and darts."

"all the gods, who had assembled, could not stand their ground" surāḥ sarve na vyatiṣṭhan samāhitāḥ: Literally, "all the gods united could not stand." The syllables vya- and -an samāhitāḥ are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead surāḥ sarve na vyatiṣṭhanta saṃhatāḥ, "all the gods, who had massed together, could not stand."

34. "even though the thirty gods were being scattered" vidrāvyamāṇeṣu tridaśeṣu: Literally, "When the thirty were being scattered." Ñ2,B1–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read daivateṣu, "the divinities . . . ," for tridaśeṣu, "the thirty."

"the god Sāvitra, eighth among the Vasus" vasūnām aṣṭamo devaḥ sāvitraḥ: Ñ1,V3, D1,3–5,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kruddhaḥ, "angry or enraged," for devaḥ, "god." See notes to verse 27 above.

"stood his ground" vyavatiṣṭhata: Literally, "he stood." Ñ2,B1–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vai vyavasthitaḥ, "alone [he] stood."

35. "But . . . by his own troops" svair anīkais tu: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead svair athānīkaiḥ, "then, by his own troops."

"that night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaram: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

36. "Then there was a duel, extremely terrifying to the world, between the two frenzied warriors" sumattayos tayor āsīd yuddhaṃ loke sudāruṇam: Literally, "There was a battle, very terrible in the world, of those two, who were extremely intoxicated." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [568*]: "Then there took place a great and hair-raising battle[1] between those two (tatas tayor mahāyuddham abhaval lomaharṣaṇam)."

[1] "a great and hair-raising battle" mahāyuddham . . . lomaharṣaṇam: D7 and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous mahad yuddham, "great battle," for mahāyuddham, while KK and VSP read the phonological variant romaharṣaṇam for lomaharṣaṇam, "hair-raising."

37. "Sumālin's great serpent-chariot" tasya . . . / mahān sa pannagarathaḥ: Literally, "that great serpent-chariot of his." We follow Cr, who understands that, despite its syntactic distance from the word pannagarathaḥ, the genitive pronoun tasya refers to Sumālin (vasunā mahābāṇais tasya sumālinaḥ pannagarathaḥ). Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nihataḥ, "struck down," for mahān saḥ, "that great." This lends the passage the sense "his serpent-chariot [was] struck down." Presumably the idea, as reflected in several of the translations consulted, is that the chariot is drawn by serpents. Compare 7.25.36 and notes. Compare, too, 1335*, following notes to 6.60.11.

38. "Sumālin's" tasya: Literally, "his."

"with hundreds of sharp arrows" bāṇaśataiḥ śitaiḥ: Literally, "with sharp hundreds of arrows." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,3–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read citam, "heaped up or covered," for śitaiḥ, "sharp," lending the line a somewhat ambiguous sense. Our understanding of this reading would be that Sumālin's chariot is "covered with hundreds of arrows [released by Sāvitra]." Most translators understand the phrase in this way. However, Gorresio (1870, p. 130) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 465) understand that the chariot is provided or furnished with hundreds of [Sumālin's own] arrows.

39. "Quickly seizing that splendid, blazing mace, which resembled the rod of Kāla" tāṃ pradīptāṃ pragṛhyāśu kāladaṇḍanibhāṃ śubhām: Literally, "having quickly grasped that blazing, splendid [thing], which resembled the rod of Kāla." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ pragṛhya dīptāgrāṃ kāladaṇḍopamāṃ gadām, "then, having grasped that blazing-tipped mace, which was like the rod of Kāla." The word śubhām, "splendid," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"Sāvitra brought it down upon Sumālin's head" tasya mūrdhani sāvitraḥ sumāler vinipātayat: Literally, "Sāvitra caused it to fall on the head of that Sumāli." (Note the variant stem form of the name Sumālin/ Sumāli.) Ñ,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāṃ mūrdhni pātayāmāsa sāvitro vai sumālinaḥ, "Sāvitra, indeed, caused that [mace] to fall on Sumālin's head."

40. "And then, as it fell on Sumālin's head, that mace, which resembled a blazing meteor, looked like" tasya mūrdhani solkābhā patantī ca tadā babhau: Literally, "and then falling on his head, it, resembling a meteor, shone like." Ñ,B1,D1,3,4,6–8,10–12,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sā tasyopari colkābhā patantī vibabhau gadā, "And falling upon him, that mace, resembling a meteor, shone." D5 and KK and VSP read patantīva babhau, "[it] as if falling, shone," for patantī vibabhau, "[it] falling, shone."

"a mighty thunderbolt hurled at a mountain by thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣasamutsṛṣṭā girāv iva mahāśaniḥ: Literally, "like a great thunderbolt released at a mountain by the thousand-eyed [one]." Ñ,V3,B1,4,D1,3–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita

Press, KK, and VSP read instead indrapramuktā garjantī girāv iva mahāśaniḥ, "like a thundering, mighty flash of lightning, released at a mountain by Indra."

41. "Once he was struck down in battle and reduced to ashes by that mace" gadayā bhasmasād bhūto raṇe tasmin nipātitaḥ: Literally, "struck down in that battle, having become ash by the mace." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gadayā bhasmatāṃ nītaṃ nihatasya raṇājire, "[the body] of him who was struck down on the battlefield was turned to ash by the mace."

"his body—neither flesh nor bone—could be seen" tasya naivāsthi kāyo vā na māṃsaṃ dadṛśe tadā: Literally, "Then neither his bone, nor body, nor flesh was seen." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read na śiraḥ, "nor his head," for kāyo vā, "his body, or." This lends the line the sense "Neither his bones, nor his head, nor his flesh was seen."

42. "they . . . fled" dudruvuḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vyadravan, "they dispersed or scattered."

"wailing loudly" krośamānā mahāsvanam: Literally, "crying a great sound." We read the compound mahāsvanam adverbially, in the sense of "very loudly." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7, 10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read parasparam, "mutually," for mahāsvanam. This lends the passage the sense "wailing to one another."

Following verse 42, Ñ,V1,3,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [572*]: "Being driven off by the Vasu, the rākṣasas could not stand their ground (vidrāvyamāṇā vasunā rākṣasā nāvatasthire)."

1–2. "and . . . that his own army . . . had fled" vidrutaṃ cāpi svaṃ sainyam: The word svam, "his own," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,M4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous svasainyaṃ vidrutaṃ cāpi.

"by arrows" śaraiḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D2,6,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suraiḥ, "by the gods."

"toward battle" yudhi: Literally, "in the battle." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

3. "Mounted in his chariot, which shone like fire . . . the [great chariot-warrior]" sa rathenāgnivarṇena: Literally, "he, with a chariot that had the color of fire." Ñ,V1,3,B1, 3,4,D1–7,9–11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, and NSP read instead sa rathena mahārheṇa, "he with a chariot of great value." KK and VSP read instead surathenāgnivarṇena, "with an excellent chariot that had the color of fire."

"moved at its owner's will" kāmagena: See notes to 7.25.10.

"the army of the gods" senāṃ tām: Literally, "that army." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all note that this is the army of the gods (devasenām—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly).

4. "he plunged into that army" praviśatas tasya: Literally, "as he was entering."

"the gods . . . at the mere sight of him" devās tasya ca darśanāt: Literally, "and at the sight of him, the gods." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead darśanād eva devatāḥ, "from the very sight, the divinities."

5. "Although he wished to fight, not one of them took a stand there." na tatrāvasthitaḥ kaścid raṇe tasya yuyutsataḥ: Literally, "As he desired to fight, not one stood there in battle." For 5ab, Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [574*]: "Then there was not one facing him as he desired to fight (na babhūva tadā kaścid yuyutsor asya saṃmukhe)."

"Then, seeing that they were all terrified, Śakra, rallying them, cried:" sarvān āvidhya vitrastān dṛṣṭvā śakro 'bhyabhāṣata: The interpretation of the line depends on the meaning of the gerund āvidhya, which has been interpreted in at least two senses by the commentators and translators. The first of these is "having been pierced or shot." Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand this meaning, glossing, "having received a piercing (vedhaṃ prāpya)." Only Dutt (1894, p. 1665) interprets in this way, translating, "pierced with shafts." We regard this interpretation as dubious, not only because of the slightly awkward syntax but also because there is no indication that any of the gods have been wounded as yet in their encounter with Indrajit, since they had fled at the mere sight of him. We and the rest of the translators consulted who actually attempt to render the gerund prefer the explanation offered by Cr, who glosses, "having abused them with harsh words suitable for those who flee (āvidhya palāyamānocitaduruktyā saṃtāḍya)." In this context, it appears that Indra is attempting to rally his fleeing troops. Ś,Ñ,V3,B3,4,D1,3–8,10,11,T4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tataḥ śakro 'bravīt surān, "then Śakra addressed the gods," for dṛṣṭvā śakro 'bhyabhāṣata, "having seen [them] Śakra spoke."

6. "to the fight" raṇaṃ prati: Ś,Ñ,V3,B3,4,D,T4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raṇe surāḥ, "in battle, O gods."

"For my son" eṣaḥ . . . me putraḥ: Literally, "this son of mine." Ś1,Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read putro me by transposition.

"is going forth to battle" gacchati . . . yuddhārtham: Literally, "he is going for the sake of battle."

7. "Jayanta" jayantaḥ: The name Jayanta in connection with the son of Indra has not appeared previously in the Rāmāyaṇa. However, the son of Indra is said to take the form of the crow, who harasses Sītā at 5.36.24. The commentators there identify this individual as Jayanta. See notes to 5.36.24 and 5.45.39. The Mahābhārata does know Jayanta as the son of Paulomī, who is identified as Śacī, Indra's wife (MBh 1.106.4; 1.213.58). In a note, Gorresio (1870, p. 324) observes that he does not believe that there is any mention of Jayanta as a son of Indra or of Gomukha (see verse 10 below) as a son of Mātali in the Rāmāyaṇa epic, by which he means, of course, the sections he regards as older than the Uttarakāṇḍa. He questions whether these two divine individuals were created at a stage later than the Rāmāyaṇa but proclaims himself unable to affirm this positively despite the fact that he is close to believing it.

"rushed into battle" saṃgrāmam abhivartata: Note the augmentless imperfect. Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃgrāme so 'bhyavartata, "he rushed into battle."

8. "they took their stand" vyavasthitāḥ: Ñ2,B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prajaghnire, "they attacked or struck."

9. "On behalf of great Indra's son" kṛte mahendraputrasya: Literally, "for the sake of Mahendra's son." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahendrasya ca putrasya, "and of the son of Mahendra."

"a tremendous battle took place" yuddhaṃ mahad abhūt: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samabhavat, "[a battle] took place," for mahad abhūt, "a tremendous . . . took place."

"befitting" sadṛśam: Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "conforming to their might and valor; that is the meaning (balavīryānurūpam ity arthaḥ)."

10. "But . . . the son of the rākṣasa . . . upon Jayanta's charioteer Gomukha, Mātali's son" mātaliputre tu gomukhe rākṣasātmajaḥ / sārathau: Literally, "But the son of the rākṣasa on Mātali's son, Gomukha, the charioteer." Ñ1,V1,3,D1,3–6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the genitive singular mātaliputrasya gomukhasya sa rāvaṇiḥ / sāratheḥ, "that Rāvaṇi . . . of the charioteer Gomukha, Mātali's son." Mātali is well known in the literature as Indra's charioteer. He plays an important role in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, where he serves as Rāma's charioteer during the latter's final battle with Rāvaṇa. See Yuddhakāṇḍa sargas 90–101. Outside of this reference, there is only one additional occurrence of the name Gomukha in the Rāmāyaṇa, and, in that case, it is used in reference to a monkey (see 6.60.37–40).

"gold" kāñcana-: Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,4,D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous kanaka.

11. "But" tvapi: Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous cāpi.

"in a rage, pierced Rāvaṇi, as well as . . . on the battlefield" taṃ caiva rāvaṇiṃ kruddhaḥ pratyavidhyad raṇājire: V1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead taṃ cāpi rāvaṇiḥ kruddhaḥ samantāt pratyavidhyata, "and for his part, Rāvaṇi, in a rage, pierced him [Jayanta] from every side." Note how the variant reading changes the subjects and objects of the second line of the verse, providing reciprocity to the action.

12. "But . . . that rākṣasa of immense blazing energy, his eyes wide in his rage" tataḥ kruddho mahātejā rakṣo visphāritekṣaṇaḥ: Literally, "then that rākṣasa of immense blazing energy, angry, his eyes wide." The compound visphāritekṣaṇaḥ, "having wide eyes," could also be interpreted to mean "whose eyes were throbbing or trembling," and, indeed, several translators have rendered in this way. We believe, however, that this fits the context poorly. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa hi krodhasamāviṣṭo balī visphāritekṣaṇaḥ, "For he, overcome with rage, that mighty one, his eyes wide."

"the son of Śakra" śakraputraṃ tam: Literally, "him, the son of Śakra." Ñ,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śakratanayam, "the son of Śakra."

13. "Seizing great and powerful weapons" tataḥ pragṛhya śastrāṇi sāravanti mahānti ca: Literally, "Then, having seized great and powerful weapons." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tato nānāpraharaṇāñ chitadhārān sahasraśaḥ, "Then sharp-edged weapons by the thousands."

"hundred-slayers, iron cudgels, darts" śataghnīs tomarān prāsān: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śataghnīmusalaprāsa-, "hundred-slayers, cudgels, darts." On the weapon "hundred-slayer," see notes to 6.3.12 and 6.63.33.

"enormous mountain peaks" sumahānty adriśṛṅgāṇi: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahānti giriśṛṅgāṇi, "great mountain peaks."

Following 13ab, Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,3–7,10,11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [579*]: "Enraged, Rāvaṇi hurled [sharp-edged weapons by the thousands] down on the soldiers of the gods (surasainyeṣu saṃkruddhaḥ pātayāmāsa rāvaṇiḥ)."

14. "was striking down his enemies" tadā śatrūn abhighnataḥ: Literally, "then, as he was striking enemies." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,3,7,8,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śatru[śakra—Lahore]sainyāni ni[vi—Gorresio] ghnataḥ, "as he was striking down the enemy [Śakra's—Lahore] soldiers."

"and a great darkness arose" saṃjajñe ca tamo mahat: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saṃjajñe ca tamas tataḥ, "then there arose darkness." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr note that we should add the phrase "through magical illusion of Rāvaṇa's son" (rāvaṇaputrasya māyayeti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct and Cr similarly). Cr further notes that it is the darkness itself that terrorizes the worlds (tato 'ndhakārāl lokāḥ pravyathitāḥ). Compare verse 46 and note below. See 6.35.6; 6.67.24; and notes.

15. "which had been surrounding Śacī's son" samantāt taṃ śacīsutam: The syntax is awkward, as it is not clear that the adverbially used samantāt, "on all sides," can govern the accusative. Nonetheless, it seems a plausible interpretation, and it is the one offered by Cr, who emends the text, as it were, by substituting the genitive śacīsutasya for the accusative, yielding the sense "From all around Śacī's son, that is, on all four sides [lit., 'directions'] of Śacī's son, [the army of the gods was] struck with arrows in all four directions (śacīsutaṃ samantāc chacīsutasya caturdikṣu śarapīḍitam)." Ck and Ct, however, see the verse quite differently. They propose supplying the gerund hitvā, "having abandoned," to govern the accusative śacīsutam, lending the sequence the sense "having abandoned Śacī's son on every side."

"ran helter-skelter" tatra tatra sma dhāvati: Literally, "it ran there [and] there." Ñ,D2,6–8,11–12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead abhavac charapīḍitam, "[the army] was oppressed by arrows."

16. "Neither the gods nor their enemies could recognize one another. Scattered on every side, they ran helter-skelter." nābhyajānaṃs tadānyonyaṃ śatrūn vā daivatāni vā / tatra tatra viparyastaṃ samantāt paridhāvitam //: Literally, "Then, they did not recognize one another—enemies nor divinities. Scattered on every side [it was] made to run there there." The syntax of the verse as found in the critical edition is far from perfect. The presumptive subject of pādas ab would have to be the soldiers of the army of the gods mentioned in verse 15 above, because the verb abhyajānan is plural. The participles, however, switch to the singular in pādas cd, so the presumptive subject there must be the army as a unit. D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nābhyajānanta cānyonyaṃ rakṣo vā devatāthavā / tatra tatra viparyastaṃ samantāt paridhāvata (KK and VSP paridhāvati) //, "And neither rākṣasa nor divinity recognized one another. Scattered on every side, it ran there [and] there." This reading, too, has obvious grammatical problems similar to those of the critical text. Cr attempts to resolve the grammatical inconsistencies by correcting both finite verbs to singular imperfects. He thus understands: "Neither rākṣasa nor divinity recognized one another, therefore [each one] ran in such a way that they were going the wrong way (rakṣo devatā vānyonyaṃ nābhyajānanta abhyajānād ata eva viparyastaṃ viparītaṃ yathā bhavati tathā paridhāvata paryadhāvat)." This variant, however, changes the narrative somewhat. In the critical reading, it is only the army of the gods, the protectors of Jayanta, who are discomfited by the darkness conjured up by Rāvaṇi. In this variant and in the following insert passage from the southern recension, there is a general confusion and melee, which appears to be patterned on the elaborate account of the chaotic night battle in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, where the combatants cannot distinguish friend from foe. See Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 34 and notes.

Following verse 16, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [580*]: "Confused and shrouded in darkness, some gods struck down gods, and some rākṣasas, rākṣasas,[1] while others ran away (devā devān nijaghnuś ca rākṣasā rākṣasāṃs tathā / saṃmūḍhās tamasā channā vyadravann apare tathā//)."

[1] "some gods . . . and some rākṣasas, rākṣasas" devāḥ . . . ca . . . rākṣasā rākṣasān: Literally, "gods . . . and rākṣasas [struck down] rākṣasas." Ñ2,B1,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read te, "those," for ca, "and," while Ñ,V1,3,D11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read by transposition rākṣasān rākṣasāḥ."

17. "the valorous daitya hero Puloman appeared" śūraḥ pulomā nāma vīryavān / daiteyaḥ: Literally, "the valorous daitya hero named Pulomā." Like Cg and several of the translators consulted, we are compelled to supply some finite verb for the first clause of the verse to make sense of the syntax (pulomā nāma astīti śeṣaḥ—so Cg). Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,D3,5–8,10–12,T1,2,4,G1, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous vīraḥ, "hero," for śūraḥ. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read daityendraḥ, "lord of the daityas," for daiteyaḥ.

"caught up Śacī's son and carried him away" tena saṃgṛhya śacīputro 'pavāhitaḥ: Literally, "the son of Śacī, having been taken up by him, was carried off."

18. "Taking his grandson Jayanta, his maternal grandfather Puloman—who had fathered Śacī Paulomī—entered the vast ocean." gṛhītvā taṃ tu naptāraṃ praviṣṭaḥ sa mahodadhim / mātāmaho 'ryakas tasya paulomī yena sā śacī //: Literally, "His grandfather, his mother's father, by whom Śacī Paulomī [was], having taken his grandson, entered the ocean." Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr flesh out the elliptical clause "by whom Śacī Paulomī" by adding the participle utpāditā, "[was] generated or fathered." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃgṛhya taṃ tu dauhitraṃ praviṣṭaḥ sāgaraṃ tadā / āryakaḥ sa hi tasyāsīt pulomā yena sā śacī //, "The grandfather, Puloman, by whom Śacī [was fathered], having taken his daughter's son, then entered the ocean." For Śacī Paulomī, see 7.12.6 and note.

19. "When the gods saw the extremely frightening disappearance of Jayanta, they were terrified and dejected, and they fled in all directions." praṇāśaṃ dṛśya tu surā jayantasyātidāruṇam / vyathitāś cāprahṛṣṭāś ca samantād vipradudruvuḥ //: Note the irregular gerund dṛśya, "having seen." GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jñātvā praṇāśaṃ tu tadā jayantasyātha devatāḥ / aprahṛṣṭās tataḥ sarvā vyathitāḥ saṃpradudruvuḥ //, "But then the divinities, having recognized the disappearance of Jayanta, were dejected, and then, terrified, they all fled."

20. "excited" saṃhṛṣṭaḥ: Literally, "thrilled or delighted." Ñ,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃkruddhaḥ, "enraged."

21. "the lord of the gods . . . he said" prāha devendraḥ: Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cāha deveśaḥ, "and the lord of the gods said."

"and the valor of Rāvaṇi" rāvaṇeś cāpi vikramam: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead daivateṣu vidrutam, "and the flight of [lit., 'among'] the divinities."

22. "swift as thought" manojavaḥ: The compound is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V1,B1,4,D3,6,7,10,11,T1–3,M5,8,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahājavaḥ, "of immense speed."

"ready for battle" sajja eva: Literally, "fully ready or equipped."

23. "Once Indra had mounted the chariot . . . before it" rathe tasmin . . . agrataḥ: Literally, "in that chariot . . . before." The syntax here is odd and elliptical. We are persuaded by the original solution proposed by Ck, who reads the phrase rathe tasmin as a defective locative absolute in which tasmin refers to Indra. He then supplies the normal locative participles sthite sati to mean "when he, that is Indra, was situated in the chariot (tatas tasmin indre rathasthite sati)." Cr prefers to force the locative rathe to construe with the adverb agrataḥ, "before," in pāda c and adds the participle sthitāḥ, "situated," which in his view refers to the clouds. Thus he understands that the clouds are placed at the front portion of the chariot (rathe 'grato 'grabhāge sthitā iti śeṣaḥ). This is the interpretation that has been followed by all translations consulted.

"thundering" mahāsvanāḥ: Literally, "having a great sound." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalāḥ, "immensely powerful [clouds]."

"went . . . rumbling" gacchanto vyanadaṃs tadā: Literally, "then going, they rumbled." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead neduḥ paramaniḥsvanam (D7 and Gorresio read nisvanam), "They roared a tremendous roar."

24. "and hymns of praise were sung . . . all together" stutayaś ca samāhitāḥ: Literally, "and hymns together." The syntax of the critical edition's pādas ab is perplexing. The nominative plural stutayaḥ appears to stand alone, and we can see no plausible collocation with the adjective samāhitāḥ, "together, collected, etc.," that follows it. No commentator shares this reading. Given the context, we believe the best solution is to read the word stutayaḥ in parallel with vādyāni, "musical instruments," as the latter are played, so the former must be sung. We then read samāhitāḥ by enjambment with apsaraḥsaṃghāḥ, "troupes of apsarases." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gandharvāś ca samāhitāḥ, "and the gandharvas, all together." The commentators who share this reading and translators who follow them read vādyanta as an active imperfect, thus lending the line the sense "all together the gandharvas played all sorts of musical instruments (gandharvā vādyāni vādyanta avādyanta—so Cr)." Ck glosses samāhitāḥ as "were present (pravṛttāḥ)." Ct expands on this, adding, "were present in the sky (gagane pravṛttāḥ)."

"as Vāsava went forth to battle" prayāte vāsave raṇam: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,3–5,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead niryāte tridaśeśvare, "as the lord of the thirty [gods] went forth."

25. "and the sādhyas" sādhyaiś ca: See notes to 7.27.3–4. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aśvibhyām, "with the Aśvins."

26. "harshly" paruṣam: Ś,Ñ2,B1,3,4,D2,6–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the adjective paruṣaḥ, "harsh," which modifies pavanaḥ, "wind."

"and the sun grew dim" bhāskaro niṣprabhaś cāsīt: Literally, "and the maker of light was devoid of radiance." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read caiva, "and quite," for cāsīt, "and [it] was."

"appeared" prapedire: Literally, "they fell or appeared." We follow Cr, who glosses, "were seen (dadṛśe)." Most translators, however, render some variation on "fell."

For similar inauspicious omens, see 5.25.35–37; App. I, No. 16, following notes to 6.15.33; 6.26.21–30; 6.41.30–34; 6.45.31–37; 6.53.40–44; 6.65.17–19; 6.83.32–34; 6.94.14–27; and notes.

27. "divine chariot" rathaṃ divyam: It is unclear whether this vehicle is intended to be different from Rāvaṇa's grand flying palace, the Puṣpaka, which also was crafted by Viśvakarman, or whether this is a smaller, secondary combat vehicle. Normally, the Puṣpaka is referred to either as a vimāna or simply by its name. For a description of the Puṣpaka and Rāvaṇa's acquisition of it, see 7.15.29–31 and notes. See, too, 293*, following notes to 7.15.30, where its construction is also mentioned (see note 5).

28. "It was encircled" veṣṭitam: The adjective can also mean "covered, wrapped, or attended." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 501), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 471), understands that the vehicle is actually drawn by serpents. He renders, "Il était traîné par des serpents monstrueux," while Shastri offers, "Harnessed to huge serpents."

"enormous" sumahākāyaiḥ: Literally, "possessing extremely large bodies." KK and VSP read instead tu mahākāyaiḥ, "and possessing large bodies."

"horrifying" lomaharṣaṇaiḥ: Literally, "causing the body-hairs to bristle." T2–4,G3, M1,2,5,6,8–10, and KK and VSP read instead the phonetic variant romaharṣaṇaiḥ.

"from whose" yeṣām: Literally, "of whose." Ñ1,V1,3,D1,3–5, and KK and VSP read instead teṣām, "of those."

"seemed to scorch the very battlefield" pradīptam iva saṃyugam: Literally, "the battle was as if burned [by the wind from the exhalations]." B3,D10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pradīptam iva saṃyuge, "as if burning . . . in battle." Confronted with this reading, Cr must refer the adjective pradīptam back to the chariot itself in verse 25. He observes: "By the wind of the breath of those serpents, the divine chariot was as if blazing (pannagānāṃ niśvāsavātena pradīptam iva divyaṃ ratham)." Several of the translators consulted follow this interpretation.

29. "Surrounded by heroic . . . his divine chariot" śūrai rathaḥ saṃparivāritaḥ /. . . divyaḥ: Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead caiva sa rathaḥ parivāritaḥ /. . . divyaḥ, "and that divine chariot surrounded." D1,4,M8, and KK and VSP read instead caiva sarathaḥ parivāritaḥ /. . . daityaḥ. This minor reading changes the sense of the verse. According to it, the daitya, who here, oddly enough, must be Rāvaṇa, together with his chariot, is surrounded. This is made all the more peculiar because to our knowledge nowhere else in the literature is Rāvaṇa described as a daitya, a term that is reserved for those demons descended from Diti.

"by . . . night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācaraiḥ: Literally, "by the night-roaming [ones]."

"rushed straight" abhyavartata: Literally, "he attacked." Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead so 'bhyavartata, "he attacked."

30. "Waving off . . . he" vārayitvāsau: Literally, "he, having blocked or warded off." B1,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vārayitvā tu, "but having warded off."

"and stood aside" samupāviśat: Literally, "he sat." Cv, Ct, and Cr understand that Rāvaṇi stood or sat quietly by (tūṣṇīm āsta—so Cv and Ct; tūṣṇīm atiṣṭhat—so Cr).

31. "Then there commenced a battle between the gods and the rākṣasas. In that battle, there was a fearsome hail of weapons, as if from storm clouds." tato yuddhaṃ pravṛttaṃ tu surāṇāṃ rākṣasaiḥ saha / śastrābhivarṣaṇaṃ ghoraṃ meghānām iva saṃyuge //: Literally, "Then began a battle of the gods with rākṣasas; there was a fearsome hail of weapons, as if from clouds, in battle." As in much of the passage, the syntax as well as the rhetoric is defective. The two halves of the verse are probably intended to function together as a simile, yielding something to the effect that gods, like storm clouds, released a fearsome hail of weapons in their battle that broke out with the rākṣasas. Gorresio (1870, p. 133), the only translator consulted to read with the critical text, struggles to construe the verse, which he does with several liberties. He takes the compound śastrābhivarṣaṇam, "hail of weapons," as a bahuvrīhi subordinated to yuddham, "battle," in pāda a, that is to say, "a battle characterized by a hail of weapons." He is then forced to read the simile rather implausibly, we believe, to mean that "the battle (yuddham) was like the clash (saṃyuge) of opposing clouds (meghānām)." He renders: "Quivi s'attaccò allora con fiera tempesta di dardi dura battaglia fra Devi e Râcsasi, pari allo scontro d'avverse nubi." Ñ2,D6,7,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read for pāda cd śastrāṇi varṣatāṃ teṣāṃ meghānām iva saṃyuge, which provides a clearer grammatical and rhetorical representation and lends the verse the sense "Then, with the rākṣasas commenced a battle on the part of the gods, who, like clouds, were showering weapons in battle." KK and VSP read instead śastrāṇi varṣatāṃ ghoraṃ meghānām iva saṃyuge, which would yield the sense "of [the gods, who], like clouds, were fearsomely showering weapons in battle."

32. "Kumbhakarṇa" kumbhakarṇaḥ: This is, of course, Rāvaṇa's monstrous and gargantuan younger brother, who is so ravenous and destructive that he was cursed to sleep virtually perpetually. His story is told twice in the Yuddhakāṇḍa and twice in the present kāṇḍa (see 6.48.9–12 and 6.49.23–27 and notes [where his sleep is attributed to a curse from Brahmā to stop him from literally eating the entire world] and 7.10.31–41 and 7.13.1–7 and notes [where his sleep is a boon for his austerities; where the gods trick him into selecting sleep as a boon]; see also R. Goldman 2006 and Goldman and Goldman 2009, pp. 75–77). The commentators seem as surprised as we are to find him awake in this episode, and they offer various explanations. Ct observes that we are to understand that he is sometimes awakened for a few days on such occasions as battles, etc. (asya jāgaritasya yuddhādiprasaṅge 'nekadinam api jāgaraṇam ity ato jñāyate). This would conform to Kumbhakarṇa's role in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, where Rāvaṇa has him awakened with great difficulty to fight Rāma and his monkey army. See 6.48.20–47 and notes. Cr, no doubt alluding to one version of the curse of Kumbhakarṇa, according to which he sleeps for six months and then wakes for a single day, notes that this is one such day (tadā tasmiñ jāgaraṇadina eva). See 6.49.26–27 and notes.

"armed with all sorts of weapons" nānāpraharaṇodyataḥ: Literally, "prepared with various weapons." Ck, Cg, and Ct read the compound as a paranipāta, lending it the sense "who had raised various weapons (udyatanānāpraharaṇaḥ)." See also notes to 7.27.21.

"fought anyone at all in that battle without even knowing who they were" nājñāyata tadā yuddhe saha kenāpy ayudhyata: Literally, "Then it was not known [by him]; he fought or it was fought with anyone at all in battle." Ñ2,V3,B1,3,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nājñāyata tadā rājan yuddhaṃ kenābhyapadyata, "Then, your majesty, it was not known: 'He joined battle with whom?'" Ck, Cg, and Ct note that what Kumbhakarṇa does not know is whether a given individual should be fought or not, so he simply fights with every single warrior he meets. (nājñāyatāyaṃ mayā yoddhavya ity eko lakṣyatvena nājñāyate. api tu na hi kenāpy ayudhyata. yena kenāpi prāptena sarveṇāpy ayudhyata ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly.) Cr adds that the meaning is that Kumbhakarṇa fights with both his own [troops] and those belonging to the enemy and that this, in turn, suggests the excess of his intoxication in battle (svakīyaiḥ parakīyaiś ca sahāyudhyatety artha etena tasya mattatātiśayaḥ sūcitaḥ).

33. "In a total frenzy" saṃrabdhaḥ: Literally, "excited or agitated." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4, D,T3,4,M7, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saṃkruddhaḥ, "enraged."

"the gods" vai surān: Literally, "indeed, the gods." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead devatāḥ, "the divinities."

"with anything he could" yena kenaiva: Literally, "with whatever." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,D1–4,7–12,T3,4,M2,6,7, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yena tenaiva, which in this context would have much the same meaning.

"fangs, arms, feet" dantair bhujābhyāṃ padbhyāṃ ca: Literally, "with teeth, with both arms, and with both feet." Ñ2,B1,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dantaiḥ pādair bhujair hastaiḥ, "with teeth, feet, arms, and hands." The peculiarity of this reading is that the last three body parts named are in the plural as opposed to the normal dual.

"arrows" -sāyakaiḥ: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead -mudgaraiḥ, "war hammers."

34. "with the illustrious Rudras, together with the Ādityas" tato rudrair mahābhāgaiḥ sahādityaiḥ: Ñ2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa tu rudrair mahāghoraiḥ saṃgamyātha, "then [the night-roaming (ones)], having encountered the extremely fearsome Rudras."

"that fierce warrior" prayuddhaḥ: Ck, Ct, and Cg understand, "who has made an excellent battle (kṛtaprakṛṣṭayuddhaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). On the term prayuddha, see notes to 7.23.6, 7.25.11, and 7.27.20.

"the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"was slashed" kṛttaḥ: Ñ2,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṣataḥ, "[was] wounded."

Following verse 34, T1,2,G1,3,M, and GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, between verse 36 and verse 37), Gita Press (7.28.37), KK (7.28.37), and VSP (7.28.37) insert a passage of two lines [583*]: "His body riddled with weapons and gushing blood, Kumbhakarṇa resembled a storm cloud, rumbling with lightning and thunder and pouring forth torrents (babhau śastrācitatanuḥ kumbhakarṇaḥ kṣarann asṛk / vidyutstanitanirghoṣo dhārāvān iva toyadaḥ //)."

35. "the thirty gods" tridaśaiḥ: Literally, "by the thirty." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prayuddham, "fighting fiercely." This adjective, then, modifies sainyam, "army," in pāda a, leaving the verse without a specified subject. Ct and Cr therefore supply one, "by the gods (devaiḥ)." See notes to verse 34 above.

36. "with weapons" śastraiḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṛttāḥ, "cut or slashed."

"writhed" veṣṭanti: Literally, "they roll or twist." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ceṣṭanti, "they move or twitch."

"while others remained fixed to their mounts in the battle" vāhaneṣv avasaktāś ca sthitā evāpare raṇe: It is not at all clear exactly what the author intends us to visualize here. The commentators offer three rather different scenarios. Cv, whose interpretation we have tentatively followed, understands that the rākṣasas have been pinned [literally, stitched or sewn] to their vehicles by arrows, javelins, etc., that have transfixed them (vāhaneṣu ca saktāś ca sthitā evāpare raṇa iti vāhaneṣu śaraśaktyādibhiḥ saśtraiḥ syūtāṅgāḥ sthitāḥ). Ck and Ct believe that their bodies have fallen senseless from their vehicles, although they remain fastened to them. They do not specify, however, whether they are simply caught in harnesses, etc., or are actively clinging to their mounts. (kecin mohād vāhanebhyo nipatitadehā api vāhaneṣv avasaktā eva sthitā ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.) Cr suggests that the phrase means that they cling firmly to their chariots, etc., even in death (apare vāhaneṣu rathādiṣv avasaktā dṛḍhaṃ grahaṇavantaḥ sthitā maraṇe 'pīti śeṣaḥ). None of these interpretations seems to be quite in agreement with the situation described in the following two verses.

37–38. For a similar list of animal mounts of the rākṣasas, see 7.25.36 and notes.

"those night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācarāḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [ones]."

"and" tathā (37.b): T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK (7.28.39) and VSP (7.28.39) read instead raṇe, "in battle."

"creatures with the faces of piśācas" piśācavadanāḥ: Literally, "ones having the faces of piśācas." Some translators take the compound to refer specifically to the animals, i.e., boars, that immediately precede it in the verse. But since there is no apparent reason for the boars to be singled out as in any way distinct in this respect from the many other animals mentioned, we tend to agree with Cv, who generalizes the term by adding the word "mounts" (piśācavadanāni vāhanānīti śeṣaḥ).

"grievously wounded" śastrasaṃviddhāḥ: Literally, "deeply pierced with weapons." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śastrasaṃbhinnāḥ, "deeply cut with weapons."

39. "With the . . . rākṣasas . . . the wreckage of battle" sa teṣām raṇasaṃplavaḥ /. . . rākṣasānām: Literally, "when those rākṣasas . . . the wreckage of battle . . ." We understand the genitive plural pronoun teṣām, "of them," to construe with the genitive absolute construction of pādas cd. Cs, who reads the variant sarveṣām, understands the word to be part of an elliptical genitive absolute construction referring to the people who witness the battle. He then construes the genitive plurals in pādas cd with the subject raṇasaṃplavaḥ, "the wreckage of battle." He understands the verse to mean "As all the people were watching, the wreckage of battle, that is to say, the fall in battle, of the slain rākṣasas, who lay motionless [lit., 'sleeping'] on the ground, appeared as if a painted work." (sarveṣāṃ paśyatāṃ janānām. nihatānāṃ mahītale prasuptānāṃ rākṣasāṇām. raṇasaṃplavo raṇe pātaḥ.) D6,7,10,11,G1,M4,7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sarveṣāṃ, "when all [the rākṣasas]," for sa teṣām, "he, of them."

"stupefied" pramattānām: Literally, "negligent or intoxicated." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead prasuptānām, "asleep or motionless."

"scattered across the ground" mahītale: Literally, "on the surface of the earth."

"like a painting" citrakarma iva: The polysemic word citra has at least three meanings that could possibly be relevant here. Cs understands that the scene resembled the work of an artist and argues the meaning is that it was like a painting because of the motionlessness [of the subjects]. (citrakarma iva śilpikarmevābhāti sma. niśceṣṭatvāc citraprāyatā teṣām iti bhāvaḥ.) We believe, with Cs, that, given the emphasis, in this and the preceding verse, on the immobility of the dead, dying, and stupefied rākṣasas, the author is employing the stereotypic convention of describing a motionless scene as a painting. Compare, for example, 6.95.5 and notes and Śāk 1.4.1. This interpretation is also followed by Gorresio (1870, p. 134) and Raghunathan (1980, vol. 3, p. 468). Several of the commentators take the term citra and the compound citrakarma in its common sense of "a wonder," and therefore regard the scene on the battlefield as amazing. Ck and Ct understand that citrakarma is an astonishing thing, as if created by the illusory power of a perfected being (siddhamāyānirmitaṃ citrakarmāścaryakaram—so Ck and Ct). Cg contents himself with glossing, "producing wonder (āścaryakaraḥ)." This interpretation is followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 501), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 472), and Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2006). Dutt (1894, p. 1667), apparently indecisive, renders, "the action appeared wondrous like a painting." Benoît (1999, p. 1295), alone, understands the term citra in its sense of "variegated" and reads the compound as referring to the varied exploits of the slain rākṣasas. He translates, "La scène des combats étincelait des exploits les plus variés de tous les rākṣasa gisant à terre, endormis dans la mort." This is far from persuasive. Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr note the irregular sandhi.

40. "In the forefront of the battle, there flowed a river streaming with blood in place of water. It was thronged with adjutant storks and vultures and had weapons in place of crocodiles." śoṇitodakaniṣyandā kaṅkagṛdhrasamākulā / pravṛttā saṃyugamukhe śastragrāhavatī nadī //: Literally, "At the front of the battle, there issued forth a river, flowing with blood for water, thronged with adjutant storks and vultures, and having weapons for its crocodiles." The verse strikes one as a truncated and inept echo of the common extended metaphor in the epics of a battlefield as a river. For a full-fledged example of this, compare 6.46.25–28 and notes. In this case, strictly speaking, there is no figure of speech but merely a description of an actual river of blood. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read -niṣpandā, "motionless," for -niṣyandā, "flowing." KK and VSP read pādas ab as a single compound, substituting -niṣpanda-, for niṣyandā, lending the line the sense "[the river], having blood for its water, and crowded with motionless adjutant storks and vultures." The term kaṅka, "adjutant stork," can also refer to a heron. See notes to 6.35.12 and 6.46.25–28 on this identification. D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M2,8,9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kāka-, "crows."

41–42. "his entire army" tadbalaṃ sarvam: Literally, "his entire army or that entire army (tad balaṃ sarvam)." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tu balam, "and the army," for tadbalam, "his army." T1,2,G3,M2,3,5,6,8,9, and KK and VSP read the kṛtsnam, "entire," for sarvam, "entire."

43–44. "Then" tataḥ: KK (7.28.46) and VSP (7.28.46) read instead āgāt, "he came or arrived."

"twanged" visphārya: Literally, "having twanged."

"reverberated" svananti sma: Literally, "they sounded." B3,4,D5,10,11,T1,M1–3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the nearly synonymous stananti sma, "they resounded."

"with the thunder of its twanging" visphāraghoṣeṇa: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead visphāranirghoṣaiḥ, "with the reverberations of that twanging."

"let fall" nipātayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused to fall down." D6,7,10,11,M1,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the similar pātayāmāsa saḥ, "he caused to fall."

45. "standing his ground" vyavasthitaḥ: Literally, "stationed or situated." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead niśācaraḥ, "the night-roaming [one]."

46. "nothing at all could be discerned" nājñāyata . . . kiṃcit: Literally, "nothing was known." T1,2,G3, and KK and VSP read the present (laṭ) na jñāyate . . . kiṃcit, "nothing is known," for the past (lañ) ajñāyata, "[nothing] was known."

"shrouded in darkness" tamasā vṛtam: According to Ck, Cg, and Ct, the darkness here is a result of the occlusion of all directions caused by the arrows fired by the two combatants (ubhayaśaravarṣakṛtasarvadikchādaneneti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). In other words, they do not believe that is the same darkness that was magically produced earlier at verse 14 above through the powers of Rāvaṇi. See 7.29.4 and notes.

1. "although that darkness had come on" tamasi saṃjāte: Literally, "when darkness had arisen."

"the rākṣasas . . . and the gods" rākṣasā daivataiḥ saha: Literally, "the rākṣasas along with the gods." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarve te devarākṣasāḥ, "all those gods and rākṣasas."

2. D7,10,11,M6,9, and Gorresio and NSP omit verse 2, while GPP places it in brackets, unnumbered, between its verse 1 and verse 2. The verse is translated only by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2007) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 468).

"But by that point" tatas tu: Literally, "But then."

"the army of the gods had left standing only a tenth part of the vast host of the rākṣasas." devasainyena rākṣasānāṃ mahad balam / daśāṃśaṃ sthāpitam: Literally, "The great army of the rākṣasas had been made to stand as [only] a tenth portion by the army of the gods." KK, VSP, and GPP (in brackets, unnumbered) read the synonymous bṛhadbalam (or bṛhad balam), "great army," for mahad balam, "great army." The reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

3. D7,10,11,M9, and Gorresio and NSP omit verse 3, while GPP places it in brackets, unnumbered, between its verse 1 and verse 2. The verse is translated only by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2007) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 468).

"Since everything was cloaked in darkness" tasmiṃs tu tamasā naddhe: Literally, "but when it was obstructed by darkness." Gita Press, KK, VSP, and GPP (in brackets, unnumbered) read tāmase for tamasā, while D6,T1,M1,3, and Gita Press, KK, VSP, and GPP (in brackets, unnumbered) read yuddhe for naddhe. This lends the pāda the sense "in that dark battle."

4. "only three . . . did not succumb to delusion" moham īyur na te trayaḥ: Literally, "those three did not go to confusion or bewilderment." That these three extraordinarily powerful masters of māyā, alone, are not blinded by Rāvaṇi's illusory darkness perhaps casts some doubt on the interpretation of the commentators at 7.28.46 above that the darkness is a purely physical phenomenon caused by the occlusion of the sky and all the directions by a dense hail of arrows. It may well be that this is still the darkness that was first conjured up by Rāvaṇi at 7.28.14 above. See, too, 7.28.46 and note. Compare 1.73.14ff., where, in the darkness brought on by the ominous appearance of Rāma Jāmadagnya, everyone except Vasiṣṭha, the other ṛṣis, and King Daśaratha and his sons becomes stupefied and unconscious.

5. "Rāvaṇa . . . had been struck down in battle" nihataṃ rāvaṇo raṇe: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rāvaṇo nihataṃ kṣaṇāt, "Rāvaṇa . . . had been struck down in an instant," while KK and VSP read by transposition the synonymous nihataṃ rāvaṇaḥ kṣaṇāt. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

6. "that unassailable warrior" durdharṣaḥ: Literally, "the unassailable one."

"right through to the end" yāvadantam: Literally, "up to the end." D11 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous yāvadantaḥ. See verse 9 and notes below.

7. "This very day . . . the" adyaitān: Literally, "today, these." D6,7,10,11,T3,M2,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead adyaiva, "this very day."

"fighting from the sky . . . I myself shall . . . destroy" nāśayāmi nabhastalāt: Literally, "I shall destroy from the sky." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5,7–12,T2,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nayāmi yamasādanam, "I [shall] lead [them] to the abode of Yama."

"with all sorts of immensely powerful weapons . . . through my valor" vikramaiḥ . . . nānāśastrair mahāsāraiḥ: Literally, "through valorous acts . . . with various weapons of great strength." D6,7,10,11,M2,8,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nānāśastramahāsāraiḥ. This somewhat awkward compound can be taken in one of several ways. It can be read as a paranipāta in the sense of the critical reading; it can be taken to mean "with the great powers of various weapons"; or, as it is read by Cr, it can be understood as an appositional karmadhāraya compound in which the various weapons themselves are the great powers (śastrāṇy eva mahāsārāṇi taiḥ); or it can be taken as a bahuvrīhi compound modifying vikramaiḥ in pāda b in the sense of "with valorous acts that are characterized by the great powers of various weapons." T1,2,G3,M3,5, and KK and VSP read nānāśastrair mahāghoraiḥ, "with various very fearsome weapons."

8. "I shall kill Indra" aham indraṃ vadhiṣyāmi: Cr observes that there is no redundancy here with the previous verse, where Rāvaṇa vowed to kill all the gods, by virtue of the maxim of the brahmans and Vasiṣṭha, that is to say, of the mention of an outstanding member of a class, along with the other members of that class (indrādīn vadhiṣyāmi brāhmaṇavasiṣṭhanyāyena na pūrveṇa paunaruktyaṃ). The idea is that one can mention a class of individuals and then an outstanding member of that class without creating redundancy.

"Varuṇa, Kubera, bestower of wealth" varuṇaṃ dhanadaṃ: Literally, "Varuṇa [and] the giver of wealth." D6,7,10,11,T,1–3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dhanadaṃ varuṇam by transposition.

"quickly" āśu: T1,2,G3,M1,5, and KK (7.29.8) and VSP (7.29.8) read instead atha, "then."

"I myself shall reign over all" svayaṃ sthāsyāmy athopari: Literally, "I shall then myself stand above." This enigmatic statement is glossed by Ck, Cg, and Ct, who take the meaning of athopari, "then above," to be "above all" (sarveṣām upariṣṭād ity arthaḥ). Cr glosses, " 'above' means 'in heaven' (upari svarge [svayaṃ sthāsyāmi])."

9. "you must not give way to despair" viṣādo na ca kartavyaḥ: Literally, "and despondency is not to be made." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read naiva, "by no means," for na ca, "and . . . not." Ck, Cg, and Ct believe that the charioteer is indeed despondent at the thought of what will happen once they enter the midst of the army of the gods (devasenāmadhye praveśe kiṃ bhaviṣyatīti viṣaṇṇaṃ sārathiṃ punaś cāha—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly).

"Now I tell you a second time" dviḥ khalu tvāṃ bravīmy adya: Literally, "indeed, I tell you now twice." Ck, Cg, and Ct believe that Rāvaṇa is wondering why, since he has told the charioteer twice, he is not conveying him [to the end] (dvivāraṃ bravīmi. tat kathaṃ na nayasīti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly).

"right through to the end" yāvadantam: KK (7.29.9) and VSP (7.29.9) read instead the synonymous yāvadantaḥ. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. See verse 6 and notes above.

10. "This place where we are now" yatra vartāmahe vayam: Literally, "where we are." B1,D5,7,12,M2, and GPP and Gita Press substitute the contextually correct dual form of the verb vartāvahe but fail to correct the plural pronoun vayam.

"is the region of the Nandana garden" ayaṃ sa nandanoddeśaḥ: Literally, "this is that region of Nandana." This is the name of the paradisiac garden in Indra's world. The saḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"to where Mount Udaya stands" udayo yatra parvataḥ: Literally, "where Mount Udaya [is]." Udaya, or "Ascent," is the name of the easternmost mountain above which the sun and the moon are said to rise.

Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr agree that Rāvaṇa's mention of the two geographical points—the Nandana garden and Mount Udaya—marks, respectively, the beginning and the end of the vast host of the gods (nandanam ārabhyodayaparvatāntaṃ senā tiṣṭhatīti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly).

11. "And" ca: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

12. "who were engaged in battle" samarasthān: Ñ2,D1,6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the nominative singular samarasthaḥ, which then must describe Śakra himself as being in the midst of or engaged in battle.

14. "through our ranks" sainye: Literally, "in the army."

"which has the force of a gale" pavanaujasā: Literally, "with the strength of the wind."

15. "through the gift of a boon" varadānāt: On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see notes to 7.10.16.

16. "I have enjoyed the lordship of the triple world" etat trailokyaṃ bhujyate mayā: Literally, "This triple world is enjoyed by me."

"only after imprisoning Bali . . . in the same way" yathā baliṃ nigṛhya . . . / evam: Literally, "just as . . . having imprisoned Bali . . . in the same way." The reference is to the famous purāṇic narrative of the tricking of the asura king, Mahābali, and confining him to the underworld. Indra is being somewhat vainglorious here, as, according to the standard purāṇic narrative, it is Viṣṇu in his vāmanāvatāra who accomplishes this deed, thus restoring the ineffectual Indra to the lordship of the heavens. See 7.27.9 and notes. See, too, 1.28.2; 6.30.22; 6.40.43; 6.47.119; 6.49.1–2; 6.53.26; 6.59.7; and notes. D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yathā balau niruddhe ca, "And just as, when Bali was confined."

"I would like to imprison this evildoer" tasya pāpasya nigraho mama rocate: Literally, "imprisonment of that evildoer is pleasing to me." The word nigrahaḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,B1,4,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,2,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nirodhaḥ, "confinement," for nigrahaḥ, "imprisonment."

17. "leaving Rāvaṇa, took a stand in another area" anyaṃ deśam āsthāya . . . saṃtyajya rāvaṇam: Literally, "having resorted to another place [and] having abandoned Rāvaṇa." Ck, Cg, and Ct explain that Indra moves from the place where Rāvaṇa had taken his stand, since [because of Brahmā's boon] he is unable to strike Rāvaṇa with his vajra or other lethal weapons. Therefore, there is no purpose for him to remain facing him. (rāvaṇāvasthitadeśād ity arthaḥ. rāvaṇaṃ saṃtyajyeti. vajrādinā prahartum aśakyatvāt purasthitir niṣprayojaneti matveti śeṣaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly.)

"annihilating" nāśayan: Literally, "destroying." Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead trāsayan, "terrifying."

18. "never retreating" anivartitaḥ: Literally, "not turned back." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,9–11,G1,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead anivartakaḥ, "one who does not turn back." Ct glosses the infinitive "not to retreat (anivartitum)." Cs offers Ct's gloss as his first explanation, basing it on the fact that the kṛt suffix ṇvul [-aka] here has the same sense as the infinitive suffix (ṇvultumunor ekārthatvāt). See Pā 3.3.10 and Kāśikā thereon. Alternatively, and more characteristically, Cs toys with the language. He argues that it is Indra who is a nivartaka, i.e., one who turns [enemies] back, and that, since he [Indra] has moved in a different direction, he [Rāvaṇa] has no one to turn him back and is therefore an anivartaka, "a person lacking someone to turn [him] back" (yadvā nivartakendrasya digantaragamanān na vidyate nivartako yasya sa tathā).

"plunged into the army" praviveśa: Literally, "he entered." Ck, Cg, and Ct flesh out the elliptical syntax by adding the words "the army of the gods (devasenām iti śesaḥ)."

19. "entire" kṛtsnam: Ñ,B1,3,4,D1,4–7,10,11,M4,7, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous sarvam, "all."

20. "that his own army had been penetrated" praviṣṭaṃ taṃ balaṃ svakam: Literally, "that army of his was entered." Ñ2,B1,3,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read praṇaṣṭaṃ tu (tam—Gorresio), "and annihilated," for praviṣṭaṃ tam, "that [was] entered," while Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,2,4–7,10–12,T3,4,G1,M1,2,5,6,8–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read svakaṃ balam by transposition.

"he remained calm" asaṃbhrāntaḥ: Literally, "not agitated."

"and cutting off ten-faced Rāvaṇa, he stopped his advance" nyavartayat . . . samāvṛtya daśānanam: Literally, "having surrounded Daśānana [the ten-faced one], he made him turn back." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2008) understands nyavartayat to mean that Indra has driven Rāvaṇa back or forced him to retreat. But this is not quite correct. It is clear from the following verse that Indra has been able to immobilize and surround Rāvaṇa.

21. "when . . . saw that Rāvaṇa had been checked by Śakra . . . 'Alas! We are lost' " hā hatāḥ smeti taṃ dṛṣṭvā grastaṃ śakreṇa rāvaṇam: Literally, "Having seen Rāvaṇa surrounded by Śakra . . . 'Alas! We are destroyed!' " Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous hā hatāḥ sma iti grastaṃ dṛṣṭvā śakreṇa rāvaṇam. This line is seemingly intended to correct the apparent double sandhi of smeti.

"the dānavas and the rākṣasas . . . they cried out" nādo mukto dānavarākṣasaiḥ: Literally, "a roar was released by the dānavas and the rākṣasas."

22. "mounted" samāruhya: Literally, "having mounted." Ñ2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous samāsthāya.

"plunged into" praviveśa: Literally, "he entered."

"that . . . army" tat sainyam: Ck and Cg note that this is, of course, the army of the gods (devasainyam).

23. "Resorting to the power of magical illusion that had been given to him long ago by Śiva, lord of cattle" sa tāṃ praviśya māyāṃ tu dattāṃ gopatinā purā: Literally, "having entered into that māyā which had been given long ago by the lord of cattle." Indrajit received his power of invisibility along with other boons from Śiva Paśupati (see 7.25.9–12 and notes). Ck and Ct note that Rāvaṇi must resort to his magical power of invisibility, because it would be impossible for him to defeat the gods merely by confronting them in battle (puraḥ sthityā devasenājayasyāśakyatvān māyāṃ śrayate—so Ct; Ck similarly). Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [601*]: "Entering into that great power of magical illusion, which he had obtained long ago from Paśupati (tāṃ praviśya mahāmāyāṃ prāptāṃ paśupateḥ [gopatinā—KK and VSP] purā)."

"by Śiva, lord of cattle" gopatinā: Literally, "by the lord of cattle." The term gopati, "lord of cattle," is a less common variant of the epithet paśupati, "lord of [domestic] beasts." Cg explicitly identifies the term as referring to Rudra (rudreṇa). The term is only used one other time in the Rāmāyaṇa. See 7.16.18 and note.

"he became invisible to all beings and pelted that army" adṛśyaḥ sarvabhūtānāṃ tat sainyaṃ samavākirat: Literally, "invisible to all beings, he poured down upon that army." Ñ1,B1,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead praviveśa susaṃrabdhas tat sainyaṃ samabhidravat, "enraged, he entered that army and put it to flight." As Ct and Cr note, one must read the augmentless simplex samabhidravat here as a causative (samabhidravat. samabhyadrāvayad ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly).

24. "Then, leaving aside the gods, he made straight for Śakra." tataḥ sa devān saṃtyajya śakram evābhyayād drutam: Literally, "Then he, having abandoned the gods, rapidly approached Śakra alone." Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D1,5–7,9–11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa sarvā devatās tyaktvā śakram evābhyadhāvata, "having abandoned all the divinities, he charged toward Śakra alone."

"could not see" na dadarśa: Literally, "he did not see." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar nāpaśyac ca, "and he did not see."

Following verse 24, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [602*]: "Even though he was belabored[1] by the immensely powerful divinities,[2] and so had lost his armor,[3] he paid them no heed[4] (vimuktakavacas tatra vadhyate cāpi rāvaṇiḥ / daivataiḥ sumahāvīryair na cakāra sa kiṃcana //)."

[1] "Even though he was belabored" vadhyate cāpi: Literally, "and even though he was struck." Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the participle vadhyamāno 'pi, "even though being struck."

[2] "by the . . . divinities" daivataiḥ: Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tridaśaiḥ, "by the thirty [gods]."

[3] "and so had lost his armor" vimuktakavacaḥ: Literally, "he whose armor was released." Cs appears to understand the term kavaca in its sense of a magical protective spell or formula, while he understands mukta here to refer to releasing by way of utterance such a formula. Thus he glosses, "one is to understand the term vimuktakavacaḥ as the utterance of a kavaca for the purpose of the muttering of a mantra, etc. (mantrajapādyarthaṃ kavaconmocanaṃ jñeyam).

[4] "he paid them no heed" na cakāra saḥ kiṃcana: Literally, "he did not do anything." Ct and Cr understand the phrase to mean that Rāvaṇi showed no fear ([na] kimapi bhayam ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly), and several of the translators have followed this interpretation. We, however, see the passage more as does Cs, who understands that Rāvaṇi did nothing by way of paying attention or targeting (lakṣyatvena) them (kiṃcana lakṣyatvena na cakāra). Gorresio (1870, p. 136), who renders, "non fece pur resistenza," and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 470), who translates, "did not mind what they did," understand more or less similarly. D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for saḥ, "he."

25. "Mātali and his horses . . . he . . . great Indra" sa mātaliṃ hayāṃś caiva . . . / mahendram: Literally, "he, [having struck] Mātali and the horses as well . . . [pelted] Mahendra." Ñ2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samāyāntam "[Mātali], who was heading toward [him]." KK [1905 and 1913] read samātaliṃ samāyāntam . . . / mahendram. This juxtaposition of the words yields the sense "Having struck great Indra, who was approaching together with Mātali, he pelted him."

"shooting rapidly" śīghrahastaḥ: Literally, "of swift hands." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhūya eva, "once more."

26. "Then Śakra, abandoning his chariot and dismissing Mātali" tataḥ śakro rathaṃ tyaktvā visṛjya ca sa mātalim: Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D1,2,4–7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tatas tyaktvā rathaṃ śakraḥ by transposition, while Ñ2, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead visasarja ca sārathim, "and he dismissed the charioteer."

27. For verse 27, Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,2,4–7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of two lines [604*]: "Hovering in the sky[1] there, invisible, and powerful through his magical illusion, he ensnared Indra with illusion[2] and drove him back[3] with arrows (sa tatra māyābalavān adṛśyo 'thāntarikṣagaḥ / indraṃ māyāparikṣiptaṃ kṛtvā saṃprādravac charaiḥ //)."

[1] "Hovering in the sky" antarikṣagaḥ: Literally, "gone to the sky."

[2] "he ensnared . . . with illusion" māyāparikṣiptaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "having made [him] encircled by māyā." Cr glosses, "having made him confused through māyā (māyayā parikṣiptaṃ vyākulaṃ kṛtvā)." Cs takes the phrase to mean "having surpassed him through his māyā (svamāyayā tiraskṛtaṃ kṛtvā)."

[3] "and drove him back" saṃprādravat: Literally, "he drove back or made him retreat." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa prādravat, "he caused him to run." The simplex must be read here as a causative; see notes to verse 23 above.

28. "reckoned" mene: Literally, "he thought." Ñ2,B3,D2,5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jajñe, "he knew or realized."

"toward his own army" svasainyam abhitaḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Rāvaṇi leads Indra to the flank of his own army (svasenāyāḥ pārśvam—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly).

29. The textual apparatus for this verse is quite complicated, and the verse itself, as it appears in the critical edition, particularly pādas ef, is elliptical and grammatically suspect and is representative of few, if any, manuscripts consulted.

"When all the immortal gods saw great Indra forcibly carried off in that battle by the power of magical illusion, they cried: 'How can this be?' " taṃ dṛṣṭvātha balāt tasmin māyayāpahṛtaṃ raṇe / mahendram amarāḥ sarve kiṃ nv etad iti cukruśuḥ //: Literally, "Now, having seen him, great Indra, carried off by force through māyā in that battle, all the immortals cried: 'What is this?' " Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead taṃ tu dṛṣṭvā balāt tena nīyamānaṃ mahāraṇāt / mahendram amarāḥ sarve kiṃ nu syād ity acintayan //, "But having seen him, great Indra, being led away by him [Rāvaṇi] by force out of the great battle, all the immortals thought: 'What may happen?' " Cr glosses kiṃ nu syād iti, "What may happen?" as "What should we do? (asmābhiḥ kiṃ kartavyam ity arthaḥ)." Cr interprets the ablative balāt, which we read in its adverbial sense of "by force," in its sense of "from the army (sainyāt)," referring to Indra's being dragged away from his own forces. The commentaries of Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct read with the critical edition for pāda d [etat kiṃ nv iti cukruśuḥ, "they cried: 'What is this?' "].

"For Rāvaṇi, who, through the power of magical illusion, is leading Indra—himself a master of magical spells—away, is nowhere to be seen." na hi dṛśyati vidyāvān māyayā yena nīyate: Literally, "For he [Rāvaṇi], by whom that master of magical spells (vidyāvān) [Indra] is being led away through māyā, cannot be seen." The line is somewhat difficult to construe. The verb of the principal clause, dṛśyati, "[it] is seen," is irregular in that it places a parasmaipada ending on what is a karmaṇi form. Oberlies (2003, pp. 240–41) notes this possibility and provides examples of the form from the Mahābhārata (1.71.44; 1.219.5; 2.62.5; 3.70.34; 5.44.21; 7.154.23; and 12.327.5). The form is also listed as a variant reading in book 5 of Pūrṇabhadra's version of the Pañcatantra (see Hertel 1912, p. 188). All northern and devanāgārī manuscripts, along with T3,4, read an additional line (either 606* or 607*), while the majority of the remaining southern manuscripts read a number of variants that make the line more intelligible. We interpret the line on the basis of the printed editions of the southern commentators and the interpretations of those commentators. The verse as it appears in KK (7.29.31) and VSP (7.29.31) and the one known to Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct reads dṛśyate na sa māyāvī śakrajit samitiñjayaḥ /

vidyāvān api yenendro māyayā nīyate balāt // [= 607*; see below]

That master of magical illusion, the conqueror of Śakra, and victorious in battle, by whom through the power of māyā, Indra, though he possessed a magical spell [vidyā], was forcibly led away, is not to be seen.

GPP (7.29.29), NSP (7.29.28), Gita Press (7.29.31), and the commentary of Cr know the verse as well, with a small variant. They read upahṛtaḥ, "carried off," for nīyate, "being led away." Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr all understand the term vidyāvān as referring to Indra's possession of a magical spell or knowledge (vidyā) for the withdrawal or destruction of the māyā of the asuras (vidyāvān apy asuramāyāsaṃhāravidyāvān apīndraḥ—so Ck, Ct, and Cm; Cg and Cr similarly). We believe this is correct and have translated the line in the critical edition accordingly. Because of the ambiguity of the syntax in pādas ef, it would also be possible to take the term vidyāvān, "possessing a spell or supernatural knowledge," as referring to Rāvaṇi.

Following verse 29, Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [607*]: "By whom, having bound the lord of the gods[1] through māyā, he was carried off[2] by force (baddhvā surapatir yena māyayāpahṛto balāt)."

[1] "By whom, having bound the lord of the gods" baddhvā surapatir yena: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vidyāvān api yenendraḥ, "by whom Indra, even though he possessed a magical spell [vidyā]." See above for the context and comments of the commentators on this passage.

[2] "was carried off" apahṛtaḥ: See above for KK and VSP's variant on this word.

30. "And" cāpi: Literally, "And also." Ś,Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kruddhāḥ, "enraged."

"in a towering rage, assaulted Rāvaṇa with hails of weapons" abhyadravan susaṃkruddhā rāvaṇaṃ śastravṛṣṭibhiḥ: For 30cd, Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,2,4–7,9–11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [609*]: "Having forced Rāvaṇa to turn tail,[1] they pelted him with hails of arrows (rāvaṇaṃ vimukhīkṛtya śaravarṣair avākiran)."

[1] "Having forced . . . to turn tail" vimukhīkṛtya: Literally, "having made [Rāvaṇa one] such that his face was averted."

31. "the Vasus, Ādityas, and the hosts of the Maruts" vasvādityamarudgaṇān: Ñ2,D6, 7,10,11, and Gorresio (with transposition of names), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ādityāṃś ca vasūṃs tadā, "then . . . the Ādityas and the Vasus."

"battered by weapons . . . nor fight on" na yoddhuṃ śastrapīḍitaḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,2,4–7,9–11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yoddhuṃ śatrubhir arditaḥ, "[he] harried by enemies [was not able] to fight."

"could neither make a stand in battle" na śaśāka raṇe sthātum: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,2,4–7,9–11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na śaśāka sa saṃgrāme, "he was not able [to fight] . . . in battle."

32. "But . . . him" taṃ tu: D6,7,10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa taṃ, "he . . . him."

"exhausted" pariśrāntam: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio [pariglānam], GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead parimlānam, "fading or weakening."

"his luster was dimmed" jarjaracchavim: Literally, "having a diminished luster." D2,5–7,9–11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jarjarīkṛtam, "made diminished or weakened."

"still invisible . . . in the midst of battle" yuddhe 'darśanasthaḥ: Literally, "[he] located in invisibility in battle." The sequence of words makes the phrase ambiguous. Due to the sandhi, it can be also read, as noted by Cs, as yuddhe darśanasthaḥ, "located in visibility in battle." Ct explicitly instructs us to select the former reading. He says, "The sequence should be broken up so that we read adarśanasthaḥ; the meaning is 'He spoke while being completely invisible.' (yuddhe darśanastha ity adarśanastha iti chedo 'ntarhita evābravīd ity arthaḥ.)" Ct explains that Rāvaṇi has remained invisible for fear of death at the hands of Indra (darśane mahendranāśabhiyeti bhāvaḥ). Ck and Cg agree with Ct in accepting reading as adarśaṇa. They note: "Situated in invisibility, he spoke in battle. Had there been visibility, then Mahendra would surely have killed him. (yuddhe 'darśanastho 'bravīd iti. sati darśane mahendra eva nāśayet kila—so Ck; Cg similarly.)" Cs allows for the possibility of two readings. If, he says, we understand that Rāvaṇi is visible, he would only be so to his father (and not to others). On the other hand, he continues, if one were to break up the sequence to read adarśana-, the sense would be that Rāvaṇi was invisible to all the others [but not to Rāvaṇa]. (darśanasthaḥ pitṛdṛṣṭipathamātraṃ gataḥ. adarśanastha iti cchede 'pītaradṛṣṭipatham aprāpta ity arthaḥ.) The idea is the same in either case. Among the printed editions consulted, only Gorresio (7.37.33) and GPP (7.29.32) read darśanasthaḥ. All translators, except for Gorresio (1870, p. 137), understand that Rāvaṇi has remained invisible. Gorresio, alone, understands that he now makes himself visible ("fattosi visibile").

33. "let us go" gacchāvaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, except for Ck, read instead the plural gacchāmaḥ for the dual.

"For the work of battle is done." nivṛttaṃ raṇakarma tat: Literally, "this battle work is done." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raṇakarma nivartatām, "let the work of battle be completed." Cg and Ct gloss, "Let it be done, i.e., let it be completed; this is the meaning. (raṇakarma nivartatāṃ nivṛttam astu. samāptam astv ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Cg similarly.)" The critical apparatus ascribes Ct's reading and comments to Ck, although this is not exactly the case in our transcription of Ck. There, Ck only comments "tad raṇakarma nivṛttam astu samāptam astu ('Let that work of battle be done, that is to say, let it be completed')."

"Sir, you have been victorious, as you must know." jitaṃ te viditaṃ bho 'stu: Literally, "O [you sir]! It has been conquered by you, let that be known." The word bhoḥ, "O," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,2,4,6,7,9–11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jitaṃ no viditaṃ te 'stu, "It has been conquered by us; this must be known to you." Ck, Cg, and Ct all note that the construction jitaṃ naḥ is an impersonal construction (bhāve niṣṭhā). They see the phrase as Rāvaṇi's argument for why Rāvaṇa should desist from battle. They explain the phrase to mean "Of us it has been conquered, that is, victory has occurred. This is an impersonal construction. Let that victory be known to you. (kuto nivṛttis tatrāha no 'smākaṃ jitaṃ jayaḥ saṃvṛtto bhāve niṣṭhā sa jayas te vidito 'stu—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.)" Note the irregular sandhi between bhoḥ and astu. See Pā 8.3.17.

34. "For I have captured Śakra . . . And I have broken the pride of the gods." sa gṛhīto mayā śakro bhagnamānāḥ surāḥ kṛtāḥ: Literally, "by me he, Śakra, was captured and the gods were rendered such that their pride was broken." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa gṛhīto devabalād [daiva- —KK and VSP] bhagnadarpāḥ surāḥ kṛtāḥ, "He has been captured from the army of the gods, and the gods have been rendered such that their pride is broken."

35. "Having captured your enemy through your might" nigṛhya ripum ojasā: Ś2, Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous nigṛhyārātim ojasā. The enemy here is Indra. Rāvaṇi's assessment of the situation seems to put something of a spin on the actual facts. At this point in the narrative, Rāvaṇa appears to have been on the point of defeat (see verse 31 above).

"the triple world" trailokyam: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead lokāṃs trīn, "the three worlds."

"Why should you exert yourself in vain" vṛthā te kiṃ śramaṃ kṛtvā: Literally, "What is the use of making exertion in vain?" Ś,Ñ2,B3,4,D3,4,6–8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vṛthā kiṃ te śrameṇeha, "what is the use of your exertion in vain here?"

"since further battle would yield no benefit" yuddhaṃ hi tava niṣphalam: Literally, "for battle on your part is fruitless." Ñ1,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yuddham adya tu niṣphalam, "but battle now is fruitless."

36. "When ten-faced Rāvaṇa had heard those words of Rāvaṇi, his mind was put at ease" tacchrutvā rāvaṇer vākyaṃ svasthacetā daśānanaḥ: Literally, "having heard that speech of Rāvaṇi, the ten-faced one became one whose mind was at ease." Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read for pāda d śakrahīnāḥ surā gatāḥ, lending the line the sense "When the gods had heard those words of Rāvaṇi, they departed without Śakra." KK and VSP read for pāda d svasthacetā babhūva ha, lending the line the meaning "When he [Rāvaṇa] had heard those words of Rāvaṇi, his mind was put at ease."

"he withdrew from the army of the gods and from the work of battle" sa daivatabalāt tasmān nivṛtto raṇakarmaṇaḥ: For 36ab, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [611*]: "Then the army of the gods desisted from the work of battle[1] (tatas tad daivatabalaṃ nivṛttaṃ raṇakarmataḥ)."

[1] "the army of the gods desisted from the work of battle" tatas tad daivatabalaṃ nivṛttaṃ raṇakarmataḥ: V3,B3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatas te daivataganā nivṛttā raṇakarmaṇaḥ, "Then the hosts of the gods desisted from the work of battle."

37. "the mighty lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas" prabhuḥ . . . niśācarādhipaḥ: Literally, "the mighty lord of the night-roaming [ones]." We have rendered prabhuḥ, the nominal sense of which is "lord or master," in its adjectival sense of "mighty or powerful" to avoid redundancy.

"free from his anxiety concerning the battle" raṇavigatajvaraḥ: Literally, "free from anxiety with respect to battle." We follow Cg, the only commentator to remark on this particular reading, who reads it as a partial paranipāta, vigataraṇajvaraḥ, which has a similar meaning.

"prepared to depart from there to his palace" bhavanam abhi tato jagāma: Literally, "he went from there toward the palace." Cv calls our attention to the separation of the upasarga abhi from the finite verb jagāma, "he went." He cites Pāṇini 1.4.82 (wrongly, since by that rule, tmesis is only allowed in vedic utterances) in justification of this separation and glosses, "from there, that is, from that place, he went to the palace. (bhavanam abhitaṃ taj jagāmeti tato deśād bhavanam abhi jagāma. vyavahitāś ceti vyavahitasyābheḥ prāk prayogaḥ.)" [The critical edition reads slightly differently than our manuscript of Cv: bhavanam abhi tato jagāmeti tato deśād bhavanam abhi jagāma.] M5 and KK (7.29.39) and VSP (7.29.39) read instead svabhavanam abhito jagāma, "he went toward his own palace."

"turning to" avāpya: Literally, "having obtained or met." The expression seems odd in the context.

The meter appears to be mixed, with twelve syllables per line. Lines 1 (hypometric) and 3 conform to the scansion of the kāmadattā meter (na, na, ra, ya), while lines 2 and 4 fit the scansion of mālatī (na, ja, ja, ra).

For verse 37, Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press substitute a passage of four lines [612*]: "Then, his anger gone,[1] the supremely powerful enemy of the thirty gods, the famous lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas,[2] listened attentively to the welcome words of his son and then addressed him[3] (atha sa vigatamanyur uttamaujās tridaśaripuḥ prathito niśācarendraḥ / svasutavacanam ādṛtaḥ priyaṃ tat samanuniśamya jagāda caiva sūnum //)."

[1] "his anger gone" vigatamanyuḥ: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead raṇavigatam, "desisted from battle." The adjective, in this case, applies to Rāvaṇi.

[2] "lord of the night-roaming rākṣasas" niśācarendraḥ: Literally, "the Indra among night-roaming [ones]." The use of the term "-indra," despite its common employment merely to mean "best or lord of," is, perhaps, intentional here.

[3] "his son . . . him" svasuta- . . . sūnum: Literally, "his own son . . . son."

The meter is Puṣpitāgrā.

38. "O you whose valor is equal to that of the immortal gods, through your feats of valor befitting the greatest of warriors, you have increased the pride of my lineage in that you have defeated the lord of the thirty gods and the thirty gods as well." atibalasadṛśaiḥ parākramais tair mama kulamānavivardhanaṃ kṛtam / yad amarasamavikrama tvayā tridaśapatis tridaśāś ca nirjitāḥ //: For pāda c [yad amarasamavikrama tvayā], KK and VSP read yad ayam atulabalas tvayādya vai, "in that he, of unequaled might, in that you have this day." See below for translation. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead atibalasadṛśaiḥ parākramais tvaṃ mama kulavaṃśavivardhanaḥ prabho / yad ayam atulabalas tvayādya vai tridaśapatis tridaśāś ca nirjitāḥ //, "Through your feats of valor befitting the greatest of warriors, you, lord, are the increaser of my lineage in that you have this day defeated the lord of the thirty gods of unequaled might and the thirty gods as well."

The meter appears to be mixed, with twelve syllables per line. Lines 1 and 3 (hypometric) conform to the scansion of the kāmadattā meter (na, na, ra, ya), while lines 2 and 4 fit the scansion of mālatī (na, ja, ja, ra).

39. "So bring Vāsava quickly" tvaritam upanayasva vāsavam: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D2,3,5–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, with the possible exception of Ck, read instead naya ratham adhiropya vāsavam, "having made Vāsava mount [your] chariot, bring [him]." Cg, who reads this variant, is apparently also aware of the critical reading, which he probably derives from Ck. Apropos of this pāda, he remarks: "If one accepts the reading 'tvaritam upanayasva,' then it should be construed with the term nirjitāḥ from the previous verse (tvaritam upanayasveti pāṭhe nirjitā iti pūrveṇānvayaḥ)." Ck only cites the critical reading but interprets similarly.

"and, surrounded by the army" sainyasaṃvṛtaḥ: Literally, "surrounded by the army." Pāda b is hypometric. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead senayā vṛttas tvam, "you, surrounded by the army."

"as you proceed . . . behind " tava gacchato . . . pṛṣṭhataḥ: V1,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tava pṛṣṭhataḥ . . . hṛṣṭavat, "behind you . . . happily."

The meter is an ardhasamavṛtta and is called either vaitālīya or aparavaktra.

40. "the rākṣasa . . . reaching his own palace" svabhavanam upagamya rākṣasaḥ: Literally, "having approached his own palace, the rākṣasa." Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead svabhavanam abhigamya vīryavān, "The mighty [Rāvaṇi], having approached his own palace." GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the contextually synonymous adhigamya for abhigamya.

"his mind delighted" muditamanāḥ: Ñ,V3,B1,3,4,D1,2,4–7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṛtasamarān, "who had made war." This adjective then modifies rākṣasān, "the rākṣasas."

"dismissed" visasarja: Several of the commentators supply words to the effect that Rāvaṇi discharged the rākṣasas each to his own residence (svasvabhavanaṃ pratīti śeśaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

The meter is vaitālīya or aparavaktra; see notes to verse 39 above.

Following verse 40, T2,M4,9, and KK (in brackets and numbered = 7.29.43 and noted in the apparatus as being placed before the first verse of sarga 30), insert a passage of two lines [613*]: "Then, after having dismissed them, the rākṣasa bound great Indra, the chastiser of Pāka, in the middle of the city gate and then sported happily[1] (tān visṛjya tadā rakṣo mahendraṃ pākaśāsanam / babandha nagaradvāri madhye krīḍati nirvṛttaḥ //)."

[1] "sported happily" krīḍati nirvṛttaḥ: KK reads instead krīḍananirvṛttaḥ, "was happy with sporting."

1. "that immensely powerful god, great Indra" mahendre 'tibale: Literally, "Mahendra, of extraordinary strength."

"placed . . . and proceeded" puraskṛtya gatāḥ: Literally, having placed before, [they] went." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous finite verb yayuḥ, "they went," for the participle gatāḥ.

Following 1ab, T3,4,G1,M2–4,7,10, and KK (numbered as 7.30.1cd–7.30.5ab in brackets) insert a passage of seven lines [614*]: "All the gods, extremely distressed, went to Prajāpati[1] [saying]: 'O Prajāpati, great Indra has been captured because of your boon, O blessed one.[1][2] You, Lord of the three worlds,[2] have made the lord of the rākṣasas invulnerable.[3] And great Maheśvara has given his son the power of magical illusion.[3][4] What could the lord of the gods do[4] against someone who was made more powerful through the power of magical illusion?[5] Nor, O God, Lord of all, can the gods[5] be victorious because of your boon.[6] Therefore, you yourself, O Prajāpati, must release[6] the lord of the gods.[7]' "

Cv remarks that these ślokas are found in some manuscripts (taṃ rāvaṇaṃ samāsādyeti pāṭhā asya ca purastāc catvāraḥ ślokāḥ keṣucit kośeṣu dṛśyante).

[1] "O Prajāpati, great Indra has been captured because of your boon, O blessed one." prajāpate mahendro 'yaṃ gṛhīto bhagavadvarāt: Literally, "O Prajāpati, great Indra has been captured because of the blessed one's boon." KK reads instead bhagavan puruhūto 'yaṃ nigṛhīto 'bhavad varāt, "O blessed one, Indra, invoked by many, has been captured because of [your] boon."

[2] "Lord of the three worlds" trilokeśa: KK reads instead suraiḥ sarvaiḥ, "by all the gods."

[3] "And great . . . has given . . . the power of magical illusion" māyā dattā mahātmanā: KK reads instead varā dattā durātmaṇaḥ, "boons were given to that evil-minded [son]."

[4] "could . . . do" karoti: Literally, "he does." KK reads instead the imperative karotu, "[what] must he do."

[5] "[N]or, O God, Lord of all . . . the gods" surā vā deva sarveśa: KK reads instead surāś ca sarve lokeśa, "And all the gods, O Lord of the worlds."

[6] "Therefore you yourself, O Prajāpati, must release" tatas . . . mokṣayasva prajāpate: KK reads instead tasmāt . . . mocayasva mahādyute, "Therefore, you, O one of immense radiance, must release."

Following 614*, M3 and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.30.4cd) continue with, while M2,4,6–9 insert after 5ab, a passage of one line [615*]: "From today onward, the lord of Laṅkā,[1] exalted through his own valor and might (adyaprabhṛti laṅkeśaḥ svavikramabaloditaḥ /)."

Following 615*, KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.30.5ab) inserts a passage of one line [617*]: "They, knowing his intentions, having thus informed [him], having prostrated before [him], and having propitiated [him] (iti vijñāpya bhāvajñāḥ praṇipatya prasādya ca /)."

2. "Approaching Rāvaṇa . . . him" taṃ rāvaṇaṃ samāsādya: Literally, "having encountered him, Rāvaṇa." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatra rāvaṇam āsādya, "having encountered Rāvaṇa there."

"in a conciliatory fashion" sāntvapūrvam: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous sāmapūrvam.

3. "your son's feats in battle" tava putrasya saṃyuge: Literally, "of your son in battle." Like most translators consulted, we have added some words to indicate that it is Rāvaṇi's accomplishments in battle that have pleased Brahmā. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read putrasya tava by transposition.

"the magnificence of his valor" vikramaudāryam: Gorresio (1870, p. 138), Dutt (1894, p. 1672), Roussel (1903, p. 505), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 475), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 471), and Benoît (1999, p. 1298) all read the compound as a dvandva in the sense of "valor and magnificence." We, however, prefer the reading of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2011), which translates as do we, as if the compound were a tatpuruṣa. If one reads the compound as a dvandva, one must wonder why it is in the singular here, as it would be difficult to understand it as a samāhāradvandva.

"or even your superior" tava . . . adhiko 'pi vā: Cs remarks that the superiority would refer to the ability to fight by means of māyā (māyāyodhane).

4. "your vow has borne fruit" kṛtā pratijñā saphalā: Literally, "the vow has been made fruitful." The reference here is to Rāvaṇa's compound vow at 7.13.37, where he vowed to conquer the three worlds and to send all four of the lokapālas to the abode of Yama. Commentators differ as to which part of this vow Brahmā is addressing here. Cm, Ct, and Cr understand the reference to be to the conquest of the three worlds (trīṃl lokāñ jeṣyāmīti yā pratijñā kṛtā sā saphalā jātā—so Ct; Cm and Cr similarly), while Ck and Cg refer to the four lokapālas (tvayā kṛtā pratijñā caturo dikpālāñ jeṣyāmīti kṛtā pratijñā—so Cg; Ck similarly).

"And I am indeed pleased with your son." prīto 'smi svasutena vai: Ck and Cg appear to construe svasutena as the kartṛ, or agent, of the participle kṛtā, lending the passage the sense "The vow has been made fruitful by your own son. I am pleased." Both Ck and Cg understand svasutena to refer to the might of Rāvaṇi. (svasutena svasutabalena. tvayā kṛtā pratijñā—so Cg; Ck similarly.) This lends the passage the sense "You fulfilled that vow through the strength of your son." The word svasutena is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead prīto 'smi sasutasya te, lending the pāda the sense "I am . . . pleased with you, together with your son." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 471), perhaps reading the text of KK and its variant in the footnote, seems to translate both readings at once. He renders: "You have thus made good your word through your son, and I am pleased with you and your son."

5. "Rāvaṇi" rāvaṇiḥ: Ś,V1,3,D1–4,6–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vīryavān, "mighty."

"shall now be famed throughout the world as Indrajit, 'the Conqueror of Indra' " indrajit tv iti vikhyāto jagaty eṣa bhaviṣyati: Literally, "and he shall be famed in the world as 'Indrajit.' " Ñ1,V1,3,D1,2,4–6,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar jagatīndrajid ity eva parikhyāto bhaviṣyati, "He will indeed be famed in the world as 'Indrajit.' "

6. "this" eṣaḥ: D5,10,11,T1,3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the emphatic particle eva, "surely or indeed."

"relying on whom you" yam āśritya tvayā: Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D1,2,4–7,9–11,T3,4,M4,6,7, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous yaṃ samāśritya te.

"conqueror of his enemies" śatrunirjetā: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–6,8–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead durjayaś caiva, "and truly invincible."

7. "great-armed warrior" mahābāho: Literally, "great-armed [one]."

"the gods, denizens of heaven" divaukasaḥ: Literally, "the heaven-dwelling [ones]." See notes to 7.5.23.

8. "For his release, I now choose" vṛṇomīhāsya mokṣaṇe: Literally, "I choose here his with regard to his release." The syllables -mīhā- are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V1,B3,4,D1,4,7,9–11,T3,4,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vṛṇe yady eṣa mucyate, "I choose . . . if he is released."

See notes to verse 9 below for textual variations and additions that follow verse 8.

9. "the lotus-born god Brahmā" devaḥ . . . kamalodbhavaḥ: Literally, "the god born from a lotus." The epithet kamalodbhavaḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ck, the only commentator to explicitly refer to this line, reads instead salilodbhavaḥ, "water-born one."

At this point, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP show a sequence of substituted, inserted, and repeated lines beginning with verse 8cd and continuing until 10ab. This creates a rather confusing textual apparatus. Below is is a table listing the critical edition's numbering and the equivalent verses in the various editions consulted.

We have provided a translation of the sequence as it appears in the critical text and apparatus, followed by the sequence as it appears in its principal published version, that of KK.

Critical Edition:

"Then Indrajit, victorious in battle [and] of immense blazing energy, said: 'For his release, I now choose immortality, O God.[8] For [all creatures]—bird, four-footed beast, and any other immensely powerful [creature] [626*], as well as trees, thickets, shrubs, vines, grass, rocks, or mountains [627*, line 1]—all creatures fear each other when there is something to fear. Therefore, in this world, all creatures fear all others.'[627(A)] Then Prajāpati, of immense blazing energy, addressed Meghanāda:[624] 'There is no such thing as absolute immortality for any living beings on earth—[9cd] from bird, four-footed beast, or any other immensely powerful [creature].[626*] All beings end in death, whether they be fixed or moving.[628*, line 1] Even the leaf of a tree, when withered, must fall.'[628*, line 2] When, Indrajit had heard the immutable words of the Lord, Grandfather Brahmā . . . [627*, line 2] [continue with verse 10]."

KK:

"Then Indrajit, of immense blazing energy and victorious in battle, said, 'I choose immortality if he is released, O God.[KK 12] For all creatures—quadrupeds, birds, or any other powerful beings, as well as trees, thickets, shrubs, vines, grass, stones, or mountains—fear each other when there is something to fear. Therefore, in this world, all creatures fear all others.'[KK 13–14] Then, Prajāpati, of immense blazing energy, addressed Meghanāda:[KK 15ab] 'There is no such thing as absolute immortality for any living being on earth,[KK 15cd] whether it be a quadruped, a bird, or beings of immense power.[KK 15ef] All beings end in death, whether they be fixed or moving. Even the leaf of a tree, when withered, must fall.'[KK 16] When Indrajit had heard the immutable words of the Lord, Grandfather Brahmā . . . [KK17ab]."

10. "Indrajit . . . lotus-born Brahmā" indrajit padmasaṃbhavam: Literally, "Indrajit . . . the lotus-born one." D1,2,4–7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead meghanādo mahābalaḥ, "the immensely powerful Meghanāda."

"who hovered before him" tatrastham: Literally, "who was or stood there." Recall that since verse 2 above, Brahmā has been hovering in the sky.

"In that case you must hear about the supernatural power that I demand for the release of Indra of the hundred sacrifices." śrūyatāṃ yā bhavet siddhiḥ śatakratuvimokṣaṇe: Literally, "Please hear which supernatural power there should be with regard to the release of him of the hundred sacrifices." We follow Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who flesh out the elliptical line in an understanding that Indrajit, having been informed that his first request, for absolute immortality, will not be granted, now submits an alternative request in exchange for Indra's release (sarvāmaraṇatvābhāve 'pi śatakratuvimokṣaṇe tannimittaṃ mayā siddhiḥ kāṅkṣitā sā śrūyatām—so Cg; Ck, Ct, and Cr similarly). D6,10,11,G1, M3–5,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vā, "or," for yā, "which [supernatural power]." Cg and Ct, who read the variant vā, gloss athavā, indicating that Indrajit is explicitly positing an alternative to his request.

11. "My abiding desire, O God, is that whenever I strive to conquer my enemies, I should enter battle only after having worshiped Agni, the purifier." mameṣṭaṃ nityaśo deva havyaiḥ saṃpūjya pāvakam / saṃgrāmam avatartuṃ vai śatrunirjayakāṅkṣiṇaḥ //: Literally, "O God, it is constantly desired by me, who am eager for victory over my enemies, to descend to battle having worshiped Pāvaka with oblations." Ś,D1,3,8 omit this verse, makings its inclusion in the critical edition questionable. See Introduction, "Text." Compare, for example, 7.51-1*–7.51-7* and notes (= App. I, No. 8, lines 1–302) and following notes to 7.51-7*, App. I, No. 8, lines 303–307, 7.63.3ff and notes (= App. I, No. 11), 7.67.4ff and notes (= 1127* and App. I, No. 11), and 7.88-1* and notes (= App. I. No. 13), where the passages are omitted with far less textual support. The verse as represented in the critical edition appears to be incomplete, as it lacks a finite verb.

"O God . . . with oblations" deva havyaiḥ: D10–12 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead havyaiḥ mantraiḥ, "with oblations and mantras."

"I should enter" avatartum: Literally, "to descend." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who all gloss praveṣṭum, "to enter."

"Agni, the purifier" pāvakam: Literally, "the purifier."

"abiding" nityaśaḥ: Literally, "constantly." However, Ck and Cg take a different approach, glossing, "according to precept or rule (niyamena)," in which case it would construe with the gerund saṃpūjya, "having worshiped." One could also read the adverb nityaśaḥ with the infinitive avatartum to yield the sense "May I always enter battle . . ." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 505) understands that Indrajit claims that he constantly worships Agni. In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 476) and Benoît (1999, p. 1298).

Following verse 11, B1,D4–7,10,11,S insert, while Ś,D1,3,8 insert following verse 10 and D10 inserts following 11ab, a passage of two lines [630*]: "The boon upon which I am resolved[1] is that a chariot yoked with horses should arise for me[2] from Agni, the shining god of fire,[3] and that so long as I remain in that chariot, I shall be[4] immortal." (aśvayukto mama ratha uttiṣṭheta vibhāvasoḥ / tatsthasyāmaratā ca syād eṣa me niścayo varaḥ //). The literal translation is "May my chariot yoked with horses arise from Vibhāvasu. And may there be immortality for [me] standing in it. This boon would be my resolve."

[1] "The boon upon which I am resolved" me niścayo varaḥ: Literally, "[This] boon [would be] my resolve." Ś,D1,3,4,6–8,10–12,M4,6,7, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead me niścito varaḥ, "this boon [is or would be] resolved upon by [lit., 'of'] me."

[2] "a chariot . . . for me" mama rathaḥ: Literally, "my chariot." B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ratho mahyam, "a chariot for me." See 67.72.12 and notes.

[3] "should arise . . . from Agni, the shining god of fire" uttiṣṭheta vibhāvasoḥ: Literally, "It should arise from Vibhāvasu." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 505), apparently reading the genitive instead of the ablative, renders, "le char du Vibhāvasu." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 476) and Benoît (1999, p. 1299). B1,D10,11,M9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead uttiṣṭhet tu, "and may [a chariot] arise."

[4] "and . . . I shall be" ca syād: Literally, "and may there be." D1,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead syān me, "let there be of or for me."

12. "But, O God, let my death occur in battle only if I should fight before that rite is completed with its mantras and oblations to Agni, the shining god of fire." tasmiṃś ced asampāte tu japyahome vibhāvasoḥ / yudhyeyaṃ deva saṃgrāme tadā me syād vināśanam //: Literally, "But if, while that with its mantras and oblations to Vibhāvasu is incomplete, I should fight, then, O God, let my destruction be in battle." We agree with Ck, Cg, and Ct in taking the locative saṃgrāme as the adhikaraṇa of the optative syāt, "let it be," in pāda d. Cg interprets, " 'If I should fight, then only let my death occur in battle itself,' that is my desire (yadi yudhyeyaṃ tadaiva saṃgrāma eva vināśanaṃ bhavatv iti mameṣṭam iti saṃbandhaḥ)." Ck and Ct understand similarly. Gorresio's edition (7.38.13) reads the sequence as a compound, devasaṃgrāme, which Gorresio (1870, p. 139) accordingly renders as "quando . . . io combatterò contro i Devi in guerra." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 505), perhaps influenced by Gorresio, similarly renders, "si . . . je m'engage dans une lutte contre un Deva."

D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tasmin yady asamāpte ca japyahome, "and if, while that with its mantras and oblations is incomplete," for tasmiṃś ced asampāte tu japyahome. Ct understands that the compound japyahome is a samāhāradvandva and refers to the ritual activities that are required in a sacrifice preparatory to battle (tasmin sāṃgrāmikayāge 'peksitaṃ yaj japyahomaṃ samāhāradvandvaḥ). Ck and Cg further note that the sacrifice might be interrupted due to the force of some obstacle (vighnavaśād asamāpte). It is this condition of Indrajit's qualified boon of invincibility that will permit Lakṣmaṇa to kill him after a long battle, as described in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (sargas 72–78). For descriptions of the boon, see 6.71.14; 6.72.13; and notes.

13. "Moreover" caiva: Literally, "and, too." Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B1,3,4,D1–5,8–12,T1,3,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead deva, "O God."

"every other man . . . But I" sarvo . . . pumān /. . . mayā tu: Literally, "every man . . . but by me." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Indrajit is stating that his mode of acquiring a boon will be different from that of ordinary people (lokavilakṣaṇakriyayāyaṃ me varalābha ity āha—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

"I shall secure immortality" mayā . . . amaratvaṃ pravartitam: Literally, "by me this immortality is set in motion or brought about." Ck and Cg gloss prakīrtitam, "famed or proclaimed," for pravartitam, "brought about." They justify this by adding the phrase "by virtue of the necessity of its being awarded (dātavyatveneti śeṣaḥ)." Cr glosses vṛttam, "come about."

"through valor" vikrameṇa: Cr notes that the specific act of valor intended is the capture of Indra. He further notes that in mentioning that he will have acquired immortality through his valor, Indrajit is suggesting that unless he receives the boon, he will not release Indra. (mayā tu vikrameṇendranigraheṇety arthaḥ. etad amaratvaṃ pravartitaṃ vṛttam. etena varaprāptim antarendramokṣo na bhaviteti dhvanitam.)

14. "Prajāpati" prajāpatiḥ: V1,D6,7,10,11,M1–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pitāmahaḥ, "the Grandfather."

"said" prāha: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cāha, "and said."

"returned" gatāḥ: Literally, "[they] went."

"highest heaven" tridivam: Literally, "the third heaven." See notes to 7.22.43.

15. "Rāma, Śakra" śakraḥ . . . rāma: Ś,D6–8,10–12,M6,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāma . . . indraḥ, "O Rāma . . . Indra."

"with his garments and garlands in disarray" bhraṣṭāmbarasrajaḥ: Literally, "one whose garments and garlands had fallen off or are ruined." Ck reads -ambara- with the critical edition but takes it in its sense of sky, which he takes, in turn, as a metonym for the gods. He glosses, "the gods who travel through the sky (khecarāṇāṃ devānām)." D10,11,M9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhraṣṭāmaradyutiḥ, "his godly splendor dimmed." We agree with Cg and Ct in taking amara in its nominal sense of "immortal god" rather than as an adjective (bhraṣṭā amarāṇāṃ dyutir yasya saḥ—so Ct; Cg similarly).

"gave way to brooding" dhyānatatparatāṃ gataḥ: Literally, "he went to preoccupation with thought." Cr provides the content of Indra's thought as he sees it, noting: "He brooded constantly, thinking: 'By what feat have I come to be defeated in this way?' (nirantaraṃ dadhyau kena karmaṇaiva parābhūtim ahaṃ prāpta iti vicārayāmāsety arthaḥ)."

16. "Prajāpati" prajāpatiḥ: Ś,D,M9,10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pitāmahaḥ, "the Grandfather."

"O Indra of the hundred sacrifices, why are you so sorrowful? You must remember your evil deed." śatakrato kim utkaṇṭhāṃ karoṣi smara duṣkṛtam: "O you of the hundred sacrifices, why do you make sorrow? Remember the evil act." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śatakrato kimu purā karoti sma suduṣkṛtam [KK, VSP—suduṣkaram], "O you of the hundred sacrifices, why did you [sir] do that very evil deed long ago?" Cr, anticipating what is to follow, remarks: "Why, sir, long ago, that is to say, earlier, did you commit that very evil deed, that is to say, that great sin that has become the cause of defeat (purā pūrvaṃ suduṣkṛtam etat parābhūtikāraṇībhūtamahāpāpaṃ kiṃ bhavān karoti sma)?"

17. This verse begins a rather unusual version of the well-known story of Indra's seduction of the wife of the sage Gautama and of the subsequent curse of both Ahalyā and the god. The Rāmāyaṇa itself has another version in the Bālakāṇḍa (see 1.47.15–1.48 and notes). See, too, notes to 7.72.13. See also R. Goldman 1978, pp. 360–61.

"many" bahvyaḥ: D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead buddhyā, "by means of intellect or mentally." This, then, would construe adverbially with the participle sṛṣṭāḥ, "created," in pāda b.

"people" prajāḥ: The term is polysemic, referring to offspring in general, creatures in general, or subjects of a king. Here the context makes it clear that Brahmā is referring to the creation of the human race.

"They were all of a single type. They all had the same speech, and they all looked the same in every respect." ekavarṇāḥ samābhāṣā ekarūpāś ca sarvaśaḥ: Literally, "[They were] of a single varṇa, having the same speech, and of a single form, in every way." The commentators and translators differ in their interpretations of the polysemic term varṇa. Given the context in which all humans were supposed to have been originally identical to one another, we believe that the appropriate sense is "class, type, or kind." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all understand varṇa to mean "bodily beauty (dehakāntiḥ—so Ck and Ct; Cg, Cm similarly)." All the translators consulted take the term in its sense of "color or complexion." No translator or commentator consulted appears to understand the term in its sense of the four social and ritual classes of traditional brahmanical society. Cm understands the term samābhāṣāḥ, "having the same speech," to mean "having a single type of speech (ekavidhavacanāḥ)." Ct understands similarly. Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss ekarūpāḥ, "of a single form," as "having the same age and condition (samānavayovasthāḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)," while Cm understands, "having the same type of arrangement of bodily limbs (ekavidhaśarīrāvayavasaṃniveśāḥ)."

18. "either in their appearance or in their characteristics" darśane lakṣaṇe 'py vā: Cg takes the former term to refer to physical beauty and the latter to the excellence or perfection of the various parts of the body, the eyes, etc. (darśane saundarye lakṣaṇe nayanādyavayavasauṣṭhave). Cv appears to understand similarly, glossing darśane as rūpe, "in beauty," but his gloss of lakṣaṇe is missing from our transcript of his commentary.

"I began to ponder" samacintayam: Literally, "I thought." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar paryacintayam, "I contemplated." Cg glosses, "I took thought with reference to those people, or I thought about ways of creating distinctions among them. (tāḥ prājā uddiśya paryacintayam. tāsāṃ viśeṣakaraṇaprakāram acintayaṃ vā.)"

20. "devoid of all imperfection . . . Ahalyā, "Devoid of Imperfection" ahalyā . . . ahalyeti . . . nāma: Literally, "she who is devoid of deformity or ugliness . . . the name 'Ahalyā.' " Cr explains the etymology of the name Ahalyā, deriving it from hala, "deformed, ugly," upon which is based halyam, "deformity, ugliness, or blameworthiness." The term is then given the negative prefix "a." Therefore the woman's name means "she in whom there is no deformity." (yasyā yena hetunā halyaṃ vairūpyaṃ na vidyate tena hetunā sāhalyeti viśrutāta eva mayāpi tasyā nāmāhalyeti prakīrtitam—so Cr.) Cm and Ct understand halyam to mean "blameworthiness (nindyatām)."

"I gave her" mayā tasyāḥ . . . pravartitam: Literally, "by me [this is] set in motion or brought about." B1,3,D6,7,10,11,M2,4,8–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead prakīrtitam, "proclaimed."

Following 20ab, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [632*]: "The word 'hala' here means [lit., 'is'] deformity. The state that arises from that is the state of being deformed (halyam). Since[1] that state of being deformed (halyam) did not exist [in her], therefore she was known as Ahalyā (halaṃ nāmeha vairūpyaṃ halyaṃ tatprabhavaṃ bhavet / yasmān na vidyate halyaṃ tenāhalyeti viśrutā //)."

[1] "Since" yasmāt: D6,10,11,T3,4,G1,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yasyāḥ, "[she] of whom."

21. "But" tu: Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11,T,G1,2,M1–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"I became concerned as to whom she should belong" bhaviṣyatīti kasyaiṣā mama cintā tato 'bhavat: Literally, "Then of me the worry arose: 'Of whom will she be?' " Cg, Ct, and Cr flesh out the expression "of whom will she be" by adding various words for wife (patnī—so Cg; bhāryā—so Ct; strī—so Cr)." Cg explains the source of Brahmā's concern, saying that it is because of the lack of a prospective groom that would be her equal (tattulyavarābhāvād iti bhāvaḥ).

22. "because of your exalted station . . . 'She must be my wife' " sthānādhikatayā patnī mamaiṣeti: Literally, "because of superiority of station, she [must be] my wife." The last word of the phrase, iti, marks the end of the quote; however, Sanskrit does not employ an initial marker of a quotation. Thus the compound sthānādhikatayā can be taken either as part of Brahmā's speech, as we have done, in the sense of "because of your exalted station," or as part of Indra's thought, "because of my exalted station." The translators consulted are divided on this issue. The commentators note that the exalted position of Indra is his lordship of the gods (devādhipatitvarūpādhikasthānaprāptyā hetunā—so Ct), his lordship of the triple world (trailokyādhipatitvena hetunā—so Cg), or his acquisition of the highest position among the gods (deveṣv adhikapadavi[sic]prāptatvena hetunā—so Ck). Cr understands that it is because of his holding the highest position of all (sarvopari sthānavattvena hetunā—so Cr). Cv understands similarly. Cr further notes that Indra believes that Ahalyā should be his wife even if she does not desire it (eṣājātakāmā mamaiva patnīti nārīṃ manasā jānīṣe). Ck, Cg, and Ct note that Indra takes this decision without Brahmā's consent (vināpi madanumatim—so Ct).

23. "I placed her under the guardianship of . . . Gautama . . . in his care" sā mayā nyāsabhūtā . . . gautamasya . . . / nyastā: Literally, "She was made a trust of Gautama by me . . . she was entrusted." The practice of entrusting a woman to an authoritative or responsible party in order to protect her chastity is known elsewhere in the literature. Compare SvapnVā Act 1, where Yaugandhāryaṇa leaves Vāsavadattā as a "deposit (nyāsa)" with Padmāvatī.

"and . . . she" ca sā: The words are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca ha, "and indeed."

24. "once I had made certain of" parijñāya: Literally, "having been ascertained [by me]."

"the self-control" sthairyam: Literally, "steadiness or firmness." The context here fully supports the commentators' gloss of "the state of having controlled one's senses (jitendriyatvam—so Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr)." See note below.

"I then gave her to him to be his wife" mayā . . . /. . . patnyarthaṃ sparśitā tadā: Literally, "by me she was given for the purpose of a wife." Cv, Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr gloss "[she was] given (dattā)" for sparśitā. The underlying meaning of the participle sparśitā is "[she was] caused to be touched." In this context, the author, no doubt, uses this unusual lexeme for "given" to emphasize the idea that prior to this the self-controlled sage had never laid hands, as it were, on Ahalyā. Perhaps this is the earliest known instance of what in modern times Gandhi referred to as "brahmacharya pariksha." See Lal 2000. D6,7,10,11,T2,3,M4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read mahā-, "great," for mayā, "by me," which then forms a compound with the word sthairyam (see above) in pāda b, lending the line the sense "The great self-control of Gautama having been ascertained [by me]."

25. Verse 25 is bracketed in KK 1905 (between verses 7.30.29 and 7.30.30, and numbered 1) and in VSP (unnumbered, between verses 7.30.29 and 7.30.30).

"But since she had been given to Gautama" gautame dattayā tayā: Cr explains the construction as "because of her being given to Gautama (tayā gautame dattayā hetunā)."

"lost all hope" āsan nirāśāḥ: Literally, "they became hopeless." The expression is elliptical. The idea, of course, is that the gods have lost all hope of winning Ahalyā.

26. "You, however, were infuriated" tvaṃ kruddhas tv iha: Literally, "But you were angry here." T1 and KK and VSP read instead saṃkruddhas tvaṃ hi. This does little to change the meaning but replaces the critical edition's awkward iha, "here."

"consumed with lust" kāmātmā: Literally, "whose very essence is desire." KK and VSP read instead dharmātman, "O righteous one." The vocative could refer either to Rāma here or to Indra, in which case the usage might be seen as ironic in this context.

27. "Overwhelmed with lust . . . you raped her" sā tvayā dharṣitā . . . kāmārtena: Literally, "she was assaulted by you, who were afflicted with desire." This is a rather unusual retelling of the widely known story of Indra and Ahalyā. In most other versions, including that of the Bālakāṇḍa, Indra seduces Ahalyā through deceit rather than through violence. Indeed, at 1.47.19 it is made clear that the sex is consensual. There are very few references to forcible rape in the epic literature, and three of them are in the Uttarakāṇḍa: here; at 7.26.30, where Rāvaṇa rapes Rambhā; and at 7.71.15, where Daṇḍa rapes Arajā. Various derivations of the verb √dhṛṣ are used in a similar fashion to indicate forcible rape at 7.26.40,43,44. Compare, too, 637*, line 2, note 2, following notes to verse 37 below.

"filled with rage" samanyunā: Cs offers two interpretations of this adjective. In the first, and least forced, he reads it as do we, "filled with rage," and ascribes Indra's anger to his thought that Brahmā has excluded him and given the woman to the sage (asmān vihāyeyaṃ vanitā munaye datteti manyusahitena). Cs's second interpretation depends on reading manyu in its less common sense of "sacrifice." In this reading, the adjective comes to mean "even he who had performed sacrifice one hundred times." The fact that such a person could assault a woman, Cs argues, suggests that even the performance of virtuous actions is no guarantee of happiness unless there is lordly compassion. (samanyunāpi śatavāraviracitayajñenāpi. dharṣitā. anena satkarmakaraṇam apīśvarakaruṇāṃ vinā na kuśalopalambhakam iti sūcitaṃ bhavati.)

"And you" tvaṃ ca: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tvaṃ saḥ, "you, he."

"in the ashram" āśrame: KK and VSP read instead hy āśrame to avoid the hiatus. The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

28. "a reversal of your condition" daśābhāgaviparyayam: Literally, "an inversion of the allocation of condition or state." The phrase is ambiguous and has been interpreted in different ways by the commentators who share this reading. In this version of the story, as we see in verses 29ff., the principal punishment for Indra's crime is his captivity and loss of what was, in effect, tenure in his position as lord of the gods. In other versions of the story, the punishment more closely fits the crime. For example, Indra is literally castrated at Bālakāṇḍa 47.26–27. And at MBh 13.41.21, he is covered with a thousand vulvas, which are then, upon Indra's appeal, turned into eyes. This gives him his common epithet sahasrākṣa, "thousand-eyed." Ct glosses the compound daśābhāga- with "a particular condition (avasthābhedaḥ)." He understands this condition to be that of Indra's lordship, which has now been reversed by his captivity (daśābhāgo 'vasthābheda aiśvaryarūpas tasya viparyayaṃ bandhanarūpaṃ viparītāvasthām). Ck and Cg understand daśābhāga- similarly but see the inversion experienced by Indra as not that of his lordship, per se, but rather as an inversion of his innately pure state (sahajasāttvikāvasthāviparyayam ity arthaḥ). Cr understands daśābhāga- to refer to "the fulfillment of destiny or time (kālaprāptiḥ) through which Indra has met with reversal, that is to say, defeat (daśābhāgena kālaprāptyā viparyayaṃ parābhūtiṃ gato 'si)." Northern manuscripts, a few southern manuscripts, Lahore, and Gorresio are much more explicit as to what has befallen Indra. For 28cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5,8,9,12, and Lahore and Gorresio substitute a passage of one line [634*]: "Then you, O god, were mutilated and came to have the testicles of a ram (vikalo 'si kṛto deva tadā meṣavṛṣo bhavān)." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D1–5,9, and Gorresio read viphalaḥ, "castrated," for vikalaḥ, "mutilated," making the sense entirely unambiguous. These readings clearly reflect the outcome of the story as it is narrated in the Bālakāṇḍa.

29. "showing no fear" nirbhayam: Literally, "fearlessly." D6,7,10,11,M2, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the similar nirbhayāt, "out of fearlessness." The idea is that Indra acted without fear of reprisal on the part of Gautama.

"your majesty" rājan: Ś,D6,8,10–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead śakra, "Śakra."

30. "this tendency" ayaṃ . . . bhāvaḥ: The polysemic word bhāvaḥ is best understood here in its sense of "conduct or predisposition." The commentators gloss either "the behavior of a paramour (jārabhāvaḥ—so Ck, Ct, and Cs)" or "the behavior that takes the form of assaulting the wives of others (parastrīdharṣaṇarūpo bhāvaḥ—so Cr)."

"that you have established in the world" yas tvayeha pravartitaḥ: Literally, "which has been set in motion by you here." This pāda (b) is repeated at 32d below. Thus the episode claims to provide an originary myth for the existence of rape. See notes to verse 27 above.

"common to all men as well" mānuṣeṣv api sarveṣu: Literally, "among all men as well." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read lokeṣu for sarveṣu, lending the phrase the sense of "even in the worlds of men." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the injunction of Gautama will apply "even to those men authorized with respect to the śāstras (śāstrādhikāriṣv api)." Ck adds that this will be because of the fault of Indra as their king (rājñas tava doṣāt). Cs notes that his condition will apply to those men under the lordship of Indra, since it will be through the fault of their king. (mānuṣeṣu tvatsvāmikeṣu bhaviṣyati. rājadoṣāt.)

31. "And as for that great and very grievous violation that will arise" tatrādharmaḥ subalavān samutthāsyati yo mahān: Literally, "whichever great and very powerful unrighteousness [adharma] will arise in that case." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP omit this line (31ab). Of the commentators consulted, only Cg remarks on the line. As his commentary is printed in GPP (Cg's comments to 7.30.34) and KK (Cg's comments to 7.30.40), it would appear that he is reading dharmaḥ for adharmaḥ. Only VSP (Cg's comments to 7.30.35) prints the avagraha, showing that the intended word is adharmaḥ. This is evidently the correct reading. For some reason, the other two editions fail to print the avagraha. Cg explains the phrase tatrādharmaḥ, "unrighteousness in reference to that." He says, "that unrighteousness that arises in connection with the conduct of a paramour (tatra jārabhāve yo 'dharmaḥ)." For other orthographic problems involving the avagraha, see 99*, lines 3–5, following notes to 7.6.9; and 7.73.10. Compare, also, 6.35.24; 6.38.2*; 6.47.103; 6.57.72; and 6.60.1342, App. I, No. 39, note 9.

"half of it will be ascribed to him who perpetrates it, while half will be ascribed to you" tatrārdhaṃ tasya yaḥ kartā tvayy ardhaṃ nipatiṣyati: Literally, "whoever is the agent of that [unrighteousness], on him will fall half of it [and] half on you." The syntax is rather peculiar. Following the interpretation of the commentators who share this reading, we understand tatra as the person who commits the offense. (yo jārabhāvena pāpasya kartā tatra puruṣe pāpasyārdhaṃ nipatiṣyati tvayy ardham—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly.) Cg additionally observes that here the principle of guilt by association is to be understood by the maxim "The king [suffers] the sin committed in the kingdom (rājā rāṣṭrakṛtaṃ pāpam iti nyāyāt)."

32. "Nor . . . will your position be permanent" na ca te sthāvaraṃ sthānam: Literally, "and your position will not be fixed." The idea here is that henceforth Indra's status as lord of the gods will no longer be permanent but rather subject to fluctuation, as noted by Cr (te sthānaṃ sthāvaraṃ niścalaṃ na bhaviṣyati so 'padrutam eva bhaviṣyatīty arthaḥ).

"smasher of citadels" puraṃdara: D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na saṃśayaḥ, "[of this] there is no doubt."

"because of your association with this violation that you have established in the world" etenādharmayogena yas tvayeha pravartitaḥ: Literally, "that which has been set in motion by you here through this connection with adharma." The line is elliptical in that it includes no substantive in agreement with the relative pronoun yaḥ, "which." The presumptive substantive would be adharmaḥ, "violation." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP omit this line (32cd). Pāda d is a repeat of 30b above.

33. "he shall be so only temporarily" adhruvaḥ sa na bhaviṣyati: Literally, "he will not be permanent."

"pronounced" muktaḥ: Literally, "released."

"Gautama" asau: Literally, "he."

"become invisible within the confines of my ashram" vinidhvaṃsa mamāśramasamīpataḥ: Literally, "perish near my ashram or vanish from my ashram." Commentators and translators differ widely as to the intent of Gautama's curse. We believe that the author here is echoing the curse of Ahalyā as it was articulated at Bālakāṇḍa 47.28cd–29, where the sage curses his wife to live a deprived and miserable life in his ashram, invisible to all creatures (adṛśyā sarvabhūtānām). Thus we believe that the verbal root √dhvaṃs, "to be destroyed," can be understood here like the synonymous root √naś in the sense of "vanish or become invisible." See, for example, 7.22.41. This is also the interpretation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2014), which translates, "O impudent woman, live unseen in the precincts of my hermitage." Cs believes the curse entails Ahalyā's lapsing from consciousness, etc. (cetanatvādibhyo dhvastā bhava). This may be a reference to the liminal state to which Ahalyā is consigned in the Bālakāṇḍa passage (1.47.28cd–32). Our interpretation and that of Gita Press appear to be most closely aligned with Cs's. Ck and Ct understand Gautama to be cursing Ahalyā so that her beauty will be destroyed (dhvastasaurūpyā bhava). This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1673), who renders, "O vicious one, let thy beauty be spoiled in the vicinity of the hermitage." Cr is noncommittal and offers the unhelpful "may you attain destruction (dhvaṃsaṃ prāpnuhi)." But there is nothing in the following text or the tradition to support this interpretation. This comment may have influenced Raghunathan's (1982, vol. 3, p. 473) rather peculiar translation, "Perish, shameless slut! But you shall remain near my hermitage." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 507), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 477) and Benoît (1999, p. 1300), understands Gautama not to be so much cursing Ahalyā with this phrase as ordering her to leave his ashram. He renders, "éloigne-toi de mon ermitage." The passage does not support this interpretation very well, and it may be that, as in other cases, Roussel has been influenced by Gorresio, whose text (7.38.35) reads durvinite vraja kṣipraṃ mamāśramasamīpataḥ, which he renders (1870, p. 141), quite correctly, as "Vattene immantinente là vicino al mio romitaggio, o trista." For examples of Gorresio's influence on Roussel, see notes to 6.93.13; 6.98.2, 21, 23; 6.116.11; 7.36.42. See also Goldman and Goldman 2009, p. 115.

Following verse 34, T2,M4,7, and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.30.43) insert a passage of three lines [635*]: "When you have worshiped, like a divinity, my chosen deity[1] Agni, the purifier, with an oblation, and have worshiped Rāma, after suffering for many, many years,[2] you will be released. For only then, when your sin has been expiated[3] will you attain perfection with me.[4]"

[1] "deity" devam: KK reads instead dīptam, "blazing." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[2] "after suffering for many, many years" bahuvarṣagaṇān dagdhā: Literally, "[you] burned for many hosts of years." KK reads instead brahmavarṣasahasrāṇi, "for many thousands of years of Brahmā." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[3] "when your sin has been expiated" pāpasya saṃkṣaye: Literally, "upon the destruction of the sin." KK reads instead pāpasya saṃkṣayaḥ, lending the line the sense "there would be an expiation of the sin." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[4] "perfection with me" siddhir mayā: KK reads instead subhrūs tava, "O fair browed woman, of you." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

35. "unfaithful" anavasthitā: Literally, "unsteady or loose in conduct."

"you shall no longer be the only" na tvam ekā bhaviṣyasi: Literally, "you shall not be alone or unique." Ś2,3,Ñ1,B1,3,D4,5,8,10,11,M1,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the third person singular bhaviṣyati. Ck, Cg, and Ct explain the disagreement by understanding that the verb applies not to Ahalyā herself but to the situation in which, up until the present moment, she was the only beautiful woman in the world, which situation will not longer be the case (yasmāt tvam anavasthitā tasmād etāvatkālaṃ tvam ekaiva rūpavatīti yat sthitaṃ tan na bhaviṣyati—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

36. "That beauty of yours, once so hard to obtain and on account of which this infatuation came about, shall henceforth belong to all people." rūpaṃ ca tat prajā sarvā gamiṣyanti sudurlabham / yat tavedaṃ samāśritya vibhramo 'yam upasthitaḥ //: Literally, "All people will go to that beauty of yours, so very hard to obtain, relying on which this error has come about."

"That" tat: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead te, "of yours."

"of yours . . . this" tavedam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tad ekam, "that unique [beauty]."

"so hard to obtain" sudurlabham: D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na saṃśayaḥ, "[of this] there is no doubt."

"infatuation" vibhramaḥ: Literally, "error or agitation of love." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct in understanding the term to refer to infatuation (kāmamohaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly). Cs is more specific and understands vibhramaḥ to refer to an infatuation that leads to adulterous intercourse (parasaṃgaprāpako mohaḥ). There is a difference of opinion among the commentators as to whose infatuation is being described. Ct believes we should ascribe it to Indra. Glossing the participle upasthitaḥ, he adds, "That is, it took place, we should add the words 'on the part of Indra' (pravṛtta indrasyeti śeṣaḥ)." Cr, however, ascribes it to Ahalyā (te vibhrama upasthitaḥ). Cs critiques Ct's ascription of the infatuation to Indra. He argues that since this is the point in the sequential application [of the curses] at which [the sage is] specifically cursing his wife, it is not certain [that this ascription to Indra alone is correct] and thus one should understand that [Ct's position] is by no means self-evident (patnīśāpaprasaktisamayo 'yam iti paraṃparopayogo na sākṣād iti kiṃcid asvārasyaṃ tatra bodhyam).

37. "It is because of the sage's unleashing of that curse" śāpotsargād dhi tasya . . . muneḥ: Literally, "For, from that sage's release of a curse."

"that all this has come to pass" idam . . . sarvam upāgatam: Literally, "all this has come." D6,7,10,11,T3,G1,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous upasthitam for upāgatam, "has come." Cr notes that the reference is to [Indra's] being captured by his enemy (śatrugrahaṇam upasthitam).

Ñ1,V1,D1,2,4,5,9 continue following 636*; Ś,D8,12, and Lahore continue following 640*; Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D3 (V3,D3, following verse 37 first occurrence), and Gorresio insert following verse 37; M3 inserts following verse 36; and D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert following verse 37ab a passage of thirteen lines [637*]: "She then propitiated the great seer Gautama: 'I was unknowingly[1] violated,[2] brahman, by that god who had taken on your form and not through any act of desire. Please pardon me, brahman-seer.'[1–3] But, addressed by Ahalyā in this fashion, Gautama responded:[4] 'A great chariot-warrior of immense blazing energy shall be born among the Ikṣvākus. Famed throughout the world by the name Rāma, he, great-armed Viṣṇu in a human form, shall go the forest for the sake of a brahman.[3][5–7] When you shall see him, my good woman, then you shall be purified. For he is able to purify the evil deed that you have done.[8–9] Once you have offered him hospitality, you shall return to my side. Then, fair lady, you shall dwell with me.'[10–11] When he had spoken in this fashion, the brahman-seer returned to his ashram. And the wife of that expounder of brahman performed extremely severe austerities.[12–13]"

[1] "unknowingly" ajñānāt: Ahalyā's plea for leniency on the basis of her ignorance of the identity of Indra contrasts starkly with Viśvāmitra's account of the episode at Bālakāṇḍa 47.19–20. There the text makes it unambiguously clear that Ahalyā is a willing and even enthusiastic participant in adultery. Cs, the only commentator to make note of the inconsistency, offers a series of exculpatory explanations for Ahalyā's behavior, none of which is very persuasive. He explains the expression "who had taken on your form (tvadrūpeṇa [lit., 'through your form'])" by noting the passage in the Bālakāṇḍa where Viśvāmitra states, "Having taken on the appearance of the sage" (1.47.17,19 = GPP 1.48.17,19). Cs then glosses the expression "not through any act of desire" as "not out of a desire to make love to him [Indra]." He then offers a series of arguments. First he argues that although it is known from the expression "with a delighted mind and out of a desire for the king of the gods" that the lustful Ahalyā consented to sexual union with the great Indra, nonetheless, it is possible to state that there was no act of desire because of his having concealed his outward appearance. He argues, alternatively, that the statement "there was not an act of desire" was made on the grounds that she was never a wanton woman, and so there is an absence of any act of desire sufficient to merit such a curse. And thus one should understand that there is no contradiction. One might object that because of the fault of being a paramour of Ahalyā, etc., the harm is much greater, and this [statement] expresses the severity [of the transgression]. Moreover, because of the expression from another vedic text that is quoted in the Gītābhāṣya to the effect that even a person who has earned the rewards of many hells does not therefore lose his [bodily] hair [i.e., does not suffer consequences in this world], how [katham] by any means could the fall of Indra, as it were, from his station by being taken at the hands of his enemies be caused by Gautama's curse? If you were to argue that, it would be wrong, because the diminution of bliss in the next world is not like the case of Sugrīva, etc., who married his brother's wife [and therefore suffered the consequences in this world by being shot by Rāma]. The author of the Bhāṣya stated, "The one who has earned the reward of many hells." Nevertheless, he considered the negative consequences in this world. If [you say this is] a contradiction, where is there the question "how" [katham] [i.e., your question "how" is not valid]? (tvadrūpeṇa "muniveṣaṃ samāsthāya" iti prāgudīrṇāt. na kāmakārāt tadramaṇecchāyāḥ. yady api "devarājakutūhalāt prahṛṣṭeṇāntarātmanā" iti vacanān manasānumene kāminī mahendrasaṅgam iti jñāyate, tathāpi bahis tathāpradarśanān na kāmakārād ity uktir iti vā kadāpi pramadā na bhavaty etādṛśaśāpopayogikāmakārābhāvān na kāmakārād ity uktir iti veti jñeyo 'virodhaḥ. nanv ahalyājāratvādy api doṣakṛto 'pi tena bahutaro lopa āsīd ity utkarṣam eva vakti "'bahunarakaphalo hy asau tasya na loma ca kṣīyate' iti śrutyantarāc ca" iti gītābhāṣyokteḥ kathaṃ vidhinendrasya padabhraṃśa ivārikaraparigrahādir gautamaśāpanimitta iti kathitam iti cen na. pāratrikānandahrāsādir yathā sodaradāraparigrahe sugrīvādes tathā nāsti bhāvyānandahrāsādir iti bahunarakaphalo hy asāv iti vadato bhāṣyakṛto 'numata aihiko 'nartha iti virodha iti kātra kathaṃtā.)

[2] "violated" dharṣitā: It appears that the insert passage is reverting to the Bālakāṇḍa version of the story, in which Indra takes on Gautama's form to enable him to trick her into having sexual relations with him. In the current passage, Indra makes no pretense of being Ahalyā's husband and appears to take her by force. See verses 26–27 and notes above.

[3] "for the sake of a brahman" brāhmaṇārthe: The compound can also be taken to mean "for the sake of brahmans" and thus allude to Rāma's larger mission during his exile. Some translators have rendered in this way. Given the context, however, it seems clear to us that the reference is to Rāma's adolescent mission to protect the sacrifice of Viśvāmitra. For it is in the course of that mission that he meets and purifies Ahalyā.

38. "on account of which" yena: B3,D6,7,10,11,G1,M1–5,7,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tena, "[it is] because of that."

"you were captured by your enemy" tvaṃ grahaṇaṃ śatror gataḥ: Literally, "you went to the captivity of an enemy." D6,7,10,11,G1,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous yātaḥ for gataḥ, "went."

39. "you must . . . perform the vaiṣṇava sacrifice" yajasva yajñaṃ tvaṃ vaiṣṇavam: Literally, "you must sacrifice the vaiṣṇava sacrifice." The word yajasva is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M2,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vai yaja, "you must surely sacrifice." See 7.25.8 and notes, where the vaiṣṇava sacrifice is among those performed by Indrajit. See, too, verse 41 and notes below.

"shall you return" yāsyasi: Literally, "you will go." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous ātmanepada form yāsyase.

40. "He was taken by his grandfather and kept in the ocean, the great receptacle of waters." nītaḥ saṃnihitaś caiva āryakeṇa mahodadhau: Literally, "brought by his grandfather and deposited in the great repository of water." At 6.28.18 we were told that Indra's son, Jayanta, was taken from the battlefield by his grandfather. Cg glosses the upasarga sam- of saṃnihitaḥ, "deposited," as samyak, "properly," and the nihitaḥ as nikṣiptaḥ, "set down or deposited." Cg understands the participle to mean "placed (sthāpitaḥ)."

41. "performed the vaiṣṇava sacrifice and" yajñam iṣṭvā ca vaiṣṇavam: Literally, "and having sacrificed the vaiṣṇava sacrifice." Ct remarks that he has pointed out earlier that Jaimini's statement that the gods are not authorized to perform sacrifices was made in error (devānāṃ na yajñeṣv adhikāra iti jaiminyuktaṃ tu pramādād iti nirūpitaṃ prāk). See, too, verse 39 and notes above.

"and ruled the gods" anvaśāsac ca devatāḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read devarāṭ, "[and ruled as] king of the gods," for devatāḥ, "the gods."

42. "Rāma" rāma: Ñ,V1,D6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nāma, "indeed."

"What then of other living beings?" prāṇino 'nye ca kiṃ punaḥ: Literally, "And how much more so living beings?" Ñ2,B1,3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tu, "and or but" for ca, "and."

Following verse 42, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B4,D1–5,8,9,12, and Lahore insert, while D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue following 643* (see below), a passage of two lines [642*]: "And that, Rāma, was how Rāvaṇa, that thorn in the side of the gods,[1] was born. And he, together with his son, was the one by whom Śakra, lord of the gods, was defeated in battle.[2] (evaṃ rāma samudbhūto rāvaṇo devakaṇṭakaḥ /saputro yena saṃgrāme jitaḥ śakraḥ sureśvaraḥ //)"

[1] "that thorn in the side of the gods" devakaṇṭakaḥ: Literally, "the thorn of the gods." Ñ2,B4,D3,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead lokakaṇṭakaḥ, "the thorn of the worlds."

[2] "And he, together with his son, was the one by whom Śakra, lord of the gods, was defeated in battle." saputro yena saṃgrāme jitaḥ śakraḥ sureśvaraḥ: Literally, "the one with a son by whom Śakra, the lord of the gods, was defeated in battle." The syntax seems somewhat forced here. But we concur with all the translations consulted in taking the adjective saputraḥ, "with a son," to refer to Indrajit's role in the capture of Indra. The line could also be read to mean "by whom [Rāvaṇa] Śakra, the lord of the gods, together with his son [Jayanta], was defeated in battle." The commentators are silent.

Following 642*, B1,3,D6,T2–4,G1,2,M (except M3) insert, while D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert following verse 42 and before 642*, a passage of five lines [643*]: "Then, when Rāma had heard those words of Agastya, he said, 'Wonderful!' as did Lakṣmaṇa, the monkeys, and the rākṣasas.[1][1–2] But Vibhīṣaṇa, who stood at Rāma's side, said these words: 'I have now been reminded of those wonderful events that took place[2] so long ago.'[3–4] And Agastya said, 'Rāma, this is what I saw and heard.[3]' [5]"

[1] "Then, when Rāma . . . he said . . . as did Lakṣmaṇa, the monkeys, and the rākṣasas" tad rāmo lakṣmaṇaś cābravīt . . . /. . . vānarā rākṣasāḥ: Literally, "Then Rāma and Lakṣmaṇa, the monkeys, [and] the rākṣasas." Cg and Cr note that we must construe the singular verb abravīt, "he said," with all the subjects (rāmaḥ . . . āścaryam ity abravīt. tathā lakṣmaṇas tathā vānarā rākṣasā cābruvann ity anuṣaṅgaḥ—so Cg). Cr understands similarly. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read rāmaś ca, "and Rāma," for tad rāmaḥ, "then Rāma."

[2] "took place" vṛttam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dṛṣṭam, "[was] seen." Ck reads with the critical edition.

[3] "And Agastya said: 'Rāma, this is what I saw and heard.' " agastyas tv abravīd rāma dṛṣṭam etac chrutaṃ ca me: B1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead agastyaṃ tv abravīd rāmaḥ satyam etac chrutaṃ ca me, "And Rāma said to Agastya: 'This true [tale] has been heard by me.' " Cg explains this somewhat awkward narration by arguing that Vibhīṣaṇa had also witnessed the long-ago events described by Agastya but has now been reminded of them. Rāma, in turn, is able to ascertain the truthfulness of Agastya's account through his conversations with Vibhīṣaṇa. (he rāma! agastyas tu āścaryaṃ yad dṛṣṭaṃ purātanam abravīt sarvaṃ mayā dṛṣṭam idānīm. ahaṃ smārito 'smi. vibhīṣaṇasaṃvādena sarvasyāgastyoktasya satyatvaṃ darśitam.) Ct understands similarly. Ck explains similarly, except that he omits any reference to Rāma's having heard these tales previously from Vibhīṣaṇa. Instead he argues that Rāma has now heard it all exactly as it was reported by the blessed Agastya, and all of it is absolutely true, none of it being mere eulogy. This how we are to view the words of Vibhīṣaṇa. (tvayādya sarvaṃ śrutam etena bhagavatāgastyenoktaṃ sarvam api tattvam eva na tv arthavādatayā kiṃcid iheti vibhīṣaṇenoktam iti draṣṭavyam.) But cf. 7.35.25 and notes.

1. "in his amazement" vismayāt: Literally, "out of astonishment or amazement." Ck and Ct believe that Rāma's astonishment is a result of his hearing about the grace and power of the Lord (bhagavatprasādavaibhavaśravaṇavismayād ity arthaḥ—so Ck; Ct similarly).

"bowing deferentially" praṇataḥ: Literally, "bent or bowed down."

Following 1ab, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert line 1 of 645*. See following notes to verse 2 below.

2. "Blessed one" bhagavan: D10,11,T1,2,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead paryaṭat, "[that rākṣasa] roaming." See 645*, following notes to verse 2 below.

"were people so dispirited" kim . . . lokāḥ śūnyā āsan: Literally, "were people empty or listless." The term lokāḥ, "people," can also mean "worlds," and many of the translators consulted have rendered the phrase in the sense of "were the worlds empty?" However, since we know that by virtue of his boon Rāvaṇa cannot be defeated by the residents of the supramundane worlds, we agree with Ck, Ct, and Cr, who understand the question here to be whether humans were devoid of the quality of heroism. (lokā manuṣyalokaprāṇinaḥ. śūnyāḥ śūratvaguṇaśūnyāḥ—so Ct.) The gloss of Cs is more ambiguous, since he does not specify whether he takes the term loka as "people" or "worlds." He glosses, "Were the lokas empty, that is to say, lacking heroes? (lokāḥ śūnyā nirvīrāḥ.)" See notes to 7.33.22 for Cs's comments on Agastya's comment in this verse.

"that" yatra: Literally, "where or in that." Cr glosses, "when (yadā)," taking the adverb as the correlative of tadā in pāda a. G1 and KK and VSP read instead yena, "on account of which." Cg glosses, "by which reason (yena kāraṇena)."

"effective opposition" dharṣaṇam: Literally, "assault or defeat." Cf. Apte s.v.

For 2ab, T3,G2,M2,4,5,7–10 substitute, while D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,3 insert, line 1 following verse 1 and line 2 following verse 2ab, whereas T4 inserts line 2 only following 2ab, a passage of two lines [645*]: "Blessed one, beginning when that cruel rākṣasa was [roaming][1] the earth, was there not here then any king or kingly person[2] . . . (bhagavan rākṣasaḥ krūro yadāprabhṛti medinīm / rājā vā rājamātro vā kiṃ tadā nātra kaścana //)."

[1] "[roaming]": The passage as reconstructed in the critical apparatus is defective in that it lacks any verbal element for the nominative rākṣasa that would govern the accusative medinīm, "earth," in line 1. With the apparent exceptions of M2,4,9, all manuscripts cited in the critical apparatus that include the passage show such a verbal element. Thus D6,7,G1,3,M1 read paryaṭan, "[he] wandering," while D10,11,T1,2,M3, read the augmentless paryaṭat, "he wandered." T3,M1,5,7,10 read bhramati, "he roams," and M8 reads carati, "he moves about."

[2] "king or kingly person" rājā vā rājamātro vā: Literally, "a king or one of the stature of a king." The commentators more or less agree as to how to take the slightly strange term rājamātra. Ct defines a king as a kshatriya as opposed to a rājamātra, who is merely a ruler, but not a kshatriya. (rājā kṣatriyaḥ. rājamātro 'kṣatriyaḥ kevalaprabhuḥ.) Ck and Cg explain similarly, but Ck adds that the absence of such powerful persons able to defeat [Rāvaṇa] reflects a situation that exists at the beginning of a manvantara. (manvantarādāv iva saty api prāṇijāte tannigrahārhaḥ kṣatriyo rājā rājamātro 'kṣatriyaḥ kevalaprabhur vā kaścana tadā nāsīt.) Cr understands rājamātra to be a synonym for rājaputraḥ, "king's son or prince." The translators adopt one or the other of these interpretations.

3. "devoid of might" hīnavīryāḥ: Literally, "those whose might was wanting." D1,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hatavīryāḥ, "those whose might is destroyed."

"and deprived of splendid, divine weapon-spells" bahiṣkṛtā varāstraiś ca: Literally, "and excluded by excellent astras." The commentators see the lack of divine weapon-spells as an alternative to the lack of might mentioned in the first pāda rather than as an additional condition. Thus they understand that even if the kings were mighty, they may have lacked adequate weapons (athavā vīryavattve 'pi varāstrair dīvyāstrair bahiṣkṛtāḥ santaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

4. "When . . . Agastya had heard" śrutvā agastyaḥ: Literally, "Agastya having heard." D5,T4,M3, and KK and VSP read instead śrutvā hy agastya to avoid hiatus.

"he smiled" prahasan: Literally, "[he] smiling." commentators generally believe that Agastya is smiling at lord Rāma's indignation that no kshatriya had ever defeated the evil-minded [Rāvaṇa] (kenāpi kṣatriyeṇa durātmanaḥ kathaṃ parābhavo na jāta iti bhagavato rāmasyāmarṣaṃ dṛṣṭvāgastyahāsaḥ—Ct; Ck similarly). Cg has this as an alternative interpretation. His first explanation is that Agastya is smiling in delight at recalling Rāvaṇa's defeat (which he is about to relate) (rāvaṇāpajayasmaraṇaprītyā prahasann ity uktam).

"as Grandfather Brahmā might the Lord" pitāmaha iveśvaram: Literally, "as the Grandfather might the Lord." Ck and Ct identify pitāmaha, "the grandfather," as "the four-faced Lord Brahmā." Ck, however, adds that this is the four-faced [god] who possesses the inherent nature of Brahmā, who is the cause of all living beings (pitāmaho bhagavān caturmukho brahmasvabhāvaḥ prāṇopādhiḥ—so Ck). Ck and Ct identify "the Lord" as Rudra, who possesses the qualities of the warrior class, such as heroism, and who possesses fire as his principal characteristic (agnipradhānaṃ śauryādikṣatraguṇaṃ rudram). Ck expands somewhat on this, noting that this is the native or inherent form of Rudra and that he possesses the seven innate qualities, starting with heroism, of the warrior class (agnipradhānanijamūrtiṃ śauryādisahajasaptakṣatraguṇaṃ rudram). Cg understands similarly, but he leaves the qualities of Rudra as a single compound with the sense "possessing the qualities of the warrior class, starting with heroism, and which have fieriness foremost (agnipradhānaśauryādikṣatraguṇaṃ rudram)." Cr simply glosses the epithet Śambhu (śambhum). Compare 7.33.8 and notes.

5. "In this fashion" sa evam: Literally, "Thus, he [Rāma]." The sequence is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,G2,M2,4,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the somewhat redundant ity evam, "thus, in this fashion."

"O lord of the earth . . . bull among kings . . . the earth . . . its kings" pārthivān pārthivarṣabha /. . . pṛthivīṃ pṛthivīpate: The author suddenly, and so far uncharacteristically for the Uttarakāṇḍa, indulges in some poetic figuration in employing this anuprāsa. Compare 7.34.3 and notes.

6. "city . . . the city of heaven" purīṃ svargapurīm: As Ck and Ct note, the city of heaven is Amarāvatī. Note again the employment of anuprāsa. Compare verse 5 above and 7.34.3 and notes.

"which, in its close proximity to Agni of the golden seed" yatra sāṃnidhyaṃ paramaṃ vasuretasaḥ: Literally, "where there was the greatest proximity of Vasuretas." The term vasu here, normally, "wealth or precious object," is used in its less common meaning of "gold." Thus the compound vasuretas, literally, "whose seed is gold," is a rare kenning for fire. It occurs in the Rāmāyaṇa only twice: here and in the following verse. It seems to be a variant of the epithet hiraṇyaretas, used of Agni. And this is indeed the gloss given by Cv (vasuretaso hiraṇyaretasaḥ). The term is used three times in the Mahābhārata: at 1.219.31, where it again appears to be used as an epithet of Agni; at 7.57.52, where it appears to be used as an epithet of Śiva; and at 13.135.87, where it appears to be an epithet of Viṣṇu/Kṛṣṇa. Cg believes that the reference to proximity derives from the fact that fire permanently surrounds the city in the form of a rampart or city wall (vasuretaso 'gneḥ sāṃnidhyaṃ prākārarūpeṇa nityasāṃnidhyam ity arthaḥ). D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sadāsīt, "[it] was always," for paramam, "highest or greatest."

7. "In his blazing splendor, its king . . . was the equal of Agni of the golden seed" tulya āsīn nṛpas tasya pratāpād vasuretasaḥ: Literally, "Because of his splendor or valor, the king was the equal of him of the golden seed." Ñ,V3,B,D3,6,7,10,11,T,G1,M8,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read prabhāvāt, "because of power," for pratāpāt, "because of splendor." Both readings are ambiguous, as it is not entirely clear whether the splendor or the power is a quality of the king shared with Agni or whether it is through the splendor or energy of Agni that the king becomes his equal in some unspecified way. Ct clearly understands the second option, as he glosses "through the grace (prasādāt)" for prabhāvāt, "through the power." Thus, in Ct's interpretation it is through the grace of Agni that Arjuna is his equal. For the kenning vasuretaḥ, see notes to verse 6 above.

"Arjuna" arjunaḥ: This is the well-known thousand-armed Arjuna Kārtavīrya who figures significantly in the Mahābhārata and purāṇic accounts of the legend of Rāma Jāmadagnya. See R. Goldman 1977, pp. 78–79, 97, and 158–59, note 1. See also MBh 3.116.20–21 and 12.49.30–33,40.

"For Agni constantly dwelt in his fire pit, which was strewn with kuśa grass." yasyāgniḥ śarakuṇḍeśayaḥ sadā: Literally, "of whom Agni always was one who lay in a pit of śara [grass]." This phrase, too, is somewhat obscure. V3,B1–3,D6,7,10,11,G2,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP have the somewhat easier reading yatrāgniḥ for yasyāgniḥ. This is glossed spatially by Cr as "in Māhiṣmatī (yatra māhiṣmatyām)" and temporally by Cm and Ct as "in the period of Arjuna's kingship (yatrārjunarājyavelāyām)." The compound śarakuṇḍeśayaḥ is generally glossed by the commentators as a saptamī aluksamāsa in the sense of "present or residing in a fire pit strewn with śara (śarakuṇḍeśayaḥ śarāstaraṇavat kuṇḍam agnikuṇḍaṃ tatra śeta iti śayaḥ . . . saptamyā aluk—so Ck; Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr similarly)." We take śara here in its sense of kuśa grass, as does Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2016). Most of the remaining translators take the term in its generic sense of reeds or leave it untranslated. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 475) takes it in its sense of "arrows." Gorresio (1870, p. 66) understands that the fire was continually fed with stalks of sugar cane ("il cui sacro fuoco era di continuo alimentato da steli di canne saccarine"). Gorresio, in a note (1870, p. 319), claims that he has translated the passage literally and exactly but does not dare to affirm exactly what it is supposed to mean. He speculates that the phrase has perhaps some other more recondite sense that the ancient epic communicated. Cm and Ct believe that Agni resides in the pit for the purpose of abhicāra, or the malevolent use of magical power against one's enemies (śatrūṇām abhicārārtham). Especially in view of Cm's and Ct's remark about the purpose of Agni's residence in the pit, the passage is reminiscent of those in the Yuddhakāṇḍa where, for similar purposes, Indrajit performs sacrifices in which the original strew of śarapatra grass is replaced with weapons (see 6.60.22,23; 6.67.6; and notes)

8. "on that very day" tam eva divasam: Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all note that the reference is to the day on which Rāvaṇa arrived at Māhiṣmatī (yasmin dine rāvaṇo gatas tasminn eva divase—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly).

"king . . . overlord" adhipatiḥ . . . īśvaraḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss "king," rājā, for īśvaraḥ, which we normally render as "lord." We follow them in their desire to avoid redundancy with adhipatiḥ, "lord or overlord."

Following 8ab, G2,M10 insert, while D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert following verse 8, a passage of one line [648*]: "Now on that very day Rāvaṇa came there (tam eva divasaṃ so 'tha rāvaṇas tatra āgataḥ /)." Note the hiatus. The inclusion of this line creates a verse (= 7.31.10 in all the following editions) in GPP, NSP, KK, VSP, and Gita Press in which the word "rāvaṇaḥ" occurs twice. In order to spare the poet the charge of repetition, Cr takes the first occurrence as an epithet in the sense of "the one who makes the worlds cry out (lokarodanakārayitā)."

9. "Arjuna's ministers" tasyāmātyān: Literally, "his ministers."

"Where is Arjuna, your king, today? Please tell me at once." kvārjuno vo nṛpaḥ so 'dya śīghram ākhyātum arhatha: Literally, "Where [is] Arjuna, that king of yours? Please tell [me] quickly." D6,7,10,11,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kvārjuno nṛpatiḥ śīghraṃ samyak ākhyātum arhatha, lending the line the sense "Where is king Arjuna? Please tell [me] accurately and at once."

10. "and" tu: D6,7,10,11,T3,G1,M3,4,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the pleonastic particle ha.

"you . . . calmly" avyagrair yuṣmābhiḥ: Literally, "by you being unagitated." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead apy agre yuṣmābhiḥ, "also . . . at first by you."

"must . . . inform him" saṃnivedyatām: Literally, "let him be informed."

11. "that the lord of the earth was away" asāṃnidhyaṃ mahīpateḥ: Literally, "the nonproximity of the lord of the earth." Cr glosses, "his state of not being present there (tatrāvidyamānatvam)."

12. "from the townsfolk" paurāṇām: Literally, "of the people of the city." The commentators address the awkward syntax in one of two ways. Ck, Cg, and Ct propose supplying "from the mouth[s] [of the townsfolk] (mukhād iti śeṣaḥ)." Cv, Cm, and Cr, however, substitute the ablative paurebhyaḥ, "from the townsfolk," for the genitive.

13–16. These verses constitute a single sentence consisting largely of a series of descriptions of the Vindhya mountain range, all in agreement with the noun vindhyam in 13c. We have broken it up into a series of sentences for the sake of readability.

"It seemed to burst forth from the earth" udbhrāntam iva medinīm: The verb ud+√bhram normally means "to spin or whirl about," senses that seem wholly inappropriate here. We follow Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who all gloss, "seemed to rise up, having split open the earth (medinīm udbhrāntam ivodbhidyodgatam iva—Cg and Ct; Ck and Cr similarly)." Apte (s.v. ud+√bhram) evidently follows this interpretation, citing this verse for his meaning number four. Cv glosses, "rose or sprang up (utpatitam)."

"sporting with their womenfolk" saha strībhiḥ krīḍamānaiḥ: Literally, "[with them] playing with women." The phrase "saha strībhiḥ" is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. V3,D6,7,10,11,M1,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead svastrībhiḥ krīḍamānaiś ca, "and [by them] playing with their respective [lit., 'own'] women."

"together with the kinnaras and troupes of apasarases" sāpsarogaṇakiṃnaraiḥ: V3,D6, 7,10,11,T3,G1,M2,5–9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sāpsarobhiḥ sakiṃnaraiḥ, "together with the apsarases [and] together with the kinnaras."

"it was truly heaven" svargabhūtam: Literally, "It was or had become heaven."

"As it loomed there, with its streams pouring forth—through its fissures—water as bright as the sky, it seemed to be flashing forth flickering tongues." nadībhiḥ syandamānābhir agatipratimaṃ jalam / sphuṭibhiś calajihvābhir vamantam iva viṣṭhitam //: The verse as it appears in the critical edition is rather obscure in its meaning. Although it is not explicitly stated, it appears that the comparison of the streams to flickering tongues implies a comparison to a serpent, which, as we will see, is made explicit in some variants of the passage. The only commentators to share the critical reading are Cv and Cm. They propose that the obscure term agati, normally "motionless or lack of access," should be taken here to mean "the sky (ākāśa-)." Thus the waters of the streams, they believe, are like the sky (ākāśapratimam). Given the context of the verse, we understand that the basis for the similarity is the bright or flashing nature of the waters as they pour forth from the recesses in the mountain, and thus we have added the word "bright" to complete the sense of the comparison. We follow Cv, who glosses sphuṭibhiḥ, normally, "through cracking or cracks," as darībhiḥ, "through caves or fissures [in a mountain]." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nadībhiḥ syandamānābhiḥ sphaṭikapratimaṃ jalam / phaṇābhiś calajihvābhir anantam iva viṣṭhitam // : "As it loomed there, with its streams pouring forth water like crystal, it resembled [the great serpent] Ananta with his spreading hoods and flickering tongues." The precise role of the expanded or spreading hoods (phaṇābhiḥ) in the simile is not made explicit. Translators of this version struggle to make sense of it.

17. "with its . . . flickering flames" ulkāvantam: Again it is not clear as to what feature of the mountains the verse refers. Perhaps this is an obscure metaphor for the bright waters pouring from the mountain caves or the luminous herbs with which mountains are often associated in the poetic literature. See, e.g., KumāSaṃ 1.10. Although Cg notes the critical reading as a variant, he offers no gloss or explanation. D10,11,T1,2,4,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead utkrāmantam, "rising or soaring upward."

18–19. "its waters rushing over stones" calopalajalam: We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct in understanding the oddly structured compound to mean "whose waters move on or among stones (calāny upaleṣu jalāni yasyās tām—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." One could also perhaps understand, "whose waters carry moving stones."

"gaur" sṛmaraiḥ: See 7.6.40–42 and note.

"bears" -ṛkṣa-: Although we normally render this term as "ape" in the context of Rāma's simian allies, it sometimes refers to "bears" in the context of lists of wild animals (see, for example, 6.30.17; 6.101.34; and notes). On the use of this term, see notes to 1.16.10 and R. Goldman 1989. Note that at notes to 6.101.34 the reference to 1.1.16 should be corrected to 1.16.10.

"thronged . . . warbling constantly" kokujadbhiḥ samāvṛtām: Literally, "surrounded [by cakravākas, etc.], which were constantly or loudly warbling." V1,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kujadbhiḥ susamāvṛtām, "fully surrounded [by cakravākas, etc.], which were warbling." T1,2, and KK and VSP read instead sukujadbhiḥ samāvṛtām, "surrounded [by cakravākas, etc.], which were sweetly warbling."

"cakravākas" cakravākaiḥ: A type of sheldrake, also called a ruddy shelduck, Tadorna ferruginea Pallas (Anas casarca).

"kāraṇḍas" -kāraṇḍaiḥ: A generic term for duck, often a goosander or smew, Mergus merganser or Mergus albeus.

"haṃsas" -haṃsa-: This bird is commonly identified as the bar-headed goose or Anser indicus, but the term can also refer to the mute swan, Cygnus olor, or whooper swan, Cygnus cygnus.

"waterfowl" jalakukkuṭaiḥ: Literally, "water roosters." The term is rare, occurring only five times in the DCS digital list, with close variants only occurring twice more. We find the word used two times in the Rāmāyaṇa (here and at 4.13.8), twice in the Mahābhārata (3.107.7; 3.155.50); and once in the Bhāgavatapurāṇa (3.21.43). The term doubtless refers to a specific bird rather than generically to all water birds. Dave (1985, p. 301, 358) identifies it as the Gallicrex cinerea, "watercock."

"sarus cranes" sārasaiḥ: The Indian sarus crane, Grus antigone.

20–23. The poet is fond of comparing women to rivers and vice versa. Compare 5.7.47,48 and 5.12.29–31.

"embrace" -saṃsparśām: Literally, "a close or mutual touch." D6,7,10,11,T3,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead -susparśām, "[for her] lovely touch."

"which was adorned with all kinds of flowers" nānākusumaśobhite: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nānāmuniniṣevite, "which was frequented by all kinds of sages."

"that lord of the rākṣasas . . . took pleasure in the sight of the Narmadā" narmadādarśajaṃ harṣam āptavān rākṣaseśvaraḥ: Literally, "the lord of the rākṣasas obtained delight produced by the sight of the Narmadā." Ś,V1,3,D1–5,7,8,9 (first time),10–12,M8, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read -darśane, "at the sight," for -darśajam, "produced from the sight." D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read sa daśānanaḥ, "that ten-faced [one]," for rākṣaseśvaraḥ, "lord of the rākṣasas," while Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B1–3,D1–5,8,9 (first time),12,T1–3,G3,M1–3,5,6,8,9, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasādhipaḥ, "overlord of the rākṣasas."

Following 23cd, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,D,S, and Lahore insert a passage of one line [652*]: "Then Rāvaṇa, having praised the Narmadā, [said]: 'She is the Ganges!' (prakhyāya narmadāṃ so 'tha gaṅgeyam iti rāvaṇaḥ)."

24. "Then Rāvaṇa, lord of the rākṣasas, smiling playfully" tataḥ salīlaṃ prahasan rāvaṇo rākṣasādhipaḥ: V3,D3,6,7,10,11,G2,M1,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP omit this line (= 24ab).

"Mārīca" mārīcaṃ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead salīlam, "playfully." This lends the half line the sense "He said playfully to his ministers and to Śuka and Sāraṇa there." This variant appears to present a case of number disagreement in that Śuka and Sāraṇa (śukasāraṇau) are in the dual and ministers (sacivān) in the plural. We follow Cr, who adds a conjunction, "and (ca)."

25. "The scorching sun" tīkṣṇatāpakaraḥ sūryaḥ: Literally, "the sun, whose rays are fiercely hot."

"now at the zenith" nabhaso madhyam āsthitaḥ: Literally, "situated in the middle of the sky." KK and VSP read instead nabhaso 'rdhaṃ samāśritaḥ, "has taken recourse to half of the sky."

"seems . . . to turn the world to gold" jagat kṛtveva kāñcanam: Literally, "Having, as it were, made the world gold." B2,4,D1–3,12,T2,G1,3,M1,7, and KK and VSP read kṛtvaiva, "have made, indeed," for kṛtveva, "having made, as it were."

"seems more like the moon" candrāyati: Literally, "it acts like the moon." Ct notes the irregular parasmaipada of the denominative (nāmadhātu) (ārṣaṃ parasmaipadam). As Cr observes, the idea is that the sun is cooling (candra iva śītaṃ karoti). This and the following two verses echo several passages earlier in the epic where the elements must moderate their intensity for fear of causing discomfort to Rāvaṇa or his son. See notes to 6.78.45.

26. "blows gently" hy eṣa vāty asau susamāhitaḥ: Literally, "for this [wind] it blows temperately or cautiously." We follow Cr, who glosses, "gently or slowly (mandam)." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead [a]py atra vāty eṣa susamāhitaḥ, lending the line the sense "even this [wind] blows gently here." This variant effectively eliminates the redundancy occasioned by the colocation of the synonymous pronouns eṣaḥ and asau.

27. "the Narmadā, the increaser of delight" narmadā narmavardhinī: Note the play on the name of the river, which means "the giver of delight." Ñ1,B1,4,D10,11,T3,G2,3,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead śarmavardhinī, "the increaser of happiness," for narmavardhinī, "the increaser of delight."

"concealing her fish, birds, and waves" līnamīnavihaṃgormiḥ: Literally, "whose fish, birds, and waves were absorbed." The idea, evidently, is that the river, out of fear of Rāvaṇa, is flowing as quietly as possible. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nakra-, "crocodiles." This lends the compound the meaning "her waves filled with crocodiles, fish, and birds." This compound, as it stands, is difficult to construe. Ct and Cr add a term to indicate that the river's waves are filled or associated with the creatures listed. Thus Ct glosses, "whose waves are connected with crocodiles, etc. (nakrādiyutormayo yasyāḥ sā)." In any case, the variant seems out of place in this context because it accords poorly with the upamāna of the timorous woman. No doubt the poet is imagining a bashful young woman concealing her body with her garments from the gaze of a male.

28–29. "to men" nṛṇām: Literally, "of men." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śubhām, "lovely or shining," which would then modify the Narmadā.

"the great . . . elephants, headed by Mahāpadma" mahāpadmamukhāḥ . . . mahāgajāḥ: Literally, "great elephants, having Mahāpadma as their head." Although the text does not say so explicitly, Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the reference is to the great diggajas, or elephants of the directions, who are represented in purāṇic cosmology as supporting the earth. Mahāpadma is regarded as the elephant of the south. Ck and Cg identify Mahāpadma as the elephant also known as Puṇḍarīka. D6,7,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sārvabhaumamukhāḥ, "having Sārvabhauma as their head." Sārvabhauma is the elephant of the north. The diggajas are mentioned at 1.39.12–22 (see, esp., note to verse 12) and at 6.58.45–46 and notes. See, too, 7.5.4; 7.32.36; and notes.

30. "you will rid yourselves of all evils" pāpmānaṃ vimokṣyatha: Literally, "you [all] will abandon sin or evil." We believe that the term here has both a physical and a moral reference. The former is to the impure, bloodstained condition of the rākṣasas mentioned in verse 28 above, and the latter is to their spiritual purification prior to their acts of worship in the following verses. D7,10,11,G2,M2,8–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the ablative pāpmanaḥ, "from sin," lending the line the more idiomatic sense of "you [all] will be freed from sin or evil."

31. "a floral offering" puṣpopahāram: As Benoît (1999, p. 1724) notes, this passage is a fresh indication of Rāvaṇa's association with Śiva. He further observes the seeming shift here from the vedic fire sacrifices mentioned elsewhere in the epic to a type of pūjā characteristic of Hindu worship, which may indicate a later date for the passage.

"here" atra: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,D6,7,10,11,G,M2,4–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead adya, "now."

"Śiva, Umā's lord" umāpateḥ: Literally, "to the lord of Umā." On the use of this epithet in the Rāmāyaṇa, see notes to 7.6.24. The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T3,G2,M2,4,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kapardinaḥ, "him of the matted locks or Kapardin." This is another epithet of Śiva, which is also used at 7.6.8 and 7.78.17.

32. "Mārīca" mārīca-: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,V1,B,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G1,3,M1–9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prahasta-, "Prahasta." See 7.32.22, where a similar list is given with the substitution of Mahāpārśva for Mārīca. See, too, verse 38 and note below.

"immersed themselves" avagāhire: The expected perfect form would be avajagāhire. But see van Daalen (1980, p. 88) and Oberlies (2003, §8.1.1, pp. 218–19), who both acknowledge unreduplicated perfects in the epics. This appears to be the only occurrence of the particular form in the epics. Ñ,B,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous but grammatically correct vijagāhire.

33. "was . . . agitated" kṣobhyate: D6,7,10,11,T2,6,G3,M1,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute the synonymous participle kṣobhitā.

"by those mighty elephants Vāmana, Añjana, Padma, and the rest" vāmanāñjanapadmādyaiḥ . . . mahāgajaiḥ: As Cm and Ct note, these are also names of some of the elephants of the directions (vāmanādyā diggajāḥ—so Ct; Cm similarly). See note to 1.39.12.

34. "in the lovely waters of the Narmadā" narmadāyā varāmbhasi: D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead narmadāyāṃ mahābalāḥ, "the very mighty [rākṣasas] . . . in the Narmadā."

"they came out" uttīrya: Literally, "having come up out of."

35. "lovely" ramye: D6,7,10,11,T2,M2,6,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hṛdye, "charming or after one's heart."

"the rākṣasa lords . . . heaped up a veritable mountain of flowers" rākṣasendraiḥ . . . kṛtaḥ puṣpamayo giriḥ: Literally, "by the lords or Indras among the rākṣasas a mountain consisting of flowers was made." V1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read rākṣasais tu, "and the rākṣasas," for rākṣasendraiḥ, "by the rākṣasa lords."

36. "Once the flowers had been gathered" puṣpeṣūpahṛteṣv eva: Literally, "as soon as the flowers were gathered." Ñ2,V3,B3,4,D6,7,10,11,T4,G2,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read evam, "thus or in this fashion," for the emphatic particle eva, lending the phrase the sense "When the flowers had been gathered in this fashion."

"as . . . a mighty elephant to the Ganges" gaṅgām iva mahāgajaḥ: Once again the reference is probably to one of the great diggajas, "elephants of the directions." This is the third time in the last seven verses that the author has used this simile, perhaps suggesting the work of a later and less imaginative poet.

37. "quietly intoned an unsurpassed mantra" japtvā japyam anuttamam: Literally, "having muttered an unexcelled prayer or formula [lit., 'what is to be muttered']." Benoît (1999, p. 1724) thinks that the formula here is probably the Gāyatrīmantra. There is, however, no way to verify this.

Following verse 37, D6,7,10,11,T1,3,G1,M1,3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [655*]: "Then[1] casting off his wet clothing and clad[2] in white garments (tataḥ klinnāmbaraṃ tyaktvā śuklavastrasaṃāvṛtam /)."

[2] "clad" -samāvṛtam: Literally, "covered." The adjective must construe with the accusative rāvaṇam in verse 38a below. D6,7,10,11,T3,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute the nominative masculine singular -samāvṛtaḥ, which then construes with the nominative rāvaṇaḥ in verse 37d.

38. "Seven" sapta-: It is not clear exactly which seven rākṣasas may be intended here. At verse 32 only five rākṣasas are named as those having ritually bathed to participate in the religious rite: Mārīca, Śuka, Sāraṇa, Mahodara, and Dhūmrākṣa. V1,B4,D1,4,6,7,9–11,T1–3,G2,3,M1,3,5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarva-, "all [the rākṣasas]." Interestingly, Ñ,B, and the printed edition of Gorresio omit this line but instead read two lines [658* = Gorresio 7.20.41cd–42ab] in which exactly seven rākṣasas—Mahodara, Mahāpārśva, Mārīca, Śuka, Sāraṇa, Dhūmrākṣa, and Prahasta—are named as accompanying Rāvaṇa in his worship. Compare verse 7.32.22 and note.

"he" saḥ: The pronoun is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D1,3–7,10,11,T1,2,4,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"his hands cupped in reverence" prāñjalim: As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr indicate, Rāvaṇa's reverence is directed to Śiva. Ck and Ct understand the object of his reverence to be Īśvara (īśvaraṃ prati). Cg concurs, indicating that the divinity is Rudra (rudraṃ prati). Cr is ambiguous, glossing devoddeśena kṛtāñjalim, which can be interpreted as "cupping his hand reverentially toward the god [i.e., Śiva], or, [less likely,] the gods."

"wherever" yatra yatra . . . tatra tatra: Literally, "where where . . . there there." Ck, Cg, and Ct agree that the distributive adverbs suggest that Rāvaṇa's worship is a daily practice (pratidivasam).

"the overlord of the rākṣasas" rākṣasādhipaḥ: D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,G2,M4[?],8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣaseśvaraḥ, "the lord of the rākṣasas."

"they carried a liṅga" liṅgam . . . sma nīyate: Literally, "a liṅga . . . was carried." We agree with Ck, Cm, and Ct that we are to understand that the rākṣasas carry the liṅga for the purpose of worship (pūjārthaṃ rākṣasair iti śeṣaḥ—so Cm and Ct; Ck similarly). It is only here and in the following verse that the term liṅga is used in the Rāmāyaṇa in this sense of a material object, the symbol of Lord Śiva.

"made of jāmbūnada gold" jāmbūnadamayam: Cg notes that we are to understand that Rāvaṇa has been worshiping the Śiva liṅga to please the god ever since the time that he was first crushed and then released (by Śiva) on Mount Kailāsa [as was narrated in sarga 16] (yadā kailāse rāvaṇaḥ pīḍito vimuktas tadāprabhṛti tatprītyarthaṃ rāvaṇo liṅgapūjāṃ karoti smeti jñeyam). Ck and Ct note that a golden liṅga is used for regular worship and is particularly appropriate for Rāvaṇa, whose goal is lordship. (talliṅgaṃ jāmbūnadamayaṃ nityapūjāliṅgam. aiśvaryakāmanayā hi talliṅgapūjā rāvaṇasya.) Ct adds that it is stated in the tantras that worship of a golden liṅga is appropriate to one who desires lordship (aiśvaryakāmasya sauvarṇaliṅgapūjāyās tantreṣūkteḥ). At 6.15.2, Cg identifies jāmbūnada as gold produced in the Jambū River, one of the seven heavenly rivers (see notes to this verse). Vyas (1967, p. 244; cf. p. 247) understands this to be gold taken from the beds of rivers.

Following 38ab, Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [657*]: "Following in his footsteps, they resembled mountains in human form[1] (tadgatīvaśam āpannā mūrtimanta ivācalāḥ /)."

[1] "Following in his footsteps, they resembled mountains in human form." tadgatīvaśam āpannā mūrtimanta ivācalāḥ: Literally, "Gone to the control of his movements, they were like unmoving things [i.e., mountains], which were embodied." As Ck and Ct note, we must take the term mūrtimantaḥ, "embodied," in the sense of "having the form of living beings (prāṇyākāravantaḥ)."

39. "fragrant articles" gandhaiḥ: Literally, "with fragrances or aromas." As Cr notes, the reference is to fragrant articles such as sandalwood (candanādibhiḥ).

40. "the night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"Hara, the dispeller of the afflictions of the virtuous and the supreme granter of boons" satām ārtiharaṃ haraṃ paraṃ varapradam: One might also read the adjective param, "supreme," with ārtiharam, "dispeller of afflictions." Note the intense internal rhyme. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead satām ārtiharaṃ paraṃ varaṃ varapradam, lending the line the sense "the supreme dispeller of afflictions of the virtuous [and] the foremost [varam] granter of boons."

"he sang" jagau: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand this to mean that Rāvaṇa was chanting the vedic sāmans (sāmānīti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). Ck and Cg comment that it is well known that Rāvaṇa has mastered a thousand branches of the Sāma[veda] (sāmnāṃ sahasraśākhāpārago rāvaṇa iti prasiddhiḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly).

"stretching out his long arms" prasārya hastān . . . cāyatān: Literally, "and having stretched out his long arms." V3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read cāgrataḥ, "in front," lending the phrase the sense "and having stretched his arms before him."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

1–2. "Rāvaṇa" sa rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "he or that Rāvaṇa." D7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa dāruṇaḥ, "that cruel [one]." KK and VSP read instead sudāruṇaḥ, "the very cruel [one]."

"in the Narmadā's waters" narmadātoyam āśritaḥ: Literally, "[he] who had resorted to the waters of the Narmadā."

3. "Arjuna" arjunaḥ saḥ: Literally, "he or that Arjuna." D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, with the exception of Ck, read instead ca, "and," for saḥ, "he."

"then" tataḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

4. "of his thousand arms . . . with them" bāhūnāṃ sahasrasya . . . /. . . bāhubhiḥ: Literally, "of the thousand arms . . . with arms."

"Arjuna then . . ." sa tadārjunaḥ: Ñ,V3,B2–4,D11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bahubhir vṛtaḥ, "[Arjuna] encircled by many [arms]." Arjuna Kārtavīrya is perhaps the best known of the Haihaya kings of ancient India. In the Mahābhārata (3.116.20ff.) he is said to have ransacked the ashram of the Bhārgava sage Jamadagni and stolen the calf of the sage's homadhenu. For this Rāma Jāmadagnya cut off his thousand arms and killed him.

5. "the dam made by Kārtavīrya's arms" kārtavīryabhujāsetum: Literally, "the dam of the arms of Kārtavīrya." The name Kārtavīrya is a patronymic of Arjuna, who is the son of King Kṛtavīrya. V1,D3,7,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kārtavīryabhujāsaktam, which then becomes an adjective modifying the noun jalam, "water," and here, as Ct and Cs note, must be understood in the sense of "water held up or obstructed by the arms of Kārtavīrya." (kārtavīryabhujair āsaktam āsaṅgaṃ bandhanaṃ prāpya—so Ct.)

"it flowed rapidly upstream" pratiśrotaḥ pradhāvati: Literally, "it runs against the current."

"crumbling the riverbanks" kūlāpahāraṃ kurvāṇam: Literally, "making a destruction or carrying off of the banks." Ś1,V3,D10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kūlopahāraṃ kurvāṇam, "making an offering on the bank." According to Cr, this is an accusative participial phrase referring to Rāvaṇa, who was making his offering on the riverbank. Thus, in this case, the water reaches Rāvaṇa. (jalaṃ kūlopahāraṃ kūladeśe pūjāṃ kurvāṇaṃ rāvaṇaṃ prāpya.) Cs reads the variant but takes the phrase to refer to the water of the Narmadā, which he seems to think is itself making a floral offering. Perhaps he is thinking in terms of the flowers being carried along by the flooding waters, as noted in verse 6 below. Translators who read upahāram are divided as to whether the river is reaching Rāvaṇa, who is making floral offerings, or is undermining its banks. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 511), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 482), renders, "en emportant ses rives." It is not clear what reading Roussel is following, but in either case, as elsewhere, he appears to be influenced by Gorresio. The latter's text (7.21.5) reads kūlāpahāram with the critical edition. Gorresio (1870, p. 70) renders, "rotte e por- tate via le sponde." Dutt (1894, p. 1678), too, appears to read apahāra, translating, "having flooded the banks."

6. "Carrying along fish, crocodiles, dolphins, flowers, and mats of kuśa grass" samīnanakramakaraḥ sapuṣpakuśasaṃstaraḥ: Literally, "with fish, crocodiles, and dolphins [and] with flowers and strews of kuśa grass." The dolphin here is perhaps the Indo-Pacific humpback dolphin (Sousa chinensis), which is found in the Narmadā estuary and may also swim upriver (Indian Express, Nov. 18, 2009). For a discussion of nakras and makaras, see notes to 5.7.6. See also notes to 6.14.9. Cf. notes to 6.4.78–80. As Ck and Ct note, the phrase -kuśasaṃstaraḥ would refer to strews or mats of kuśa grass that had been placed on the banks by the throngs of seers for the sake of their rituals (sa tu tatpuline karmanimittam ṛṣigaṇakṛtaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly).

7. "the entire" tat sarvam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sakalam, "complete, entire."

8. "And" tu: Ñ,V1,B3,D1,3,4,6,7,9–11,M1,3,6,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tam, "that," which would then refer to niyamam, "rite."

"glared" paśyate: Literally, "he looks or sees." Note the irregular ātmanepada.

"beloved . . . as if at a cherished wife who had become disobedient" kāntāṃ pratikūlāṃ yathā priyām: Literally, "a beloved [woman] just as a dear [woman], who was against the current." The sequence yathā priyām, "just as a beloved [woman]," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. We read the term kāntām, "beloved," adjectivally with Narmadā in light of the previous passage in sarga 7.31.20–23, where the river is elaborately described as a beloved woman and Rāvaṇa's entrance into her waters as a virtually erotic act. In addition, we believe that this reading enhances the force of the simile. One can, however, take kāntā nominally in the sense of "wife or mistress," and many translators have taken it in this way. The term pratikūla, "against the bank," works well as a description of both a river, literally, against the banks and a woman acting in a refractory manner.

9–10. "But when Rāvaṇa saw the current of the water flowing from the west and swelling like a tidal wave, he moved eastward and then saw the river—whose appearance was like that of an obedient woman and whose waterfowl were unruffled—in its splendid natural state." paścimena tu taṃ dṛṣṭvā sāgarodgārasaṃnibham / vardhantam ambhaso vegaṃ pūrvām āśāṃ praviśya tu [9] // tato 'nudbhrāntaśakunāṃ svābhāvye parame sthitām / nirvikārāṅganābhāsāṃ paśyate rāvaṇo nadīm [10] // Literally, "But having seen by the west that current of water swelling and resembling an ocean-flood, and having entered the eastern direction, Rāvaṇa then saw the river, which was in [its] excellent natural state with [her] birds unagitated, and whose appearance was that of an unchanged woman." These verses present a somewhat cloudy picture of what is taking place. Our understanding of the situation is as follows: As is well known, the Narmadā River rises in central India and flows westward, emptying into the Bay of Cambay on the Gujarat coast. As is clear from the context as well as the explicit reference in verse 12, Rāvaṇa is performing his worship to the east, that is, upstream, of where Arjuna is damming the river with his arms. Thus the normal westward flow of the water has been reversed, and it is backing up and flooding the shore where Rāvaṇa is. Rather than going west to discover the cause of the blockage, Rāvaṇa moves eastward to the point where he finds the river as yet unchanged. In verse 12 below he dispatches Śuka and Sāraṇa to find out the cause of the blockage. Thus we agree with Cg and Ct, who, commenting on a variant, argue that we must supply Rāvaṇa as the subject of the gerund praviśya, "having entered (rāvaṇa iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg)." Ct further argues that the meaning here is that Rāvaṇa has gone east to try to determine the extent of the flooding (tasya kiyaddūre vṛddhir iti nirṇayārtham iti bhāvaḥ). Of the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 477) understands as we do. All the others understand that it is the current of the river that moves first to the west and then to the east. But this interpretation provides no explanation of why, in verse 10, Rāvaṇa finds the river unchanged.

"whose appearance was like that of an obedient woman" nirvikārāṅganābhāsām: Literally, "and whose appearance was that of an unchanged woman." The term must be read in the context of verse 8 above, where the raging Narmadā is likened to a refractory or disobedient wife. Now having moved upstream, Rāvaṇa looks upon the calmly flowing river as if on an amenable or obedient woman.

"whose waterfowl were unruffled" anudbhrāntaśakunām: Literally, "having non-agitated birds." D6,7,10,T4,M1,4,9, and KK and VSP read instead the obscure anubhrānta- for anudbhrānta. The word is attested elsewhere in the epic only at MBh 5.35.32 (mā gamaḥ sasutāmātyo 'tyayam putrān anubhraman), where it appears to have the meaning "wandering after."

"in its splendid natural state" svābhāvye parame: Literally, "which was in an excellent natural state." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,M6,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the virtually synonymous svabhāve parame. T4,G2, and KK and VSP read instead svabhāvoparame, "in natural cessation or resting." The idea here, apparently, is that the portion of the river that Rāvaṇa is observing is flowing calmly, as is natural to it, as opposed to being agitated further downstream.

11. "And . . . accompanied by a brief word" saśabdaṃ ca: Literally, "and with a sound or word." Ck and Cm understand that Rāvaṇa uses a brief or broken word of command, which, as an accompaniment to the gesture, indicates that the search should be undertaken at once (śīghrānveṣaṇadyotitruṭiśabdasahitaṃ yathā tathā). Cg specifies that the accompanying sound is the syllable "Hum" (śīghrānveṣaṇadyotihuṃkārasahitaṃ yathā tathā). The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. V3,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hy aśabdāsyaḥ, "whose mouth was soundless." Cr and Cs understand that Rāvaṇa gestures silently because he is still observing a vow of silence as a consequence of his rite (na śabda āsye mukhe yasya niyamena maunibhūta ity arthaḥ—so Cr; Cs similarly).

"ten-faced Rāvaṇa" daśānanaḥ: Literally, "ten-faced [one]."

"with a finger of his right hand" savyetarakarāṅgulyā: Literally, "with a finger of the hand that was other than left." Ct understands that the gesture is intended to show that they should search immediately (śīghrānveṣaṇadyotakābhinayam). Cs alone understands that Rāvaṇa gestures with several or all of the fingers of his right hand (avāmadakṣiṇahastāṅgulibhiḥ). Or, perhaps, his use of the plural is an allusion to the fact that Rāvaṇa had ten right hands.

12. "brothers" bhrātarau: Śuka and Sāraṇa, the two spies whom Rāvaṇa will send on an ill-fated mission in the Yuddhakāṇḍa at sargas 16–19 and then revile for their failure to carry out their mission (6.20.1–3ff.), are not said earlier to be brothers. On the two spies, see note to 6.16.1.

"flying through the sky" vyomāntaracarau: Literally, "moving within the sky." Ñ1,V1,D5–7,10,11,G2,M5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous vyomāntaragatau.

"heading west" paścimonmukhau: Literally, "facing west." Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D1,3–5,7–12,T3,4, G,2,M10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous paścimāmukhau.

13–16. Verses 13–16 constitute a single sentence in which verses 14–16 consist of a series of adjectives and participial phrases in the accusative modifying puruṣam, "a man," in 13c. We have broken the sequence into smaller units for the sake of readability.

"But . . . the two night-roaming rākṣasas" tu niśācarau: Literally, "But the two night-roaming [ones]." Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar rajanīcarau, "the two night-roaming [ones]."

"a man and many women playing in the water" puruṣaṃ toye krīḍantaṃ sahayoṣitam: Literally, "a man along with women playing in the water."

"With his hair disordered by the waters" toyavyākulamūrdhajam: Cr, the only commentator to concern himself to any degree with this verse, offers two possible readings of the compound. His first, "whose hair was disordered, that is, scattered about in the waters (toyeṣu vyākulāḥ prakṣiptā mūrdhajā yasya)," is similar to ours. The second is that Arjuna's hair was pervaded, i.e., wet, with water (toyena vyākulā vyāptā mūrdhajā yasyeti vā).

"sāla tree" sāla-: The sāla tree is normally identified as either the Vatica robusta or the Shorea robusta.

"The corners of his eyes were red with passion" madaraktāntanayanam: Here, too, Cr offers two alternative readings. According to his first, the interiors of Arjuna's eyes are red with passion (madena raktāntaṃ nayanaṃ yasya). The second, which is similar to ours, has the end portions, i.e., corners of the eyes, reddened (raktam antanayanaṃ nayanāntabhāgo yasyeti vā). The word mada- can also mean "intoxication," lending the compound the sense "the corners of his eyes were red with intoxication." This interpretation might, perhaps, be supported by verse 28 below. See verse 28 and notes below.

"in splendor he was the likeness of Madana, the god of love" madanākāravarcasam: Literally, "whose splendor or beauty had the form or appearance of Madana." V3,D6,7, 10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead madavyākulacetasam, "whose mind was agitated with passion or intoxication."

"He was completely surrounded" abhisaṃvṛtam: Ñ,V3,B,D1,3–7,10,11,T3,G2, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samāvṛtam, "surrounded."

17. "Now . . . Rāvaṇa, addressed him" rāvaṇaṃ tam athocatuḥ: V3,D10,M8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press instead rāvaṇāntam athocatuḥ, "[having approached] the vicinity of Rāvaṇa, now those two spoke."

"that most amazing man" tam adbhutatamam: Literally, "that most amazing [one]." GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the comparative adbhutataram for the critical edition's superlative. For some reason, the critical apparatus assigns this variant only to KK, which, in fact, reads with the critical edition at least in the editions that we are consulting (1905, 1913).

20. "Having listened" niśāmya: Literally, "having perceived or observed." Cg, the only commentator to remark on the critical reading, glosses dṛṣṭvā, "having seen." He does this probably because the gerund, in its normal sense of "having heard," usually takes as its object some term with the sense of "sound, word, speech, etc.," which is lacking here. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,6–12,T1,2,4,G,M5,6,8, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the virtually synonymous niśamya. The editors of the critical edition have noted in the apparatus that Ct reads niśāmya. GPP and NSP both show the commentary of Ct as reading niśamya. Ct glosses as does Cg, understanding, "having seen (dṛṣṭvā)." Cr, who also reads niśamya, glosses, "having heard their speech (tadbhāṣaṇaṃ śrutvā)."

"leapt to his feet" uttasthau: Literally, "he rose or stood up." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa yayau, "he went," while KK and VSP read instead prayayau, "he set out."

21. "The moment the lord of the rākṣasas set out toward Arjuna" arjunābhimukhe tasmin prasthite rākṣaseśvare / sakṛd eva: Literally, "when the rākṣasa lord set forth facing Arjuna, simultaneously." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead arjunābhimukhe tasmin rāvaṇe rākṣasādhipe / sakṛd eva, "when Rāvaṇa, that lord of the rākṣasas, [was] facing Arjuna, simultaneously." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the adverbial phrase sakṛd eva, which we understand, in its sense of simultaneously, to mean "one time only (ekavāram eva—so Ck, Cg; Ct similarly)." Their idea appears to be that an isolated thunderclap is ominous.

"the clouds released a thunderclap accompanied by showers of blood" kṛto rāvaḥ saraktaḥ preṣito ghanaiḥ: Literally, "a sound accompanied by blood was made and sent forth by clouds." As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr point out, a sudden sound from a rain-charged cloud is an evil omen (varṣukameghānāṃ sakṛdrāva utpāta iti bhāvaḥ—so Cg). See 6.26.22 and notes. For references to various inauspicious omens, see notes to 7.28.26. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read saraktapṛṣataḥ, "[sound] with drops of blood," for saraktaḥ preṣitaḥ, "[cloud] accompanied by blood . . . sent forth." Ck, Ct, and Cr understand pṛṣata to mean "a drop," and so they take the compound saraktapṛṣataḥ to mean "accompanied by drops of blood" (raktabindusahito rāvaḥ svanaḥ sakṛd eva ghanaiḥ kṛto 'yam apy utpāta iti tātparyam—so Cr).

Following 21ab, Ś,B2,D2,8,9,12, and Lahore substitute, while Ñ,V1,3,D1,3–5,7,10, 11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, a passage of one line [662*]: "A fierce wind blew, howling[1] and filled with dust[2] (caṇḍaḥ pravāti pavanaḥ sanādaḥ sarajas tathā)."

[2] "and filled with dust" sarajas tathā: Literally, "with dust as well." Ś3,D3,7–10,12,T4, and KK and VSP read instead the grammatically correct sarajāḥ, "[the wind] with dust," for sarajaḥ. V1,3,T4,M3, and KK and VSP read tadā, "then," for tathā.

22. "by Mahodara, Mahāpārśva, Dhūmrākṣa, Śuka, and Sāraṇa" mahodaramahāpārśvadhūmrākṣaśukasāraṇaiḥ: See 7.31.32,38 and notes for similar lists of Rāvaṇa's counselors.

"to where Arjuna was" yatra so 'rjunaḥ: V3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read cārjunaḥ, "and Arjuna," for so 'rjunaḥ, "he, Arjuna."

23. "Then" tataḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,7–12,T4,M5,8,10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"in a short a time" nātidīrgheṇa kālena: Literally, "in a time that was not too long." The phrase nātidīrgheṇa is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. V3,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead adīrgheṇaiva kālena, "in a time that was, indeed, not long."

"as black as collyrium*"* añjanaprabhaḥ: Literally, "whose radiance or appearance was that of collyrium."

24. "by impassioned elephant cows" vāśitābhiḥ: The term vāśitā refers to cows or any female animal in heat. Given the repeated similes in this passage, the reference, as Cg and Cr note, refers to elephant cows. Cg additionally cites the AmaK 3.3.75 to support this meaning. (vāśitābhiḥ kareṇubhiḥ. vāśitā strīkareṇvaṃ cety amaraḥ.) Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous variant vāsitābhiḥ. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. The term is used only twice in the Rāmāyaṇa: here and at verse 51 below. See notes to verse 51 below.

26. "Haihaya" haihayasya: The Haihayas are a tribe of ancient India said to be descended from the Yadu lineage (Thapar 2013, p. 172). See notes to verse 4 above.

"who goes by the name of Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇo nāma nāmataḥ: Literally, Rāvaṇa by name namely." This redundant expression is not uncommon in the poem. For its use elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa, see notes to 7.9.3 and 6.38.25. Cr, the only commentator to take note of the phrase here, tries to separate the two adverbial usages. He takes nāmataḥ to refer to Rāvaṇa's name and nāma as an emphatic, referring to his well-known proclivity for battle (nāmato rāvaṇo yuddhārthaṃ nāma prasiddham). Ś,D1,3–5,8,9,12, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read rākṣasaḥ, "the rākṣasa," for nāmataḥ, lending the phrase the sense "the rākṣasa named Rāvaṇa."

"for the purpose of battle" yuddhārtham: The "-tham" of -artham is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś1,V1,D1–5,9,T1,2,G,M1,3,5,6,8,10, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative yuddhārthī, "seeking battle."

27. "with their weapons . . . him" sāyudhās taṃ [rāvaṇam]: KK and VSP read instead sāyudhāstraṃ, "with their weapons and missiles."

"Rāvaṇa's . . . him" rāvaṇasya taṃ rāvaṇam: Literally, "of Rāvaṇa . . . to him Rāvaṇa."

28. "Well done, Rāvaṇa! You really know the time for a battle" yuddhasya kālo vijñātaḥ sādhu bhoḥ sādhu rāvaṇa: Literally, "the time of battle is correctly [sādhu] known. Well done [sādhu], O Rāvaṇa!" As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, the counselors' words here are to be taken as ironic, as they are, in fact, taunting Rāvaṇa (arjunamantriṇo vyañgyoktyā rāvaṇaṃ nindanti—Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Cr simply notes that they are saying that Rāvaṇa does not know the proper time for battle. As an alternative, he suggests breaking up the sequence kālo vijñātaḥ, "the time is well known," as kālo 'vijñātaḥ, "the time not known." This would make the counselors' statement literal as opposed to ironic.

"you wish to fight" yoddhum icchasi: D6,7,10,11,T2,G,M1,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yoddhum utsahase, "you dare to fight." Ck, Ct, and Cr read the second adverb sādhu from pāda b, with the verb. This would yield the sense "since you dare to fight straightaway (sādhu samyag yoddhum utsahase)."

"impassioned" kṣībam: Ck, Ct, and Cr understand the term in its sense of intoxicated from strong drink (madapānamadam—so Ct). The term can also mean "excited," and, given the context and the force of the simile, we feel that the reference is to Arjuna's sexual excitement, which is compared to the rutting of an elephant. Cg's gloss of matta, which can mean intoxicated as well as sexually excited, maintains the ambiguity of the term. See verses 13–16 above.

"surrounded by women" strīvṛtam: D2,6,7,10–12,T3,G1,M1,2,4,5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead strīgatam, "gone to or approached [his women]."

Following 28cd, Ñ,B,D6,10,11,S (except T4), and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [665*]: "And how dare you do battle with Arjuna in the presence of his women[1] (strīsamakṣaṃ kathaṃ cāpi yoddhum utsahase 'rjunam)?"

[1]"And how . . . in the presence of his women" strīsamakṣaṃ kathaṃ cāpi: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, Gita Press, and NSP read instead strīsamakṣagataṃ yat tvam, "since you . . . [him] who has gone to the presence of women." KK and VSP read instead strīsamakṣaṃ kathaṃ yat tat, "how [dare you . . .] since he is in the presence of [his] women?"

29. According to Ck and Ct, the counselors are now speaking straightforwardly (svabhāvenāhuḥ) [as opposed to ironically, as in the previous verse].

"please stay here for the night" uṣyatāṃ rajanī tvayā: Literally, "let it be stayed by you [for] the night." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct in adding the word iha, "here," (uṣyatām iheti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly). KK and VSP read coṣyatām, "and let it be stayed," for uṣyatām, "let it be stayed," to avoid hiatus, while T1,2,G2,3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read the synonymous śarvarī, "night," for rajanī.

"If you still wish to fight, dear fellow, you can meet Arjuna in battle tomorrow." yuddhaśraddhā tu yady asti śvas tāta samare 'rjunam: Literally, "But if there is still desire for battle, dear boy, in battle Arjuna tomorrow." The line is defective as it lacks a finite verb for the correlative clause. Cr, the only commentator to read with the critical edition, proposes adding the verb "you should meet (prāpnuhīti śeṣaḥ)," and we have followed his suggestion. KK and VSP and, according to a footnote in GPP (p. 2859), the text of Cg, read yuddhe sraddhā, "desire with respect to battle," for the compound yuddhaśraddhā. This, however, does not address the syntactical problem, and Cg offers no help. D11,M2, and GPP and NSP read the second person imperative yudhya, "you must fight," for yud- dha-. This is glossed by Ck, Cm, and Ct with the regular ātmanepada imperative form yudhyasva. This lends the line the sense "If you still wish it, dear boy, then you should fight Arjuna in battle tomorrow." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2021) reads yudhya, while the 1998 edition of Gita Press (vol. 2, p. 788) reads yuddhe śraddhā. The translation in both cases is the imperative "fight." GPP and the critical apparatus (for Ś,D11,M2) read yuddhya, which is evidently a typographical error.

30. "If, on the other hand, you are in such haste in your thirst for battle" yadi vāpi tvarā tubhyaṃ yuddhatṛṣṇāsamāvṛtā: Literally, "or if the haste for you is infused with a thirst for battle." The syntax is quite awkward, and we have attempted to make it intelligible. D10,11,T3,M6,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative singular yuddhatṛṣṇāsamāvṛta, "O you who are filled with thirst for battle." KK and VSP read for pāda a yady adyāsti matir yoddhum. This lends the line the sense "If there is an intention, driven by a thirst for battle, to fight today . . ."

"you must first strike us down" nihatyāsmāṃs tato: Literally, "then having struck us down." D1,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nipātyāsmān raṇe, "having felled us in battle."

31. "The . . . ministers of Rāvaṇa . . . those ministers of the king" te rāvaṇāmātyair amātyāḥ pārthivasya: Literally, "by the ministers of Rāvaṇa . . . those ministers of the king." D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and KK read instead the similar tai rāvaṇāmātyair amātyās te nṛpasya, "then those ministers of the king by the ministers of Rāvaṇa." See notes to verse 32 below.

32. "on the bank of the Narmadā there arose" narmadātīra ābabhau: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the similar narmadātīrago babhau, "appeared [a sound] that was situated on the bank on the Narmadā."

"a tumultuous noise" halahalāśabdaḥ: The term halahalā normally refers to the sound of applause or approbation. Here, however, as suggested by Ck and Ct, it is simply onomatopoeic (śabdānukāraḥ). See, too, 7.87.11 and notes.

"from the followers of Arjuna" arjunasyānuyātrāṇām: Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to Arjuna's counselors. It is, however, not clear whether any of those have survived the initial onslaught of Rāvaṇa's counselors described in the preceding verse. Henceforth the poet appears to avoid the terms mantrin and amātya when referring to those fighting on Arjuna's side, calling them only warriors or fighters (yodhāḥ). D6,7,T1,3,4,M1,3, and KK and VSP read the synonymous anuyātṝṇām, "followers," for anuyātrāṇām.

33. "Arjuna's troops rushed up" abhidrutāḥ: Literally, "[they] ran toward." The verse is elliptical in several respects and does not provide a noun to serve as the subject of the verbal participle abhidrutāḥ, "ran toward." The context makes it apparent that the subject must be Arjuna's soldiers, who are mentioned in the following verse. We have supplied the subject.

"Rāvaṇa and his ministers" sarāvaṇān: Literally, "those accompanied by Rāvaṇa." The verse is also elliptical in describing the object of the participle ardayantaḥ, "assailing." The reference, of course, must be to the ministers together with Rāvaṇa. KK 1913 alone breaks the sequence into the words sarāvaṇā nardayantaḥ. This lends the phrase the meaning "those accompanied by Rāvaṇa, roaring [rushed from every side]." This reading makes Rāvaṇa and his ministers the subjects of the sentence. This reading is not attested in the critical apparatus. However, the apparatus shows that M2 and M8 similarly split the sequence, reading sarāvaṇaṃ nardayantaḥ, "roaring they rushed upon that one [the army?] together with Rāvaṇa." This reading still implies that Arjuna's troops are attacking.

"with . . . lances that were like thunderbolts, together with nooses" śūlair vajrakalpaiḥ sakarṣaṇaiḥ: The sequence -kalpaiḥ sakarṣaṇaiḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ1,B4,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead prāsaiḥ triśūlair vajrakarṣaṇaiḥ, "with darts, tridents, vajras, and nooses." Ñ1,B4,D10,11, and KK and VSP read the variant, substituting the critical edition's śūlaiḥ, "with lances," for the variant prāsaiḥ, "with darts." At our note to 6.59.28 we have argued that the obscure term karṣaṇa, literally, "dagger," refers to a noose or lasso. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand it simply to be a type of weapon (āyudhaviśeṣaḥ). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 479), who in the earlier context (1982, vol. 3, p. 203) had rendered "noose," here leaves the term untranslated.

34. "The onset . . . was . . . like the roar of the ocean" vega āsīt . . . samudrasyeva nisvanaḥ: The simile is a bit strange. Probably the intention is that the sound of the attack was like that of the ocean.

35. "whose blazing energy was that of fire, burned up" nirdahanty agnitejasasaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nihanti sma svatejasā, "they struck down [the army] through their own blazing energy." Note the irregular third person singular nihanti for the expected plural nighnanti. Cr silently corrects the form in his comments (prastādayaḥ kārtavīryabalaṃ svatejasā nighnanti sma). M6 and KK and VSP read instead nirdahanti sma [ca—M6] tejasā, "they burned up with blazing energy."

36. "the men who guarded his gateway" puruṣair dvārarakṣibhiḥ: The final member of the compound, -rakṣibhiḥ, is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead puruṣair bhayavihvalaiḥ, "the men beside themselves with fear."

37. "After telling" uktvā: Literally, "having said." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śrutvā, "having heard." This variant provides no object for the gerund. Presumably we are to understand that what Arjuna has heard is the report of his men alluded to in the previous verse. This reading also obliges one, as noted by Ct and Cr, to supply the missing gerund uktvā, "having said" (uktvā na bhetavyam ity uktveti śeṣaḥ—so Ct).

"then" sa tataḥ: Literally, "he [Arjuna], then." D1,3,4,6,7,10,11,T3,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa tadā, "he, then," while T4 and KK and VSP read taṃ tataḥ, "the [womenfolk] then."

"came up out of the water" uttatāra jalāt: Cr does not specify to whom Arjuna directs his comforting words "do not fear." He takes the compound strījanam, "womenfolk," to be the object of the verb uttatāra, which he evidently reads as a causative. Thus he understands that, like the great elephant Añjana, Arjuna has his females get out of the water. (arjunaḥ śrutvā na bhetavyam ity uktāveti [sic] [uktveti?] śesaḥ. tasmān narmadāj[al]ād gāṅgātoyād añjano mahāgaja iva. strījanam uttatāra.)

"as might Añjana" ivāñjanaḥ: Literally, "like Añjana." As Ck and Ct note, Añjana is the name of one of the elephants of the directions (añjano diggajaḥ). Normally, Añjana is the elephant of Varuṇa and is associated with the western direction. For the names of these elephants, see notes to 1.39.12. See, too, 6.4.16; 6.31.4; 6.58.45–46; and notes and AmaK 1.3.3. See notes to 7.5.4 and 7.31.28–29.

38. "Then" tataḥ: V1,B3,D1,5,7,9–11,T3,4,M8,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the tadā, "then or after that."

"the . . . fire that was Arjuna" arjunapāvakaḥ: Literally, "the Arjuna-fire." The figure is somewhat unusual for the Rāmāyaṇa, where one would normally expect the anger itself to be the upameya, or the figure of comparison. Here we read with Ck and Ct in understanding the compound as a samastarūpaka, or compound metaphor (arjunarūpaḥ pāvaka iti rūpakam—so Ct; Ck similarly). See notes to 7.31.29.

39. "drove off" abhidravati: Literally, "he runs toward or charges at." Given the nature of the stock simile, we agree with Ct and most translators consulted in reading the simplex as a causative in the sense of "he puts to flight." Ñ,V3,B,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the perfect abhidudrāva.

40. "which was whirled about by the force of his arms" bāhuvikṣepakaraṇām: Literally, "possessing the effect of arm-whirling." The phrase is somewhat awkward. Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct gloss, "[that great mace], which through the agency of arms possessed an effect of whirling, that is to say, having an accomplishment through rotation (bāhubhir vikṣepakaraṇaṃ bhramasaṃpādanaṃ yasyās tām—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cm similarly)."

41. "blocking his path" samāvṛtya: Literally, "having obstructed." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (except Ck) read instead the synonymous samāruddhya.

"as did the Vindhya mountain that of the sun" vindhyo 'rkasyeva parvataḥ: As Ck and Ct note, the reference is to the well-known purāṇic episode (vindhyaparvato 'rkamārgaṃ ruddhvā sthita iti paurāṇikī kathā—so Ct; Ck similarly). This is the episode in which the sage Agastya proceeds to the south and thus makes the Vindhyas bow down in order to make a passage for the sun. According to the legend, the mountains must remain in their bowed position until Agastya's return. See MBh 3.102.

42. "Puffed up with pride" madoddhataḥ: Literally, "inflated with arrogance." M5 and KK and VSP read instead mahoddhataḥ, "greatly inflated or arrogant."

"roared" rarāsa: The verb has been marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"like a thundercloud" yathāmbudaḥ: Literally, "like a water-giver [i.e., a cloud]." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yathāntakaḥ, "like Antaka, the ender of all things [lit., 'the ender']."

43. "as it left Prahasta's hand" prahastakaramuktasya: Literally, "released from the hand of Prahasta."

"that seemed to be blazing" pradahann iva: The simile appears to be somewhat truncated. Normally, a phrase like "appeared to be burning" will take a direct object in the Rāmāyaṇa. For example, see 6.24.23–24 and notes.

44. "who was armed with his mace" sagadaḥ: Literally, "along with [his] mace." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T,1,2,G3,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead gadayā, "with [his] mace."

"whose strength was that of an elephant" gajavikramaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead gataviklavaḥ, "whose agitation was gone." Ct glosses, "free from fear (gatabhayaḥ)." M8 and KK and VSP read instead [a]gadavikramaḥ, "whose prowess was unimpaired." Cg, the only commentator to note this reading, explains: "The meaning is that [Arjuna is] one whose prowess or strength is free from affliction, that is to say, unconstrained (agado 'rogo 'pratibandha iti yāvad vikramo yasyeti vigrahaḥ).

"evaded" vañcayāmāsa: Literally, "he deceived or caused to go astray." Cg glosses, "he struck down or warded off (pratihatavān)."

"as it sped toward him" ādhāvamānam: Literally, "as it was rushing toward [him]." KK and VSP read instead athāyāntaṃ tu, "but, now as it was approaching [him]."

45. "Prahasta" prahastam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sagadaḥ, "along with [his] mace."

"massive" gurvīm: Literally, "heavy."

"by five hundred of his arms" pañcabāhuśatocchrayām: The compound is ambiguous in the present context. It can be read, as two translators have done, to mean that Arjuna is holding the mace up to an elevation of five hundred bāhus, roughly five hundred feet (Gorresio 1870, p. 73, and Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 479), but this seems unlikely. It can also be taken to indicate the length of the mace, that it was five hundred bāhus long or high, and this interpretation has been followed by Dutt ("five hundred hands long" [1894, p. 1681]). The remainder interpret as we do, in accordance with the gloss of Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand it to mean that the mace was held up by five hundred [of Arjuna's one thousand] arms (pañcabāhuśatair ucchraya utkṣepo yasyāḥ sā—so Ck, Cg; Ct similarly).

46. "struck . . . by him" tenāhataḥ: Ś2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tato hataḥ, "then struck." KK and VSP read instead tathāhato, "struck in this fashion." This variant avoids the near redundancy of the vulgate's reading of tataḥ . . . tadā.

"violently" [a]tivegena: Literally, "with tremendous force."

"was stunned" sthitaḥ: Literally, "stood or was stationary." The participle is very ambiguous. It can mean "standing," "remaining in a state," or even "standing firm in battle." The only commentator to remark on it, Cr, glosses sthirabuddhiḥ, which normally means "firm-minded, resolute," but given the context in which Prahasta is knocked unconscious only to come to his senses, at verse 66 below, Cr may well intend his gloss to mean "of still or stunned intellect." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand, "standing like a mountain, he fell (śaila iva sthito nipapāta)." KK and VSP read instead hataḥ, "struck."

"like a mountain struck by the thunderbolt of Indra, wielder of the thunderbolt" śailo vajrivajrahato yathā: Literally, "like a mountain struck by the vajra of the vajrin." Normally, we render the epithet vajrin as "Indra, wielder of the vajra." However, in keeping with the commonplace epic trope of a mountain struck by a thunderbolt, we have rendered vajrin here as "wielder of the thunderbolt."

47. "they fled" apasṛptāḥ: Literally, "they retreated." V3,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead apasṛṣṭāḥ (KK and VSP hy apasṛṣṭāḥ), "they abandoned."

48. "and . . . had been felled" ca nipātite: KK and VSP read instead vinipātite, "[when Prahasta had been] felled."

49. "commenced" ārabdham: G2 and KK and VSP read instead cārabdham, "and commenced."

"hair-raising" lomaharṣaṇam: Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,B3,D2,6–12,S, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the phonological variant romaharṣaṇam. Based on the manuscript evidence, the choice of the reading lomaharṣaṇam over romaharṣaṇam is questionable.

"between the thousand-armed king and the twenty-armed rākṣasa" sahasrabāhoḥ . . . viṃśadbāhoś ca . . . / nṛparākṣasayoḥ: Literally, "of the thousand-armed one and the twenty-armed one . . . of the king and the rākṣasa."

50–52. "The rākṣasa and Arjuna . . . each other . . . with their maces" tau tathā rākṣasārjunau / parasparaṃ gadābhyām tau: Literally, "thus the two, the rākṣasa and Arjuna, [belabored] mutually [i.e., each] with the two maces, the two." V3,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead parasparaṃ gadāṃ gṛhya, "mutually (i.e., each) having seized a mace," for parasparaṃ gadābhyām tau, "mutually [i.e., each] with the two maces, the two." D6,7,10,11,T1,4,G2,M1,3,5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tau tadā, "those two then," for tau tathā, "thus, the two," while KK and VSP read by transposition tadā tau, a variant not noted in the critical apparatus.

"roiling" saṃkṣubdhau: Literally, "agitated." M6 and KK and VSP read instead saṃrabdhau, "agitated or angry."

"like two moving mountains" calamūlāv ivācalau: Literally, "like two mountains [lit., '(things) that do not move'] whose roots are moving." D3,6,T1,2,4,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the present participle calat-, "moving," for the adjective cala-, yielding a synonymous compound.

"like two bull elephants arrogant in their might, like two bulls fighting over an impassioned cow" baloddhatau yatha nāgau vāśitārthe yathā vṛṣau: Literally, "like two elephants inflated through strength, like two bulls for the sake of an impassioned cow." We read with Cr in taking the term vāśitā- here to refer to a bovine female who is the object of contention between two bulls (vāsitārthe [v.l. vāśitārthe] gavarthe vṛṣāv iva). Ck, Cg, and Ct, however, take it in its sense of elephant cow and thus make it the object of conflict between two bull elephants (kareṇvarthe yudhyantāv iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly; kariṇīrūpaprayojanāya yuyudhāte iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct). This, however, seems rhetorically weak in light of the fact that elephants have already been used as upamānas. See notes to verse 24 above. Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,B,D1,2,4,6,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous phonological variant vāsitārthe, "impassioned cow," for vāśitārthe.

53. "But the two . . . just as" yathā . . . tadvat tau: Literally, "just as . . . like that, the two." Ñ1,V3,B4,D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1,3,5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tau tatra, "those two, there," for tadvat tau, "like that, the two."

"withstood" sahete: Literally, "those two endure." The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ1,V3,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11,M3,5,8–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the perfect dual ātmanepada, sehāte, "those two endured."

54. "inevitably" vai: Literally, "indeed." B2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead [a]tha, "now."

"with the blows of their maces" tābhyāṃ gadāpātaiḥ: Literally, "by the mace falls by or from those two." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tayoḥ gadāpothaiḥ, "with the blows of their maces."

55. "it lent a golden glow to the heavens" kāñcanābhaṃ nabhaś cakre: Literally, "it made the sky have a golden luster."

56. "resembled a blazing meteor falling on a mighty mountain" nirbhāti . . . ulkeva mahāgirau: Literally, "resembled a meteor on a great mountain."

57. "experienced any fatigue" khedam āpnoti: Literally, "he obtains exhaustion." Ś,V3,D1–5,8–12, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead khedam āyāti, "he came to exhaustion."

"the battle . . . was just like" samam āsīt . . . yuddhaṃ yathā: Literally, "the battle was the same, just like." KK and VSP read idam, "that," for samam, "the same," lending the phrase the sense "that battle was just like." This reading eliminates the redundancy. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"between Bali and Indra" balīndrayoḥ: Bhāgavatapurāṇa 8.11 tells the story of the battle between Bali and Indra. See verse 72 and notes below. Compare verse 63 and notes below and 6.47.119 and notes.

58. "The foremost of men and the foremost of rākṣasas" nararākṣasasattamau: Literally, "the two foremost among men and rākṣasas." The word -sattamau is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"belabored" vinighnantau: Literally, "those two striking." The verse lacks a finite verb, which Cv and Cs supply (abhūtām, babhuvatuḥ, respectively). T1,2,G2,3,M1,10, and KK and VSP read instead tau nighantau, "those two, striking."

"as might two great bulls with their horns" śṛṅgair maharṣabhau yadvat: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śṛṅgair iva vṛṣāyudhyan (KK and VSP—vṛṣā yudhyan), "they fought like two bulls with their horns." The commentators either gloss vṛṣā as vṛṣau (vṛśā vṛṣāv ayudhyann ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Cs similarly) or explain the irregular vṛṣā as vṛṣau according to Pāṇini 7.1.39, supāṃ suluk-, in which certain nominal endings are replaced in the veda (ḍādeśaś chandas tulyatvāt—so Cs; Cr similarly). Cs and Cr correct the plural ayudhyan to ayudhyetām (so Cs; Cr similarly), "those two fight."

59. "in that great battle" mahāhave: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahorasi, "on [Rāvaṇa's] broad chest."

"let fly" muktā: Literally, "was released."

"with all his might" sarvaprāṇeṇa: Literally, "with his entire life-breath or vital energy."

"at the middle of . . . chest" stanayor antare: Literally, "in the interval between the breasts."

60. "because of the protection afforded by the grant of his boon" varadānakṛtatrāṇe: The syntax of this verse is rather defective. We read the compound as an elliptical sati saptamī, the sense of which is "there being protection created by the gift of Rāvaṇa's boon." Cr reads it as a bahuvrīhi compound in agreement with rāvaṇorasi, "on Rāvaṇa's chest," which is then the locus of the protection, i.e., "on Rāvaṇa's chest, which had a protection that was caused by the granting of a boon" (varadānena kṛtaṃ trāṇaṃ yasya tasmin rāvaṇorasi). Ironically, the boon of Rāvaṇa, which protects him only from supernatural beings, should not by rights apply here, since despite his unusual number of limbs, Arjuna is everywhere said to be a human (nara). On the motif of Rāvaṇa's boon, see notes to 7.10.16.

"striking Rāvaṇa's chest" rāvaṇorasi: Literally, "on Rāvaṇa's chest." Again the syntax is elliptical. We follow Cr, who adds the adjective "[was] made to fall [on Rāvaṇa's chest] (pātiteti śeṣaḥ)."

"broke in two" dvidhābhūtā: Literally, "became bifurcated." D8,T1,2,4, and KK and VSP read instead dvidhābhūtvā, "having become bifurcated."

"like a feeble army" durbaleva yathā senā: The simile is utterly bizarre and unlike any seen elsewhere in the poem. Among the translators consulted, only Gorresio shares this reading and translates "a guisa d'un'oste malferma" (1870, p. 74). A possible alternative would be to take senā in its vedic sense of "missile, dart, or spear," but this would rob the simile of almost any rhetorical force. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vegam, "force, impact," for senā. This, too, is a rather awkward reading. The phrase durbaleva would then refer directly to the mace, gadā, with the sense "the mace, as if weak." Commentators resort to circumlocution in order to explain the syntax of yathā and vegam. Ck, Cg, and Ct take the adverb yathā in compound with vegam to form the avyayībhāva compound yathāvegam, yielding the sense that the mace was unable to strike with its appropriate or usual impact (yathāvegaṃ svavegocitaṃ prahartum asamarthā—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Cr simply glosses, "in such a way as to be without force or impact (avegam iva yathā bhavati tathā)." Cv addresses the redundancy of the adverbs of similarity iva and yathā by noting that they have a single meaning here (iva yathā śabdāv ekārthāv eva).

61. "delivered" pramuktena: Literally, "released." Ñ2,V1,3,B2,3,D2,5–7,9–11,T,G2,M1, 3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead prayuktena, "employed or discharged."

"staggered back a bow's length and collapsed, moaning softly" apāsarpad dhanurmātraṃ niṣasāda ca niṣṭanan: The line is a close variant of 6.84.19cd, where it is said that the rākṣasa Virūpākṣa's elephant "staggered back a bow's length, collapsed, and bellowed (apāsarpad dhanurmātraṃ niṣasāda nanāda ca)." Here, Ct and Cr gloss niṣṭanan, "moaning softly," with rudan, "crying," while Cg glosses raṭan, "screaming." Ck's gloss in our transcript reads the same as Cg's, i.e., raṭan. It has, however, been corrected to read nadan, "roaring," which is the reading assigned to Ck in the critical apparatus. On the word niṣṭanan, see 1744*, note 1, following notes to 6.79.4; and 404*, lines 3–4, note 3, following notes to 7.21.10. On dhanuḥ, "bow," as a unit of measurement, see 6.53.34 and notes.

62. "swiftly seized" sahasā pratijagrāha: Literally, "he seized suddenly or swiftly." V3,B3,D6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sahasotpatya jagrāha, "having leapt forward suddenly, he seized."

63. "ten-faced Rāvaṇa" tam . . . daśānanam: Literally, "him . . . the ten-faced [one]." D6,7,10,11,T1–3,M9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tu, "but," for tam, "him."

"as Nārāyaṇa did Bali" baliṃ nārāyaṇo yathā: The reference is to the well-known story in which Viṣṇu in his vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation, confines the asura king Bali to the underworld. See 6.49.1–2; 7.27.9; 7.29.16; and notes. See BhāgP 8.18–23. Compare verse 57 and notes above and verse 72 and notes below.

64. "cried out: 'Well done' " sādhvīti vādinaḥ: The sequence sādhvīti is unusual and has caused some consternation among the commentators. The normal expression of approbation on the part of the celestials for some extraordinary deed of valor is sādhu, which, with the quotation marker iti, should yield the sequence sādhv iti. Thus the long ī requires explanation. Ck and Ct write it off to epic irregularity, noting that it is ārṣa (so Ct) or chāndasa (so Ck). Cv understands that the ī is long metri causa (dīrghavṛttānukūlyāt). This point is also raised, among others, by Cs. Cg, Cr, and Cs argue that there is no irregularity here since the adjective is the feminine sādhvī, which modifies an understood noun referring to Arjuna's feat (kriyā). Thus Cg remarks: "They were saying 'the feat' was excellent (iyaṃ kriyā sādhvīti vadantaḥ)." Cr quotes Ct but remarks that there is no need to imagine irregular lengthening here, as we should understand the adjective sādhvī to modify the attainment of binding (bandhanaprāpti) mentioned in the previous verse (sādhvīty atra dīrgha ārṣa iti bhaṭṭāḥ sādhvīty asyādhyāhṛtabandhanaprāptiviśeṣaṇatve tu nārṣakalpaneti dik). Cs, too, sees a feminine adjective and suggests adding the words "the action of binding" (sādhvībandhanakriyeti śeṣaḥ). Cs also quotes and criticizes Ct, claiming that he should not have explained the sequence as he did but, at the very least, should have explained the length as necessary to agree with the word being modified (i.e., kriyā). (nāgojibhaṭṭas tu dīrgha ārṣa ity ūcivān. parantu tena na vaktavyam. kartavyaṃ tenāpi viśeṣyapadapūraṇam.)

65. "as the king of lions might an elephant" siṃharāḍ iva dantinam: Literally, "as a lion-king a tusked one." D10,11,T1,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mṛgarāṭ, "king of beasts (i.e., a lion)," for siṃharāṭ, "king of lions," while D6,7,10,11,T4,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read kuñjaram, "elephant," for dantinam, "tusked one."

"roared" rarāsa: T1,2,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous nanāda, "he roared."

66. "having regained consciousness" samāśvastaḥ: It will be recalled that Arjuna had knocked Prahasta unconscious in verse 46 above.

"ten-faced Rāvaṇa" daśānanam: Literally, "the ten-faced [one]."

"in a rage . . . charged at the king" kruddha abhidudrāva pārthivam: Note the hiatus. KK and VSP read kruddhaś cābhidudrāva, "and angry, he charged," while D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead haihayam, "the Haihaya," for pārthivam, "the king."

"together with the rākṣasas" saha tai rākṣasaiḥ: The reference is to the counselors of Rāvaṇa who had fled the battlefield at verses 47–48 above. D6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sahasā rākṣasaḥ, "suddenly the rākṣasa."

67. "night-roaming rākṣasas" naktaṃcarāṇām: Literally, "of the night-roaming [ones]." See notes to 7.7.2.

"was like the wondrous rise of the seas at the waning of summer" uddhūta ātapāpāye samudrāṇām ivādbhutaḥ: Literally, "was like the wondrous [onset] of the oceans that arises at the waning of the heat." Here again the simile is both syntactically and rhetorically deficient. Apparently the author's intention is to compare the sudden rush of the rākṣasa warriors to that of the seas, which swell up during the rainy season, following the heat of summer. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead udbhūta (uddhūta—so Cr) ātapāpāye payodānām ivāmbudhau, "was like that which arises from [lit. 'of'] storm clouds on the ocean at the waning of the heat."

68. "Release him! Release him!" muñca muñca: Literally, "Release! Release!"

"they then loosed . . . at Arjuna" utsasarjus tadārjune: Ś2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sotsasarja tadā raṇe [(ā)rjune—so KK, VSP], "he then released in battle [at Arjuna—so KK, VSP]." Ct and Cr are the only commentators who grapple with the grammatical irregularities of the variant. Both note the irregular sandhi in the sequence sotsasarja (sotsasarjety ārṣam—so Ct). Both commentators try to negotiate the awkward sequence of a plural participle (bhāṣantaḥ—note also the irregular parasmaipada) in pāda a with their singular finite verb utsasarja in pāda d. Ct glosses, "they released [the weapons] all together [i.e., as one] (sahaiva tyaktavantaḥ)." Cr wants to break the verse into two separate sentences. He suggests supplying the plural finite verb "they arrived (prāpuḥ)" in the first half, thus leaving Prahasta's action in the second half as an independent one. Thus the singular verb is because of the finite verb of a second sentence. (bhāṣanto rākṣasāḥ prāpur iti śeṣaḥ sa prahastas tu . . . utsasarja.)

"cudgels and lances" musalāni ca śūlāni: Ñ,B1,2,4,D1,3,4,T1,2,G1,2,M2,3,9, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead musalāni saśūlāni, "cudgels along with lances."

69. "the destroyer of his enemies" ripusūdanaḥ: The compound is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11,T1–3,G2,3,M1,3,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous ariniṣūdanaḥ.

"He . . . caught those weapons" āyudhāni . . . jagrāha: Ct observes that Arjuna quickly caught the weapons with those hands that were not occupied with holding Rāvaṇa (tāny āyudhāni rāvaṇagrāhikaravyatiriktakarair āśu jagrāha).

70. "with those very same" tair eva: GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tāny eva, "those same [rākṣasas (rakṣāṃsi)]."

71. "And, having thus frightened off" trāsayitvā tu: Ñ1,V1,3,D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the periphrastic perfect trāsayāmāsa, "he frightened off."

"Arjuna Kārtavīrya" kārtavīryārjunaḥ: Ś1,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D1–4,8,T1,2,G3,M1,3,4,6, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous kārtavīryo 'rjunaḥ.

72. "Then" tadā: D6,7,10,11,T4,M3,5–7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the more or less synonymous tataḥ, "then."

"as the twice-born brahmans, together with the townsfolk, showered him with masses of blossoms and unhusked rice" sa kīryamāṇaḥ kusumākṣatotkarair dvijaiḥ sapauraiḥ: Literally, "he being showered with masses of blossoms and unhusked rice by the twice-born [ones], together with the townsfolk."

"who resembled Indra, invoked by many" puruhūtasaṃnibhaḥ: Literally, "resembling the widely invoked [one]."

"entered" saṃpraviveśa: Ś1,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead svāṃ praviveśa, "he entered his own [city]."

"just as did thousand-eyed Indra when he had captured Bali" baliṃ nigṛhyeva sahasralocanaḥ: Literally, "like the thousand-eyed [one], having captured Bali." The simile seems to confuse two distinct mythological episodes involving the asura king Bali. As noted above, it is Viṣṇu who famously imprisons Bali (verse 63), while Indra is said to have killed him in battle (verse 57). See verse 57 and notes above. Compare, too, verse 63 and notes, above, and 6.47.119 and notes.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

1. "Now . . . the capture of Rāvaṇa" rāvaṇagrahanaṃ tat tu: The word -grahaṇam is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition, but this is apparently a typographical error. Although not noted in the errata (p. 666) to the critical edition, it appears that the following sequence, tat tu, was intended to be marked as uncertain. The word -grahaṇam shows no variations in the critical apparatus, while the sequence tat tu has a number of northern and southern variations.

"the seer" ṛṣiḥ: D6,7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "then."

2. "that great seer" mahān ṛṣiḥ: Literally, "the great seer." Ñ1,V1,3,T4, and KK and VSP read instead mahāmuniḥ, "the great sage."

"despite his extraordinary self-control" mahādhṛtiḥ: Literally, "he of great firmness or fortitude." The idea, we believe, as articulated by Cg, is that even though the seer is legendary for the control of his emotions, his grandfatherly affection for Rāvaṇa gets the better of him. Cg observes: "Although he was one of great self-control, his heart was agitated, that is the meaning (mahādhṛter api kampitaṃ hṛdayam ity arthaḥ)."

"moved by affection for his grandson" putrasutasnehāt kampyamānaḥ: Literally, "being shaken out of affection for the son of his son." B1,D6,7,10,11,T4,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead putrakṛta-, "made or caused by a son." Ck, Cg (first alternative), and Ct understand the participle kampyamānaḥ, "being shaken," to mean that Pulastya is filled with compassion (anukampayā yujyamānaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). As a second alternative, Cg understands, as we do, that the seer is shaken or moved by affection for his grandson, Rāvaṇa (yadvā pautrasnehāt kampita ity arthaḥ).

3. "whose pace was equal to that of the wind and who strode with the speed of thought" vāyutulyagatiḥ . . . /. . . manaḥsaṃpātavikramaḥ: Literally, "whose gait was equal to the wind and whose stride was the flight of mind." The two adjectives seem to constitute a redundancy, especially since several of the commentators (Ck, Cg, and Ct) gloss vikramaḥ, "stride," as "gatiḥ, "gait." This makes one of the adjectives superfluous.

4. "was filled" -āvṛtām: B2,M4,7, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous -ākulām.

5. "As he approached he was as hard to look upon as would be Āditya if he were approaching on foot." pādacāram ivādityaṃ niṣpatantaṃ sudurdṛśam: Literally, "[him] who was very hard to see as he was descending, like Āditya [the sun] going on foot." KK and VSP read the synonymous sudurdarśam for sudurdṛśam, "very hard to see." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. See verse 10 and note below.

"they" te: The commentators differ slightly as to the antecedent of the pronoun. Ck believes it is the counselors of Arjuna who were mentioned earlier (pūrvoktān nṛpamantriṇa ity arthaḥ). Ct believes it is either the counselors or the gatekeepers (dvāḥsthā mantriṇo vā), while Cr takes the pronoun to refer generically to Arjuna's attendants (arjunānucārāḥ).

"Arjuna" arjunāya: KK and VSP read instead cārjunāya, "and [to] Arjuna." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus and has probably been introduced to correct the hiatus.

6. "Upon hearing the words . . . that foremost of twice-born brahmans" taṃ śrutvā vacanam . . . /. . . dvijottamam: Literally, "having heard the speech . . . that foremost of the twice-born [ones]." The syntax is extremely awkward, with the masculine pronoun tam, "him," disconnected syntactically. Most manuscripts rephrase in such a way as to avoid the critical construction. Our translation makes the best of a very awkward reconstruction by reading through enjambment the pronoun tam with the noun dvijottamam. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vijñāya vacanāt, "having realized from [their] speech." D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tapasvinam, "the ascetic," for dvijottamam, "the foremost of the twice-born [ones]."

"raising" uddhṛtya: Literally, "having raised." V3,B1,D1,3–7,9–11,T1,2,M1,3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ādhāya, "having placed."

7. "his purohita" purohitaḥ: Literally, "the one placed forward." The purohita or purodhaḥ is the hereditary family priest, especially of a royal dynasty.

"the guest-offering" arghyam: For a listing of the various articles of food and drink traditionally offered to a respected or venerable visitor, see 16*, note 1, following notes to 7.1.10.

"madhuparka" madhuparkam: This is another guest-offering, consisting of milk and honey. It sometimes includes ghee, curds, and sugar. (dadhisarpir jalaṃ kṣaudraṃ sitā caitaiś ca pañcabhiḥ / procyate madhuparkaḥ—Apte [s.v. madhuparka].) See Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 542–45. In the Rāmāyaṇa this term is found only here and in verse 9 below. It is somewhat more common in the Mahābhārata (see, e.g., 1.105.7; 2.5.5; 3.49.30; 5.35.19,20; 5.38.3; and 12.202.5).

"Indra" indrasya: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,6–12,T4,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śakrasya, "of Śakra."

8. "worshiped . . . Indra" vavandendraḥ: The form vavande, "he worshiped or honored," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Cr, who understands the verb to be the ātmanepada perfect vavande, notes the double sandhi (vavande guṇo 'ta eva nirdeśāt). One could also understand the verb to be the parasmaipada perfect, vavanda, which would then coalesce to the identical sequence vavandendraḥ.

"who had come" saṃprāptam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃbhrāntaḥ, "agitated or flustered." The adjective modifies Arjuna.

"the Lord" īśvaram: Although the term, when used by itself of a divinity, most typically refers to Śiva, Ct and Cg believe that the reference here is to Brahmā. This is no doubt to maintain the parallelism in the present context, in which a king goes to greet a brahman. Compare 7.31.4 and notes. Ck identifies the lord as caturmukharudra, "four-faced Rudra." On his use of this term, see notes to 7.25.9.

9. "And" ca: Ñ2,B,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gām, "cow," which would then be added to the list of things that Arjuna has provided Pulastya.

"he had seen to it that he had been given" dāpayan: Literally, "[he], causing to give." B3,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nivedya, "and having offered."

"the madhuparka" madhuparkam: See notes to verse 7 above.

10. "Today, Māhiṣmatī" adyeyam . . . māhiṣmatī: Literally, "today, this Māhiṣmatī." Ś1,Ṇ2,V1,D1,4–7,9–11,G1,M2,4,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read adhyaivam, "today, in this fashion," for adyeyam, "today, this."

"lord among the lords of twice-born brahmans" dvijendrendra: Literally, "lord among the lords of the twice-born [ones]." The sequence -endra is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dvijendra tvām, "[I am seeing] you, O lord of the twice-born."

"so hard to see" durdṛśam: KK and VSP read instead the synonymous durdarśam. The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Compare verse 5 above (sudurdṛśam, "hard to look upon"). Apparently here the adjective refers to the rarity of the sight of the exalted sage rather than, as in verse 5, to its blinding quality.

11. "my lineage is exalted" me kulam uddhṛtam: Literally, "of me the lineage is raised up." V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead me kuśalaṃ vratam, "my vow has prospered."

"in that . . . your" yat te: KK and VSP read instead yasmāt, "on account of which." This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"feet" caraṇāv imau: Literally, "the two feet." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead caraṇau tava, "your two feet."

Following 11ab, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [683*]: "Today my birth has born fruit. Today my asceticism has born fruit. (adya me saphalaṃ janma adya me saphalaṃ tapaḥ.)" Note the hiatus.

12. "This kingdom, my sons, my wives, and I are yours." idaṃ rājyam ime putrā ime dārā ime vayam: Literally, "this kingdom, these sons, these wives, we [who are] these." The words "are yours," are added in accordance with the suggestion of Cr (idaṃ rājyādi tavaiveti śeṣaḥ). Note the repetition of the plural pronoun ime, "these," including its usage as the "royal we (pūjāyāṃ bahuvacanam)."

"what may we do? What must we do?" kiṃ kurma kiṃ kāryam: Literally, "What do we do? What must be done?" Ck glosses karavāma, the first person plural imperative, "[What] must we do?" D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous parasmaipada form kiṃ kurmaḥ. KK and VSP read the unusual form kurmi for kurma. This is an irregular form of the first person singular, present indicative. See Whitney 1889, p. 260 [§715a]. The form is used three times in the Mahābhārata (3.142.28; 5.180.26; and 7.161.4) and three in the critical edition of the Rāmāyaṇa (5.20.20; 6.1.11; and 7.69.20). Cg glosses karavāṇi, the first person singular imperative "[What] must I do?"

13. "Now, after having inquired" pṛṣṭvātha: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M2,3,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pṛṣṭvā ca, "and after having inquired."

"dependents" bhṛtyeṣu: D6,7,10,11,M9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead putreṣu, "[his] sons."

"then" tadā: Ñ2,V3,D6,7,10,11,T1,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathā, "thus."

14. "Lord of kings . . . whose eyes are like shining lotuses" rājendrāmalapadmākṣa: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead narendrāmbujapatrākṣa, "O lord of men, whose eyes are like lotus petals."

15. "invincible" [a]tīvadurjayaḥ: Literally, "highly invincible." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raṇadurjayaḥ, "invincible in battle."

"the ocean and wind stand motionless" avatiṣṭhetāṃ niṣpandau sāgarānilau: V3,D6,7,10,11,T2,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous upatiṣṭhetām, "those two stand," for avatiṣṭhetām.

"today" adya: V3,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mṛdhe, "in battle."

16. "Thus you have increased your fame, my son" tat putraka yaśaḥ sphītam: Literally, "That fame is expanded, little son." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead putrakasya yaśaḥ pītam, "[you have] drunk up the fame of [my] little son." Ct understands the term pītam, "drunk up," to be a metaphor for nāśitam, "destroyed."

"spread your name" nāma viśrāvitaṃ tvayā: Literally, "the name has been caused by you to be heard." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Arjuna's epithet will be rāvaṇajit, "conqueror of Rāvaṇa," and that it will be spread throughout the three worlds (svīyaṃ nāma ca rāvaṇajid ity evaṃ trailokye viśrāvitam). Compare 7.22.42; 7.24.45; and notes.

"dear boy" vatsa: Literally, "child." KK and VSP read instead the accusative, vatsam, which makes the term apply to Rāvaṇa rather than Arjuna, yielding the sense "my child Rāvaṇa."

17. "Accepting . . . command without a word" ājñāṃ sa gṛhyātha akiṃcanavacaḥ: Literally, "then he, having received the command without any word at all." Note the hiatus. We read the compound akiṃcanavacaḥ as an adverb in the sense of "wordlessly." D6,7,10,11,M7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read pragṛhyātha, "having accepted," for sa gṛhya, "he, having accepted." KK and VSP read pragṛhyoce na kiṃcana vacaḥ, lending the line the sense "Having accepted the command, he did not utter any word." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Cr, who shares the critical reading, points out that for this variant reading one must supply a verb with the sense "he uttered or spoke (kiñ- cana vaco novāceti śeṣaḥ)." D6,7,10,11,12,M1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous na kiṃcana vacaḥ. Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct additionally observe that the meaning is that, although Arjuna did not speak, he replied through his actions alone and released him (api tu kriyā kevalam uttaram iti mumocety arthaḥ—so Cg).

"lord among the lords of kings" pārthivendrendraḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead [-ai]va pārthivendraḥ, "the lord of kings immediately [released]," while KK and VSP read vai pārthivendraḥ, "the lord among kings indeed [released]," a variant not noted in the critical apparatus.

"happily" prahṛṣṭavat: Ct understands that Arjuna is pleased at the thought that a son of Brahmā has to plead with him (brahmaputro māṃ prārthitavān iti saṃtoṣayuktaḥ san). Ck and Cg are similar, except that they believe that he is happy because it is a brahman who is begging him (brahmaṇā prārthanīyo 'smīti saṃtoṣayuktaḥ san).

18. "When he had released . . . he honored . . . after forging" pramuktvā . . . prapūjya . . . upetya: Literally, "having released, having honored, having reached." D1,3,4,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the grammatically correct form pramucya.

"with him a pact of nonaggression witnessed by Agni" ahiṃsakaṃ sakhyaṃ sāgnikam: Literally, "a noninjurious alliance or friendship together with Agni." As Cv, Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr note, the pact of nonaggression is an instrument for the prevention of mutually injurious actions (parasparahiṃsāpravṛttinivāraṇasādhanabhūtam—so Cg; Cv, Ck, Cm, Ct, and Cr similarly). As Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct further explain, the elliptical expression "including Agni (sāgnikam)" refers to the culturally normative practice of calling upon the fire god Agni to witness agreements, pacts, alliances, and so forth (sāgnikam agnisākṣipūrvakam—so Cg; Ck, Cm, and Ct similarly). Compare the similar condition governing the alliance between Rāma and Sugrīva at Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa 5.14–16.

"Arjuna" saḥ . . . arjunaḥ . . . saḥ: Literally, "he . . . Arjuna . . . he." Ñ1,V1,B2,D1,6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saḥ . . . arjunaḥ . . . tam, "he . . . Arjuna . . . that [son of Brahmā]." This alleviates the redundancy.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

19. "After having met with Pulastya as well" pulastyenāpi saṃgamya: D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pulastyenāpi saṃtyaktaḥ, "released by Pulastya as well." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the particle api, "as well," indicates that Rāvaṇa was also released from his bonds by Arjuna (apinārjunenāpi tyakto bandhanān muktaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

"given hospitality with an embrace" pariṣvañgakṛtātithyaḥ: Ñ2,B3,D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pariṣvaktaḥ kṛtātithyaḥ, "embraced [and] given hospitality." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that it is Arjuna who has offered hospitality to Rāvaṇa (arjuneneti śeṣaḥ).

"was dismissed" visarjitaḥ: B4,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vinirjitaḥ, "[was] defeated."

20. "the foremost of sages" munisattamaḥ: The word -sattamaḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. V1,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1,3,5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead munipuṅgavaḥ, "bull among sages."

"he proceeded" jagāma saḥ: Literally, "he went." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute the pleonastic particle ha for the pronoun saḥ, "he."

21. "And . . . was overpowered by Kārtavīrya" prāptaḥ kārtavīryāt tu dharṣaṇam: Literally, "And he obtained assault or ill-treatment from Kārtavīrya." Ś1,2,Ñ1,V1,D1–3,4,5,7–12,T4,M3,6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prāptaḥ kārtavīryāt pradharṣaṇam, "He attained assault or ill-treatment from Kārtavīrya."

"he obtained his freedom once again" punar mokṣam avāptavān: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead punar mukto mahābalaḥ, "the immensely powerful [Rāvaṇa] was once more freed."

22. "there are those who are mightier even than the mighty" balibhyo balinaḥ santi: Literally, "there are mightier [ones] [lit., 'mighty (ones)'] than mighty [ones]." Ck and Ct attribute this to the diversity of the Lord's creation (īśvarasṛṣṭer vicitratvād ity āśayaḥ—so Ct). Ck is similar except that he specifies that the term īśvara here refers explicitly to Brahmā (brahmasṛṣṭer ativicitratvād ity āśayaḥ). Cs sees Agastya's comment here as a response to Rāma's question at 7.31.2 as to whether, after conquering all the directions, Rāvaṇa did not find the world empty [of worthy opponents] (rāvaṇadigvijayakāle jagac chūnyaṃ kim ity asyottaram āha—evam iti). See 7.31.2 and notes.

"Therefore, he who desires his own well-being should not hold his enemy in contempt." nāvajñā parataḥ kāryā ya icchec chreya ātmanaḥ: Literally, "Contempt with respect to an enemy is not to be made [by him] who desires his own well-being." The syntax is deficient in that there is no clearly demarcated correlative subject of the independent clause. One must understand tena, "by him." Ñ2,V3,B,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hi pare, "indeed in regard to an enemy," for parataḥ, "with respect to an enemy."

23. "with thousand-armed Arjuna" sahasrabāhoḥ: Literally, "of the thousand-armed [one]."

"of the flesh-eating rākṣasas" piśitāśanānām: Literally, "of those whose food is flesh."

"he once more roamed the entire earth in his arrogance, slaughtering men" punar narāṇāṃ kadanaṃ cakāra cacāra sarvāṃ pṛthivīṃ ca darpāt: Literally, "again he made a slaughter of men and out of arrogance roamed the entire earth." B3,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nṛpāṇām, "of kings," for narāṇām. "

The meter is upendravajrā.

1. "the lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣasādhipaḥ: The final part of the compound, -ādhipaḥ, is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"no longer despondent" anirviṇṇas tathā kṛtaḥ: Literally, "thus rendered non-despondent." Ck and Ct explain that, as the cumulative result of his being released through the intercession of Pulastya, his forging of a friendship with Arjuna, and his having been honored and released by the latter, Rāvaṇa has been freed from the depression produced by his defeat (pulastyena vimocyārjunasakhyaṃ prāpayya tena pūjayitvā visarjitatvāt parābhavajanitanirvedarahitaḥ kṛta ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly). Cr, more simply, understands that Rāvaṇa is no longer dejected since he has been released by Arjuna and has lost his aversion for combat (arjunena vimukto 'ta evānirviṇṇo yuddhād vairāgyarahitaḥ kṛtaḥ). Cs remarks that the fact that Rāvaṇa was not despondent, even though he had been defeated by Arjuna, indicates that he has lost his sense of shame (tathā kṛto 'py arjunena parājito 'py anirviṇṇo lajjārahitaḥ). Cs is referring to the description of Rāvaṇa at 7.33.19, where he is said to be abashed or ashamed (lajjamānaḥ).

3. "he came . . . and challenged" gatvāhvayati: Literally, "having come, he challenges." The editors of the critical edition, along with GPP and Gita Press, read the two words without a break, indicating that they understand the finite form to be āhvayati. Nonetheless, the critical apparatus appears to indicate that these manuscripts (Ś,Ñ1,V1,B,D1–5,8,9,12,T4) read in the same way, thus suggesting that the editors of the critical edition meant to read instead gatvā hvayati, "having gone, he challenges," mirroring the usage in verse 2. NSP, KK, and VSP print, gatvā hvayati. Lahore and Gorresio read the imperfect, gatvāhvayata, which makes it impossible to determine whether they read āhvayata or ahvayata. The readings are essentially synonymous. It should also be noted that, given the way in which manuscripts are written, it is normally virtually impossible to make this kind of distinction.

"protected by Vālin . . . golden-garlanded Vālin" vālipālitām . . . vālinaṃ hemamālinam: Note the author's use of anuprāsa. See notes to 7.31.5,6. The name of the great monkey occurs as both Vālin and Vāli. In our translation we have standardized to Vālin.

4. "Then . . . to [Rāvaṇa]" tatas tam . . . / [rāvaṇam]: Literally, "Then . . . to him, [Rāvaṇa]." Ś1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tu, "and," for tam, "him."

"Lord Tāra, a minister of the monkey and the father of Tārā, addressed . . . Rāvaṇa" vānarāmātyas tāras tārāpitā prabhuḥ / uvāca rāvaṇam: The singular verb uvāca makes it clear that in this reading all of the names, epithets, and titles listed in the verse apply to a single monkey, Tāra. This reading presents numerous problems for those commentators who share it. Additionally, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vānaraḥ, "monkey," for rāvaṇam, "Rāvaṇa." Cv is the only one who understands that Tāra is the only monkey mentioned here. However, since, as he notes, in the epic the monkey Suṣeṇa is identified as the father of Tārā, the term "father," pitā, here must be understood to refer to the relationship of paternal uncle (pitṛvya). (tāras tārāpiteti. atra pitṛvyatvādisaṃbandhaviśeṣeṇa tārasya pitṛvyatvam avagantavyam. sarvatra suṣeṇasyaiva pitṛtvakathanāt.) Ck and Cg understand that there are three monkeys mentioned here: Tāra, who is the minister of the vānara king; Suṣeṇa, who is Tārā's father; and the lord, that is to say, the heir apparent, Sugrīva. They thus are forced to repeat the word uvāca, "he said," after each of these figures. (vānarāmātyo vālino 'mātyo mantrī tāra uvāca. tathā tārāpitā suṣeṇaś covāca. prabhur yuvarājaḥ sugrīvaś covāca—so Cg; Ck similarly.) Ś1,2,Ñ1,V1,3,D10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the plural vānarāmātyāḥ, "the ministers of the monkey." Ct, who sees the same three monkeys as do Ck and Cg, argues that Tāra is one [minister]; Tārā's father, Suṣeṇa, is the second; and Lord Sugrīva, the heir apparent, is the third. (vānarāmātyā vālimantriṇas tān āha. tāra ekaḥ. tārāpitā suṣeṇaḥ prabhur yuvarājaḥ sugrīvaś covāca.) Cr is the only one to see four individuals named in the verse. He understands the ministers in question to be the monkey named Tāra; Tārā's father, Suṣeṇa; Lord Aṅgada; and the monkey Sugrīva. Cr, as an alternative, understands that the term vānaraḥ is a qualifier that applies equally to both tāraḥ and tārāpitā. (vānarāmātyā vānarasyāmātyās tāras tadabhidho vānaras tārāpitā suṣeṇaḥ prabhur aṅgadaś ca vānaraḥ sugrīvaś covāca. tāratārāpitror eva sarvaviśeṣaṇaṃ vā.) The monkey Tāra is mentioned four times in the Uttarakāṇḍa: here and in verse 10 below; at 7.36.44 and 7.39.4–6; numerous times in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.13.4; 4.24.17–37; 4.32.9–13; 4.38.26; 4.44.5; 4.49.1,5–7; 4.52.31; 4.53.1,2–4), and twice in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.46.19; 6.54.29).

5. "who would be your equal in strength" yas te pratibalo bhavet: The sequence te prati- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all see the phrase as elliptical and supply the words "to give battle (yuddhaṃ dātum iti śeṣaḥ)."

"is gone" gataḥ: Cr adds "to the vicinity of the sea (samudrasamīpa iti śeṣaḥ)."

"there is none other among the leaping monkeys" nānyaḥ . . . plavaṅgamaḥ: Literally, "no other one who goes by leaps." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ko 'nyaḥ, "what other," for nānyaḥ, "no other." This, as Cr notes, amounts to the same thing: "'Who is capable? No one.' That is the meaning. (kaḥ śakto na ko 'pīty arthaḥ)."

6. "momentarily" imaṃ muhūrtam: Literally, "during this muhūrtam." B2,D6,7,10,11, T4,G1,M1,6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the neuter pronoun idam. The term muhūrta is generally used in the epics to indicate an unspecified, but brief, period of time. It also has the technical meaning of a specific period of forty-eight minutes, or one-thirtieth of a day. Ct seems to take it here in this latter sense, glossing, "within this muhūrta (idaṃ muhūrtam asmin muhūrte)."

"after he has performed his sandhyā ritual" sandhyām anvāsya: Literally, "having performed sandhyā." This is the ritual of prayer and worship offered by brahmans and other high-caste Hindus at the three junctures, or sandhyās, of the day—morning, noon, and evening. (See Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 312–21.) The term may also be derived from the root sam + √dhyai, "to meditate," which is the way it is interpreted by Ct. Ct glosses, "having performed sandhyā, that is to say, having meditated upon the divinity in the form of Brahmā, who is to be properly meditated upon (sandhyāṃ samyagdhyeyadevatāṃ brahmarūpam anvāsya dhyātvā)." See verses 11, 26, 28, and notes below. See, too, 5.12.48 and notes, where Sītā is said to perform sandhyā rituals.

"in all four oceans" caturbhyo 'pi samudrebhyaḥ: Literally, "from even four oceans." The ablative here is odd, and it is corrected by Ct and Cr to the more appropriate locative caturṣu samudreṣu. According to one popular cosmological model of the purāṇas, the central continent of Bhāratadvīpa is surrounded by four oceans, one in each of the four cardinal directions. Compare 6.116.46 and notes.

7. "They belonged to those who came seeking battle" yuddhārthinām ime: Literally, "they [were] of those seeking battle."

"were then slain by the blazing energy of the monkey lord" vānarādhipatejasā: Literally, "by the blazing energy of the lord of the monkeys." The line is elliptical and lacks an expected participle to be governed by the instrumental. We understand as do Cg and Ct, who add "of those dead through the blazing power of the lord of the monkeys (vānarādhipatejasā mṛtānām)." Cr notes that in this verse the ministers are informing Rāvaṇa that in fact he lacks the ability to fight with Vālin (vastutas tu vālinā yuddhayogyatā tava nāstīti bodhayann āha).

8. "nonetheless" tathā: Literally, "in such a way." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"that would be the end of your life" tadantaṃ tava jīvitam: Literally, "your life would have that for its end." This is yet another awkward construction. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the pronoun tat, "that," to refer to the proximity of Vālin (tadantaṃ tatsamīpaprāptiparyantam ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly). Cr takes it to refer to combat with Vālin (tadvāliyuddham evānto 'vasānaṃ yasya tad eva).

Following verse 8, Ñ,V3,B,D6,7,10,11,S, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [689*]: "Take a look at this wonderful world around you,[1] son of Viśravas. If you wait a moment,[2] you shall see it no more.[3] (paśyedānīṃ jagac citram iha viśravasaḥ suta / imaṃ muhūrtaṃ tiṣṭhasva durlabhaṃ te bhaviṣyati //)"

[1] "around you" iha: Literally, "here." Ñ2,B3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the masculine accusative pronoun imam, "this," Ct takes it to refer to Vālin.

[2] "a moment" imaṃ muhūrtam: Ñ,V3,D10,11,T4,M4–7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the neuter pronoun idam for the masculine imam. See notes to verse 6 above.

[3] "you shall see it no more" durlabhaṃ te bhaviṣyati: Literally, "it will be impossible to obtain for you." Our reading follows that of Cr, who glosses, "Look right now at this wonderful world. Afterwards it will be unobtainable because of the fact that you will have died. (idānīm eva citraṃ jagat paśyānantaraṃ durlabhaṃ bhaviṣyati mariṣyamāṇatvād ity arthaḥ.)" Ck, Cg, and Ct, however, believe that what will be unobtainable for Rāvaṇa will be not the world but his life (durlabhaṃ jīvitam iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

9. "who is like the sun come to earth" bhūmiṣṭham iva bhāskaram: Literally, "who is like the maker of light standing on earth." V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read pāvakam, "the purifier (i.e., fire)," for bhāskaram, "maker of light," making the figure weaker.

10. "reviling Tāra" tāraṃ vinirbhartsya: Literally, "having reviled Tāra." The commentators who read the plural amātyāḥ in verse 4 above attempt to make the present verse consistent with it. Thus Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "Tāra and the others (tārādīn)." Cg offers an alternative, according to which only Tāra spoke [on behalf of the other ministers in verses 5–9 above] because of his special familial relationship to Vālin (yadvā pūrvaṃ tāra evoktavān tasya tārapitṛtvaṃ saṃbandhaviśeṣāt). Compare verse 4 and notes above.

"lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣaseśvaraḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead lokarāvaṇaḥ, "[Rāvaṇa] who made the worlds resound." For a discussion of this term, see notes to 7.16.27.

11–12. "he spied" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen."

"Vālin . . . him" vālinam . . . vālinam: Literally, "Vālin . . . Vālin."

"with a face like the rising sun" taruṇārkanibhānanam: Literally, "whose face resembled the young sun." A red face is characteristic of rhesus macaque (Macaca mulatta). See, too, 6.18.35, where some of the monkeys in Sugrīva's army are described as having red faces (tāmrāsya). For a discussion of monkeys in the Rāmāyaṇa, see note to 1.16.10 and R. Goldman 1989.

"was absorbed in the performance of his sandhyā rites" sandhyopāsanatatparam: Literally, "given over to sandhyā-worship." As before, Ct glosses, "given over to meditation on Brahmā, who is to be properly meditated on (samyagdhyeyabrahmadhyānatatparam)." Cs understands that Vālin is absorbed in the worship of the deity of the sandhyā (sandhyādevatopāsananiratam)." See verse 6 above, verses 26 and 28 below, and notes.

13. "But Rāvaṇa . . . by Vālin, who by chance had opened his eyes" yadṛcchayonmīlayatā vālināpi sa rāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "He, Rāvaṇa, [was seen] nevertheless by Vālin, who by chance was opening his eyes." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yadṛcchayā tadā dṛṣṭo vālināpi sa rāvaṇaḥ, "He, Rāvaṇa, was nevertheless seen then by Vālin, by chance."

"whose intention was evil, was spotted . . . Still, Vālin was not perturbed." pāpābhiprāyavān dṛṣṭaś cakāra na ca saṃbhramam: Literally, "he, having an evil intention, was seen, and he did not make agitation." KK and VSP read pāpābhiprāyavān dṛṣṭvā for dṛṣṭaḥ, lending the phrase the sense "that one of evil intention having been seen." The reading of the critical edition is ambiguous, since, given the passive construction, which places Rāvaṇa in the nominative, it would appear that it is he who, although spotted, remains calm. But this clearly goes against the force of the context, as is seen in the following verse, where we learn that Vālin is utterly unconcerned by Rāvaṇa's approach. According to Ck and Cg, Rāvaṇa's evil intention is that of capturing [Vālin] (bandhanābhiprāyavān). V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead pāpābhiprāyakaṃ dṛṣṭvā cakāra na tu saṃbhramam, "having seen him, whose intention was evil, he was not perturbed." This variant disambiguates the second half of the verse, making it clear that it is Vālin who is unperturbed. Ñ2 and KK and VSP read the synonymous tu for ca, "and."

14. "Just as a lion might a hare or Garuḍa, a serpent, Vālin, spying evil-intentioned Rāvaṇa, did not take him seriously, thinking" śaśam ālakṣya siṃho vā pannagaṃ garuḍo yathā / na cintayati taṃ vālī rāvaṇaṃ pāpaniścayam: Literally, "just as a lion having seen a hare or Garuḍa, a serpent, Vālin [having seen] does not think about Rāvaṇa, whose intention was evil." Cr glosses, "did not value or care about (agaṇayat)."

15. "This evil-minded Rāvaṇa wishes to capture me. But today, hanging him from my armpit, I shall travel to the mighty oceans." jighṛkṣamāṇam adyainaṃ rāvaṇaṃ pāpabuddhinam / kakṣāvalambinaṃ kṛtvā gamiṣyāmi mahārṇavān //: Literally, "This very day, I shall go to the great oceans, having made this evil-minded Rāvaṇa, who wishes to capture, one who is hanging from [my] armpit."

"evil-minded" pāpabuddhinam: The form seems to be highly irregular, although the meaning is clear. One would expect pāpabuddhim. No available commentator shares the reading, and there is no comment about it in the critical apparatus. Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,4,6–11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous, but grammatically correct, pāpacetasam.

"But today . . . him" adyainam: Literally, "today, him." V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āyāntam, "[him] who is approaching."

"I shall travel to the mighty oceans" gamiṣyāmi mahārṇavān: Literally, "I shall go to the great oceans." The sequence -ṣyāmi is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,B,D,T3,4,M1,3,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gamiṣye trīn mahārṇavān, "I shall go to the three great oceans." Since Vālin is currently at the southern ocean, the reference is to the remaining three. See note to verse 6 above.

16. "Everyone will see" drakṣyanti: Literally, "they will see." No subject is specified. Ck, Cg, and Ct supply "the gods, etc. (devādaya iti śesaḥ)." Cr supplies "the people or the worlds (lokā iti śeṣaḥ)."

"his thighs, hands, and garments dangling" sraṃsitorukarāmbaram: D10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous sraṃsadūrukarāmbaram.

17. "pricking up his ears" karṇam upāśritaḥ: Literally, "relying on [his] ears." We follow Cv and Cg, who gloss, "being one whose mind was reliant on his ear in order to listen for the sound of footsteps (pādaśabdaśravaṇārthaṃ karṇam upāśritamanāḥ—so Cg; Cv similarly)." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead maunam āśritaḥ, "remaining silent."

"intoning vedic mantras" japan vai naigamān mantrān: Literally, "muttering indeed mantras from the nigama." Ck understands that since Vālin, Hanumān, etc., are the sons of gods, they have had the vedas and śāstras spontaneously revealed to them (vālihanumadādīnāṃ devakumāratvāt svayaṃ pratibhātavedaśāstrāḥ). Cg similarly notes that Vālin would have possessed the mantras because of his being a child of a god (devakumāratvān mantravattvam). Ct notes that Vālin and the rest would have had the entire veda spontaneously revealed to them (vālyādayo hi svayaṃ pratibhātasakalavedāḥ). Ct, no doubt keeping in mind the need for silence, glosses, "meditating on their [i.e., the mantras'] meaning (tadarthaṃ dhyāyan)." On the term naigama, see notes to 7.55.5.

18. "The two kings—the one of the tawny monkeys, the other of the rākṣasas" harirākṣasapārthivau: Literally, "the two kings of the tawny ones and the rākṣasas."

"strove mightily toward that end" prayatnavantau tat karma īhatuḥ: Literally, "endowed with effort, the two aimed at that feat." As Ck and Ct note, that feat or action is the action of seizing (grahaṇakarma—so Ct) or binding (tat karma bandhanakarmeti—so Ck).

19. "Even though his back was turned" parāṅmukho 'pi: Literally, "even though his face was averted." The translators consulted are divided as to whether Vālin actually seizes Rāvaṇa from behind or merely judges his approach without looking.

"judging . . . that Rāvaṇa was within arm's reach" hastagrāhyaṃ tu taṃ matvā . . . rāvaṇam: Literally, "but having thought that Rāvaṇa could be captured by hands."

V1,3,D1,4,5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hastagrāham, "grasping by hand," for hastagrāhyam, "to be captured by hand." This lends the line the sense "having thought that Rāvaṇa was one who was a grasper or seizer by hands." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "[Rāvaṇa was one] intending to grasp with his hands (hastair grahaṇābhiprāyavantam)."

"egg-born Garuḍa" aṇḍajaḥ: Literally, "the egg-born one." Ct and Cr supply the referent (aṇḍajo garuḍaḥ).

21. "crushing him tightly" sa taṃ pīḍayamānaḥ: Literally, "he squeezing or injuring him." D6,7,10,11,M1,6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead taṃ ca pīḍayamānam, "and him squeezing or injuring." In this reading, Rāvaṇa becomes the subject of the verbal root √pīḍ, "to crush, squeeze, injure, or harm." In the critical reading, Vālin is crushing Rāvaṇa tightly under his arm, while in vulgate variant, Rāvaṇa is fighting and inflicting injury on Vālin. KK and VSP read instead the closely synonymous taṃ cāpīḍayamānam. Apparently due to a typographical error (not noted in the errata to the critical edition), the critical apparatus records this reading as the passive taṃ cāpīḍyamānam, "him being crushed," in which case once again it would be Rāvaṇa who is being crushed. An examination of KK 1905 and 1913 and the closely aligned VSP, however, does not support this reading.

22. "as ten-faced Rāvaṇa was being carried off" hriyamāṇe daśānane: Ś1,2,Ñ,V1,3,B, D1,2,4,5,9,12,T4,M3,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hriyamāṇaṃ daśānanam. This makes the phrase the object of the desiderative verbal adjective mumokṣayiṣavaḥ in pāda c, yielding the sense "who were eager to free Rāvaṇa, who was being carried off."

"fearsome" ghorāḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,D,T4,M6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vālim, "Vāli," (v.l. vālinam, "Vālin"), which then becomes the object of the variant reading abhidrutāḥ, "[they] ran after."

"ran after" abhidruvan: D5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the participle abhidrutāḥ, "[they] ran after."

23. "the many-rayed sun" aṃśuvān: Literally, "the one possessing rays."

"high in the sky" ambarasthaḥ: Literally, "situated in the sky."

24. "by the speed generated by his arms and haunches" bāhūruvegena: Literally, "by the speed or force of his arms and thighs." See 5.1.42,44, where a similar phrase is used of Hanumān during his flight to Laṅkā.

"they collapsed" patanti ca: Literally, "and they fall." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T,G2,3,M1,6,8,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vyavasthitāḥ, "[they] stopped." Given the near unanimity of the manuscript tradition for this variant, it is not clear why the editors of the critical edition chose the reading patanti ca. At the very least, it should have been marked as uncertain.

25. "as Vālin was proceeding . . . his way" vālimārgāt . . . gacchataḥ: Literally, "of him who was going . . . out of Vālin's path."

Following verse 25, Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [693*]: "What to say of a creature of flesh and blood, wishing to save its life?[1] (kiṃ punar jīvitaprepsur bibhrad vai māṃsaśoṇitam /)"

[1] "a creature of flesh and blood, wishing to save its life" jīvitaprepsur bibhrad vai māṃsaśoṇitam: Literally, "indeed [someone] bearing flesh and blood [and] eager for life." B1,D10,11, and Gita Press, NSP, and GPP read the synonymous jīvanaprepsuḥ for jīvitaprepsuḥ, "wishing to save a life."

26. "whose flight was impossible even for flocks of birds" apakṣigaṇasaṃpātaḥ: Literally, "whose flight was not that of flocks of birds." Ñ1,V1,D1,4–7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative masculine plural apakṣigaṇasaṃpātān, which would then modify sāgarān, "oceans," in pāda c. Ct understands the compound to mean that flocks of birds would not be able to reach the oceans in the same time that Vālin could (apakṣigaṇasaṃpātān yāvatā kālena vālī gacchati tāvatā kālena pakṣigaṇair apy aprāpyān sāgarān). Other commentators simply state that the birds could not reach the ocean (pakṣigaṇair apy aśakyasaṃpātān sāgarān—so Cg; Ck and Cr similarly).

"performed his worship at the time of sandhyā" sandhyākālam avandata: Literally, "he worshiped the time of sandhyā." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all agree that here the morning sandhyā period is indicated, during which one is to worship the sandhyā deity, who is, for Ck and Ct, Brahmā (prātaḥsandhyākāladevatārūpaṃ brahmāṇam avandata—so Ck; Cg, Cm, and Ct similarly). Ct, as before, more specifically understands that this sandhyā worship consists of meditation on Brahmā (prātaḥsandhyākāladhyeyadevatārūpaṃ brahmā[sic for brahmānam a]vandata dhyātavān). See verses 6 and 11–12 above, verse 28 below, and notes. Ck and Cm add that it is really Indra who performs this complex ritual through the agency of his son [Vālin] for the purpose of bringing about the complete extermination of Rāvaṇa (etādṛśaṃ paraṃ vrataṃ mahendraḥ putradvārā rāvaṇasya samūlonmūlanārtham anutiṣṭhati).

27. "Moving through the sky, the tawny monkey . . . honored by the creatures that move through the sky" sabhājyamāno bhūtais tu khecaraiḥ khecaro hariḥ: Literally, "And being honored by beings that move in the sky, the tawny one, who moved in the sky." KK and VSP read khecarottamaḥ, "that foremost of those who move through the sky," for khecaro hariḥ, "the tawny monkey, who moved through the sky." D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saṃpūjyamāno yātas tu khacaraiḥ khacarottamaḥ, "being honored by those who move through the sky, that foremost of those who move through the sky went."

"came" ājagāma: KK and VSP read hy ājagāma to avoid the hiatus. This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"still clutching Rāvaṇa" sarāvaṇaḥ: Literally, "together with Rāvaṇa."

28. "there" tatra: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmin, "in that [place]." We follow Cr, who understands, "at the western ocean (tasmin paścimasāgare)."

"having bathed and intoned the mantras" snātvā japtvā ca: Literally, "having bathed and having intoned or recited." The fact that Vālin is represented as performing the unitary sandhyā rite, which the commentators agree is the morning rite, at four different locations sparks a commentarial debate about the nature of the ritual and the propriety of performing it in separate sections and locations. Ck, Cg, and Cm understand that Vālin performs successive discrete elements of the sandhyāvandana at each of the four oceans, respectively. Thus, they argue that he performs the bathing of his body, prior to the sandhyā, at the southern ocean; the ritual sandhyā bath accompanied by vedic mantras at the western ocean; the ritual sprinkling at the northern ocean; and the gift of arghya at the eastern ocean. (dakṣiṇe sandhyāṅgaśaucam. paścime mantrapūrvakasandhyāṅgasnānam. uttare prokṣaṇādikam. pūrve 'rghyapradānādikam iti—so Cg.) Otherwise, Cg argues, since there are not four different sandhyās, we would have merely a pretext of the performance of the rite (anyathā sandhyācatuṣṭhayābhāvāt tadaṅgasyāpi tattvena vyapadeśāt). Ck further argues that it is only in a manner of speaking that Vālin can be said to have actually performed the sandhyā ritual at the four separate locations, since, according śāstra, the rite can only be performed facing the sunrise or sunset, thus eliminating the possibility of performing it in the north or the south. (sarvasamudreṣu sandhyām upāsitveti vandanam asty asmaduktarītyā sandhyāvandanaśeṣāṅgānuṣṭhānatvāt sandhyāvandanaṃ kṛtvety ucyata iti draṣṭavyam. no hy uttaradakṣiṇayoḥ kadācid api sandhyāprāsaktir asti sandhyā hi nāmodyato 'staṃ yato vā maṇḍalasya raśmimātropetaḥ kālaḥ.) Ct represents at some length the position of Ck and Cm. But he claims that their analysis contradicts the statement at verse 17 above, where it is first said that Vālin utters his vedic mantras on the shores of the southern ocean. In other words, it is not true that he merely performs his initial ablutions there, as represented in the position of Ck, Cg, and Cm. Ct argues that the principal element of the sandhyā ritual is the meditation on Brahmā for the sake of the recitation of the Gāyatrīmantra at the sandhyākāla, or the twilight hour, and that alone is the central ritual act that governs all others. This, Ct claims, is perfectly clear to those who know the śrutis and the smṛtis. (yat tu tasya dakṣiṇasamudre śaucaṃ paścime snānam uttara āpohiṣṭhādimantrair mārjanaṃ pūrvasamudre 'rghyādīty evaṃ sandhyāvandanaśeṣānuṣṭhānatvāc caturṣu samudreṣu sandhyām anvāsyety uktir iti katakatīrthādayas taj japan vai naigamān mantrān iti dakṣiṇasamudrasnānakāloktyā virudhyate. maduktarītyā sāmañjasyāc ca. sandhyākāle gāyatryarthaṃ brahmaṇo dhyānam eva pradhānaṃ sa eva sandhyāpadārtha iti spaṣṭaṃ śrutismṛtividām.) See, too, verses 6, 11, 26, and notes above.

Following verse 28, Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11,S, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [694*]: "And in this way the great tawny monkey, still clutching his enemy,[1] sped onward[2] like the wind or thought along that path[3] of many-thousand leagues (bahuyojanasāhasraṃ tad adhvānaṃ mahāhariḥ / vāyuvac ca manovac ca jagāma saha śatruṇā //)."

[3] "along that path" tad adhvānam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vahamānaḥ, "bearing." Oddly, the verse provides no direct object for the participle.

29. "to the great eastern receptacle of waters" pūrvam ambumahānidhim: Literally, "the eastern great receptacle of the waters." D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pūrvaṃ vai sa mahodadhim, "indeed he . . . [went] to the eastern great water-receptacle."

30. "Vāsavi" vāsaviḥ: Literally, "the son of Vāsava." This is possibly the only occurrence of this patronymic epithet of Vālin in the entire literature. The epithet, however, is not uncommonly used in the Mahābhārata to refer to Arjuna.

"headed back to Kiṣkindhā" kiṣkindhābhimukhaḥ . . . punar āgamat: Literally, "he came once more facing Kiṣkindhā." D6,7,10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kiṣkindhām abhitaḥ . . . punar āgamat, "he came once more toward Kiṣkindhā."

32. Rāvaṇa . . . at him" rāvaṇam . . . rāvaṇaṃ prati: Literally, "Rāvaṇa . . . to or toward Rāvaṇa." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read muhuḥ, "again or repeatedly," for prati, "to or toward."

"and" ca: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"laughing" prahasan: Ck, Cg, and Ct explain that Vālin is laughing in his delight at the thought that the evil wretch who wanted to capture him was instead captured himself (māṃ jighṛkṣur durātmā svayam eva grahaṇaṃ prāpta iti toṣāt prahāsaḥ—so Ct).

33. "the lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣaseśaḥ: D6,7,10,11,G1,M5,6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous rākṣasendraḥ, "the lord of rākṣasas."

"the lord of the tawny monkeys" harīśam: Ñ2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous harīndram, "the lord of the tawny [ones]."

34. "you have overpowered me" sa ca . . . āsāditas tvayā: The commentators disagree as to the sense of the participle āsādita, "attacked, overcome, set down." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand, "deposited in [your] armpit (kakṣanikṣepaṃ prāpitaḥ)." Cr glosses, "crushed or pained (pīḍitaḥ)."

35. "Oh, what composure you have!" aho gambhīratā ca te: Literally, "and Oh, the profundity or composure of you!" D6,7,10,11,T4,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aho gāmbhīryam eva ca, "and Oh, indeed, the profundity or composure!"

"as if I were some dumb beast" paśuvat: Literally, "like an animal or sacrificial victim."

36. "O . . . monkey " ca vānara: Literally, "and, O monkey." M3 and KK and VSP read instead mahārṇavān, which then construes with kramiṣyati, lending the line the sense "he will stride around the great oceans."

"hero" vīraḥ: Ñ1,B1–3,D10,11,T3,M2,4,9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative, vīra, "O hero," which is redundant in GPP, NSP, and Gita Press.

"carrying me" māṃ caivodvahamānaḥ: Literally, "and carrying me as well." Ck, Cg, and Ct observe that Rāvaṇa is alluding to his great weight, which is equal to that of a mountain (māṃ caiva mahādrisamānabhāram ity arthaḥ—Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

"could stride" kramiṣyati: Literally, "he will stride or pace." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bhaviṣyati, "he will be," yielding the sense "who else could there be?"

Following verse 36, KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.34.39) inserts a passage of two lines [698*]: "Whatever gods, dānavas, daityas, rākṣasas, and great serpents there are in the world, you are greater in might than all of them (ye surā dānavā loke daityarākṣasapannagāḥ / sarveṣāṃ eva teṣāṃ tvaṃ balād abhyadhiko hy asi //)."

37. "Indeed, other than you . . . Of this, there is no doubt." tava vā nātra saṃśayaḥ: Literally, "indeed, of you, here or in this, there is not doubt." V3,D6,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tava cātra na saṃśayaḥ "and of you here or in this there is no doubt."

"only three things possess such speed" trayāṇām eva bhūtānāṃ gatir eṣā: Literally, "of three beings alone is this gait."

38. "alliance . . . one concluded in the presence of Agni, the purifier" sakhyam . . . pāvakāgrataḥ: Literally, "a friendship or alliance in front of Pāvaka." On the fire god Agni as the witness of alliances, see 7.33.18 and notes.

39. "we shall share all these together" sarvam evāvibhaktaṃ nau bhaviṣyati: Literally, "indeed, all will be undivided by us two." See 202*, following notes to 7.11.26; 7.34.11; and notes.

40. "became as brothers" bhrātṛtvam upasaṃpannau: Literally, "those two obtained brotherhood." This bond of friendship between Rāvaṇa and Vālin will serve as one of the reasons for Rāma's siding with Sugrīva in the fraternal conflict between the two monkeys, as described at length in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa, and may have been introduced here as an additional rationalization for Rāma's killing of Vālin. See notes to 4.18.39 and Lefeber 1994, pp. 45–50.

41. "hand in hand" anyonyaṃ lambitakarau: Literally, "having hands that were clinging to one another."

42. "as if he were Sugrīva" sugrīva iva: Literally, "like Sugrīva." As Ck and Cg point out, this means that Rāvaṇa was held in the affectionate regard that one would have for one's own brother (bhrātṛbhāvenety arthaḥ). One must keep in mind that the events described here take place long before the feud between Vālin and Sugrīva described at Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa sargas 9–10.

"until he was taken away by his ministers, who had come" amātyair āgatair nītaḥ: Literally, "[he was] led [away] by the ministers who had arrived." Our understanding is that Rāvaṇa's ministers, whom we last encountered when they collapsed near the shore of the southern ocean (see verses 22–24 above), are the kartṛ of the participle nītaḥ, "[he was] taken away [by them]." They have evidently arrived in Kiṣkindhā during the course of the month of Rāvaṇa's residence there. For some reason, Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the instrumental to be one of accompaniment, suggesting that we add the indeclinable saha, "together with," but this reading leaves the participle without a kartṛ. Among the translators consulted, only Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 519) follows this reading, rendering, "il avait été amené avec ses ministres." Benoît (1999, p. 1312) somewhat oddly translates, "Rāvaṇa, toujours désireux d'ébranler le Triple Monde, passa un mois à Kiṣkindhā avec ses ministres."

43. "was treated by him as his brother" kṛtaś cāpi bhrātā: Literally, "and was made a brother." Cg and Ct note that Rāvaṇa was treated with the affection appropriate to one's actual brother (bhrātā kṛtaḥ sodarabhāvatayā snehīkrtaḥ—so Cg; Ct similarly). As noted in the critical apparatus, GPP reads vṛtaḥ, "chosen," for kṛtaḥ, "made." This would lend the phrase the sense "was chosen as a brother." And indeed this is the translation of Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2031), which shares this reading. No other printed edition or manuscript collated for the critical edition shares this reading, nor is it cited by any of the commentators.

44. "you burned him as well, as might a fire, a moth" so 'pi tvayā vinirdagdhaḥ śalabho vahninā yathā: Literally, "even he was burned up by you, just like a moth, by a fire."

1. "Then . . . once more" tataḥ: Literally, "then or after that." Ś,D2,6,7,9–11,T,G,M2,3,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then or at that time."

"questioned . . . he . . . uttered these . . . words" aprcchata . . . / . . . idam āha vacaḥ: Literally, "he questioned . . . he uttered this speech." Several of the commentators are uncomfortable with the awkward redundancy of this sequence of verbs. Cv, Cg, Cm, and Ct understand the second expression to be a further exposition or specification of the former (aprcchatety asya vivaraṇam idam āheti—so Cv, Cm, and Ct; Cg similarly). Cr takes the first verb to be indicative of Rāma's desire to question Agastya, which is then actuated by the second verb (agastyaṃ rāmo 'prcchat praṣṭum aicchatāta evedaṃ vaca āha). Cs, in one of his demonstrations of his quirky mastery of the Sanskrit lexicon and the art of resegmentation of strings of syllables, offers an unusual reading of this clichéd expression. He breaks it up as follows: idama āhavacaḥ. He takes -caḥ as an upapada of the verbal root √cāy, in its sense of "to honor." Thus he reads the term āhavacaḥ in the sense of "honored in battle," which then becomes a modifier of Rāma in pāda a. Next he takes the sequence idama as a vocative consisting of the word "iḥ," a name for the god of love, Kāma, who is a descendant of A, that is, Brahmā, and dama, "subduer," from the root √dam, "to subdue." This then becomes a vocative, idama, "O you who have conquered desire," referring to the sage Agastya, who has conquered desire. (āhave cāyyate pūjyata ity āhavaco rāmaḥ. āhavaśabdopapadāt pūjārthāc cāyateḥ. anyebhyo 'pi dṛśyata iti karmaṇi ḍapratyaye rūpam. he idama asyāpatyam ihiḥ kāmaḥ. damayatīti damaḥ. eḥ damaḥ idamaḥ. tasya saṃbuddhiḥ.)

"who dwelt in the southern region" dakṣiṇāśālayam: Literally, "whose abode was the southern region." The reference is, of course, to the sage Agastya, who, according to legend, was the first to bring brahmanical civilization to the south. Ś,Ñ1,D6,710,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar dakṣiṇāśāśrayam, "whose recourse or dwelling was the southern region." See 7.1.3 and notes.

"appropriate" arthavat: Literally, "suitable to the object." We understand the term here to be an adjective modifying vacaḥ, "speech." It can also mean "meaningful." Our understanding is that, as Rāma has now heard about the immense might of Vālin and Rāvaṇa, he is naturally curious about how it compares with that of Hanumān. The term can also be read adverbially in the sense of "meaningfully or purposefully." This is the reading proposed by Cs, who, as noted above, does not understand the verse to contain the noun vacaḥ, "speech." He would thus construe arthavat adverbially with the finite verb apṛcchata, lending the phrase the sense "he questioned meaningfully or purposefully (arthavad iti kriyāviśeṣaṇam). "

2. "The might of those two" balam etābhyām: The word etābhyām, which according to Ck, Cg, and Ct is a dative form (caturthī), is used irregularly here for the genitive. See below. D6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead balam etad vai, "this strength indeed."

"but . . . they were not equal in their heroic deeds to Hanumān" na tv etau hanumadvīryaiḥ samau: Literally, "but these two were not equal to the heroic deeds of Hanumān." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na tv etābhyāṃ hanumatā samam, "but [the might] of these two was not equal with Hanumān." Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr note the irregular use of the dative etābhyām for the genitive etayoḥ, and Ck and Cg cite Pā 2.3.62 to this effect (caturthyarthe bahulaṃ chandasi). Cg comments similarly.

3. "Heroism, skill, strength, steadfastness, wisdom, mastery of policy, valor, and power" śauryaṃ dākṣyaṃ balaṃ dhairyaṃ prājñatā nayasādhanam / vikramaś ca prabhāvaś ca: As in many passages in the Rāmāyaṇa, the list of attributes here contains words that overlap to some degree in their semantic range. Ct is particularly concerned with trying to differentiate these terms. His glosses are as follows: "dākṣya (skill) is acting quickly; balam (strength) refers to physical strength; dhairyam (steadfastness) is the capacity not to be shaken by anything; prājñatā (wisdom) is swift decisiveness as to what should be done and what should not be done; nayasādhanam (mastery of policy) is the ability to effect what needs to be done according to the science of statecraft. (dākṣyaṃ kṣiprakāritvaṃ balaṃ śārīram. dhairyaṃ kenāpy aprakampyatā. prājñatā śīghraṃ kāryākāryanirṇetṛtā nayasādhanaṃ rājanītikṛtyasaṃpādanam.)" Ck and Cg provide similar, but far less inclusive, explanations. Compare 3181*, lines 5–8, following notes to 6.101.22, where a similar description of Hanumān's qualities is given.

"all reside in Hanumān" hanūmati kṛtālayāḥ: Literally, "they have made their abode in Hanumān."

4. "Back then, when he saw the ocean and the monkey army in despair, he reassured the monkeys once again" dṛṣṭvodadhiṃ viṣīdantīṃ tadaiṣa kapivāhinīm / samāśvāsya kapīn bhūyaḥ: The syntax of the critical text seems to be rather defective. Unless one reads, as we have done, the ocean and the monkey army as two separate objects of Hanumān's gaze, the first half of the verse becomes impossible to construe as it stands. Other versions of the verse address the problem in different ways. The majority of northern manuscripts, as well as GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, read two gerunds, both with the sense of "having seen," yielding the meaning that when Hanumān saw the monkey army, which, having seen the ocean, was despairing, he consoled them. Thus D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dṛṣṭvaiva sāgaraṃ vīkṣya sīdantīṃ kapivāhinīm / samāśvāsya mahābāhuḥ, "having seen the monkey army despairing at the sight of the sea, the great-armed one, having consoled them . . ." Ś,Ñ,V1,3, D1–5,8,9,12,T4, and Lahore read sāgaraṃ prekṣya sīdantīṃ dṛṣṭvaiva kapivāhinīm / samāśvāsya mahābāhuḥ, which is similar but transposes pādas a and b. B1,3,4, and Gorresio omit a second object of the gerund samāśvāsya (kapīn) and read sāgaraṃ vīkṣya sīdantīṃ puraiṣa kapivāhinīm / samāśvāsya mahābāhuḥ, "the great-armed one, having long ago reassured the monkey army, which was despairing upon seeing the ocean." A number of southern manuscripts (T3,M2,4,8,9) read tathaiva, "as well," for tadaiṣa, "then he," which yields a reading similar to our interpretation. See 4.63.9–23 and 5.1.35–39.

5. "After assaulting the citadel of Laṅkā and exploring Rāvaṇa's inner apartments, he spoke with Sītā and gained her confidence." dharṣayitvā purīṃ laṅkāṃ rāvaṇāntaḥpuraṃ tathā / dṛṣṭvā saṃbhāṣitā cāpi sītā viśvāsitā tathā: The verse is extremely badly constructed grammatically, and its interpretation requires one to switch the implicit kartṛ (agent) from the prathamā (nominative) to the tṛtīyā (instrumental) to account for the shift from the kartari to the karmaṇi constructions. We read the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," as governing the dvitiyā (accusative) antaḥpuram, "inner apartments," in pāda b through enjambment. A literal translation would be: "Having assaulted the city Laṅkā, and having seen the inner apartments of Rāvaṇa, [by Hanumān] Sītā was conversed with and inspired with confidence." Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read dṛṣṭā, "[was] seen," which would then have to modify sītā, leaving antaḥpuram to be governed by dharṣayitvā in pāda a. This latter reading is not consonant with the narrative as it unfolds in the Sundarakāṇḍa, where Hanumān penetrates and spies upon Rāvaṇa's inner apartments but does not launch an attack on the inner apartments, unless one takes as such the reference to Hanumān's ravaging of the trees in the aśokavana at 5.12.12–19. The critical apparatus makes no mention of the reading dṛṣṭā but mentions dṛṣṭvā as a variant, leaving open the possibility that the critical reading might be a typographical error for dṛṣṭā. All translators consulted, whether they read dṛṣṭvā or dṛṣṭā, understand that the reference is to Hanumān's finding Sītā. D6,7,10–12,T1,4,G1,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then," for the first tathā, "as well." Ñ3,B3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read, hy āśvāsitā, "was reassured," for viśvāsitā, "inspired with confidence." See App. I, No. 1, following notes to 5.3.19, in which Hanumān confronts and assaults the female guardian divinity of Laṅkā. At Sundarakāṇḍa sargas 8–9, Hanumān searches the antaḥpuram of Rāvaṇa. Hanumān converses with Sītā and gains her confidence at Sundarakāṇḍa sargas 29–38.

6. "there . . . single-handedly" tatra ekena: Note the hiatus. KK and VSP read the virtually synonymous tatra hy ekena to avoid hiatus. The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"the generals of the army" senāgragāḥ: Hanumān kills Rāvaṇa's generals at Sundarakāṇḍa sarga 44.

"the sons of the counselors" mantrisutāḥ: Hanumān kills the minister's sons at Sundarakāṇḍa sarga 43.

"and Rāvaṇa's own son" rāvaṇātmajaḥ: The reference is to prince Akṣa. Hanumān kills him at Sundarakāṇḍa sarga 45.

7. The episode of Hanumān's capture by Indrajit, his exhortation of Rāvaṇa, his escape from his bonds, and his burning of Laṅkā are narrated at Sundarakāṇḍa sargas 46–52.

"from his bonds" bandhāt: Literally, "from bondage." Ct and Cr point out that the reference is to Hanumān's escape from the bondage of Indrajit's brahmāstra (brahmāstrabandhāt—so Ct).

"conversed with ten-faced Rāvaṇa" saṃbhāṣitvā daśānanam: Literally, "having spoken to the ten-faced [one]." D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the causative bhāṣayitvā, "having caused to speak," for saṃbhāṣitvā, "having spoken."

"as . . . fire might the earth" pāvakeneva medinīm: Literally, "like the earth, by fire." The simile is a particularly weak one. The commentators are silent, and only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 486) seeks to strengthen it by adding the phrase "(at the Dissolution)."

8. "Those . . . are unheard of on the part of Kāla, Śakra, Viṣṇu, or Kubera, the guardian of wealth" na kālasya na śakrasya na viṣṇor vittapasya ca / karmāṇi tāni śruyante: Literally, "those feats are heard not of Kāla, not of Śakra, not of Viṣṇu, and [not] of the guardian of wealth." Cs is evidently disturbed by the inclusion of Viṣṇu in a list of deities whose feats are deemed inferior to those of Hanumān. He argues that the name Viṣṇu should be excluded from the list of the lesser divinities and construed with the added words "by the grace of" to indicate how Hanumān's deeds surpassed the deeds of the other three divinities, i.e., "through the grace of Viṣṇu." He further argues on a syntactic level that the negative particle "na" that precedes the word viṣṇoḥ should be carried over, as it were, to apply instead to vittapasya, "of the guardian of wealth," that is, of Kubera, the guardian of wealth. He claims that if we accept this reading, we see that the single instance of the negative particle would have served the purpose, the other two being in excess. He bases his argument on a quote from the Ṛgveda (7.99.2ab) to the effect that "no other creature born or being born could ever attain Viṣṇu's godly greatness," which constitutes a pramāṇabādha, or an exclusion based on superior [textual] proof. (hanūmato yāni karmāṇi śrūyante tāni na kālasya na śakrasya na vittapasyāpi śrūyante. kathaṃ viṣṇor anugrahād iti śeṣaḥ. naño yathāśrutaviṣṇupadenaivānvaye vittapasyety atra naño 'nuvṛttiprasaṅgaḥ. tadaṅgīkāre caikenaiva cāritārthyān nañdvayasyādhikyaṃ syāt. "na te viṣṇo jāyamāno na jāto devamahimnaḥ param antam āpa." ityādipramāṇabādhaś ca.) Cr believes that the term vittapa does not refer to Kubera but is rather an epithet of Viṣṇu. He argues this somewhat in the manner of Cs, by the clever use of lexical resources and resegmentation of the sequence of letters. He breaks up the word vittapa into vit, "knowledge," and tapaḥ, which he glosses as "vision." He thus takes it as an epithet of Viṣṇu with the sense of "he who has vision through knowledge." This he argues, moreover, is by synecdoche, a reference also to Brahmā and Śiva, and therefore the poet is not guilty of the fault of being illogical [by including a lesser figure, such as Kubera, in a list of much more formidable gods and omitting the major divinities Brahmā and Śiva]. (vittapasya vidā jñānenaiva tapa ālocanaṃ darśanaṃ yasya tasya viṣṇoś ca na. upalakṣaṇam etad brahmaśivayor api. ata eva na patatprakarṣadoṣaḥ.)

9. "gained . . . recovered" prāptaḥ: Literally, "obtained." The singular ending is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more contextually apposite plural prāptāḥ.

"Laṅkā" laṅkā: As Ck, Cg, and Ct point out, Rāma obtained Laṅkā only to turn it over as promised to Vibhīṣaṇa (vibhīṣaṇāya deyatvena pratijñātety arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Vibhīṣaṇa is symbolically consecrated at 6.13.9 (also, see note); his actual consecration takes place at 6.100.

"Lakṣmaṇa" lakṣmaṇaḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct remind us that Rāma regained Lakṣmaṇa in the sense that the latter was restored to life and health through Hanumān's fetching of the mountain of healing herbs (second time) (lakṣmaṇaprāptir auṣadhaparvatānayanena—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). See 6.89.14–25 and notes.

10. "If I had not had Hanumān" hanūmān yadi me na syāt: Literally, "If Hanumān were not mine." Ck, Cg, and Ct add "as a companion (sahāya iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly)." KK and VSP read no, "ours," for me, "mine." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"who would have been able to find out any word" pravṛttim api ko vettum . . . śaktimān bhavet: Literally, "who might possess the ability to know even news."

11. "he . . . Vālin" vālī caitena: Literally, "and Vālin by him." The syllables -lī caitena are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. KK and VSP read instead vāly anenaiva, "Vālin by him alone."

"a mere creeper" vīrudhaḥ: Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct note that the term vīrudha refers to trees or any plants (vīrudha ity akārānto vṛkṣavācī). The expected form is the feminine vīrudh, "creeper, vine, or shrub." The term only occurs in one other place in the Rāmāyaṇa, at 4.66.16, when Hanumān is preparing to leap over the ocean.

13. "Great and blessed sage" bhagavan . . . mahāmune: Literally, "O blessed [one], O great sage." M3 and KK and VSP read mahāmatau, "concerning the highly intelligent [one]," for mahāmune, "O great sage." In this variant the adjective refers to Hanumān rather than Agastya.

14. "Then" tataḥ: The -taḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B3,4,T1,2,G3,M1,3,10, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then, at that time."

15. "about Hanumān" hanūmataḥ: Literally, "of Hanumān." D6,7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the locative, hanūmati, "with regard to Hanumān."

16. "some seers . . . cursed him" śāpas tu datto 'sya ṛṣibhiḥ . . . yena: Literally, "and a curse of him was given by the seers, by which." Cr corrects the genitive asya, "of him," to the more grammatical dative asmai, "to him." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read sarvam, "all," for yena, "by which," which then construes with balam, "strength," to yield the sense "his full strength." Ś,Ñ1,V1–3,B1,3,4,D1–5,7–12,T1,2,4,M1, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read munibhiḥ, "by the sages," for ṛṣibhiḥ, "by the seers."

"whose curses never fail to take effect" amoghaśāpaiḥ: Literally, "of unfailing curses."

"that crusher of his foes" arimardanaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative arimardana, "O crusher of your foes," which then refers to Rāma.

"he would not know his own strength" na veditā balam: Literally, "He will not know strength." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous na vettā hi balam, "Truly, he will not know strength."

17. "Because of its extreme childishness . . . you" atibālatayāsya te: Literally, "because of extreme childishness of that or him . . . you." The phrase is ambiguous since the pronoun asya can refer either to the young Hanumān or to his action (karma). The ambiguity is aggravated still further by the fact that the sequence has been segmented in different ways in various editions of the text and its commentaries. Our translation and those of most of the translators consulted are based on the sequence as it appears in the critical edition, atibālatayāsya te. GPP and NSP share this division but read iti bālyatayāsya te (i.e., iti bālyatayā asya te). On the other hand, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, as well as the commentaries of Ck, Cg, and Ct as they are printed in the critical apparatus, all read the sequence as iti bālatayāsyate (bālatayā āsyate), "and so he remained childish (i.e., ignorant)." This is clearly the interpretation of Ck, Cg, and Ct. Cg glosses, "The phrase bālayatayā āsyate means that because of his childishness, that is, because of his condition of being a child, he remained ignorant (bālatayāsyata iti bālatayā bālabhāvenājānataivety arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)." The gloss of Cv on this verse appears differently in the two legible sources that we have at our disposal. The transcript of the Baroda manuscript appears to render the text as the other commentators do (i.e., āsyate). However, the editors of the critical edition, in transcribing Cv's commentary in the critical apparatus, have separated the words as in the critical text. Cv's actual commentary does not make it clear which reading he favors. Among the translators consulted who share the reading of the critical text, only Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2032) renders it in accordance with the gloss of Ck, Cg, and Ct, translating, "Hence he remained ignorant (as a child)." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read iti bālyatayā [KK and VSP, bālatayā] for atibālatayā, lending the phrase the sense "thus, because of the childishness."

"I really ought not tell you . . . what" yat karma . . . tan na varṇayituṃ śakyam: Literally, "which action . . . it is not possible to describe that [action]." Cv observes that the reason it is not possible to hastily describe Hanumān's actions is because of the thought that no one would believe such a thing in the case of extreme youth. (na kasyacid apy atibālya etat saṃbhāvyata iti buddhir bhaviṣyati. ato 'rthasyāsaṃbhāvyatvāt sahasā vaktuṃ na śakyate.)

18. "to hear it" tac chrotum: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saṃśrotum, "to hear."

"as I tell you" vadāmy aham: Literally, "I speak."

19. The story of Hanumān's childhood is told twice earlier in the epic: once at 4.65.8–28 and once at 6.19.13–15. See Bulcke 1960 and S. Goldman 1999.

"Mount Sumeru, which is golden as the result of a boon granted by Sūrya" sūryadattavarasvarṇaḥ sumerur nāma: Ck, Cg, and Ct all note that the mountain is golden in appearance (svarṇarūpaḥ), while Cr understands that it is actually made of gold (suvarṇamayaḥ). Ck and Ct further identify the mountain as Sāvarṇameru. On the identification of this mountain, see notes to 6.18.32–34; 6.19.13–15; and 6.48.50.

"Hanumān's father, Kesarin" asya kesarī nāma vai pitā: Literally, "his father indeed named Kesarin." Kesarin was merely the nominal or legal father of Hanumān. His biological father is Vāyu, the wind god. On Kesarin, see S. Goldman 1999. See 4.38.17; 4.65.26–28; 4.66.27; 6.19.11; and notes, where Kesarin is identified as Hanumān's father.

20. "beloved" iṣṭā: KK and VSP read instead eṣā, "this [wife] or she [his wife]." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

21. "Then . . . Añjanā gave birth to a son, whose complexion was like that of rice awn" śāliśūkasamābhāsaṃ prasūtemaṃ tadāñjanā: Literally, "Then Añjanā gave birth to him who had the same luster as rice awn." Ck, Ct, and Cr note that Hanumān had a color similar to that of the tips of rice paddy (śālyagrasamānavarṇam—so Ck and Ct; Cr similarly). Cg adds that this is a yellowish or golden color and that the expression means that Hanumān had a body as attractive or desirable as the golden mountain (śālyagravatpiṅgalābhāsaṃ kāñcanādrikamanīyavigraham ity ukteḥ). Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,10,11,T1,2,G2, M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous śāliśūkanibhābhāsam. KK and VSP read the pronoun amum, "him," for imam, "him." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"that forest-roaming monkey" gahanecarā: Literally, "the female roamer in the forest." The term is rare, and this is its only occurrence in the Rāmāyaṇa. The sequence gahane- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead gahane varā, "that excellent [female] in the forest."

22. "like a young king of the śarabhas" śiśuḥ śarabharāḍ iva: A śarabha is a mythical eight-legged beast said to be more powerful than a lion (Apte s.v.). D5–7,10,11,T, G2,3,M1,3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śiśuḥ śaravaṇe yathā, "like a child in the reed thicket." As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all point out, this is a reference to the young god Skanda or Kumāra, who was born from Śiva's semen in a thicket of reeds (kumārasvamīty arthaḥ—so Ck and Ct; Cr similarly; skandaḥ—so Cg). See 7.16.1. See, too, Bālakāṇḍa sargas 35–36 for the Rāmāyaṇa's version of this widely known story.

23. "Then . . . rising" tatodyantam: Note the irregular sandhi between tataḥ, "then," and udyantam. The syllable -to- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V1,B3,4,D6,10,11,T1,G2,M2,3,4,8,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, tadā, "at that time, then."

"he saw" dadṛśe: Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D1–6,9–11,T4,M3,8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous parasmaipada form dadarśa, "he saw."

"sun . . . leapt up toward it" utpapāta raviṃ prati: Literally, "he leapt up toward the sun." D1–4,7,9–11,T1,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hy utpapāta to avoid the hiatus.

"japā blossoms" japāpuṣpa-: The japā is the Hibiscus rosa-sinensis, which has a deep-red blossom. See note to 6.94.17.

24. "Facing the rising sun, the child, who was himself like the rising sun . . . the rising sun" bālārkābhimukho bālo bālārka iva . . . / . . . bālārkam: Literally, "Facing the young sun, the child, like the young sun . . . the young sun." The poet plays on the word bāla, "youth, child," since the term bālārka, "rising sun," literally means "the young sun." The figure is anuprāsa. See notes to verses 57 and 60 below.

25. "the infant Hanumān" śiśubhāve hanūmati: Literally, "Hanumān, in the condition or situation of a child." This, at any rate, is the interpretation offered by Ck, Ct, and Cr, who gloss, "in the condition of childhood (bālyāvasthāyām—so Ck and Ct; Cr similarly)." One could also interpret the compound to mean "who had the imagination or ideas of a child."

"perfected beings" -siddhānām: B1,D3,6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead -yakṣāṇām, "and yakṣas."

26. "They said": The words have been added to provide a transition into the speech of the divinities. Normally, such transitions are marked in the Rāmāyaṇa, but this is somewhat less common in the Uttarakāṇḍa. All translators consulted similarly understand this verse (26) and the following verse (27) to be the thought or speech of the celestials. Only Cr among the commentators remarks on this, claiming that it is the thought of Hanumān's father Vāyu, who is shown as following after him in verse 28 below (iti vicāryeti śeṣaḥ . . . vāyuḥ).

"Not . . . or" na . . . na: Literally, "not . . . not." D2,T1,3,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read vā, "or," for the second na, "not."

"thought" manas: Literally, "the mind." See 7.34.37.

27. "his speed and valor . . . are such" īdṛśau gativikramau: Ś2,Ñ1,3,V1,3,D2,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the singular īdṛśo gativikramaḥ, while Ś1,3,D1,3–5,8,12, and KK and VSP read instead tv īdṛśo gativikramaḥ to avoid the hiatus (between asya and īḍṛṣaḥ). These variants lend the line the sense "the force of his gait is such," or "but the force of his gait is such."

"once he gains the strength of his prime" yauvanaṃ balam āsādya: Literally, "having attained the strength of youth." The term yauvanam refers to the period of adolescence or early adulthood, when one is at the height of one's physical powers.

29. "he . . . flew along" kramaty eṣaḥ: Literally, "he goes, moves, or crosses." D4,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead krāmann eva, "just flying along."

"then . . . into the sky" tato 'mbaram: D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1,3–5,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gato 'mbaram, "[flying along] he went to the sky."

30. "the sun, maker of day" divākaraḥ: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"who doesn't know that this is wrong" adoṣajñaḥ: Our understanding of the term is that the sun is making allowances for Hanumān's childish innocence and reflects that he is not old enough to be aware that he is doing something inappropriate. Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct, relying on the Amarakoṣa's (2.7.5) definition of doṣajñaḥ as a learned person or scholar, understand the negative to simply mean "ignorant," i.e., "he is only an ignorant child" (doṣajño vidvān sa na bhavatīty adoṣajño doṣajñau vaidyavidvāṃsāv ity amaraḥ—so Cg; Ck, Cm, and Ct similarly). Cr and Cs take the term to mean that Hanumān is ignorant of the fact that the sun would burn him if he approached it too closely. (sūryasamīpagamane māṃ dahed iti doṣānabhijñaḥ—so Cs; Cr similarly.)

"Moreover, a great task will depend on him." kāryaṃ cātra samāyattam: Literally, "and an enterprise is dependent here." As Cr points out, the enterprise will be Rāma's mission [to destroy Rāvaṇa] (rāmakṛtyaṃ ca samāyattam adhīnatayā sthitam). Presumably, Sūrya, as a divinity, has foreknowledge of this. D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M2,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read cāsmin, "and on him," for cātra, "and here."

31. "Rāhu . . . desired to seize the sun, maker of day" rāhur jighṛkṣati divākaram: Literally, "Rāhu desires to seize the maker of day." On Rāhu as the demon of the eclipse, see notes to 7.7.39.

32. "But" ca: Literally, "and." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. KK and VSP read instead saḥ, "he."

"Rāma . . . Rāhu" rāma . . . rāhuḥ: D2,6,7,10–12,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the redundant rāhuḥ . . . rāhuḥ.

"was mauled" parāmṛṣṭaḥ: Literally, "[was] seized, touched, or roughly treated." Ck and Ct gloss simply, "[was] touched (spṛṣṭaḥ)." The verse is not very clear as to what is happening. What emerges in the following verses appears to be that, while Hanumān and Rāhu converge on the sun at the same moment to swallow it, the monkey assaults the demon to try to keep what he takes to be food for himself.

"by Hanumān" anena: Literally, "by him."

33. "Rāhu, Siṃhikā's son" siṃhikāsutaḥ: Literally, "the son of Siṃhikā." Hanumān will encounter and kill the shadow-catching rākṣasī Siṃhikā at 5.1.166–179.

"Indra's palace . . . he" sa indrabhavanam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead indrasya bhavanam, "Indra's palace."

34. "O slayer of Bala and Vṛtra" balavṛtrahan: Bala and Vṛtra are demonic foes of Indra, whose deaths at the hands of the god are recounted in several hymns of the Ṛgveda. See notes to 7.6.39. The great primordial serpentine asura, Vṛtra, "the Encloser," is the paradigmatic enemy of the vedic divinity Indra. The story of Vṛtra is told at Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 75–77. See, too, notes to 7.75.4.

35. "as it was the time for an eclipse" parvakāle: Literally, "at the time of parvan." The term normally is used to designate any of the four transitional days of the lunar cycle that are days of important observances in the vedic religion. These are the new-moon day, the full-moon day, the first-quarter day (the eighth day), and the third-quarter day (the fourteenth day). See notes to 5.2.54. See, too, 6.86.5 and note. But these are not relevant to the sun, and the term is used here in its less common sense of "eclipse" (Apte s.v.). A variant of this term, parvaṇi, "on the parvan [day]," is also used in this sense at 1.34 of Bhartṛhari's Śatakatrayam.

"I went to the sun to seize it" aham . . . jighṛkṣuḥ sūryam āgataḥ: Literally, "I, desirous of seizing, came to the sun."

"it" ravim: Literally, "the sun."

36. "in great agitation" saṃbhramānvitaḥ: Literally, "endowed or filled with agitation."

"still wearing his golden garland" udvahan kāñcanasrajam: Literally, "wearing a golden garland." Apparently the idea here is that Indra is so agitated by what he has heard that he leaps up to go to battle without removing his courtly ornaments. Ś,D6–8,10–12,T1,2,G3,M1,3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous kāñcanīṃ srajam. KK and VSP read instead codvahan, "and wearing," to avoid the hiatus between hitvā, "having left," and udvahan, "wearing." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

37–38. The two verses constitute a single sentence in the original. We have broken it up for the sake of intelligibility.

"the . . . lord of elephants" karīndram: As Ck and Ct point out, this is, of course, Indra's mighty war elephant Airāvata.

"bearing ornaments" śṛṅgārakāriṇam: Literally, "making ornaments." The reading is awkward. The word śṛṅgāra can refer to ornaments, in general, or specifically to marks made with red lead to adorn an elephant. The sequence -kā- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ1,D1–7,9–11,T3,G1,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śṛṅgāradhāriṇam, "bearing ornaments." Ck glosses śṛṅgāropetaḥ karī, "an elephant endowed with ornaments," but it is unclear what his reading is. Ct understands, "bearing various ornaments (nānāśṛṅgāradhāriṇam)."

"Sūrya and Hanumān" sūryaḥ sahānena hanūmatā: Literally, "Sūrya together with that Hanumān."

39. "But" atha: Literally, "Then."

"went on ahead" agāt: Literally, "he went." The idea, as pointed out by Ck, Ct, and Cr, is that Rāhu reaches Hanumān before Indra does (indraprāpteḥ pūrvam eva hanumat-samīpaṃ prāpety arthaḥ—so Cr; Ck and Ct similarly).

"Hanumān spied him" anena . . . sa . . . dṛṣṭaḥ: Literally, "he was seen by him." Ck, Ct, and Cr clarify the referents: "'By him,' that is to say, 'by Hanumān,' 'he,' that is to say, 'Rāhu.' (anena hanumatā. sa rāhuḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cr similarly.)"

"as he raced toward him" ādhāvan: Literally, "racing toward." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous pradhāvan.

40. "Seeing Rāhu like that" rāhum evam avekṣya: Literally, "Having seen Rāhu thus." The reference here appears to be to Hanumān's perception of Rāhu as like a mountain peak, as mentioned in verse 39. The underlying idea is that Rāhu consists only of a large head, which would be perceived by the childish Hanumān in the same way as he saw the sun, as a large sphere, which he took for a piece of fruit. This is made clear in a number of versions (Ñ,V1,3,B4,D6,7,10,11,M7, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP), which read rāhuṃ phalam avekṣya, "regarding Rāhu as a fruit." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "The meaning is 'Having seen the one [Rāhu], who was like a great mountain peak, as if he were a gigantic piece of fruit' (mahāśailakūṭavad bṛhattaraphalam avekṣyety arthaḥ—so Cg)." Ck and Ct are similar, but the latter does not explicitly mention the word fruit (phalam).

"Hanumān . . . leapt" utpapāta: Literally, "he leapt."

41. "And . . . seeing . . . Rāhu, who consists only of a head, turned around and took flight" dṛṣṭvā rāhuḥ parāvṛtya mukhaśeṣaḥ parāṅmukhaḥ: Literally, "Rāhu having seen [and] having turned around, he who had a head for his remainder [and] he who had an averted face." Note the author's echoing of the sequences parā- and mukha-. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead avekṣyaivaṃ parāvṛttaḥ for dṛṣṭvā rāhuḥ parāvṛtya, lending the line the sense "Having seen [Hanumān] like that, he who had a head for his remainder [was] one who had an averted face." Cs quotes a line from Madhva's Mahā-bhāratatātparyanirṇaya (10.31a) to the effect that Rāhu became a planet and that the expression in our text is simply a description of Rāhu's inherent form (mukhaśeṣaḥ śiras tu tasya grahatām avāpa ityāder mukhaśeṣa iti rāhusvarūpasaṃkīrtanam).

"was racing toward him" ādhavantam: Literally, "[was] running toward." Ñ2,B3,D1,3–5,7,10,11,T1,M2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous pradhā-vantam.

42. "Hoping that Indra would protect him" indram āśaṃsamānas tu trātāram: Literally, "and hoping to attain Indra as a protector."

"'Indra! Indra!'" indra indreti: Cs notes the lack of sandhi, which, were it correct, would yield the sequence indrendreti. He notes that we are to understand that the poet is suggesting to us that Rāhu's fear of Hanumān is the cause of his failure to use sandhi (indra indreti niḥsandhiḥ kaviḥ kavayann avagamayati hanumatā sandhiṃ trāsakāraṇam iti mantavyam).

43. "Hearing the voice of Rāhu . . . and recognizing it even before seeing him" rāhoḥ . . . prāg evālakṣitaḥ svaraḥ / śrutvā: Literally, "having heard . . . the previously recognized sound of Rāhu." The syntax of the verse is problematic. The nominative svaraḥ, "voice or sound," is the logical object of the gerund śrutvā, but one would expect an accusative in this construction. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–4,8–12,G2,M2,4,5, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative singular svaram, which is grammatically correct here. Ś,Ñ1,V1,D3,8–11,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the adjective [ā]lakṣitam in agreement with svaram, yielding the sense "having heard the sound, which was recognized." The enigmatic line is fleshed out by Ct and Cr, who explain that Indra has determined that it is Rāhu's voice even before seeing him (prāg evālakṣitaṃ svaraṃ rāhudarśanāt pūrvam evāyaṃ rāhoḥ svara iti niścitam—so Ct; Cr similarly). Cs provides a somewhat more detailed explanation. He says that when Indra hears from afar a voice that is familiar to him from conversations on many occasions, he determines that it is Rāhu who is summoning him. (prāk pūrvam. ālakṣitaṃ bahuvāraṃ tena saha saṃkathanena jñātaṃ svaraṃ śrutvā dūrataḥ śrutvā rāhor āhvānaṃ mameti niścikāya.)

"I will slay him." ayam enaṃ nihanmy aham: Literally, "I am he who will kill him." D5–7,9–11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aham enaṃ niṣūdaye, "I will kill him."

44. "he thought: 'This one is a really big fruit' . . . that king of the elephants" mahat tad idam ity api / phalaṃ taṃ hastirājānam: The syntax, as well as the grammar, is defective here. A literal rendering would be: "And also [thinking] 'this one is big' . . . [he rushed toward] the fruit, the king of the elephants." Note the incorrect formation of the compound hastirājānam. Pāda b (mahat tad idam ity api) is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. We follow Ct, who understands, "Having thought: 'This one, too, is a big fruit' (idam api mahat phalam iti matvā)." Ñ2,B1,4, and KK and VSP try to correct the grammar, reading instead phalaṃ matvā hastirājam [Ñ2,B1,4,-varam], "having considered the king of elephants to be a fruit."

45. "Then" tadā: D5–7,10–12,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathā, "thus."

"as radiant as that of Indra or Agni" indrāgnyor iva bhāsvaram: D7,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead indrādyupari bhāsvaram, "shining above Indra and the rest." Presumably this refers to Rāhu and Airāvata as well.

46. "only slightly angered" nātikruddhaḥ: Literally, "not excessively angered." Cr explains Indra's lack of extreme anger by the fact that Hanumān is merely a child (nātikruddho hanumadbālyena hetunātikrodharahitaḥ). Cs similarly explains that there was no great inflation of Indra's anger, noting that because Hanumān was merely a child, he regarded him as insignificant. Therefore, Cs argues, Indra tossed his vajra [so lightly] with his fingertips. (nātikruddho bāla ity alakṣyatayā kopāṭopābhāvo mahendrasyeti jñeyam. ata eva hastāntād dhastāgrād ity uktiḥ.) See, too, 7.36.32 and note, where the same phrase is used.

"from the tips of his fingers" hastāntena: Literally, "by the tip of his hand." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the ablative hastāntād, "from the tip of his hand."

47. "his jaw [hanu] was broken on the left side" vāmo hanur abhajyata: Literally, "his left jaw was broken." The ensuing deformation of the monkey's jaw (hanu) will give him his most common name hanumān, "the one with the great jaw." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous feminine vāmā hanuḥ for vāmo hanuḥ. See 7.36.11 and notes, where Hanumān is given his name.

48. "that child" bāle: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead cāpi, "and moreover," yielding the sense "and, moreover, when he had fallen."

"who had injured his son" prajānām aśivāya ca: Literally, "and to one inimical or unkind to offspring or creatures." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nearly synonymous prajānām ahitāya saḥ, "he [Pavana] . . . to one hostile to offspring." Only Cr among the commentators consulted attempts to explain the plural prajānām, "of offspring." He argues that it is a plural of respect and, moreover, that in striking Hanumān, Indra was, in fact, injuring all creatures (ādarād bahuvacanaṃ kiṃca prajānām ahitāya hanumatprahāradvārā prajānām ahitakartra ity arthaḥ).

Following verse 48, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5,8,9,12,T1–3,G1,4, and Lahore and Gorresio substitute for 48ab, a passage of one line [708*]: "The lord who moves within all creatures, restraining his movement (pracāraṃ sa tu saṃgṛhya prajāsv antargataḥ prabhuḥ)."

Following 708*, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while G1,2,M1 insert after verse 48, a passage of one line [709*]: "Māruta took his own infant son[1] and entered a cave (guhāṃ praviṣṭaḥ svasutaṃ śiśumādāya mārutaḥ)."

49. "Closing off the organs of defecation and urination" viṇmūtrāśayam āvṛtya: Literally, "having closed off the receptacles of feces and urine."

"the lord who moves within all creatures" prajāsv antargataḥ prabhuḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prajānāṃ paramārtikṛt, "causing extreme pain to creatures."

50. "bursting at the seams, they became like blocks of wood" sandhibhir bhajyamānāni kāṣṭhabhūtāni jajñire: Literally, "being split apart by their joints or junctures, they became wood." The image is not entirely clear. The idea may be that the creatures' joints are breaking, and therefore they are immobilized. This idea is supported by D3,7,10,11, T1,2,4,G,M1,3,5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, who read sandhibhir bhidyamānaiś ca [D3 tu], yielding the sense "with or by virtue of their joints that were being split, they became wood." Ñ2,B4, and Gorresio (7.38.101) appear to try to correct or gloss the passage, reading sandhibhiś cāpy asannamyaiḥ, "with limbs that could not be bent [they became like wood]." Still, however, given the nature of the affliction and the critical reading, we believe that "bursting at the seams" is a fair approximation. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 489) appears to read as we do, rendering, "became like logs of wood and felt as if their sides would split."

51. "Deprived of the cries of 'svadhā' and 'vaṣaṭ' " niḥsvadhaṃ nirvaṣaṭkāram: Literally, "without svadhā, without the articulation [of the syllables] of vaṣaṭ." The term svadhā refers to the recitation accompanying the oblations to the pitṛs, "departed ancestors," and the exclamation on presenting this oblation. The term vaṣaṭ is the exclamation uttered by the hotṛ priest at the end of a vedic mantra and is a signal for the adhvaryu priest to offer the oblation into the fire. Here both are used as adjectives that signify the cessation of the ritual offering both to the gods and to the pitṛs. D7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead niḥsvādhyāyavaṣaṭkāram, "deprived of vedic study and the articulation [of the syllables] vaṣaṭ." Ct and Cr gloss, "sacrifice (yāgaḥ)" for vaṣaṭkāram.

"devoid of all ritual performance" niṣkriyam: Literally, "devoid of activity." Given the tenor of the verse and the critical reading of pāda a, we believe the reference here is based on the use of the term kriyā to mean specifically "ritual performance." Ct, however, takes the adjective to mean "void of saṃsāra (saṃsāraśūnyam)," which in this context we take to refer to the cessation of secular as well as ritual activities. Cr glosses, "devoid of activities such as bathing, etc. (snānādikriyārahitam)."

"stripped of all righteous practices" dharmavarjitam: Literally, "devoid of dharma."

"seemed to be" ivābabhau: Literally, "it appeared as if." Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D6–8,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ivābhavat, "it was as if."

52. "afflicted with misery . . . seeking relief" asukhārtāḥ sukhaiṣiṇaḥ: Literally, "afflicted with unhappiness . . . desiring happiness." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar duḥkhitāś ca sukhecchayā, "miserable and out of a desire for happiness."

53. "whose bellies were as bulbous as conch shells" darodaranibhodarāḥ: Literally, "whose bellies were similar to those of ones who have conch-shell bellies." Our interpretation of this extremely obscure term is guided by Cv, the only commentator to share this reading. He glosses, "The phrase darodaranibhodara means: 'Those who have bellies that are similar to the swelling of conch shells, that is to say, whose bellies are protuberant.'" In support of this interpretation Cv quotes the lexicon Vaijayantī, which gives "conch shell," along with "fear" and "cavity," as a meaning of dara. (darodaranibhodarāḥ śaṅkhodarasadṛśodarāḥ samunnatodarā ity arthaḥ. daro 'strī śaṅkhabhīgarteṣv iti vaijayantī.) It is not clear how convincing Cv's interpretation of this obscure term is. Another possibility might be to take dara in its lexical sense of poison, yielding the meaning "those whose bellies were like those of ones who had been poisoned." D6,7 [marg.],10, 11,T2,G1,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahodaranibhodarāḥ. This is glossed by Ck and Cg as "Whose bellies were like the bellies of those who were seized with the ailment called mahodara, 'enlarged belly,' which is caused by the blockage of wind (vāyustambhān mahodaravyādhigrastodaravad udaram yeṣāṃ te tathā—Ck and Cg)." Ct and Cr understand similarly. The disease known as mahodara is usually considered to be the equivalent of the modern-day affliction called edema and was formerly known as dropsy.

"the four types of beings" caturvidhāḥ: Literally, "the four types." Cr, the only commentator to remark on this compound, explains that these are living creatures, which are divided into four types: those born from eggs, etc. (caturvidhā aṇḍajādibhedena catuṣprakārāḥ prajāḥ). According to this classification, the remaining three are those born from wombs (yonija), from water (jalaja), and from sweat (svedaja).

54–55. "has he blocked us up . . . as if we were women in the inner apartments" rurodha . . . antaḥpura iva striyaḥ: The image is a striking one, although it is not completely clear what the sādhāraṇadharma of the simile is meant to be. On the surface it might appear that the reference is to the confinement of women in the women's quarters, and that is how all translators consulted who share this reading appear to have taken it. But it does not seem that the creatures who have come to complain to Prajāpati are restricted in their movements. Given the description of their ailments and their painfully swollen bellies, the reference, in fact, may be to the late-stage pregnancy or labor of women. The commentators are silent.

"O Lord" vibho: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D2,6,7,9–11,T4,M5, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the pronoun vayam, "we."

56. KK places this line in brackets and numbers it as verse 7.35.56, while VSP omits the half verse altogether. These variations are not noted in the critical apparatus.

"caused by the blockage of wind" vāyusaṃrodhajam: Literally, "born from the blockage of Vāyu." In a passage such as this it is not clear how, if at all, one is to distinguish the deity Vāyu from the element "wind," so the compound could be read as either "produced from the obstruction of [internal] wind" or "produced from the blockage by Vāyu." The commentators are silent. Translations differ in their understanding. Compare 7.36.5 and notes.

"slayer of your enemies" śatruhan: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead duḥkhahan, "O banisher of misery."

57. "Prajāpati, the Lord of creatures . . . of the creatures . . . those creatures" prajānām . . . prajānāthaḥ prajāpatiḥ /. . . prajāḥ: Note the anuprāsa. See notes to verse 24 above and verse 60 below.

"he said to them: This has happened for a reason" kāraṇād iti tān uktvā: Literally, "having said to them: 'because of a reason.'" The commentators unpack the terse utterance to have Prajāpati say: "This took place because of a particular reason." Ct explains most fully, noting, "Having said: 'There is a reason for this,' because of which reason Vāyu was angry. He now explains that reason. (kiṃcit kāraṇam atrāstīty uktvā yasmin kāraṇe vāyuś cukrodha tat kāraṇam abhāṣata—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly.)" Ñ2,B1,4,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read coktvāsau, "and he, having said," for tān uktvā. The variant avoids the critical edition's gender disagreement between the masculine pronoun tān, "to them," and the feminine object prajāḥ, "creatures."

58. "You" vaḥ: Ñ,V1,B3,D2,3,9–11,T3,4,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"patiently" kṣamam: Literally, "patiently or forgivingly." Cr glosses, "you should listen for yourselves to the reason which you must hear and forgive (tad ātmanaḥ śrotavyaṃ kṣamaṃ kṣantavyaṃ kāraṇaṃ yūyaṃ śṛṇudhvam)." The idea here is that once the creatures hear the reason for Vāyu's anger, they will patiently endure their suffering. Our understanding is similar to that of Cr, although where he understands kṣamam to modify the term kāraṇam adjectivally, that is to say, the reason that is to be borne patiently (tat kāraṇam), we take the term adverbially with the gerundive śrotavyam, "it is to be heard patiently." This interpretation is more or less shared by Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2036), which translates: "Hear, O created beings, for what reason the wind god got angry and held up his movement: all that deserves to be listened to by you and is justifiable too," and by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 489), who offers, "Listen, O creatures, I will tell you what you should know, and then you will make allowance for it." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 522) takes the term kṣamam in its sense of "capable" and understands ātmanaḥ to refer to Prajāpati himself. He thus renders unconvincingly, "O êtres, apprenez tout et écoutez ce que je puis moi-même." This interpretation has been followed by Benoît (1999, p. 1316), who translates, "apprenez tout ce dont je suis moi-même capable." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 494) apparently follows Roussel as well, rendering, "O Beings, this I have probed for myself." Dutt (1894, p. 1692) appears to ignore the term kṣamam.

59. "by King" rājñā: Ñ1,V1,D2,6,7,9–11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "because of that." See entry below under kopitaḥ.

"who acted on" ājñāya: Literally, "having heeded or minded." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,T1, 2,4,G2,3,M3,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āsthāya, "having acted upon."

"Anila, the wind god, grew angry at you." kopito 'nilaḥ: Literally, "Anila [was] made angry." The causative participle can be read with the instrumental rājñā to mean "[he] was made angry by the king [i.e., Indra]." Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D1–5,8–12,T3,4,G1,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the simplex kupitaḥ, "was angry."

"at you" vaḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saḥ, "he [Anila was angry]."

60. "Bodiless . . . within all bodies . . . the body" aśarīraḥ śarīreṣu . . . śarīram: Literally, "the one without a body . . . among bodies . . . the body." Here we have another example of the composer's fondness for repetition (anuprāsa). See notes to verses 24 and 57 above.

"becomes nothing but dust" samatāṃ yāti reṇubhiḥ: Literally, "goes to equality with particles of dust." Ŝ,Ñ2,B1,3,4,D7,8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dārubhiḥ, "[goes to equality] with pieces of wood." Ct glosses this as: "'It cannot move even for an instant.' That is the meaning. (kṣaṇam api na calatīty arthaḥ.)" Cr glosses: "'It cannot stand.' That is the meaning. (sthātuṃ na śaktam ity arthaḥ.)"

61. "This whole world is Vāyu." idaṃ sarvaṃ jagad vāyuḥ: Cs remarks that this amounts to saying that it, i.e., the world, is dependent on him (idaṃ sarvaṃ jagad vāyus tadadhīnam iti yāvat).

62. "Today all these creatures" adyaiveme: Literally, "this very day, these." D6,7,10–12,T2,3,G1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous adyaiva te, "this very day, they."

"stand . . . motionless like logs or walls" kāṣṭhakuḍyopamāḥ sthitāḥ: Literally, "[they] stand like logs and walls." The compound could also be read as a tatpuruṣa in the sense of "like a wall or walls of logs," i.e., palisades. Among the translators consulted, Gorresio, Gita Press, and Raghunathan read as we do. Gorresio (1870, p. 147) renders, "simili ad un pezzo di legno o a un muro," while Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2036) translates, "no better than the blocks of wood or walls," and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 489) offers, "become like logs or brick-walls." Other translators, who apparently have the same reading, appear to take kuḍya, "wall," in the sense of kūḍī, "a bunch of twigs." Dutt (1894, p. 1692) renders, "like dried wood." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 523) offers, "comme des planches," while Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 494), following Roussel, renders, "are as boards," and Benoît (1999, p. 1316) translates, "ressemblent à des planches."

63. "the cause of your affliction" rukprado hi vaḥ: Literally, "the giver of affliction, indeed, of you." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss rukprada as "giver of ailments, such as colic, etc. (śūlādirogapradaḥ)." Cs glosses, "giver of diseases similar to edema, etc. (mahodarādisadṛśarogadaḥ)." See notes to verse 53 above. The word vaḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead naḥ, "our." Cs, who reads naḥ, "our," understands that the use of the first person pronoun suggests that a great being [e.g., Prajāpati] regards the suffering of others as his own (naḥ paraduḥkham ātmagāmīti manyamāno mahātmeti sūcayitum ity uktiḥ).

"Let us not court destruction" mā vināśaṃ gamiṣyāma: Literally, "Let us not go to destruction." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs all note the hiatus between gamiṣyāma and aprasādya, "not having propitiated" (sandhir ārṣaḥ—so Ct).

"the son of Aditi" aditeḥ sutam: Cs takes the phrase as a kenning for deva, "god" (aditeḥ sutaṃ devam). D6,T1,2,G1,3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the plural aditeḥ sutāḥ, which can be read either as a vocative, "O you sons of Aditi," or as the subject of the verb mā . . . gamiṣyāma, "let us, the sons of Aditi, not go."

64. "Prajāpati, along with the creatures and together with the gods, gandharvas, great serpents, and guhyakas" prajābhiḥ sahitaḥ prajāpatiḥ sadevagandharvabhujaṅgaguhyakaḥ: Ñ,B1,3,4,D1,3–7,10,11,T,G,M1,3,5,8,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read -guhyakaiḥ for -guhyakaḥ. In this reading, the dvandva must be subordinated not to Prajāpati (prajāpatiḥ), as in the critical edition, but, with gender disagreement, to prajābhiḥ, "with the creatures." This lends the line the sense "Prajāpati, together with the creatures, who were accompanied by the gods, gandharvas, great serpents, and guhyakas."

"where . . . was staying" yatrāsyati tatra: We, like most translators, understand the verbal form here to be āsyati, from the normally second gaṇa root √ās, "to sit or stay," but here it is conjugated as a fourth gaṇa (see Whitney 1885, s.v. √ās). Cs offers an alternative explanation based on his derivation of the verb asyati from the fourth gaṇa verbal root √as, "to throw or drive off," which he further glosses as "to despise or ignore." He reads the passage to mean "Where he who, having taken his son, despised the world. (yo jagad asyati kṣipati tiraskarotīti yāvat. sa sutaṃ pragṛhya yatra vartate.)" Ñ2,B1,3,4, D6,7,10,11,M5, and Gorresio, GPP, and NSP read by transposition tatra . . . yatra.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

65. "There on the lap of ever-moving Vāyu lay his son, as radiant as the sun, Agni Vaiśvānara, or gold. When four-faced Brahmā, together with the gods, perfected beings, seers, great serpents, and the rākṣasas, saw him, he was filled with pity." tato 'rkavaiśvānarakāñcanaprabhaṃ sutaṃ tadotsaṅgagataṃ sadāgateḥ / caturmukho vīkṣya kṛpām athākarot sadevasiddharṣibhujaṅgarākṣasaḥ //: Literally, "Then the four-faced one, together with the gods, perfected beings, seers, serpents, and rākṣasas, having seen the ever-moving one's son—who had the luster of the sun, Vaiśvānara, or a god—on his lap, he made compassion."

"together with the gods, perfected beings, seers, great serpents, and the rākṣasas" sadevasiddharṣibhujaṃgarākṣasaḥ: The sequence -siddharṣibhujaṃgarākṣasaḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sadevagandharvarṣiyakṣarākṣasaiḥ, "together with the gods, gandharvas, ṛṣis, yakṣas, and rākṣasas." This reading is ungrammatical, hypermetric, and has the fault of incorrect scansion. In addition, it has the fault of incorrect sandhi between -gandharva- and -ṛṣi-. Ck, Ct, and Cr all note that sequence of heavy and light syllables is irregular (gandharvarṣiyakṣeti gurulaghubheda ārṣaḥ—so Ck and Ct). Cr similarly notes that the extra syllable in the pāda denotes a metrical irregularity (caramapāde 'kṣarādhikyaṃ chandasāṃ vailakṣaṇyadyotanāya). Cg, who reads with the critical edition, also notes that the sequence of heavy and light syllables is irregular (gandharvarṣiyakṣeti gurulaghubheda ārṣaḥ). G2,M5, and KK and VSP correct the reading to sadevagandharvarṣiyakṣarākṣasaiḥ.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha) with a defective pāda a.

1. "injury" -vadha-: Although the term is most commonly used in its sense of "slaying or death," the context makes it clear that here it must be understood in the sense of "injury or hurt." See 7.35.46–48 and verse 4 and notes below.

"his infant son" śiśukam: Literally, "infant or child." We take the suffix -ka here in its diminutive sense. Cr takes the suffix to indicate that the child is the object of compassion or pity (anukampitasutam). Cs appears to take the suffix in the sense of similarity, understanding the term here to mean "similar to the appearance of a child." Cs continues, arguing: "But that Hanumān, in reality, is not a child, although he reveals himself to the worlds in this form. (śiśukaṃ śiśupratimāsadṛśam. vastutas tu na śiśuḥ. tathā lokānāṃ pradarśayitāram.)"

2. "After rising . . . Vāyu prostrated himself three times at the Creator's feet." pādayor nyapatad vāyus tisro 'vasthāya vedhase: Literally, "Having stood, Vāyu fell down three times at the two feet to the Creator." The word tisraḥ, "three," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. As noted by Cv, the nominative or accusative feminine tisraḥ is irregular here (anyat sarvam ārṣam). D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead trir upasthāya, literally, "having worshiped three times." Cg notes this as a variant reading. T1–3,M2,3, and KK and VSP read instead tisropasthāya, "having worshiped three times." Cg understands the passage to mean: "First worshiping him, he performed a complete [lit., 'eight-limbed'] prostration three times (upasthānapūrvakaṃ triḥsāṣṭāṅgam anamad ity arthaḥ)." Cg further notes that the aluksamāsa (i.e., tisropasthāya) is irregular (alug apy ārṣaḥ). Translators, who read the variant, upasthāya, generally understand Vāyu to have bowed down to or stood submissively before Brahmā. Thus Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 523) translates, "Vāyu tomba aux pieds de Vedhas, après trois inclinations profondes." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 494) understands, "Vayu, having bowed three times, fell at the feet of Brahma." Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2037), offers, "Standing thrice submissively before the creator, the wind-god . . . fell at the former's feet." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 490), renders, "he prostrated himself thrice at the feet of Brahmā in all humility, announcing himself as ordained." Benoît (1999, p. 1317) translates, "Vâyu se prosterna par trois fois aux pieds de Brahmā."

"With his dangling earrings, garland, diadem, and ornaments of burnished gold" calatkuṇḍalamaulisraktapanīyavibhūṣaṇaḥ: The compound lends itself to a variety of analyses. There are two ways to construe it as a proper bahuvrīhi compound. The first, which we have selected, is to take the participle calat, "moving, swinging, dangling," as governing only the earrings. Cr takes mauli, which we understand in its meaning of "diadem," in its adjectival sense of "excellent." He then takes the compound to mean: "Vāyu is one who has dangling earrings, who has an excellent garland, and who has golden ornaments (calatī kuṇḍale yasya maulir atiśreṣṭhā srag yasya sa eva sa iti karmadhārayas tapanīyāni svarṇamayāni vibhūṣaṇāni yasya sa vāyuḥ—so Cr)." An alternative is provided by Ck and Ct, who suggest reading the sequence -sraktapanīya- as a paranipāta for -tapanīyasrak-. (sraktapanīyeti. tapanīyasrag ity arthaḥ.) This, then, would lend the compound the sense "having dangling earrings, a diadem, and a garland of burnished gold for his ornaments." Ś,Ñ1,V1,B4,D1,4,G1,M4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous adjective cala-, "moving or dangling," for the participle calat-, "dangling."

Following verse 2, KK inserts in brackets, numbered as verses 7.36.2–3, a passage of four lines [713*, lines 1–4]: " 'I do homage to you, the Lord of the three worlds, who are the three qualities, the three vedas, the three cosmic eras, the three powers, the three times, and the three abodes.' Having thus done homage to Brahmā, whose powers are endless, Vāyu, taking his infant son, worshiped Grandfather Brahmā."

3. "his son" śiśuṃ tam: Literally, "that child."

4. "he once more revived" punar jīvitam āptavān: Literally, "he once more attained life." Most of the translators consulted seem to read the phrase literally. Nonetheless, it is clear from the previous sarga that Hanumān has not been killed but has merely been stunned. Compare the description of Hanumān's wounding at 7.35.46–48, where we are told that he was merely stunned (vihvale—7.35.48). The simile in the present verse further reinforces this.

5. "Perceiving . . . that Hanumān had revived" prāṇavantam imaṃ dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen him possessed of the breath of life or vitality [prāṇa])."

"Vāyu, bearer of scents" gandhavahaḥ: Literally, "bearer of scents." The term is rare, occurring only six times in the critical edition: at 4.65.23; 6.61.34,64,68; 7.36.26; and here. See notes to 6.61.34,64,68. See also MBh 2.10.7, where the air within the court of King Vaiśravaṇa is so described.

"began to circulate among all beings, where there had previously been obstruction" cacāra sarvabhūteṣu saṃniruddhaṃ yathā purā: This line is rather difficult to construe because of the neuter saṃniruddham, which can mean either "blocked" or "an obstruction of the intestines." (Compare 7.35.56 and notes.) We take it nominally in its medical sense of the obstruction of the anus and the urethra. The reference is to the blockage of the feces and urine that Vāyu had inflicted upon all beings in his anger (see 7.35.49 and notes). To bring out what we take to be the intended sense of the verse, we have taken the liberty of reading the adverb yathā, "in such a way," as if it were yatra, "in which or where." The commentators and translators struggle with the term, offering a variety of more or less persuasive interpretations. Ct reads the upasarga sam as an elliptical form of saṃtyakta, "given up or abandoned." He then reads the compound adverbially in the sense of "in such a way as to give up [his] obstruction in all beings (sarvabhuteṣu saṃniruddhaṃ saṃtyaktavirodhaṃ yathā bhavati tathā)." Cs, somewhat similarly, takes both upasarga-s sam and ni elliptically to mean, respectively, "completely (samyak)" and "gone out from or voided (nirgatah)." He then, too, reads the compound adverbially to mean "in such a way that obstruction had completely gone out," that is, "devoid of obstruction." (saṃniruddhaṃ ruddhaṃ bhāve ktaḥ. nirodhaḥ. samyañ ni nirgato rodho yasmin karmaṇi tad yathā bhavati tathā nirodharahitam.) Cr explains: "Having seen Hanumān restored to life, Vāyu, who had previously blocked up the collection of life breaths in all beings, now circulated as before, that is to say, caused them to circulate. If, however, we take the term saṃniruddham as a generic neuter, we can then see it as an adjective modifying Vāyu [i.e., the wind, which had been blocked]. In that case, there is no need to understand this as a causative construction. (vāyur imaṃ hanūmantaṃ prāṇavantaṃ dṛṣṭvā sarvabhūteṣu saṃniruddhaṃ prāṇādijātaṃ yathā purā pūrvavac cacāra cālayāmāsa. yadi tu sāmānye napuṃsakatvakalpanayā saṃniruddham ity api vāyuviśeṣaṇaṃ tadā nāntarbhāvitaṇijarthakalpanā.)" Ck, Cg, and Cm understand the term saṃniruddham to mean "established or present within all beings" and, like Ct and Cs, read the participle adverbially (sarvabhūteṣu saṃniruddham antaḥpratiṣṭhitaṃ yathā bhavati tathā). Ck, Cm, Ct, and Cs explain that Vāyu circulated as before in the form of the upward and downward life breaths (yathā purā yathā pūrvaṃ prāṇāpānātmanā—so Ck, Cm, and Ct; Cs similarly). Of the translators consulted, only Benoît (1999, p. 1318) takes the term saṃniruddham in the sense of "blocked," reading adjectivally with Vāyu. He offers, "le dieu du Souffle . . . se remit à circuler en tous les êtres où il était resté bloqué jusqu'alors." Both Roussel and Gita Press read the term adverbially but interpret it idiosyncratically, with no reference to blockage. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 523) renders, "Prâṇa . . . circula de nouveau dans tous les êtres, librement, comme auparavant," while Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2037) offers, "Seeing Hanumān restored to life, the wind-god, constituting the vital breath (of the entire creation), began (once more) to circulate inwardly as before in all creatures." Shastri and Raghunathan both ignore the term. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 495) renders, "the Wind-god, blowing auspiciously, began to circulate in all beings as erstwhile." And Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 490) offers, "Rejoicing at seeing him live, Vāyu, carrier of scents, resumed his movements in all creatures, as the life-breath." Dutt does not translate this sarga. Gorresio's text, perhaps glossing, as elsewhere, reads avirodhaḥ, "without obstruction," for saṃniruddham, which then modifies Vāyu. Gorresio (1870, p. 147) renders, "dissolvendo ogni impedimento."

6. "Released from the affliction of wind" marudrogavinirmuktāḥ: Literally, "released from the disease of wind." V1,D1–4,7,9–11,T3,4,G1,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead marudrodhād vinirmuktāḥ, "freed from the obstruction of wind." KK 1913 (7.36.8) reads marudrodhādivinirmuktāḥ, "freed from the obstruction of wind, etc.," but this appears to be a typographical error, as KK 1905 (7.36.6) and VSP (7.36.6) both read marudrodhād vinirmuktāḥ.

"creatures" prajā vai: Literally, "creatures indeed." Ñ2,V1,B3,D1–3,5–7,9–11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāḥ prajāḥ, "those creatures."

"as might be lotus ponds in bloom" padminya iva sāmbujāḥ: Literally, "like lotus ponds with lotuses."

"from freezing winds" śītavāta-: Literally, "from cold wind." Ñ1,V1,D1–5,9,T4, and KK 1905 (7.36.3) and VSP (7.36.6) read instead śītadāha, "frostbite [lit., 'cold burning']." Cg glosses, "burning by frost (himena dāhaḥ)." Cg also notes our reading as a variant.

7. "of the three pairs, foremost of the three, who has three abodes and is worshiped by the thirty gods" triyugmas trikakut tridhāmā tridaśārcitaḥ: Literally, "having three pairs, being the foremost of three, having three abodes, worshiped by thirty." The commentators are unanimous in defining the three pairs as the three pairs of lordly attributes: 1) glory and might, 2) sovereignty and majesty, and 3) knowledge and freedom from worldly desires. Cv, Cg, Ct, and Cr also agree that trikakud means principal or foremost among the trimūrti and that tridhāmā means having a dwelling or place in [each of] the three worlds. (triyugmas trīṇi yugmāni yasya saḥ. tāni yaśovīrye aiśvaryaśriyau jñānavairāgye ca trikakuttrimūrtipradhānaḥ. tridhāmā trilokasthānaḥ—so Ct; Cv, Cg, and Cr similarly.) The term trikakud is relatively rare in the epics as a description of a divinity. Outside of this one appearance in the Rāmāyaṇa, it occurs three times in the Mahābhārata—twice in reference to Kṛṣṇa (12.43.10; 13.135.20) and once in reference to Viṣṇu in his varāhāvatāra (12.330.28). The concept of the trimūrti as a composite deity consisting of Brahmā, Viṣṇu, and Śiva appears to be a relatively late purāṇic innovation, unknown to either epic. It should be also noted that there is substantial manuscript uniformity supporting the term trikakud here. The term tridhāman is given as an epithet of Kṛṣṇa at

MBh 12.43.10, where Nīlakaṇṭha, taking dhāman in its sense of light or splendor, glosses it as "having the luster of the sun, the moon, and fire (sūryacandrāgniprabhaḥ)." At 13.143.22 the term tridhāman is found once again. Here it is used as an epithet of Kṛṣṇa in his form as the sun and the year. Nīlakaṇṭha understands the term to refer to his possession or dispensation of the three meteorological phenomena: wind, rain, and heat (tridhāmeti varṣavātoṣṇaprakāram).

8. "O great Indra! O Agni! O Varuṇa! O Kubera, lord of wealth! O Maheśvara!" bho mahendrāgnivaruṇadhaneśvaramaheśvarāḥ: Literally, "O Mahendra, Agni, Varuṇa, Dhaneśvara [lord of wealth], [and] Maheśvara." The sequence -dhana- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D3,10,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the similar bho mahendrāgnivaruṇā maheśvaradhaneśvarāḥ. KK and VSP read instead bho mahendreśavaruṇaprajeśvaradhaneśvarāḥ, "O Mahendra! O Īśa! O Varuṇa! O Prajeśvara ! O Dhaneśa [lord of wealth]!" Ck and Cg identify īśa, "the Lord," as Rudra and Prajeśvara [the Lord of creatures]," as Yama. (īśa ity anena rudra ity ucyate. prajeśvaro yamaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly.)

"Please listen . . . I shall tell it, as it is beneficial" tat . . . hitaṃ vakṣyāmi śrūyatām: Ñ1,B1,3,4,D1,3–7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous vakṣyāmi śrūyatāṃ hitam by transposition. Ck, Cg, and Ct note the irregularity of the scansion in the phrase vakṣyāmi śrūyatām, marking the presence of an irregular heavy syllable (śrū[yatām]), and consider it archaic (vakṣyāmi śrūyatām iti guruvaiṣamyam ārṣam). Cs quotes Ct and takes great exception to his comments. He asks what the purpose or the sense of this remark is and concludes that those lacking in or impoverished in reference to knowledge should be considered uncertain [sources]. (nāgojibhaṭṭo vakṣyāmi śrūyatām ity atra guruvaiṣamyam ārṣam iti vyācakhyau tatkim abhiprāyakaṃ veti jñānadāridrā vicāryāḥ.) Ś,D6–8,10–12,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vaḥ, "to you," for tat, "it."

9. "This infant will have to accomplish a mission of yours." anena śiśunā kāryaṃ kartavyaṃ vo bhaviṣyati: Literally, "something that must be done for you will have to be done by this infant."

"So you must all grant" dadatāsya: Literally, "you must give to him." B3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tad dadadhvam, "therefore you must give."

"boons in order to gratify him" varān . . . asya tuṣṭidān: Literally, "boons that give gratification to [lit., 'of'] him." Ś,D6–8,10–12, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead asya tuṣṭaye, "for his gratification."

10. "thousand-eyed Indra" sahasranayanaḥ: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

"moved by affection" prītiraktaḥ: Literally, "impassioned or emotional through affection." D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1,3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prītiyuktaḥ, "filled with affection."

"with a benign expression" śubhānanaḥ: Literally, "having a pleasant face."

"took off . . . and said this" samutkṣipyedam abravīt: The sequence -utkṣipya- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The passage is elliptical. Cr glosses, "having removed it, that is to say, having given it preceeded by removal (utkṣipyotkṣepaṇapūrvakaṃ pradāya)." Several of the translators consulted interpolate this idea into their translations by indicating that Indra gave the garland to Hanumān. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead utkṣipyedaṃ vaco 'bravīt, "having removed [it], he spoke these words."

"his garland of lotuses" kuśeśayamayīṃ mālām: Literally, "a garland made of lotuses." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr gloss, "made of golden lotuses (kāñcanapadmamayīm)," and this gloss is rendered in several translations consulted. The term kuśeśaya- is rare in the epic literature, but it is known to the later purāṇic literature. It only occurs in one other place in the Rāmāyaṇa, at 2.88.24, and once in the Mahābhārata at 3.130.15.

Following verse 10, KK inserts a passage, numbered and in brackets (7.36.13ab), of one line, not noted in the critical apparatus. The line seems syntactically isolated from its context. It reads: "And this very day, the world has been released by Vāyu, who is life (adyaiva ca parityaktaṃ vāyunā jagad āyuṣā)." Optionally, it is perhaps possible to read the sequence as jagadāyuṣā, "by him who is the life of the world."

11. "was broken" kṣataḥ: Literally, "broken or wounded." B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hataḥ, "was struck o*r* wounded." Apparently the author takes the normally feminine noun hanu as masculine (see 7.35.47 and note). Only Cs among the commentators consulted is concerned about the liṅgabheda and glosses hatā, noting that the feminine reading does appear in some manuscripts. Cs further proposes an alternative reading of the verse, understanding the sequence yathā hataḥ, which in the devanāgarī is written as one unit, i.e., yathāhataḥ, as yathā ahataḥ, which he then glosses as ahatā, i.e., "not injured." He then explains, "Since his jaw was completely uninjured, therefore he shall be known by the name Hanumān, 'possessing a jaw.'" (hataḥ hatā. hatety api kvacit pāṭhaḥ. ahato 'hatā. sarvātmanānāśaṃ prāptety ato hanumān iti nāmnā bhaviteti vā.)

"this . . . by the name of" nāmaiṣaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nāmnā vai, "indeed, by name."

"Hanumān, 'He of the Great Jaw.'" hanumān iti: Literally, "Hanumān." The word hanumān literally means "possessing a jaw." Since the possessive suffix mant/vant is frequently used to indicate possession to a great degree (prāśastye matup—according to Pā 5.2.94 and the vartika thereon), the idea may be that Hanumān has a characteristically large or distorted jaw as a result of his injury. See note to kṣataḥ above.

12. "I will grant him" aham evāsya dāsyāmi: Literally, "I myself will give him." Ś,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous aham asya pradāsyāmi.

"the greatest and most excellent" paramam . . . uttamam: The expression is redundant, as the terms here are more or less synonymous. Ñ,V1,D2–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read adbhutam, "wondrous, marvelous," for uttama, "most excellent," thus avoiding the redundancy.

"Henceforward" ataḥ prabhṛti: The word ataḥ, "from this or from now," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M2,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous itaḥ.

"he shall be invulnerable to my vajra" vajrasya mamāvadhyo bhaviṣyati: Compare this episode with the previous account of the childhood of Hanumān in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (4.65). There, in verses 25–26, it is Brahmā who gives Hanumān the boon that he cannot be killed by any weapon in battle. Indra's boon there is that he should not die unless and until he should choose to do so. Hanumān's invulnerability to weapons is reflected in his common post-epic epithet, vajrāṅga, "having an adamantine body or a vajra-body,"

13. "Sūrya Mārtāṇḍa" mārtāṇḍaḥ: Literally, "he of the mortal egg." The epithet can be traced back to the Ṛgveda (10.72.8), where the sun, who dies and is reborn each day, is mentioned as the seventh son of Aditi. This is the only occurrence of the epithet mārtāṇḍa (or the v.l. mārtaṇḍa) in the Rāmāyaṇa. Ś1,2,Ñ,V1,B3,4,D1–11,G2,M4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mārtaṇḍaḥ, "Mārtaṇḍa."

14. "And" tu: B4,D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ca, "and."

"I shall grant him mastery of that śāstra" asya śāstraṃ dāsyāmi: Literally, "I shall give him a śāstra." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand śāstra here to mean "studying of the śāstra and knowledge or mastery of its meaning (śāstraṃ śāstrādhyayanaṃ tadarthajñānaṃ ca—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cg understands the śāstra intended here to be the Aindra grammar (aindravyākaraṇam ity arthaḥ). Cr glosses the verb dāsyāmi, "I will give," as "I will teach (adhyāpayiṣyāmi)." This boon accounts for Hanumān's reputation as a great grammarian and his eloquence in Sanskrit. Compare App. I, No. 3, following notes to 4.3.25; and 5.28.18–19 and notes. On the Aindra school of grammar, see Burnell 1875 and Belvalkar 1915, pp. 10–12. See, too, 730*, following notes to verse 42 below.

Following verse 14, T2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.36.14 and 15), Gita Press (7.36.14cd), KK (7.36.16.ef), and VSP (7.36.15bac) insert a passage of one line [716*]: "and no one shall be his equal in the apprehension of the śāstra[1] (na cāsya bhavitā kaścit sadṛśaḥ śāstradarśane)."

15. "or through water" udakād api: Literally, "even from water." Varuṇa is the regent of the waters.

"even after a million years" varṣāyutaśatenāpi: Literally, "even by a hundred ayutas of years." An ayuta is normally ten thousand.

16. "And Yama . . . invulnerability to his rod" yamo 'pi daṇḍāvadhyatvam: Ś,Ñ,V1,B1, 3,4,D,T1,2,4,G3,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yamo daṇḍād avadhyatvam, "Yama . . . invulnerability to his rod." Lahore reads the slight variant yamadaṇḍād avadhyatvam, "invulnerability to Yama's rod."

"ordained for him" diśate 'sya: Literally, "he ordered or assigned to [lit., 'of'] him." D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varaṃ dadāmi, making the statement a direct quotation, "I will give a boon."

"perpetual" nityaśaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dattavān, "he gave or granted."

"never losing heart in battle" aviṣādaṃ ca saṃyuge: Literally, "and non-despondency in battle."

17. "Kubera Ekākṣipiṅgala" ekākṣipiṅgalaḥ: Literally, "Ekākṣipiṅgala (Tawny in One Eye)." The term piṅgala- covers a spectrum of colors, from red to reddish-brown, yellow, tawny, and gold. Translators vary in their choices. For an explanation and the origin of this epithet, see sarga 13 above, esp. verses 21–30.

"who was a granter of boons" varadaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D3,5–8,10–12,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dhanadaḥ, "the bestower of wealth."

"never . . . him in battle" nainaṃ saṃyugeṣu: Literally, "not him in battles." The sequence nainam is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. KK and VSP read instead cainaṃ [saṃyuge na], "and [not] him [in battle]."

18. "His death shall never come" na vadhyo 'yaṃ bhaviṣyati: Literally, "he will not be subject to being killed." Ś,D2,6–12,T1,G1,M3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the virtually synonymous avadhyaḥ, "not to be killed," for na vadhyaḥ.

"from me or from my weapons" matto madāyudhānāṃ ca: Literally, "from me and of my weapons." The construction is awkward and ungrammatical, with the ablative mattaḥ and the genitive madāyudhānām placed in parallel.

Following 18ab, KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.36.21cd–7.36.22ab) inserts, while D7, T4 insert following 18, a passage of two lines [719*]: "And he shall have invulnerability from me and from my lance, especially as he is constantly bearing my immovable javelin[1] (macchūlenāpy avadhyatvaṃ mama caiva bhaviṣyati / macchaktim acalāṃ caiva vahan nityaṃ viśeṣataḥ //)."

[1] "And he shall have invulnerability from me and from my lance, especially as he is constantly bearing my immovable javelin." macchūlenāpy avadhyatvaṃ mama caiva bhaviṣyati / macchaktim acalāṃ caiva vahan nityaṃ viśeṣataḥ //: The passage, especially the second line, makes little sense. KK reads hantaiva hi, "indeed he will especially destroy [my unshakable javelin]," for vahan nityam, "constantly bearing." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

19. D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read verses 18–22 in a slightly different sequence—20, 720* (substitutes for critical edition verse 21), 19 (with transposition of pādas ab and cd), 22.

"Next Brahmā said these words: 'He will be a great being, long-lived' " dīrghāyuś ca mahātmā ca iti brahmābravīd vacaḥ: Literally, "Brahmā spoke words: '[He will be] a great being and long-lived.' " Note the hiatus between ca and iti. The commentators differ as to how to interpret the commonplace epithet mahātmā in connection with the baby Hanumān. Ck and Ct understand it to mean that the expression "he whose soul or mind is great" amounts to saying that Hanumān will be a knower of Brahman. (mahātmā mahān ātmā yasya saḥ. brahmajña iti yāvat—so Ct.) Cr, on the other hand, understands the term to mean that Hanumān will perform extraordinarily great deeds (atiprayatnavān). D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read brahmā taṃ prābravīt vacaḥ, "Brahmā said these words to him," for iti brahmābravīd vacaḥ, "Brahmā said words." The loss of the quotation mark iti makes it grammatically, if not contextually, ambiguous as to whether the adjectives mahātmā, "great one," and dīrghāyuḥ, "long-lived," refer to Hanumān or Brahmā. Several of the translations consulted construe one or both of the adjectives with Brahmā (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 524; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 491; and Benoît 1999, p. 1318). Cr warns us against this construction, in which these epithets are taken as referring to Brahmā. He says: "One should not imagine that either dīrghāyuḥ or mahātmā are adjectives of brahmā (dīrghāyurmahātmanor brahmaviśeṣaṇatve tu neyaṃ kalpanā)." See 7.98.24 and notes, where Hanumān's longevity is ordained by Rāma.

"and immune to all chastisements on the part of brahmans" sarveṣāṃ brahmadaṇḍānām avadhyo 'yaṃ bhaviṣyati: Literally, "this one will be invulnerable to all staves of brahmans." The term brahmadaṇḍa, normally in the singular, refers either to the rod of Lord Brahmā or, more commonly, to the staff carried by brahmanical sages. The commentators differ somewhat, oscillating between the idea of a physical weapon and the idea of the priestly power of the curse used to chastise those who offend brahmans. The term daṇḍa can also refer to punishment. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the reference to be to all the means of punishment, up to and including the divine weapon-spell of Brahmā (sarveṣāṃ brahmāstrāntānām). Ck and Ct add that the specific term brahmadaṇḍa refers to the curse of brahman-seers that could be released with reference to destructive activities (brahmadaṇḍo brahmarṣikriyamāṇaḥ saṃhāroddeśyakaḥ śāpaḥ). Cm glosses simply, "the curses of brahmans (brahmaśāpānām)," while Cg remains undecided, glossing, "either the curses of brahmans or brahmanical weapons (brahmaśāpānāṃ brahmāyudhānāṃ vā)." These discussions of the sense of brahmadaṇḍa are conditioned by the information given at verse 30 below, where the ṛṣis, recalling Brahmā's boon, are unable to punish Hanumān for his mischievous destruction of their ashrams. D6,7,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read avadhyatvam, "[there will be] invulnerability," for avadhyo 'yam, "this one [will be] invulnerable."

20. See note to verse 19 above for variations in the sequence of verses in this passage.

"very wise . . . foremost of artisans . . . uttered a boon for him" śilpināṃ pravaraḥ prāha varam asya mahāmatiḥ: D6,7,10,11, and VSP omit, while GPP reads the line in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.36.20ab and 7.36.21ab. The word pravaraḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D2,3,5,8,9,12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, KK, and VSP read prādāt, "he gave," for prāha, "he said or uttered."

"that infant, who resembled the rising sun" enaṃ bālasūryopamaṃ śiśum: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead imaṃ bālaṃ prati mahārathaḥ, "The great chariot-warrior [having looked] at that infant."

21. See note to verse 19 above for variations in the sequence of verses in this passage.

"And . . . here" iha . . . tu: KK reads instead tu . . . ca, "but . . . and."

"at the time of battle" saṃgrāmakāle tu: T1,2,G1,3,M2,4,8,9, and KK read instead the plural, saṃgrāmakāleṣu, "in times of battles."

KK reads this verse, numbered (7.36.24) and in brackets, following 720*.

For verse 21, D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP substitute, while KK reads following verse 20, a passage of two lines [720*]: "And he shall be invulnerable to those weapons that[1] I have fashioned as well as to divine weapons, and thus he will become one of the cirajīvins[2] (matkṛtāni ca śastrāṇi yāni divyāni tāni ca / tair avadhyatvam āpannaś cirajīvī bhaviṣyati //)."

[1] "And . . . those . . . that" yāni . . . tāni ca: Literally, "which . . . and those." KK and VSP read saṃyuge, "in battle," for tāni ca, "and those."

[2] "will become one of the cirajīvins" cirajīvī bhaviṣyati: This boon is, no doubt, intended to explain Hanumān's inclusion in the traditional list of the "seven immortals [cirajīvins]," that is, figures from the epic and purāṇic literature who are thought to live on from one age to another. The others are Aśvatthāman, Bali, Vyāsa, Vibhīṣaṇa, Kṛpa, and Rāma Jāmadagnya (Paraśurāma). See 7.10.30; 7.98.22; and notes.

22. See note to verse 19 above for variations in the sequence of verses in this passage.

"Hanumān" enam: Literally, "him."

"four-faced Brahmā" caturmukhaḥ: Literally, "the four-faced [one]."

"guru of the world" jagadguruḥ: This appears to be the only occurrence of this term in in the epic literature. It is, however, not uncommon in the purāṇic literature.

"with a satisfied expression" tuṣṭamukhaḥ: Literally, "having a satisfied face." Ñ,V1, D2,3,5–7,9–11,T4,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tuṣṭamanāḥ, "having a satisfied mind."

23. "your son here" te 'tra putraḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,4,D,T4,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead putras tava, "your son."

Following verse 23, D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [721*]: "And he shall be able to take on any form at will, do as he likes, go where he pleases, and be the foremost of leapers. His movements shall never be obstructed and he shall attain great fame.[1] (kāmarūpaḥ kāmacārī kāmagaḥ plavatāṃ varaḥ / bhavaty avyāhatagatiḥ kīrtimāṃś ca bhaviṣyati //)"

[1] "and he shall attain great fame" kīrtimāṃś ca bhaviṣyati: Literally, "and he will be one possessing fame *o*r glory."

25. "When all of those gods had spoken in this fashion and had taken leave of Māruta, they placed Grandfather Brahmā before them, and, along with the other immortals, they all departed just as they had come" evam uktvā tam āmantrya mārutaṃ te 'maraiḥ saha / yathāgataṃ yayuḥ sarve pitāmahaḥ purogamāḥ //: Literally, "Having spoken thus [and] having taken leave of Māruta, they all, having the Grandfather going before them, together with the immortals, went just as they had come." The syntax of the verse is fairly obscure because it is not clear as to who is or are the subject[s] of the gerunds uktvā, "having said," and āmantrya, "having taken leave." Even though Brahmā was the last speaker, he cannot be the subject. Moreover, the gods who had assembled cannot be the subjects either, as the unnamed subjects are said to depart, along with the gods (amaraiḥ saha). Probably the best solution is the second alternative proposed by Cs, the only commentator consulted who engages with the problem. He understands the subject to be only the set of gods who actually conferred boons on Hanumān and who then, placing Brahmā before them, departed together with all the other divinities, perhaps including such beings as gandharvas, great serpents, guhyakas, etc. (pitāmahapurogamā varadā amarair itaraiḥ sahaivam uktveti vā). See 7.35.64–65. We find Cs's first alternative less persuasive. According to this, the term amara, normally "immortal," refers to the boons of immortality that were conferred upon Hanumān. This allows Cs to read the verse to mean that the gods first spoke to Hanumān, who now possesses these boons, and then took their leave of Māruta. Finally, they placed Brahmā at their head and all departed as they had come. (amarair amaratvagair varaiḥ saha vartamānaṃ taṃ hanumantam uktvā mārutaṃ cāmantrya pitāmahapurogamāḥ sarve 'pi yathāgatās tathā yayuḥ.) Ck and Ct similarly understand the subjects to be [the principal] gods, that is, great Indra, etc., while the term amaraiḥ refers to the hosts of their attendant divinities. (evam uktvā mahendrādaya ity arthaḥ. amaraiḥ parivāradevagaṇaiḥ.) D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the particle tu [tv amaraiḥ] for the plural pronoun te [te 'maraiḥ].

26. "Vāyu, bearer of scents" gandhavāhaḥ: Literally, "bearer of scents." See notes to verse 5 above.

"after telling . . . about the boons that had been granted" tam ākhyāya varaṃ dattam: Literally, "having told . . . that a boon had been given." The critical reading is awkward in that it uses the singular when the boons given were numerous. Ñ2,V1,B1,3,D2,5,10,11,T4,G2,M2,8,9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead taṃ varadattam. This reading yields the sense "having told [her] that he [i.e., Hanumān] had been given boons." Cg and Ct read the compound as a paranipāta for dattavaram, "to whom boons had been granted."

"he departed" viniḥsṛtaḥ: Literally, "[he] went out." D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous vinirgataḥ. Cr supplies the phrase "from the house (gṛhād iti śeṣaḥ)."

27. "Hanumān" eṣaḥ: Literally, "he."

"with his native strength" balenātmani saṃsthena: Literally, "with the strength situated within himself." D6,7,10,11,T,G1,M2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead javena, "with speed," for balena, "with strength."

"he swelled up like the ocean" so 'pūryata yathārṇavaḥ: Literally, "he was filled like the ocean." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead so 'sau pūrṇa ivārṇavaḥ, "he was as full as the ocean."

28. "Indeed . . . that" hi eṣaḥ: Note the hiatus. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead [a]pi tadā, "indeed . . . then."

"with strength" balena: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tarasā, "with speed or strength."

29. "He broke the sacrificial ladles, smashed the ritual vessels, and scattered the sacred fires and the piles of barkcloth garments belonging to those tranquil sages." srugbhāṇḍān agnihotraṃ ca valkalānāṃ ca saṃcayān / bhagnavichinnavidhvastān suśāntānāṃ karoty ayam //: Literally, "He made the ladles, vessels, agnihotra, and piles of barkcloth garments of the very peaceful ones broken, split, and scattered." D5,7,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the neuter srugbhāṇḍāny agnihotrāṇi, "ladles, vessels, [and] agnihotras," for srugbhāṇḍān agnihotraṃ ca, "the sacrificial ladles . . . the ritual vessels, scattered the sacred fire." D11 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read saṃśāntānām, "the thoroughly peaceful ones," for suśāntānāṃ, "the very peaceful ones." Cs understands the term to suggest that the boon of Brahmā had made Hanumān such that he had nothing to prevent his offensive behavior. The idea, apparently, is that the seers, being of a peaceful nature, would not be likely to curse him, but, as we see below at verse 32, they ultimately do curse Hanumān. (saṃśāntānām iti. etena niraparādhoparodho 'nena kṛta iti sūcyate.) Ct understands the reference to ladles and vessels to refer generally to sacrificial implements (yajñopakaraṇāni). He takes the term agnihotrāṇi to mean "the fires that are the means of accomplishing the agnihotra oblation (agnihotrasādhanabhūtāgnayaḥ)." Ct and Cm note that we are to take the adjectives in pāda c respectively with the implements, etc., mentioned in the first half of the verse (bhagnavichinnavidhvastaśabdāḥ srugbhāṇḍādiṣu krameṇa yogyāḥ—so Ct; Cm similarly).

Following verse 29, D5 (after second occurrence),6,7,10,11,G2,M1,3,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [722*]: "And that immensely powerful monkey[1] continued to do such things[2] (evaṃvidhāni karmāṇi prāvartata mahābalaḥ)."

30. "Knowing that [Brahmā] . . . the seers continued to tolerate this" jānanta ṛṣayas taṃ vai kṣamante tasya nityaśaḥ: D1–5,9,T1,4,G1,3,M3,5,10, and KK and VSP read śaktitaḥ, "because of the power," for nityaśaḥ, "constantly or continually," while D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead jānanta ṛṣayaḥ sarve sahante tasya śaktitaḥ, which is then read as an independent sentence, yielding the sense "Knowing this, all the ṛṣis endured it because of the power of him or that." Ct suggests adding the word "behavior (ceṣṭitam)" to construe with the genitive tasya, "that is, of his [i.e., Hanumān's]," and as the direct object of the verb sahante, "they endured" (sahante kṣamante tasya ceṣṭitam iti śeṣaḥ). The commentators are divided as to how to understand the phrase tasya śaktitaḥ. Cv understands the power to be the majesty of Śaṃbhu (i.e., Brahmā) (tasya śaktitaḥ śaṃbhor māhātmyāt). Cg understands the power to be that of Brahmā's boon (tasya śaktito brahmaṇo varaśaktitaḥ). Ct understands the term to refer to the power of Brahmā through the force of his boon (tasya brahmaṇaḥ śaktito varasāmarthyāt).

"Brahmā" brahmaṇā: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D1,3–7,10,11,T3,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śaṃbhunā, "by the beneficent one." Although the epithet "Śambhu" is most commonly used of Śiva, it is also used of Brahmā. The context as well as the commentators support the latter usage here. Cg additionally bolsters this interpretation with a citation from the AmaK 3.3.135 to the effect that the epithet refers both to Brahmā and to the three-eyed god (śambhū brahmatrilocanāv ity amaraḥ). Ck identifies śaṃbhu with the "four-faced Rudra (caturmukharudraḥ)." On his use of this term, see notes to 7.25.9.

"had granted him immunity from all chastisements" brahmadaṇḍānām avadhyam . . . kṛtam: Literally, "had made [him] invulnerable to the chastisements [daṇḍa—lit., 'the staff'] of the Brahmans." See verse 19 and notes above. Ś,Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6–8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular avadhyaḥ . . . kṛtaḥ, which then construes with mahābalaḥ, "[Hanumān] of immense strength," of 722*. See notes to verse 29 above.

31. "when" yadā: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tathā, "in this way." KK and VSP read instead yathā, "in which way," a reading that is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"and . . . together with Añjanā" sāñjanena ca: D5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead so 'ñjanīsutaḥ, "that son of Añjanī." D7 and KK and VSP read instead so 'ñjanāsutaḥ, "that son of Añjanā."

"continued to transgress all bounds" maryādāṃ laṅghayati: Literally, "he went beyond the limit." Cr glosses: "He went indeed beyond the path followed by the elders. This suggests his childishness (maryādāṃ vṛddhasevitapathaṃ laṅghayaty eva tena tasya bālatvaṃ sūcitam)."

32. "were annoyed, but not excessively wrathful or impatient" kruddhāḥ . . . nātikruddhātimanyavaḥ: Literally, "[they were] angry . . . [they were] were not overly angry or impatient." The expression is somewhat confusing. Cr has the most elaborate discussion of it, in which he tries to reconcile the fact that the ṛṣis are supposed to have suppressed their anger and yet, as moral guardians of the civilization, apparently must take some action against errant youth. He says: "Angry means they had restrained their anger, and, therefore, they were devoid of irritation. But because of the prescriptions, etc., they were those who withheld anger against those people who resorted to them. Still, those great seers were not excessively angry because of their reflection that the offense of a child should not be taken seriously. They were devoid of anger but had taken on a little annoyance. This being the case, they cursed Hanumān. By this is suggested the role of protectors of the bounds of morality on the part of the seers. (kruddhā nivṛttakopā ata eva vimanyava upadeśādinā svāśritajanakopanivartakā api maharṣayo nātikruddhā bālāparādho na gaṇanīya ityādi vicāreṇātikrodharahitāḥ svīkṛteṣatkopā ity arthaḥ santa enaṃ hanūmantaṃ śepur etenarṣiṇāṃ maryādāpālakatvaṃ dhvanitam.)" Ck, Cg, and Ct draw a distinction between krodhaḥ and manyuḥ, which both basically mean anger. They define the former as a desire to injure or kill and the latter as impatience (krodho jighāṃsā manyur amarṣaḥ). These three commentators, plus Cm, then understand the compound nātikruddhātimanyavaḥ to mean that the seers were neither excessively angry nor excessively impatient (atikruddhā atimanyavaś ca na bhavantīty arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cm similarly). See 7.35.46 and note, where Indra is similarly described.

33. Following verse 33, D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [724*]: "Only when you shall be reminded of your fame will your strength increase (yadā te smāryate kīrtis tat te vartate balam)."

34. "he was thus forced to forget his power and blazing energy " hṛtatejaujāḥ: Literally, "he whose blazing energy and power had been taken away." As Ck, Cg, and Ct all note, Hanumān has not actually lost his great strength, etc., but has merely been robbed of his knowledge of it (apahṛtasvavīryabalajñānaḥ). Cr and Cs ascribe the irregular sandhi of the compound -tejaujāḥ either to the peculiarities of the epic language or to the use of the synonymous, but less common, term teja for tejaḥ (tejaujā ity atra saṃdhir ārṣas tejaśabdasyādantatvaṃ vā—so Cr; tejaḥśabdaparyāyo 'yaṃ tejaśabdaḥ—so Cs). Cs distinguishes between the terms ojas, which he defines as the power of steadfastness or passive courage, and tejas, which he sees as referring to more active valor. He substantiates the distinction with recourse to the Viśvakośa. (ojo 'vaṣṭambhaśaktiḥ. tejaḥ parākramaḥ. ojo 'vaṣṭambhaprakāśayos tejo dhāmni parākrama iti ca viśvaḥ.)

"he took on a gentle nature, roaming" mṛdubhāvagataś caran: Literally, "[he], roaming, went to a gentle state." Ñ2,V1,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mṛdubhāvaṃ gato 'carat, "he who had gone to a gentle state, roamed."

"the . . . ashrams" eṣośramāṇi: The sequence is unusual and difficult to interpret, although the manuscript evidence supports the critical text's reading. The context clearly supports the idea that the reference is to the ashrams or hermitages of the seers, which Hanumān, having previously despoiled, now roams peacefully. Ck, Cg, and Ct, whom we follow, simply understand that this is an example of irregular epic sandhi in which the initial ā of āśramāṇi is elided. (eṣośramāṇīty ārṣaḥ sandhiḥ—so Cg and Ct; Ck similarly). Cr sees the sequence as showing regular sandhi for the elision of the initial short a of the term aśramāṇi, which he appears to take as a kenning for āśramas in the sense of "places that remove fatigue" (aśramāṇi śramanivartakāni tāny eva sthānāni). Cs reads the expression aśramāṇi adverbially in the sense that Hanumān adopted a gentle nature in such a way that those places would be free from the trouble [śrama] that he had himself caused (aśramāṇi svaprayuktaśramarahitāni yathā bhaveyus tathā mṛdubhāvaṃ mārdavaṃ gataḥ). Cs further notes that some manuscripts actually read āśramān, "ash-rams," in which case, he wryly notes, there is no need for any mental exertion. (eṣa tān āśramān eveti kāsucit pustakasaṃpuṭīṣu pāṭho 'sti. tatra tu anāyāsaḥ.)

"without violating them" nātyeti: Literally, "he does not go beyond or transgress." D10,12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāny eva, "those very ones."

35. "At that time . . . Ṛkṣarajas" atha ṛkṣarajāḥ: Note the hiatus. D10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead atharkṣarajasaḥ, which corrects the hiatus but substitutes the variant name ṛkṣarajasa, turning the name into an a-stem noun (ṛkṣarajasa ity akārāntaḥ—so Ck, Cg, and Ct similarly).

"like the sun in his blazing energy" tejasā iva bhāskaraḥ: Literally, "like the maker of light in his blazing energy." Note the hiatus. T1,2,M1, and KK and VSP read instead tejasā bhāskaraprabhaḥ, "who through [his] radiance had the blazing energy of the maker of light." This variant, of course, avoids the hiatus.

36. "that lord of the tawny monkeys" harīśvaraḥ: D3,9–11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead maheśvaraḥ, a term normally used as an epithet of Śiva, which here must be taken in its etymological sense of "the great lord."

"he succumbed to the rule of time" kāladharmeṇa saṃgataḥ: Literally, "he met with the rule or principle of kāla." This normally is a euphemism for natural death that is commonly found in the epic and purāṇic literature. D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yojitaḥ, "conjoined with," for saṃgataḥ, "met with."

37. "When he had passed away" tasminn astam ite: Literally, "when he had gone to setting or [his] end." The phrase astam plus a verb of motion is commonly used for the setting of the sun or moon beyond the western mountain. It is used frequently in the metaphorical sense of death or the end of anyone or anything. Compare notes to verse 42 below.

"set Vālin as king in his father's place and Sugrīva in that of Vālin" vālī . . . / pitrye pade kṛto rājā sugrīvo vālinaḥ pade //: Literally, "Vālin was made king in the paternal position, Sugrīva in Vālin's position." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr note that Vālin's former position, to which Sugrīva is promoted, is that of yuvarāja, "heir apparent" (vālinaḥ pade kṛtaḥ yuvarājatvena sthāpita ity arthaḥ—so Cr; Ck, Cg, and Ct similarly). It is noteworthy that his appointment seems to pass over the presumptive yuvarāja, Vālin's son Aṅgada, who will later be made yuvarāja when his father, Vālin, is killed and is succeeded by Sugrīva. See 4.25.11,35. On the position of yuvarāja, see notes to 6.51.10. D6,7,10,11,M2,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cātha . . . /. . . vālī, "and then . . . Vālin," for vālī . . . /. . . rājā, "Vālin . . . as king."

38. "And between Hanumān and Sugrīva" sugrīveṇa saṃam tv asya: Literally, "and of him together with Sugrīva." As elsewhere in this passage, the author seems oddly hesitant to mention Hanumān's name.

"unbreakable" ahāryam: Literally, "not to be removed." D10,11,T1,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ābālyam, "from childhood [onward]."

"indivisible" advaidham: Literally, "free from division or duality."

"free from any breach" chidravarjitam: Literally, "excluding or devoid of any breach or split." Cr, evidently taking chidra in its sense of "flaw or fault," understands the adjective to mean "free from mutual faultfinding (parasparaṃ doṣadarśanarahitam)."

"just as there is between wind and fire" anilasya yathāgninā: V1,D2,6,7,9–11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read anilasyāgninā yathā by transposition.

39. "Hanumān" eṣaḥ: Literally, "he." See notes to verse 38 above.

40. The verse, as it appears in the critical edition, is highly defective. It contains two subjects but has no explicit finite verb or any participle that might have substituted for one, making do with two present participles, one of which is irregular and neither of which can serve grammatically as a finite verb.

"And . . . he did not remind him . . . Nor did Māruti know his own strength." na hy eṣaḥ . . . vedayāno na ca hy eṣa balam ātmāni mārutiḥ //: Literally, "and he not causing to know . . . and he, Māruti, not [knowing] the strength in himself." We understand the form vedayānaḥ to be an irregular present participle of the causative of the verbal root √vid, "to know." Reading it in this way, we understand that Sugrīva, even though he was being hounded by his more powerful brother, failed to remind Hanumān, who was even more powerful than Vālin, of his own strength. If one reads in this way, one must bring down by anukarṣa the phrase na veda, "he did not know," from verse 39 above, which then refers to Māruti himself. Cv, Ck, and Cm, who read with the critical edition, understand the term as a simplex. Ck and Cm gloss jānānaḥ, "[not] knowing." Their idea, which is also shared by the commentators that do not share this reading, is that, although Sugrīva was, in fact, aware of Hanumān's immeasurable strength, he appeared to forget about it when he was being hounded in all directions by Vālin. (na hy eṣa iti. eṣa mārutir ātmani yadā balaṃ vedayāno jānāno bhavati tadaiṣa sugrīvo vālinā bhrāmyamāṇo 'pi nānādikṣu vibhrāmyamāṇo 'pi na bhavatīti saṃbandhaḥ. aparimitabalaśālihanumatsahitasugrīvasya vālinā bhrāmyamāṇatvān māruteḥ satprabalajñānam iva sugrīvasyāpi mārutibalaparijñānaṃ nāstīti bhāvaḥ—so Cm.) Ct and Cs, who do not share the reading (see below), explain the situation as follows: "Sugrīva, even though being driven out, did not know [Ct and Cs borrowing the phrase na veda from the previous verse] Hanumān's strength until the time of the latter's mission on behalf of the gods. Only then, when reminded by Jāmbavān at the seashore, was he possessed of that knowledge. (vālinā bhrāmyamāṇa eṣa sugrīvo 'pi tadbalaṃ na vedety anukarṣaḥ. tad api devakāryaṃ yāvad eva. tadā tu jāmbavatā smāritaḥ samudratīre tajjñānavān—so Ct; Cs similarly.)" See Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa sarga 65. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read deva jānāti na for vedayāno na, which lends the second line of the verse the sense "O lord, Māruti did not know the strength within him."

Following verse 40, Ś,Ñ1,V1,D,S (except M6), and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [726*]: "Forced to forget his strength because of the seers' curse,[1] that foremost of monkeys accompanied him in battle, standing by like a lion trapped in a cage[2] (ṛṣiśāpād dhṛtabalas tadaiṣa kapisattamaḥ / siṃhaḥ pañjararuddheva āsthitaḥ sahito raṇe //)."

[1] "Forced to forget his strength because of the seers' curse" ṛṣiśāpād dhṛtabalaḥ: Literally, "one whose strength was taken away because of the curse of the seers." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous compound ṛṣiśāpāhṛtabalaḥ.

[2] "trapped in a cage" pañjararuddheva: As Ck mentions, the sandhi is irregular (sandhir ārṣaḥ). Note, too, the hiatus between eva and āsthitaḥ. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kuñjararuddho vā, "or [like] a lion blocked by an elephant." The idea here, as noted by Ct, is that, unaware of his strength because of the curse, Hanumān simply stands by while Sugrīva is attacked and does not himself fight (ata eva raṇe kuñjararuddhaḥ siṃha iva sahito 'yam āsthitaḥ sthita eva na tu yuddhaṃ kṛtavān iti). Cs notes that what is suggested here is that even though Hanumān is capable of avoiding the curse, through his own desire to demonstrate his conformity with it, he resorts to play-acting (kuñjararuddhasiṃho vā siṃha iva. anena śāpaparihārasamartho 'pi svecchayā tadānukūlyaṃ saṃpādayan naṭanam āṭīkata hanumān iti sūcyate). Evidently Cs's idea is that, as in the case of Hanumān's allowing himself to be bound by Indrajit's weapons in order not to violate the boon of Brahmā (see 5.46.38–45 and notes), here he demonstrates his respect for the ṛṣis' curse, even though he is not actually constrained by it.

41. "valor, energy, intelligence, prowess, morality, kindness, political sense, dignity, cleverness, great strength, and fortitude" parākramotsāhamatipratāpaiḥ sauśīlyamādhuryanayānayaiś ca / gāmbhīryacāturyasuvīryadhairyaiḥ: The sequence -tāpaiḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D5,7,10,11,T4,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the first line as one long compound as opposed to two. Ct gives the most elaborate gloss of the various qualities attributed to Hanumān. He glosses them as follows: "parākramaḥ (valor) means energy in great feats of battle; the word utsāhaḥ (energy) refers to other actions that need to be done; matiḥ (intelligence) is decisiveness in one's affairs or matters; pratāpa (prowess) means power; sauśīlyam (morality) is good nature; mādhuryam (kindness) is sweetness with respect to speech; nayānayau (political sense; lit., 'good and bad policy'), according to other [scholars], means action and inaction with respect to knowledge of those two [i.e., good and bad policy]; gāmbhīryam (dignity) means calmness in a crisis; suvīryam (great strength) refers to the vanquishing of enemies through self-protection; and dhairyam (fortitude) is the state of having an unshakable mind. (parākramo mahatsv api yuddhakāryeṣūtsāhaḥ. utsāhapadenetarakāryaviṣayaḥ saḥ. matir arthanirdhāraṇam. pratāpaḥ prabhāvaḥ. sauśīlyaṃ susvabhāvatvam. mādhuryaṃ vāci. nayānayau tatparijñāne pravṛttinivṛttī ity anye. gāmbhīryam āpady akṣobhaḥ. suvīryaṃ svarakṣaṇena paraparābhavaḥ. dhairyam akampyacittatā.)" Ck and Cg generally agree with Ct but define fewer of the terms. They differ slightly, however, in defining gāmbhīrya, "profundity," which they understand to refer to profundity of thought or mind (cittasya), while they gloss dhairyam (fortitude) as "calmness in a crisis (āpady akṣobhaḥ)." Cr understands naya to refer to deference toward the truly great and anaya to refer to harshness toward the wicked (nayo mahātmasu vinamratānayaḥ khaleṣu pāruṣam).

42. "Long ago" purā: B1,D5–7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead punaḥ, "once again."

"faced the sun and, following it, walked" sūryonmukhaḥ pṛṣṭhagamaḥ: Literally, "[he] facing the sun [and he] going behind." Ct, the only commentator to explain the expression, glosses, "He went in such a way to remain facing the sun (sūryasāṃmukhyārtham)." D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead praṣṭumanāḥ, "with a mind to question," i.e., "eager to learn or inquisitive." On this variant, Cr glosses, "possessing the desire whose subject was the questioning of the sun (sūryāt praśnaviṣayikecchāvān.)" Recall that it was Sūrya that granted Hanumān the gift of mastery of the science of language. See verse 14 and notes above.

"from the eastern to the western mountain" udyadgirer astagirim: Literally, "from the mountain of rising to the mountain of setting." These are the mountains behind which the sun and moon are traditionally said to rise and set, respectively. Compare the notes to verse 37 above and 7.50.20. See, too, 6.39.15; 6.47.16; 6.57.20; 6.78.43; and notes. See also MBh 7.171.4. Note that the critical apparatus has omitted the notation "Cg" at the beginning of its quotation of Cg's commentary on this verse, making it appear to be part of the very brief citation of Cv (udyato girir ity udyadgiriḥ). Cg's comments start with the words "udyadgirer udayagirer ity arthaḥ (of the rising mountain, the meaning is 'the mountain of rising')."

"and so mastered that great subject" granthaṃ mahad dhārayat: Literally, "he bore or retained in memory that great treatise." We take the term grantha, normally "text or treatise," to refer here more broadly to the entire science or discipline of grammar. D10–12,M1,7,8,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the present participle dhārayan, "mastering." Ck, Cg, and Ct, commenting on the variant dhārayan, "mastering," gloss, "learning it both in terms of its substance and its recitation (arthataḥ pāṭhataś ca gṛhṇann ity arthaḥ)." Gorresio (1870, p. 151) apparently misunderstands the culture of traditional learning, which is normally imparted orally, or even, in some cases, mentally, from teacher to student. Therefore, he erroneously translates the phrase literally to mean "portando un grande libro." In another instance in which Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 526) appears to be markedly influenced by Gorresio (see notes to 7.30.34), the former literally renders Gorresio's Italian into the French "portant un grand livre." Roussel has, in turn, been followed by both Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 497), "with a large book" and Benoît (1999, p. 1319), "avec un grand livre."

Following verse 42, D6,7,10,11,T2,G1,3,M1,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D5,T1,4,M3 insert following verse 41, a passage of four lines [728*]: "And that foremost of monkeys gained perfect mastery of that great matter, including the sūtras, the vṛttis, and the arthapada, as well as the great work and its compendia.[1] Indeed, no one is his equal in śāstraic knowledge,[2] in erudition,[3] and in the science of metrics.[4] (sasūtravṛttyarthapadaṃ mahārthaṃ sasaṃgrahaṃ sādhyati vai kapīndraḥ / na hy asya kaścid sadṛśo 'sti śāstre vaiśārade chandagatau tathaiva //)

Ck, quoted by Ct, notes that it is well known that Hanumān is the author of the [so-called] Ninth Grammar (navamavyākaraṇakartā hanūmān iti prasiddhiḥ). Cs uses the identification of Hanumān as the ninth grammarian as part of his refutation of the opinion of Ck, Cg, and Ct (see below) that Hanumān had studied the works of Pāṇini, Patañjali, and the like. He says that it is illogical to think that someone who was capable of composing the Ninth Grammar would have followed those other texts. (navamavyākaraṇakaraṇasamarthasyaitad anusaraṇasyāyuktatvāc ca.)

[1] "that great matter, including the sūtras, the vṛttis, and the arthapada, as well as the great work and its compendia sasūtravṛttyarthapadaṃ mahārthaṃ sasaṃgraham": Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr understand these terms to be synonyms for the well-known major works of the Pāṇinian tradition. For example, Ct understands as follows: "The sūtras are those aphorisms classified by the Aṣṭādhyāyī. The vṛtti is the contemporary commentary on those sūtras. The arthapada, literally, 'words of meaning,' refers to the vārtikas. The term mahārtha, 'that thing of great worth or meaning,' which we take to refer to the subject of grammar in general, is said to be a reference to Patañjali's Mahābhāṣya, while the term saṃgraha refers to the lost work of that name composed by Vyāḍi. (sūtram aṣṭādhyāyī lakṣaṇam. vṛttis tātkālikasūtravṛttiḥ. arthapadaṃ sūtrārthabodhakapadavadvārtikam. mahārthaṃ mahābhāṣyaṃ patañjalikṛtam. sasaṃgrahaṃ vyāḍikṛtasaṃgrahākhyagranthasahitam.)" See, for example, Mahābhāṣya (Kielhorn [1962], vol. 1, p. 6, lines 12–14; vol. 1, p. 468, lines 11–12; etc.), etc. See Peterson 1891, p. 323. Ck, Cg, Cm, and Cr agree with the identifications the term mahārtha. Cm agrees with Ct in understanding that saṃgraha refers to the compendium of words produced by the ṛṣis (such as Vyāḍi) prior to the composition of the Mahābhāṣya (saṃgrahaṃ mahābhāṣyāt pūrvakālīnārṣaśabdagranthaḥ). Ck understands the term saṃgraha to refer a contemporary text serving as a compendium of the older grammatical treatises, that is, the sūtras, vṛttis, etc. (asmadādibhir asmin kāla iva tatkālīnakṛtasūtravṛttivārtikabhāṣyārthasaṃgrāhaka saṃgrahākhyamahāgranthasahitam). Cg understands the term saṃgraha to refer to the prakaraṇas (grammatical texts that deal with subjects by topic, like the Siddhāntakaumudī), etc. [prakaraṇādi]). Cr, somewhat similarly, understands the term to refer to works that concern the sūtras, verbal roots, etc. (sautradhātvādiśāstram). Cs understands that the sūtras are the eternal Śivasūtras that were produced from the God's ḍamaru drum; the vṛtti refers to commentary on those sūtras; and arthapada refers to contemporary commentary on the vṛtti. Cs takes the term mahārtham simply as a descriptive adjective meaning "endowed with much meaning" and saṃgraha to be a text of that name. Cs ridicules Ct for identifying these works as those in the tradition of Pāṇini and Patañjali, etc., since, he argues ironically, it must be through the power of his deeds since antiquity that he, Nāgojibhaṭṭa, is able to know the relative antiquity of Hanumān, on the one hand, and the grammarians such as Pāṇini and Patañjali, on the other. Cs notes that we contemporary scholars with our fragile bodies are unable to make such calculations. He further notes that there is no issue of "relative antiquity" because the Śivasūtras are, in fact, eternal, and Pāṇini, in his desire to promulgate them on earth, acquired them through the practice of asceticism. (sasūtravṛttyarthapadaṃ sūtraṃ śivaḍamaruniḥsṛtaṃ caturdaśalakṣaṇam. vṛttiḥ sūtravṛttiḥ. arthapadaṃ tadarthabodhakaṃ tatkālavartipadam. mahārthaṃ bahvarthopetam. sasaṃgrahaṃ saṃgrahākhyagranthasahitam . . . iti vyākurvan nāgojibhaṭṭo hanumataḥ pāṇinipatañjalyādīnāṃ prācīnatāṃ svaprācīnācīrṇakarmavaśāj jānātīti na vayam adhunātanatanutanavo vyākartuṃ prabhavāmaḥ . . . a-i-u-ṇādīnāṃ sūtrāṇāṃ nityatvād bhūmau pravartayituṃ pāṇinis tapaḥ kṛtvā labdhavāṃs tānīty upapatteḥ.)

[4] "in the science of metrics" chandagatau: This odd term seems to be irregular for chandogati, which would then refer to "the way or path of metrics." Cg glosses, "in the science of metrics (chandaḥśāstre)." Ct takes the term chandagatau as a reference to vedic learning and links it with vaiśārade to lend the phrase the sense "in erudition in the form of resolution of the meaning of the vedas through the pūrva and uttara mīmāṃsā (chandagatau pūrvottaramīmāṃsāmukhena vedārthanirṇaye vaiśārade vaiduṣye)." Cs glosses, "the knowledge of chandas, that is, metrics," noting that the term chanda used here is a synonym for the expected chandaḥ. (chandagatau chandojñāne. chandaḥśabdaparyāyo 'yaṃ chandaśabdaḥ.)"

The meter is upajāti.

Following 728*, D10,11,T2,3,G2,3,M1,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while D6–7,T1,4,M3 insert following verse 43, and M2 inserts following verse 42, a passage of two lines [729*]: "In all branches of knowledge and in the practice of asceticism, he[1] rivaled the guru of the gods[2] (sarvāsu vidyāsu tapovidhāne praspardhate 'yaṃ hi guruṃ surāṇām /)."

[1] "he" [a]yam: M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead the relative pronoun yaḥ, "[he] who."

[2] "the guru of the gods" guruṃ surāṇām: The reference is, of course, to Bṛhaspati.

The meter is upajāti.

Following 729*, M3 and KK (7.36.50ab), GPP (in brackets, between 7.36.45–46), Gita Press (7.36.47ab), and VSP (7.3.6.48ab) continue with a passage of two lines [730*]: "He will master the substance of the nine grammatical systems[1] and, through your grace, will even become Brahmā[2] (so 'yaṃ navavyākaraṇārthavettā brahmā bhaviṣyaty api te prasādāt /)."

[1] "He will master the substance of the nine grammatical systems" navavyākaraṇārthavettā: Literally, "He [will be] a knower of the meaning of the navavyākaraṇa." The term navavyākaraṇa is ambiguous. It can refer to the nine systems of grammar or the new grammar. Given the commentaries on 728*, which indicate that Hanumān is the author or compiler of the ninth system of grammar, we, along with Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2041), understand the reference here to be to the nine systems. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 493), the only other translator to render this passage, translates, "He . . . will promulgate a new Grammar." On the notion of a new grammar, see Kathāsaritsāgara 1.2.1, where Varuruci is identified as Kātyāyana, an early promulgator of the Aindra system. At KSS 1.4.22–25 Śiva graces Pāṇini, a dull student, with a new grammar, and Śiva then destroys the Aindra grammar (sarvavidyāmukhaṃ tena prāptaṃ vyākaraṇaṃ navam [22] . . . tena pranaṣṭam aindraṃ tad asmadvyākaraṇaṃ bhuvi [25]). At KSS 1.7.4–14, Kārttikeya reveals the Kātantra to Śarvavarman (śabdaśāstram . . . abhinavaṃ laghu [14]). On the number of grammatical systems, see Belvalkar 1915. See notes to verse 14 above.

[2] "will even become Brahmā" brahmā bhaviṣyaty api: The expression is rather odd. Brahmā, unlike deities such as Indra, etc., does not disappear at the end of a cosmic era and so technically cannot be replaced, nor can his position be assumed by another being, no matter how learned or virtuous. Perhaps Gita Press (1969, vol. 3, p. 2041) is right to take the expression metaphorically, translating, "shall prove to be a very Brahmā." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 493) takes it literally, rendering, "and in the course of time, [he will] become Brahmā."

43. "eager to inundate the world" pravīvivikṣoḥ: Literally, "[of the ocean], who is desiring to enter." Ck, Cg, and Ct read the two upasargas pra and vi as short forms of intensive adverbial nouns, prakarṣeṇa, "to a high degree," and viśeṣeṇa, "especially," noting also the irregular length of -vī-. Their general understanding is that the reference is to the ocean wishing to inundate or submerge the land at the end of a cosmic era. (pravīvivikṣor iti dīrghacchāndasaḥ. yugānte bhūmim āplāvayituṃ prakarṣeṇa viśeṣeṇa veṣṭum icchoḥ—so Ck; Cg and Ct similarly.) Cr, oddly, takes the simile to refer to Viṣṇu when he was preparing to slay the conch-shell demon named Pañcajana (pañcajanavadhodyataviṣṇor iva).

"Agni, the purifier, eager to consume all the worlds" lokān didhakṣoḥ . . . pāvakasya: Literally, "of the purifier, who is wishing to burn the worlds."

"like Yama, the ender of all things, at the times of universal destruction" lokakṣayeṣv eva yathāntakasya: Literally, "just as of Antaka during the actual destructions of the worlds." KK and VSP read yugakṣaye hy, "indeed at the waning of the yuga[s]," for lokakṣayeṣu, "during the destructions of the worlds." See 6.87.24 and note.

44. "He himself" eṣo 'pi: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead eṣeva, which by irregular sandhi should be read as eṣa iva, "like him."

"Tārā's son" -tāreya-: The matronymic refers to Aṅgada.

"were created by the gods on your behalf" tvatkāraṇāt . . . suraiḥ . . . sṛṣṭāḥ: Cr explains that, like Hanumān, these other monkeys, Sugrīva, etc., were created, that is, manifested through prayer or petition, by the gods because of Rāma, that is, for the purpose of serving him (eṣa hanūmān ivānye 'pi sugrīvādayas tvatkāraṇāt tvatsevārūpahetoḥ suraiḥ sṛṣṭāḥ prārthanayā prakaṭitāḥ). Cr is referring to Brahmā's instructions to the gods to take on the form of powerful monkeys to aid Viṣṇu in his incarnation as Rāma at Bālakāṇḍa sarga 16.

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 44, D5–7,10–11,T,G1,2,M1–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.36.48) insert a passage of four lines [731*]: "And also on your behalf, Lord Rāma, together with those monkey lords, the gods created these apes: Gaja, Gavākṣa, Gavaya, Sudaṃṣṭra,[1] Mainda, Jyotimukha, and Nala (gajo gavākṣo gavayaḥ sudaṃṣṭro maindaḥ prabhavo jyotimukho nalaś ca / ete 'pi ṛkṣāḥ saha vānarendrais tvatkāraṇād rāma surair hi sṛṣṭāḥ //)."

[1] "Sudaṃṣṭra" sudaṃṣṭraḥ: Literally, "possessing excellent fangs." A monkey of this name is mentioned at 6.47.40. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 493) takes the term inaccurately and unpersuasively as an adjective modifying Gavaya and having the sense "of the powerful jaw."

The meter is upajāti.

Following 731*, D7,T4, and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.36.48ab) continue, while Ś,Ñ,V1,B4,D1,4,8,12, and Lahore insert following verse 44, a passage of two lines [732*]: "All[1] the immensely powerful hosts of gods thus came to earth for the purpose of Rāvaṇa's destruction (mahīṃ gatā devagaṇāḥ samagrā mahābalā rāvaṇanāśahetoḥ /)."

[1] "All" samagrāḥ: B4,D3,T4, and KK read instead the synonymous samastāḥ.

The meter is upajāti.

Following 732*, D7,T4, and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.36.48cd) insert a passage of two lines [734*]: "And let this—the earthly sojourn of the leaping monkeys—be known to you from me" (etat tu matto viditaṃ tavāstu plavaṃgamānāṃ dharaṇīnivāsaḥ /)."

The meter is upajāti.

45. "I have told you everything" etat kathitaṃ sarvam: Literally, "all this has been narrated or told."

"the deeds" karmaitat: Literally, "this deed or action."

"in his childhood" bālabhāve: Literally, "in the state or condition of a child."

Following verse 45, D5,6,7 (m.),10,11,T1–3,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a passage of three lines [736*]: "Having heard Agastya's tale, Rāma, Saumitri, and the monkeys, together with the rākṣasas, were filled with the greatest wonder. Agastya then said to Rāma: 'You have now heard everything.' "[1]

[1] "You have now heard everything" sarvam etac chrutaṃ tvayā: Literally, "all this has been heard by you."

46. Compare Prakṣipta II, sarga 5.62 (= App. I, No. 3, lines 376–377), which is a close variant of verse 46.

"Having seen and conversed with you" dṛṣṭaḥ saṃbhāṣitaś cāsi: Literally, "you are seen and conversed with."

Following 46ab, D5–7,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of fifteen lines [737*]: "When Rāghava had heard these words of Agastya, of fierce austerities, he bowed with hands cupped in reverence and said this to the great seer:[1–2] 'Today all[1] the divinities, the ancestors, and my forefathers,[2] together with all my kinsmen, are eternally pleased with me because of my having obtained the sight of you.[3–4] But having conceived a desire, I have something to request, which I will tell you. You, sir, should fulfill it on my behalf out of compassion.[5–6] Having first established the people of the town and countryside in their proper occupations, I have come here. Through the power of you virtuous gentlemen, I[3] shall now perform sacrifices.[7–8] And[4] you immensely powerful gentlemen should always be present at my sacrifices as I long for your favor.[9–10] Relying on you, who have been cleansed of sin through your austerities, and favored by my ancestors, I shall be extremely happy.[11–12] Therefore, all of you gentlemen must always come here together.' When those seers of fierce austerities, starting with Agastya, had heard that, they promised:[5] 'Let it be so.' They then began to depart.[13–15]"

[1] "all" sarve: D7,10,11, and GPP (7.36.53), NSP (7.36.53), and Gita Press (7.36.55) read instead tuṣṭāḥ, "pleased, gratified," while KK (7.36.59) and VSP (7.36.55) read instead hṛṣṭāḥ, "delighted."

[2] "the ancestors, and my forefathers" pitaraḥ prapitāmahāḥ: Literally, "the fathers, the great-grandfathers." The former term refers here to the generic class of the departed ancestors who dwell in the pitṛloka, while the latter refers to Rāma's specific lineal forefathers.

[3] "I" aham: KK and VSP read instead eva, "indeed."

[4] "And" hi: D10,11, and GPP (7.36.56), NSP (7.36.56), and Gita Press (7.36.58) read instead tu, "but," while KK (7.36.62) and VSP (7.36.58) read instead tat, "so or thus."

[5] "they promised" saṃśrutya: Literally, "having promised." D10,11, and GPP (7.36.59), NSP (7.36.59), and Gita Press (7.36.61) read instead taṃ procya, "having proclaimed to him," while KK (7.36.64) and VSP (7.36.61) read instead taṃ coktvā, "and having said to him."

Following 7.36.46cd, D5–7,T1,2,4,G1,3,M1,3,8, and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.36.65.cd) and VSP (in brackets, numbered as 7.36.62cd) insert a passage of one line [738*]: "Having been respectfully saluted, those great ones were dismissed by Rāghava (abhivādya mahātmāno rāghaveṇa visarjitāḥ)."

Following verse 46, V1,D1–4,8,10–12,T3,G2,M2,4,5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [739*]: "And Rāghava, wonderstruck, continued to ponder that matter. Then, when the sun[1] had set, he, having dismissed the kings and monkeys . . . (rāghavaś ca tam evārthaṃ cintayāmāsa vismitaḥ / tato 'staṃ bhāskare yāte visṛjya nṛpavānarān //)."

[1] "when the sun" bhāskare: Literally, "[when] the maker of light . . ."

Following 739*, D1–7,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of two lines [740*]: "Then, when that foremost among the best of men had duly performed the sandhyā ritual and the night had come on, he withdrew to his inner apartments (saṃdhyām upāsya vidhivat tadā naravarottamaḥ / pravṛttāyāṃ rajanyāṃ tu so 'ntaḥpuracaro 'bhavat //)."

[Prakṣipta II, sargas 1–5, follows sarga 36; see pp. 1305–18]

Before 7.37.1, Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–6,S, and Lahore and Gorresio insert App. I, No. 4, a passage of seventy-four lines. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert lines 1–46 of App. I, No. 4, and then, following line 46, insert Prakṣipta II, sargas 1–5 (= App. I, No. 3). These same manuscripts and editions then insert App. I, No. 4, lines 47–74, following Prakṣipta II, sargas 1–5 (= App. I, No. 3). App. I, No. 4, lines 1–46 = Lahore, sarga 40; Gorresio, sarga 41; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, sarga 37).

"When the self-aware[1] Kākutstha had been consecrated in keeping with righteousness, the first night[2] passed, enhancing the joys of his subjects.[1–2] On the next day, when the night had once more[3] given way to dawn, excellent[4] bards presented themselves at the residence of the king.[3–4] They all had sweet voices and were as well trained as the kinnaras. Joyous, they praised and delighted the sleeping king at the proper time.[5][5–6] 'Awaken gentle hero, increaser of Kausalyā's joy. For when you are asleep, lord of men, the whole world sleeps.[7–8] Your valor is like that of Viṣṇu, and your beauty like that of the Aśvins. Your intellect is equal[6] to that of Bṛhaspati, and you are the equal of Prajāpati.[9–10] Your patience is equal to that of the earth. In blazing splendor you are comparable to the sun.[7] Your speed is equal to that of Vāyu. Your profundity is like that of the sea.[11–12] You are as unshakable as Sthāṇu,[8] and such mildness is only found in the moon.[13] None of the kings that came before or will come after were or will be as unassailable, as constant in righteousness, or as beneficent to their subjects as are you,[9] O lord of men.[14–15] Neither fame nor fortune will ever abandon[10] you, O bull among men. Majesty and righteousness are ever established in you, O Kākutstha.'[16–17] These and others were the sweet hymns of praise that were sung to awaken Rāghava. They were sung by those bards, who knew the essence of praise.[11][18–19] Leaving his bed, which was covered with a white spread,[12] he arose like Hari Nārāyaṇa from his serpent bed.[13][20–21] And once that great-armed hero had arisen,[14] a thousand devoted servants, their hands cupped in reverence, brought[15] him water in shining vessels.[22–23] When he had bathed and become pure, he made the water offering to his ancestors.[16] He then offered oblations to Agni, the eater of oblations, and then proceeded at once to the sacred sacrificial enclosure[17] frequented by the Ikṣvākus.[24–25] After he had worshiped the gods, the ancestors, and the brahmans there according to the ritual prescriptions, Rāma, surrounded by the people, went into an outer chamber.[26–27] His great counselors, together with his household priests headed by Vasiṣṭha, attended upon him, all of them blazing like fires.[28–29] Great kshatriyas, the lords of various kingdoms, entered[18] at Rāma's side like the immortal gods at Śakra's.[30–31] Bharata, Lakṣmaṇa, and illustrious Śatrughna[19][32] followed him as attendants, with delighted faces, cupping their hands in reverence.[20][33] And many servants, truly delighted, were in attendance at Rāma's side.[21][34] Twenty immensely powerful and enormously energetic monkeys,[22] who could take on any form at will and were headed by Sugrīva, attended upon Rāma.[35–36] And Vibhīṣaṇa, accompanied by four rākṣasas,[23] attended upon the great king as might the guhyakas[24] upon Kubera, the lord of wealth.[25][37–38] Also, learned men of noble families who were advanced in vedic knowledge waited upon the king, bowing their heads.[39–40] And thus the king was surrounded by majestic and outstanding seers,[26] immensely powerful kings, and monkeys, along with rākṣasas, just as the lord of the gods is constantly attended by seers.[41–43] He was so radiant that he excelled thousand-eyed Indra[27] in beauty.[44] And while they were seated there, many very charming stories, replete with righteousness, were told by great seers who were learned in the purāṇas.[45–46]"

[1] "self-aware" viditātmani: It seems that the term should be taken in this sense, in light of the fact that, prior to the fulfillment of his mission and his consecration, Rāma was represented as not being aware of who he really was. See 6.105.10 and note.

[2] "the first night" sā niśā pūrvā: We interpret the term pūrvā, normally "prior or former," with Cg and Ct, who take the term in its sense of "first (prathamā)." Cs glosses similarly as his second alternative. For his first, he breaks the sequence niśāpūrvā into niśā and apūrvā, "wonderful or unprecedented night." He then explains that the night was wonderful because it brought about the burgeoning of joy never before experienced. (apūrvāścaryāvahā. tatra hetur ananubhūtaharṣavardhīnīti. pūrvā prāthamikīti vā.) V1,B3,D10,11,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute the relative pronoun yā for sā.

[3] "once more" punaḥ: D5–7,T4,M3,6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prātaḥ, "in the morning."

[4] "excellent" saumyāḥ: Literally, "auspicious."

[5] "delighted . . . sleeping . . . at the proper time" suptaṃ yathākālaṃ praharṣiṇaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4 (as given in the apparatus), and NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vīraṃ yathāvat saṃpraharṣiṇaḥ, "Supremely delighted . . . the heroic king in accordance with proper procedure." GPP breaks up the sequence to read vīraṃ yathā vatsaṃ praharṣiṇaḥ, "Delighted . . . that heroic king . . . as [they] might Vatsa or a child." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 494) understands the referent to be to King Vatsa, presumably a reference to the legendary king Udayana. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 527) reads this sequence and renders, "leur prince vaillant, comme un fils chéri." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 499), who renders, "to that valiant prince as to a cherished son," and Benoît (1999, p. 1320), who translates, "le roi héroïque, tel un fils chéri." Neither interpretation is very persuasive, and we believe that the breakup of words on which these translations are based is erroneous.

[6] "your intellect is equal" buddhiḥ . . . tulyā: Literally, "the mind or intellect is equal." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,10,11,T3,4,G3,M3,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Pres, KK, and VSP read instead buddhyā . . . tulyaḥ, giving the passage the sense "you are the equal of Bṛhaspati in [lit., 'through'] intellect."

[7] "sun" bhāskara-: Literally, "maker of light."

[8] "Sthāṇu" sthāṇuḥ: The term here must be taken as an epithet of Śiva, as its other meanings, some of which have been adopted by translators, such as "post" or "stake," are contextually inappropriate, for example, Dutt's "Thou art stable like a stake" (1894, p. 1705).

[9] "as unassailable . . . as are you" yathā tvam asi durdharṣaḥ: KK and VSP read instead yathā tvam atidurdharṣaḥ, "as extremely unassailable as you." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[10] "neither fame nor fortune will ever abandon" na . . . kīrtiḥ prajahate lakṣmīś ca: Literally, "fame does not abandon and fortune." Note the plural for the expected dual. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the nearly synonymous na . . . jahāti kīrtiś ca lakṣmīś ca.

[11] "hymns of praise that were sung to awaken Rāghava . . . by [those bards], who knew the essence of praise" stūtayaḥ stūtitattvajñair bodhayanti sma rāghavam: Literally, "The hymns of praise by those who knew the essence of praise awakened Rāghava." The critical apparatus on line 19 shows a number of substitutions and repetitions. Rather than replicate the rather confusing textual evidence, we will only provide the variants known to GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP [= their 7.37.10]. They read instead:

sūtāś ca saṃstavair divyair bodhayanti sma rāghavam /
stutibhiḥ stūyamānābhiḥ pratyabudhyata rāghavaḥ //

And the bards awakened Rāghava with heavenly panegyrics. Thus Rāghava was awakened by hymns of praise, which were being chanted [lit., "being praised"].

[12] "which was covered with a white spread" pāṇḍurapracchadāstṛtam: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous pāṇḍurācchādanāstṛtam. Ct understands, "a cloth serving as the top cover (pāṇḍurācchādanam uttarācchādanapaṭaḥ)."

[13] "from his serpent bed" nāgaśāyanāt: The reference is to the white serpent Śeṣa, who serves as Viṣṇu's bed in the cosmic ocean. The whiteness of the serpent parallels the whiteness of Rāma's bed cover.

[14] "once that great-armed hero had arisen" tam utthitaṃ mahābāhum: Literally, "[brought] to that arisen great-armed [one]." B4,D2,M6,7, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read saṃutthitam, "arisen," for tam utthitam, "that [one] arisen," while D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mahātmānam, "the great [one]," for mahābāhum, "the great-armed [one]."

[15] "servants . . . brought" narāḥ/. . . upajahruḥ: Literally, "the men brought." Ñ,V1,3,D1–7,9–11,T1,2,4,G, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read upatasthuḥ, "they waited upon or served," for upajahruḥ, "they brought." With this variant the syntax of the verse is defective, as there is no way to construe the accusative salilam, "water." Cg and Ct suggest adding the gerund gṛhitvā, "having fetched," while Cr glosses upatasthuḥ as "they caused [him] to obtain (prāpayāmāsuḥ)."

kṛtodakaḥ śucir bhūtvā snātvā: Literally, "He by whom the water offering was made, having become pure, having bathed." We understand the term kṛtodakaḥ, which can mean either "he by whom a [water] bath has been made or he by whom the udaka or rite of water offering to the departed ancestors has been performed," in the latter sense. This, we believe, is confirmed by the immediately following passage [line 26], which explicitly states that Rāma had worshiped his ancestors as well as the gods. Moreover, to take it in the former sense in the critical reading would create a redundancy with the gerund snātvā, "having bathed." D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāle, "at the [proper] time." This avoids the redundancy mentioned above and permits the commentators and translators to understand the compound kṛtodakaḥ in the sense of "he by whom a bath has been made." Thus Cr glosses, "having performed his bath, etc., which was connected with that water (udakaṃ tatsambandhi snānādi kṛtvā)." In a similar vein, KK and VSP read the variant kṛtodakaśucir bhūtvā, "having become pure through bathing." Cg glosses, "pure through bathing means he made himself pure by means of water (kṛtodakaśucir udakena kṛtaśauca ity arthaḥ)."

[17] "the . . . sacrificial enclosure" vedīgṛham: Literally, "the altar-house." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead devāgāram, "the chamber of the god." The referent is to a shrine or temple.

[18] "entered" viviśuḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,10,11,T4,G2,M6,8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous upāviśan, "they entered."

[19] Following line 32, B1,4,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G1 (after line 33),2,3,M1,3,6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [5*]: "[Bharata, Lakṣmaṇa, and illustrious Śatrughna], delighted, attended upon him as do the three vedas the sacrifice (upāsāṃcakrire hṛṣṭā vedās traya ivādhvaram /)."

[20] "followed him, as attendants, with delighted faces, cupping their hands in reverence" yātāḥ prāñjalayo bhūtvā kiṃkarā muditānanāḥ: The sequence of lines 32–33 is somewhat awkward, as it seems inappropriate that Rāma's princely brothers should be referred to as kiṃkarāḥ, literally, "servants or slaves." This, however, is a sequence with which Cv, who calls it a variant reading, is familiar. The insert line 5* (see note 19 above) should have been included, it seems, or is an attempt to remedy the problem. If read on its own, the sense of the line would be "and his attendants followed him, with delighted faces, cupping their hands in reverence."

[21] "And many servants, truly delighted, were in attendance at Rāma's side." bhṛtyāś ca rāmapārśvasthā bahavaḥ samupāsire: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead muditā nāma pārśvasthā bahavaḥ samupāviśan, "greatly delighted, many waited upon him at his side." Ct, who reads this line with line 33, understands the phrase muditā nāma, "truly delighted," in the sense of "named the Muditas," seeing this as the name of one group of Rāma's servants (muditā nāma tannāmakāḥ kiṃkarāḥ). This interpretation is followed by a number of translators.

[22] "twenty . . . monkeys" vānarāḥ . . . viṃśatiḥ: Cv, Ck, and Ct take the challenge posed by the specific number twenty, and each provides an identical list of the most prominent (atipradhānāḥ—so Cv) of these monkeys.

[23] "by four rākṣasas" rakṣobhiś caturbhiḥ: These would be, no doubt, the four rākṣasa attendants of Vibhīṣaṇa known from the Yuddhakāṇḍa. Their names are Anala, Śarabha, Saṃpāti, and Praghasa. See 6.11.3 and notes. It is somewhat noteworthy that the commentators, who have gone to the trouble of naming all twenty principal monkeys, show no interest in the names of Vibhīṣaṇa's attendants here.

[24] "guhyakas" guhyakāḥ: A class of semidivine beings who wait upon Kubera, the god of wealth. The term sometimes is distinct from yakṣa and sometime identical with it. Compare MeghDū 1 and 5. GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the singular, guhyakaḥ, "a guhyaka."

[25] "upon Kubera, the lord of wealth" dhaneśam: Literally, "the lord of wealth."

[26] "by . . . outstanding seers" ṛṣisattamaiḥ: Literally, "by the foremost of seers." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ṛṣibhir varaiḥ, "by excellent seers," while KK and VSP read instead ṛṣibhir vṛtaḥ, "surrounded by seers."

[27] "thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣāt: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

Following line 46, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert Prakṣipta II, sargas 1–5 (= App. I, No. 3), see notes to Prakṣipta II, sargas 1–5. App. I, No. 4, lines 47–74 = sarga 38 of GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP; Gorresio 7.42.1–13; Lahore 7.40.22–35. [Lines 1–46 occur before sarga 37.]

"And so, in this fashion, great-armed Rāghava spent[1] day after day ordering all of the affairs of the people of the city and the countryside.[47–48] Then, after some days, Rāghava, cupping his hands in reverence, spoke these words to Vaideha, the lord of Mithilā: [49–50] 'It is because you are our guru that we are thus engaged here,[2] and we are protected by you,[3] sir. And it is through your fierce, blazing energy,[4] sir, that I slew Rāvaṇa. [51–52] Between all the Ikṣvākus and all the Maithilas unparalleled relations of affection have developed since our alliance, your majesty.[53–54] You may now return to your own city,[5] your majesty, taking with you many precious things.[6] Bharata will follow close behind you as your companion.[7]'[55–56] Saying, 'So be it!' the king then[8] spoke these words to Rāghava: 'I am delighted, your majesty, at having seen you and with your victory.[9][57–58] And those precious things, which have been collected and brought[10] for my sake, I shall give them[11] to my daughter,[12] your majesty.'[13][59–60] Then, when Janaka had departed, Rāghava, cupping his hands in reverence, addressed these words[14] to his maternal uncle, Lord Kaikeya:[15][61–62] 'This kingdom, I, and Bharata together with Lakṣmaṇa are dependent on you, lord, for you are our refuge,[16] bull among men.[63–64] But the king is old and will be missing you.[17] Therefore, I would like you[18] to depart this very day, your majesty.[65–66] And Lakṣmaṇa, taking with him much[19] wealth and many precious things, will follow behind[20] you with a retinue.'[67–68] Then, Yudhājit said to Rāghava[21] with respect to his departure: 'So be it! But let the precious things and wealth remain with you, undiminished.'[69–70] Then, after reverently circumambulating the king, and having first been respectfully saluted and circumambulated by Rāma,[22] the[23] lord of the Kekayas, increaser of the Kekaya lineage, departed with Lakṣmaṇa as his companion, just as did Vāsava with Viṣṇu when the asura Vṛtra had been vanquished.[24][71–74]"

[1] "in this fashion . . . spent" evam āste: Literally, "he sat or stayed in this way." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand evam, "in this fashion," to mean "being honored by all (sarvopāsyamāna ity arthaḥ)."

[2] "It is because you are our guru that we are thus engaged here" bhavato gauravavyagrāḥ: Literally, "because of you, sir, we are occupied through [your] venerableness." Cv, the only commentator to share this reading, glosses, "Because of your being a guru, we have come here quickly (bhavato gauraveṇa vayam iha śīghram āgatāḥ)." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhavān hi gatir avyagrāḥ, "you are our unshakable recourse."

[3] "and we are protected by you" bhavatā pālitā vayam: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the phrase to refer to Janaka's protection of Rāma's lineage through his gift of his daughters, etc. (kanyāpradānādinā pālitavaṃśāḥ).

[4] "through your fierce blazing energy" tejasogreṇa: Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "the power of austerities (tapovīryeṇa)."

[5] "your own city" svapuram: KK and VSP read instead svapurīm, a variant not noted in the critical apparatus.

[6] "many precious things" ratnāni: Literally, "gems." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, these would be the fine items gifted by Rāma (asmābhir dīyamānottamavastūni—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

[7] "will follow close behind you as your companion" sahāyas te pṛṣṭhataś cānuyāsyati: Literally, "and he will follow behind you as companion." D6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sahāyārtham, "for the sake of companionship," for sahāyas te, "[behind] your . . . companion." M3 and KK and VSP read te 'nuyāsyati "he will follow you," for cānuyāsyati, "and he will follow." Ck and Ct note that following a dear kinsman is for the sake of showing respect (iṣṭabandhūnām anugamanarūpa-satkārārtham).

[8] "Saying, 'So be it!' the king then" tatheti sa nṛpaḥ kṛtvā: Literally, "having rendered, 'So be it!' the king." D7,10,11, and GPP, Gita Press, and NSP read instead sa tatheti tataḥ kṛtvā, "Then having rendered, 'So be it!' he," while KK and VSP read sa tatheti nṛpaḥ kṛtvā, "Then having rendered, 'So be it!' the king." The variant of KK and VSP is not noted in the critical apparatus. Cv understands Janaka's expression "So be it!" to indicate his acceptance of Rāma's precious gifts (tatheti tadratnādyādānaṃ kṛtvā).

[9] "and with your victory" jayena: Literally, "with victory." V1,B3,D6,7,10,11,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nayena, "with [your] conduct of state."

[10] "And those . . . which have been . . . brought" yāny āhṛtāni: Ñ,V1,3,D1–7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yāny etāni tu, "but these, which."

[11] "I shall give them" tāni vai . . . dadāmi ca: Literally, "and indeed I shall give those." B3,4,D6,7,10,11,T4,M1,6,8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tāny aham . . . dadāmi vai, "indeed, I shall give those."

[12] "to my daughter" duhitre: Literally, "to the daughter." D7,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead duhitroḥ, "to the two daughters." The reference is to Sītā and Ūrmilā, who is the wife of Lakṣmaṇa (1.70.22).

[13] Following line 60, T4,M3, and GPP (in brackets, between 7.38.7 and 7.38.9), KK (7.38.8), and VSP (7.38.8) insert a passage of two lines [15*]: "When he had addressed Kākutstha in this fashion, with a delighted mind, majestic Janaka proceeded to Mithilā, after taking his leave from Rāghava (evam uktvā tu kākutsthaṃ janako hṛṣṭamānasaḥ / prayayau mithilāṃ śrīmāṃs tam anujñāya rāghavam //)."

[14] "addressed these words" vākyam etad uvāca ha: D6,7,10,11,G2,M1,5,6,8, and GPP, NSP, and GPP read instead vinayād vākyam abravīt, "he spoke words out of humility."

[15] "Lord Kaikeya" kaikeyam . . . prabhum: Literally, "the Kaikeyan lord." As several of the commentators point out, this reference is to the Kaikeyan prince Yudhājit, Kaikeyī's brother (2.1.2). Ñ2,D10,11,G,M8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kekayam, "Lord Kekaya." B3,D6, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read the nominative singular masculine prabhuḥ, "lord," for the accusative singular prabhum, "lord." In this variant reading the term would then refer to Rāghava. Ck, Cg, and Ct all identify the Kaikeyan lord here as Rāma's maternal uncle Yudhājit (kekayaṃ mātulam iti yudhājitam ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly). This king is also called Aśvapati at 2.1.6.

[16] "are dependent on you, lord, for you are our refuge" āyattaṃ tvayi no nātha gatiḥ: Literally, "is dependent on you, [who are] our refuge, O lord." Even though the singular āyattam construes grammatically only with rājyam, "kingdom," by attraction we must take it with "I" and with "Bharata" as well. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āyattās tvaṃ hi no rājan gatiḥ, "[This kingdom, I, and Bharata together with Lakṣmaṇa] is dependent [on you], for you are our refuge, O king."

[17] "But the king is old and will be missing you" rājā hi vṛddhaḥ saṃtāpaṃ tvadartham upayāsyati: Literally, "Indeed, the old king will go to anguish for your sake." B1,4, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read rājāpi, "although the king [is old]," for rājā hi, "indeed, the king." The old king referred to here would be the Kaikeya rāja, Yudhājit's father, mentioned earlier at 1.72.1–3 and 2.1.2. See, too, 7.90.1–3 and notes. Ck, Cg, and Ct all identify the king as "Kekaya [= Kaikeya] (rājā kekayaḥ)."

[18] "I would like" rocaye: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–6,10,11,T4,G1,M1,5,8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the third person singular rocate "[it] is preferred."

[19] "much" vipulam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous bahulam.

[20] "And Lakṣmaṇa will follow" lakṣmaṇaś ca . . . anugamiṣyati: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous bhāve construction lakṣmaṇena . . . anugamiṣyate.

[21] "to Rāghava" rāghavam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative singular rāghava, "O Rāghava."

[22] "and by Rāma" rāmeṇa ca: T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead rāmeṇa hi, "indeed, by Rāma."

[23] "the" saḥ: D5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ca, "and."

[24] "when the asura . . . had been vanquished" jite 'sure: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hate 'sure, "when the asura had been slain."

The printed editions now continue with sarga 37 of the critical edition (= Lahore 7.40.35; Gorresio 7.42.14; GPP and NSP 7.38.15; Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.38.16).

1. "After this . . . first caressed and then embraced" vimṛśya ca . . . / . . . pariṣvajya: Literally, "having touched or stroked and having embraced." The object of the gerunds vimṛśya and pariṣvajya could be the ṛṣis, who had just departed (7.36.46). But this does not seem convincing. Otherwise the gerund must refer prospectively to Pratardana. Since it appears from verse 4 that Rāma is seated, it is difficult to visualize how the embrace took place. B3,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead taṃ visṛjya, "having sent him off." In the latter case, as Cr notes, the referent is Yudhājit (taṃ yudhājitam). (See App. I, No. 4, line 74 above.)

2. "Bharata made great preparations in tandem with you." udyogaś ca kṛtaḥ . . . bharatena tvayā saha: Literally, "energetic preparation was made by Bharata together with you." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all provide a revisionist history of the Laṅkan war, interpreting the verse to indicate that the king of Kāśī joined Bharata in order to assist Rāma in destroying Rāvaṇa. (yasmāt tvayā bharateṇa saha mama raṇasahāyārtham udyogaḥ kṛtaḥ. yasmād bhavatā paramā prītir darśitā paramasauhardaṃ ca darśitam. anenānuvādena rāvaṇasaṃhārārthaṃ kāśīrājena saṃgatam iti siddham—so Cg; Ck, Cm, and Ct similarly). This seems quite peculiar in light of the fact that no mention whatever is made in the Yuddhakāṇḍa of Pratardana or any other human king offering assistance to Rāma, while Bharata is shown at 6.114 to have been utterly unaware of his brother's military campaign in Laṅkā or, indeed, of anything that had befallen Rāma and Sītā, following his own return to Nandigrāma from Citrakūṭa at 2.105. Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–7,9–11,T4,M1,6,8, and KK and VSP read tvayā . . . kṛtaḥ by transposition.

3. "in the country of Kāśī" kāśeyīm: Literally, "belonging to or originating in the country of Kāśī." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the masculine vocative kāśeya, "O man of the Kāśī country." For a discussion of the significance of Pratardana's role as the king of Kāśi, see Benoît 1999 (pp. 1691–92).

"with its splendid palisades" suprākārām: KK and VSP read instead suprakāśām, "brightly shining." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

4. "arose" utthāya: Literally, "having arisen." D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cotthāya, "and having arisen," in an effort to avoid the hiatus (uktvā utthāya).

"held him closely to his chest" paryaṣvajata . . . nirantaram urogatam: Literally, "he embraced [him] who came to his chest in such a way that there was no intervening space."

Following verse 4, B3,D6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of three lines [742*]: "Then, the increaser of Kausalyā's joy[1] dismissed him.[1] Granted leave[2] and dismissed by Rāghava, the fearless ruler of the country of Kāśī[3] proceeded swiftly to Vārāṇasī.[2–3]"

[1] "the increaser of Kausalyā's joy" kausalyānandivardhanaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kausalyāprītivardhanaḥ, "increaser of Kausalyā's delight," while T1–3,G2,3, and KK and VSP read the minor but more common variant kausalyānandavardhanaḥ.

[2] "Granted leave" [a]bhyanujñātaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kṛtānujñaḥ, "to whom permission [to depart] was made."

[3] "the . . . ruler of the country of Kāśī" kāśeyo hi: We read the word hi here as pleonastic. KK and VSP read instead kāśīśo 'pi, "and the lord of Kāśī as well."

5. "After he had dismissed his friend . . . to the lords of the earth who had come willingly" visṛjya taṃ vayasyaṃ sa svāgatān pṛthivīpatīn: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead visṛjya taṃ kāśīpatiṃ [printed editions read kāśi-] triśataṃ pṛthivīpatīn, "when he had dismissed the lord of Kāśī, [he addressed] the three hundred lords of the earth." Ck, Cg, and Ct explain that Rāma is smiling because of the gratification produced by the sight of so many hundred (three hundred—Ck and Cg) friendly kings (aneka[tri—Ck and Cg]śatasaṃkhyasvasuhṛtpṛthivīpatidarśanajasaṃtoṣāt prahāsaḥ—so Ck, Cg, and Ct).

6. "Through your strength of character, you gentlemen have maintained your unshakable affection for me." bhavatāṃ prītir avyagrā tejasā parirakṣitā: Literally, "The unshakable affection of you sirs is protected by blazing energy or moral authority." The idea here appears to be that Rāma is thanking his putative allies for their loyalty despite the reversals of fortune to which he had been subjected during his years in exile. We therefore take the noun tejas, which we normally translate as "blazing energy," here in its sense of "firmness or strength of character." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss the passage in this way, adding that the allies' affection for Rāma is not based on any virtues of his but is a product of their own virtuous natures alone (bhavatāṃ tejasāvyagrā niścalatayā sthitā prītir vanāt punar āgatyānubhavayogyatayā parirakṣitā mayi bhavadbhir madguṇam ālocya na bhavatāṃ mayi prītiḥ, kiṃtu svīyasatsvabhāvenaivety āśayaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

"you are always true" satyaṃ ca bhavatāṃ sadā: Literally, "truth is always yours." The word satyam, "truth," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. We understand the term satya here to be used in the sense of faithfulness to one's obligations, etc.

7. "And . . . through the might" ca prabhāvena: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cānubhāvena, "and through [your] dignity." Cr glosses, "through might (prabhāvena)."

"of you great kings" mahātmanām: Literally, "of [you] great [ones]."

"lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣasādhipaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasādhamaḥ, "lowest or most vile of rākṣasas."

8. "together with . . . his sons, and his kinsmen" saputraḥ sahabāndhavaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4,G3,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saputrāmātyabāndhavaḥ, "along with [his] sons, [his] ministers, and [his] kinsmen."

"I was merely the proximate cause of that" hetumātram ahaṃ tatra: Literally, "I [was] the mere cause with regard to that." Compare BhagGī 11.33.

9. "in the wilderness" kānane: D7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kānanāt, "from the wilderness."

10. "passed" hy atītaḥ: Ñ,V3,B1,3,4,D2,3,9,T1,2,G3,M1,3,5,8, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead vyatītaḥ, "went by," while D6,7,10,11,T4,M6,7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read [a]py atītaḥ, "and passed."

"while all you great kings were here making preparations" udyuktānāṃ ca sarveṣāṃ pārthivānāṃ mahātmanām: Here, as in the previous verse and earlier, the idea is that Bharata has assembled a host of loyal warrior kings who have apparently spent several years in Ayodhyā preparing for battle. As noted at verse 2 above, this revisionist history is utterly at odds with anything we know from the previous books of the epic. Note particularly Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 114, where Hanumān gives Bharata a detailed account of Sītā's abduction and of the search and war that followed it. There all of this appears to be news to Bharata.

"Now you must resolve to depart." gamane rocatāṃ matiḥ: Literally, "let the mind choose with regard to going." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gamanaṃ rocayāmy ataḥ, "therefore, I would like the departure [of you]."

11. "Filled with the greatest delight" harṣeṇa mahatānvitāḥ: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous harṣeṇa mahatā vṛtāḥ.

"and your reign has been established" rājyaṃ cāpi pratiṣṭhitam: KK and VSP read instead svarājye 'pi pratiṣṭhitaḥ. This would lend the line the sense "And thank heavens . . . you have been established in your own kingdom."

12–13. "this is our greatest glory" eṣā naḥ kīrtir uttamā: Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D1,4,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead eṣā naḥ prītir uttamā, "this is our greatest joy," for the critical edition's somewhat odd reading.

"having slain your enemies" hataśātravam: Literally, "one by whom enmity is destroyed." Ck and Cg take the term śātrava, "enmity," as a synonym for śatru, "enemy," glossing hataśatrum, "one by whom an enemy or enemies are slain," while Ct understands it to refer to the collectivity of enemies (hataśatrusamūham).

"And how like you, Kākutstha" upapannaṃ ca kākutstha: Literally, "and fitting or suitable, Kākutstha." Ñ,V1,B1,4,D1–5,8–12, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead etat tvayi upapannaṃ ca, "and this is fitting in you."

"that you praise us" yat tvam asmān praśaṃsasi: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous yad asmāṃs tvaṃ praśaṃsase.

14. "For only those worthy of praise know how to utter praise such as this." praśaṃsārhā hi jānanti praśaṃsāṃ vaktum īdṛśīm: Literally, "For those worthy of praise know to speak such praise." The last syllable of the word īdṛśīm is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11,G2,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead praśaṃsārha na jānīmaḥ praśaṃsāṃ vaktum īdṛśīm. This yields the rather peculiar sense: "O you who are worthy of praise, we do not know how to utter such praise." Ck and Ct are forced to supply a fairly elaborate gloss of this statement, arguing that the assembled kings are making their excuses for not rendering Rāma praise similar to that which he has lavished on them, even though he has a nature that is worthy of praise by all the world (praśaṃsārha sakalalokapraśaṃsārhasvabhāvayukta! īdṛśīṃ bhavaduktapraśaṃsājātīyāṃ praśaṃsāṃ vaktuṃ na jānīmo 'tas tām akṛtvaiva—so Ct; Ck similarly).

It is interesting to speculate as to the purpose of this peculiar episode, which lacks any basis in and even contradicts the narrative of the preceding kāṇḍas. Probably it serves a number of purposes. For one thing the idea of Rāma commanding a cohort of vassal kings serves to establish him as model of the classic cakravartin, "universal monarch," whose sovereignty extends over a sāmanta, "feudatory princes." Secondly, it functions as a transition of Rāma's life from a forest wanderer and warrior to the courtly world of Ayodhyā. See Introduction, "Historicity and Sovereignty," pp. 157–68, and S. Goldman 2014.

Following 14cd, D6,7,10,T3,4,M2,3,4,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [750*, line 2]: "And, O great-armed one, we are filled with the greatest delight[1] (vartāmahe mahābāho prītyā ca parayānvitāḥ /)."

[1] "And . . . filled will the greatest delight" prītyā ca parayānvitāḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prītyātra mahatā vṛtāḥ, "here or in regard to this, filled with great delight."

Following verse 14, D5,6,7 (repeats before 738*, line 1),10,11,T1–3,4 (before 738*, line 1), G,M1,2,3 (before 738*, line 1),4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of three lines [752*]: "All the kings, filled with great delight[1] and eager to depart, cupped their hands in reverence and said to Rāghava: 'Very well!'[1–2] Then, honored all together by Rāma,[2] they departed each to his own country.[3]"

[1] "filled with great delight" harṣeṇa mahatānvitāḥ: D5,6,7,10,11,T3,M2,4,5,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead harṣeṇa paramānvitāḥ, "supremely endowed with joy."

[2] "honored all together by Rāma" pūjitāḥ saha rāmeṇa: The syntax forces us to read saha in the sense of "all together or collectively" rather than as it is normally used, construing with the instrumental, which would lead to the idea that the kings are honored together with Rāma. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead pūjitās te ca rāmeṇa, "and they were honored by Rāma," while KK and VSP read pūjitāś caiva rāmeṇa, "and indeed honored by Rāma."

Following 752*, line 2, D7 (continues after first occurrence of 752*),T4 (after verse 14), and KK insert a passage of four lines (in brackets, numbered as 7.38.33) (consisting of four pādas) [746*]: "Thank heavens we see today, shining like the full moon at the onset of autumn, your face, with its eyes like lotus petals, its fine nose, its ruby lips, and its white teeth, that face, which is ever victorious in great battles[1–4] (diṣṭyā te kamaladalekṣaṇaṃ sunāsaṃ tāmroṣṭhaṃ mukham idam adya śukladantam / paśyāmo vijyainaṃ mahāhaveṣu nityaṃ bhrājantaṃ navaśaradīva pūrṇacandram //)."

The meter is praharṣiṇī.

KK shows several variations in lines 1–4 for which the textual evidence is complicated. A translation of KK's version of these lines would be: "Thank heavens we see, shining like the full moon on an autumn night, your exceedingly lovely face, with its eyes like the finest of lotuses, its fine nose, its ruby lips, and its white teeth, in great and victorious battles (diṣṭyā te kamalavarekṣaṇaṃ sunāsaṃ tāmroṣṭhaṃ mukham atiśobhi śukladantam / paśyāmo vijyainaṃ mahāhaveṣu nityaṃ bhrājantaṃ niśiśaradīva pūrṇacandram //)."

The meter is praharṣiṇī.

Following 746*, these same manuscripts and KK insert a passage of two lines [in brackets, numbered as 7.37.34] [752 (A)*, lines 1,2]: "We have been honored and especially esteemed by you, Rāma. We will now depart to our respective lands, your majesty, foremost of the Raghus.[1–2] (pūjitās tvayā rāma mānitāś ca viśeṣataḥ / gamiṣyāmo mahārāja svaṃ svaṃ deśaṃ raghūttama //)"

Sarga 38

1. "Shaking the earth . . . heroic . . . delightedly . . . for their own cities" kampayanto mahīṃ vīrāḥ svapurāṇi prahṛṣṭavat: Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D2–7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, KK, and VSP

substitute for 1cd–2cd a passage of three lines [753*, lines 2–4]: "With many thousands of oghas of elephants and horses[1] they shook the earth.[2][2] For on the order of Bharata many akṣauhiṇīs[3] with eager troops and mounts[4] had been made ready there for Rāghava's sake.[3–4]"

[1] "With many thousands of oghas of elephants and horses" gajavājisahasraughaiḥ: We understand the term ogha here in its sense of a specific large number, used elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa to enumerate large numbers of troops and their mounts. See 6.31.38 and notes, where an ogha is said to be either equal to a samudra, which itself is said to be 10^{14}, or equal to one hundred thousand samudras. See, too, 411*, following notes to 6.19.32, where samudra is understood to be 10^{47}.

[2] "they shook the earth" kampayanti sma medinīm: Ñ2,B1,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kampayanto vasuṃdharām, "shaking the earth."

[3] "akṣauhiṇīs" akṣauhiṇyaḥ: See notes to verse 2 below.

[4] "with eager troops and mounts" prahṛṣṭabalavāhanāḥ: B3,D6, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous prahṛṣṭā balavāhanāḥ.

2. See note to verse 1 above for the variants found in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP.

"akṣauhiṇī" akṣauhiṇī-: An akṣauhiṇī is a technical military term for a large fourfold military force. See 7.25.33 and notes.

3. "But" caiva: Literally, "And, indeed." Ñ2,B1,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead te ca, "and they."

"those protectors of the earth" mahīpālāḥ: The term mahīpāla is relatively rare in the Rāmāyaṇa, occurring some ten times (see 1.8.15,16; 2.20.24; 2.66.43; 2.95.27; 2.110.36; 3.15.7; 4.18.23; 7.38.3; 7.74.10).

"We never got to see Rāvaṇa" na nāma rāvaṇam . . . paśyāmaḥ: Literally, "We did not at all see Rāvaṇa." The emphatic particle nāma is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,D2,5,7–11,T2,3,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the somewhat enigmatic na rāmarāvaṇam . . . paśyāmaḥ. Ck, Cg, and Cm understand the sequence rāmarāvaṇam to be a type of ṣaṣṭhītatpuruṣa expressing the connection between a killer and the one to be killed, that is to say, enmity in the sense of "Rāma's Rāvaṇa," i.e., "Rāma's enemy Rāvaṇa." (rāmasya rāvaṇo rāmarāvaṇaḥ. vadhyaghātakasaṃbandhaṣaṣṭhyāḥ samāsaḥ. rāmasya śatrū rāvaṇo rāmarāvaṇaḥ—so Ck.) Ct explicitly identifies the compound as a madhyamapadalopī with a loss of the middle term śatru, "enemy." (rāmarāvaṇam iti. rāmaśatruṃ rāvaṇam ity artho madhyamapadalopī samāsaḥ.) Cg notes a variant reading, rāmaṃ rāvaṇaṃ, not noted in the critical apparatus or that of KK. The idea here is that the kings never got to see Rāma and Rāvaṇa fighting in battle. (rāmaṃ rāvaṇam iti pāṭhe yuddhe rāmaṃ rāvaṇaṃ ca yudhyamānau rāmarāvaṇāv ity arthaḥ.) In a similar vein, Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, pp. 811–12) translates, "We do not see Śrī Rāma and Rāvaṇa," although the printed text reads rāma rāvaṇam. Interestingly, the text of Gorresio (7.42.31) and Lahore (7.41.3) similarly read rāma rāvaṇam. The only proper way to read this sequence is to take Rāma as a vocative, but no translation that shares this reading does so.

4. "belatedly" paścāt: Literally, "afterward." Ck, Cg, and Ct all observe that the reference is to a time after the killing of Rāvaṇa (rāvaṇavadhānantaram—so Cg and Ct; Ck similarly).

"otherwise": The word has been added in keeping with the observation of Ct and Cr that the kings would have slain the rākṣasas if only they had been summoned earlier (yadi pūrvaṃ samānītāḥ syur iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly).

"there" tatra: Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D2,5,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṣipram, "quickly."

5. "protected" pālitāḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D5,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous rakṣitāḥ.

6. "those . . . great chariot-warriors, entered" viviśus te mahārathāḥ: Ñ,V1,D2,5,7,9–11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jagmur harṣasamanvitāḥ, "they went, filled with delight."

"their own kingdoms" svarāṣṭrāṇi: Ñ,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous svarājyāni.

Following verse 6, D6,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of two lines [755*]: "[they entered] their own kingdoms, which were eminent, rich, happy, prosperous, filled with wealth and grain,[1] and wealthy (svāni rājyāni mukhyāni ṛddhāni muditāni ca / yuktāni dhanadhānyena pūrṇāni vasumanti ca)." Note the hiatus between mukhyāni and ṛddhāni.

[1] "prosperous . . . with wealth and grain" yuktāni dhanadhānyena: Normally, the adjective yuktāni would construe with the instrumental dhanadhānyena in the sense of "endowed or filled with wealth and grain." But the presence of the adjective pūrṇāni, "filled with," in line 2 forces us to take yuktāni in its less common sense of "prosperous." D10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samṛddhadhanadhānyāni, "having abundant wealth and grain." This variant reading, of course, makes the now-isolated pūrṇāni, "filled," more difficult to construe.

7–8. "each to his own city" yathāpurāṇi: Literally, "according to cities." Our interpretation of this odd compound follows that of Ck, Cg, and Cm, who gloss, "in such a way that they reached their respective cities (yathāprāptasvasvapurāṇi)." Ct, however, understands the compound to mean that they reached the city in such a way that they were uninjured in their bodies, just as they had been previously (yathāpūrvam akṣataśarīratayā purāṇi gatvā). Cr reads the adverb yathā separately and glosses it as yathāvat, "duly, properly." He thus understands that the kings returned in proper fashion to their own countries and cities (te nṛpāḥ svāni rājyāni svāni purāṇi ca yathā yathāvad gatvā).

"those kings, acting on their desire to please Rāma, presented as gifts for him" rāmāya priyakāmārtham upahārān nṛpā daduḥ: Literally, "For the sake of the desire to please, the kings gave gifts to Rāma." Ct notes that we should understand that the gifts for Rāma were actually presented to the kings' respective travel companions, Bharata, Lakṣmaṇa, and Śatrughna. (anuyātrikebhyaḥ. bharatalakṣmaṇaśatrughnebhya iti śeṣaḥ.) Ś,Ñ,V1,3, D1–5,7–12,M1,3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read rāmasya, "of Rāma," for rāmāya, "for Rāma." This variant, in any case, must be read as if it were a caturthī. Ñ2,V1,3,D1–7,9–11,T1,2,4,M3,6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the singular upahāram, "gift," for upahārān, "gifts."

"as well as horses, jewels" aśvān ratnāni: Ś2,3,Ñ2,V1,B1,4,D7,10,11,G2,M2,4,5,8–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aśvān yānāni, "horses, vehicles."

"garments" vastrāṇi: Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D1,3,5,7–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ratnāni, "jewels."

Following verse 8, Ś,Ñ2,B3,D1,4,6–8,10–12,S, and Lahore insert a passage of two lines [756*]: "gems, pearls, coral, beautiful maidservants,[1] various kinds of goats and sheep,[2] and many[3] and varied chariots (maṇimuktāpravālāṃś ca dāsī rūpasamanvitāḥ / ajāvikaṃ ca vividhaṃ rathāṃs tu vividhān bahūn //)."

[1] "maidservants" dāsīḥ: Ñ2,B3,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the contextually inappropriate nominative plural dāsyaḥ.

[2] "various kinds of goats and sheep" ajāvikaṃ ca vividham: The compound ajāvikam is somewhat obscure. We, and most translators consulted, follow Cr, who understands the term to refer to a multitude or collection of goats and sheep (ajāvikam ajāś cāvikā avayaś caiteṣāṃ samāhāraḥ). Ct glosses, "possessed of fine hides (ajāvikaṃ viśiṣṭacarmavat)." Ś,D1,4,8,12,M1,6,7, and KK and VSP read instead the plural ajāvikāṃś ca vividhān. Ck, Cg, and Cm understand this to refer to a particular type of couch made of leather [perhaps from the hides of goats and sheep] (carmamayān talpaviśeṣān ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Cm similarly).

[3] "many" bahūn: KK and VSP read instead daduḥ, "they gave."

9. "the great chariot-warrior" mahārathaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3,D1–5,7–12,T4,M3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mahābalaḥ, "of immense power." T3 and KK and VSP read instead the masculine plural mahābalāḥ, which would then apply to all three brothers.

"returned to Ayodhyā" ayodhyām agaman punaḥ: Literally, "they went again to Ayodhyā." Ñ,B1,3,D1–4,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead svāṃ purīṃ punar āgatāḥ, "they came again to their own city."

10. "returned" āgatāḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–4,7–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āgamya, "having returned."

"they gave all those precious things to great Rāghava" daduḥ sarvāṇi ratnāni rāghavāya mahātmane: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [758*]: tāni ratnāni citrāṇi rāmāya samupānayan, "They offered[1] those wonderful, precious objects to Rāma."

[1] "They offered" samupānayan: KK and VSP read instead samupāharan, "They brought near or offered." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

11. "Filled with delight, Rāghava" prītiyuktaḥ sa rāghavaḥ: Ñ,V1,3,D1–5,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāmaḥ prītisamanvitaḥ, "Rāma, filled with delight.

"and then gave everything to the great Sugrīva" sarvāṇi tāni pradadau sugrīvāya mahātmane: Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D1–5,7,9–11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sugrīvāya dadau rājñe mahātmā kṛtakarmaṇe, "The great one gave to King Sugrīva, who had accomplished his mission."

12–13. "And he also made gifts to Vibhīṣaṇa." vibhīṣaṇāya ca dadau: Literally, "and he gave to Vibhīṣaṇa."

"And as for those other . . . apes and monkeys" ye cānye ṛkṣavānarāḥ: Note the hiatus. On the term ṛkṣa, see 1.16.10 and notes; and R. Goldman 1989. Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D1–5,7,9–11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathānyebhyo 'pi rāghavaḥ, "in the same fashion Rāghava [gave] to the others as well."

"heroic . . . starting with Hanumān, as well as the immensely powerful rākṣasas" hanūmatpramukhā vīrā rākṣasāś ca mahābalāḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5,7,9–11, and Gorresio (rākṣasebhyaḥ kapibhyaḥ by transposition), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasebhyaḥ kapibhyaś ca yair vṛto jayam āptavān, "and to the rākṣasas and monkeys surrounded by whom he had obtained victory."

"placed . . . on their heads and arms" śirobhir dhārayāmasur bāhubhiś ca: Literally, "causing them to be borne by the heads and arms." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all understand that Rāma's gifts consisted of various types of jewelry and ornaments that are to be worn on the head, such as diadems and earrings, as well as those that would be worn on the arms, such as armlets, etc. (śirobhir iti. mukuṭakuṇḍalādīnīti bhāvaḥ. bāhubhir iti. aṅgadādīnity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck, Cm, and Ct similarly.) Ñ2,V1,3,D1,3–5,7,9–11,T4, and

GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read bhujeṣu, "on their arms or chests," for bāhubhiḥ, "by the arms."

Following verse 13, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,1,3,4,D (D6 line 1 only),T3 (following 7.38.12ab),4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of twenty lines [App. I, No. 5]: "Then the great chariot-warrior, the great-armed[1] and mighty king of the Ikṣvākus, placed[2] Hanumān and Aṅgada on his lap.[1–2] Rāma, whose eyes were like lotus petals, said this to the yellow-eyed Sugrīva:[3][3] 'Your son here, Aṅgada, and your excellent minister, the son of Anila, who were the champions, respectively, of Vālin and Sugrīva,[4] are devoted to my welfare.[4–5] And they are worthy of especially great[5] honor on my account, lord of the monkeys.'[6] Having said this, the greatly illustrious Rāma removed the ornaments from his limbs and fastened them equally upon both Māruti and Aṅgada.[7][6–8] And then, drinking them up, as it were, with his eyes,[8] Rāghava sweetly addressed[9] in tender words those immensely powerful bulls among the troop leaders—Nīla, Nala, Kesarin, Kumuda, Gandhamādana, Suṣeṇa, the heroic Panasa, Mainda, Dvivida, Jāmbavān, Gavākṣa, Dhūmra, Vinata,[10] Balīmukha, Prajaṅgha, immensely powerful Saṃnāda, Darīmukha, Dadhīmukha, and the troop leader Indrajānu.[9–15] 'You, sirs, are my friends,[11] my brothers, my very body. You, O forest-dwelling monkeys,[12] rescued me from calamity. Fortunate, indeed, is King Sugrīva to have such excellent friends as you.'[13][16–18] Then, when he had spoken in this fashion, that bull among men embraced them and gave them splendid ornaments[14] and costly garments.[15][19–20]"

[1] "great-armed" mahābāhuḥ: Ñ,V1,3,D7,10,11,T3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative singular mahābāhum, which then refers to Aṅgada.

[2] "placed" āropya: Literally, "having placed."

[3] "to the yellow-eyed Sugrīva" piṅgākṣam: Literally, "to the yellow-eyed one." Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sugrīvam, "to Sugriva."

[4] "who were the champions, respectively, of Vālin and Sugrīva" vālisugrīvayor vīrau: Literally, "the two heroes of Vālin and Sugrīva." The expression is odd, to say the least. Ñ2,B1,2,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sugrīva mantrite yuktau, "the two engaged in counsel, O Sugrīva." The critical apparatus, as well as GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, print the words sugrīva and mantrite together to form a compound, sugrīvamantrite yuktau, meaning "engaged in counsel with Sugrīva." This, however, seems an improbable reading, as Rāma is directly addressing Sugrīva. Other editions consulted separate the words to read sugrīva mantrite, making the first a vocative. This is certainly the way Ct and Cr, the only commentators to remark on the pāda, read it and the way that all translators consulted, with the exception of Raghunathan, render it.

[5] "especially great" abhyadhikām: Literally, "extraordinary, more excellent than or superior to." Ñ2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vividhām, "various or diverse."

[6] "And . . . on my account, lord of the monkeys" matkṛte ca kapīśvara: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvatkṛte vai harīśvara, "for your sake, indeed, O lord of the tawny monkeys."

[7] "fastened them equally upon both Māruti and Aṅgada" ābabandha sa hy ubhayor mārutyaṅgadayoḥ samam: Ñ2,D7,10,11, and Gorresio (ābabandha), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa babandha mahārhāṇi tadāṅgadahanūmatoḥ, "He then fastened those costly [ornaments] on Aṅgada and Hanumān."

[8] "And then, drinking them up, as it were, with his eyes" netrebhyāṃ ca pibann iva: Literally, "and as if drinking with [his] two eyes." Ś2,Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D1,3,4,7,10,11, and Gorresio (cāpibann iva), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the more or less synonymous āpibann iva, "as if drinking in," for ca pibann iva, "and as if drinking."

[9] "addressed" ābhāṣya: Literally, "having addressed."

[10] "Dhūmra, Vinata" dhūmraṃ vinatam eva ca: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vinataṃ dhūmram eva ca by transposition.

[11] "You, sirs, are my friends" bhavantaḥ suhṛdo mahyam: Literally, "you, sirs, are friends for me." Ñ2,B1,3,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suhṛdo me bhavantaś ca, "and you, sirs, are my friends."

[12] "O forest-dwelling monkeys" kānanaukasaḥ: Literally, "O forest-dwelling [ones]." The term is a rare kenning for monkeys. The more common term is the synonymous vanaukasaḥ. See 6.45.18 and notes.

[13] "Fortunate, indeed, is King Sugrīva to have such excellent friends as you." dhanyo rājā ca sugrīvo bhavadbhiḥ suhṛdāṃ varaiḥ: Literally, "And King Sugrīva is fortunate with you, sirs, the foremost of friends."

[14] "Then, when he had spoken in this fashion, that bull among men . . . and gave them splendid ornaments" evam uktvā tatas teṣāṃ dadau bhūṣaṇam uttamam: Literally, "Having spoken thus, he then gave them a splendid ornament." B1,3,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evam uktvā dadau tebhyo bhūṣaṇāni yathārhataḥ, "when he had spoken in this fashion, he gave them ornaments according to their merit."

[15] "garments" vastrāṇi: Ñ2,B1,3,D10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, vajrāṇi, "diamonds."

14. "And they drank" papuś caiva: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1,2,5,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead te pibantaḥ, "they, drinking." This reading provides no finite verb to resolve the participle.

"various" vividhāni ca: Literally, "and various." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5,7,9–11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead madhupiṅgalāḥ, "as tawny as honey-wine."

"and feasted on fruits" phalāny āsvādayanti ca: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mūlāni ca phalāni ca, "and roots and fruits."

15. "a month and more went by" māsaḥ sāgro gataḥ: Literally, "a month with more went or passed." The commentators, who elsewhere have shown interest in questions of the narrative's chronology, are no less eager to debate it now (see notes to 6.4.3,4). Their discussions center on how to interpret the phrase māsaḥ sāgraḥ. Cr reads the phrase literally, understanding it to mean simply, "somewhat more than a month (kiṃcid adhiko māsaḥ)." Cv understands that the subordinate kings, having participated in the consecration of Rāma, which took place in the spring, then spent the summer and the monsoon season attending upon him before returning to their home countries in the autumn (vasante raghunāthasyābhiṣekam abhisaṃdhāya tasya sevayā grīṣmaprāvṛṣī nītvā śaradi svadeśān prati gateṣu rājasu). According to Ck, the interval under consideration is a period of five to six days more than a month. This is the interval that elapses between the time that Bharata and his brothers brought back the precious tribute and the present moment, at which the monkeys receive their special honors. (bharatādyānītaratnaviśeṣataḥ satkāraprāptiparyantaṃ nivasatāṃ teṣāṃ sāgraḥ pañcaṣaḍdinābhyadhiko māso gata ity arthaḥ.) Cg's view is similar to that of Ck.

Cm takes issue with Cv's position. He acknowledges that the consecration took place in the spring and that the kings departed in the autumn, after spending the summer and the monsoon in Ayodhyā. But he claims that the monkeys spent the winter season there, being honored with gifts, etc., and that we should therefore understand that the extended month was the first month of winter and should not be counted from the spring coronation. (vasante śrīrāmasyābhiṣekaṃ dṛṣṭvā tasya sevayā grīṣmaprāvṛṣī nītvā śaradi svasvadeśān prati gateṣu rājasu. evaṃ nivasatām upahārapradānasaṃmāne hemantartuḥ sthitānāṃ vānarādīnāṃ sāgro gataḥ śiśirartoḥ prathamo māso gataḥ. na tu rāmābhiṣekam ārabhya sāgro māso gata ity arthaḥ. vasantakāle rāmābhiṣekasyoktatvāt.)

Ct has the most elaborate discussion of this matter and presents a unique point of view. He understands that there is a position, which he ascribes to Tīrtha, etc., that holds that the monkeys remain with Rāma for an entire year, but he disagrees with this position on the basis of various calculations that he himself has made. It is not clear to us exactly who Ct is referring to by the name Tīrtha. Normally, commentators use this abbreviated name to refer to Maheśvaratīrtha (Cm). However, in the text of Cm available to us, there is no suggestion that Rāma's guests remain with him for as long as a year (saṃvatsaraparyantam). In fact, Cm's position is that the monkeys remain in Ayodhyā through the first month of Śiśira (i.e., the month of Māgha). The only commentator we have seen who believes that the monkeys remain in Ayodhyā for a full year is Satyatīrtha (Cs), but as Cs very frequently and disparagingly references both Ct and Cm, it is not clear to us how Ct could be referring to him here. Ct argues that his reading of the situation, based on what he sees mentioned briefly at the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, is that the monkeys reside in Ayodhyā for five months, including the second month of autumn, the months of Hemanta, and the two months of Śiśira (i.e., the months of Kārttika, Margaśīrṣa, Pauṣa, Māgha, and Phālguna). The expression māsaḥ sāgraḥ then, he believes, refers to five months plus an additional five or six days. (vasante 'bhiṣiktena rāmeṇa māsānantaraṃ viśeṣasatkāraprāptau śiśiraḥ śiśirartusaṃbandhī dvitīyo māsaḥ sukhaṃ gata ity uktyā saṃvatsaraparyantaṃ teṣāṃ rāmasamīpe vāsa ukta iti tīrthādayaḥ. vastuto 'dhikamāsagaṇanayāmāntamānenāśvinakṛṣṇapakṣe 'yodhyāpraveśena tatraiva taduttaraśuklapakṣe vābhiṣekaḥ. sāgro māsa ity anena kārtikāntā sthitir uktā. tataḥ śiśiro dvitīyo māsaḥ phālguno gata iti hemantaśiśirāv ardhaśarac ca tatra vāsa iti pañcamāsaparyantaṃ tatra vāsa iti labhyata iti mama bhāti. pūrvakāṇḍāntasaṃkṣepeṇoktasyaivārthasyātra kāṇḍe vistareṇoktir iti bodhyam. evaṃ teṣām iti bharatādyānītaratnaviśeṣair viśeṣasatkāraprāptiparyantaṃ nivasatāṃ teṣāṃ sāgrāḥ pañcaṣaḍdinādhikā māsā gatāḥ.) Cs believes that the month mentioned here begins from the time of the consecration. However, he notes that we should keep in mind that the period under consideration (i.e., through the second month of Śiśira [i.e., Māgha]) also follows the departure of all the kings. He then refers to the version of the Rāma story found in the Skandapurāṇa, where it is said that Rāma's guests remained with him for a year after his consecration. This, he believes, is what should have been said, because it was mentioned earlier. (māsaś cātra niśekam ārabhya. kiṃtu sarvarājanirgamānantaram iti dhyeyam. skānde rāmopākhyāne rāmābhiṣekānantaraṃ saṃvatsaraparyantaraṃ vāsasyoktatvāt. atra yad vaktavyaṃ tad uktaṃ purastāt.) For a detailed discussion of the commentators' differing understanding of the epic's chronology, see notes to 6.112.1. See, too, 7.38.17 and notes. Ś,Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D7,8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yayau, "he went," for gataḥ, "[he] went."

"it all seemed to them to pass as if in a moment" muhūrtam iva tat sarvam . . . samarthayan: Literally, "They considered all that as if it were a moment." We understand samarthayan to be an augmentless imperfect plural. Ñ,V3,B1,3,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead muhūrtam iva te sarve . . . ca menire, "and they all thought it was like a moment."

16. And as for Rāma, he took delight" reme rāmaḥ sa: Ñ2,B1,4,D1,3,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nearly synonymous rāmo 'pi reme.

"the . . . kings" rājabhiḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D2,7,9–11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rākṣasaiḥ, "[in the company of, lit., 'with'] the rākṣasas."

It is not clear which kings are intended here, as Rāma's putative allies have already departed for their own countries.

"and the . . . rākṣasas" rākṣasaiś ca: Literally, "and with the rākṣasas." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5 (first time),7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ṛkṣaiś caiva, "and with the apes." This and the previous variant may be an effort to eliminate the presence of the kings at this point, since according to verses 1 and 2, they had already departed for their own kingdoms.

17. "the second month of the cold season" māso dvitīyaḥ śaiśiraḥ: Literally, "the second Śiśira month." Although the text appears to indicate that Rāma's guests remained with him through the second of the two months of the cold season, i.e., Phālguna, several of the commentators want to read the verse as supporting the positions stated in their commentaries on verse 15 above. Thus Cv understands that the first month of the winter season (Māgha) was spent in the receiving of gifts and honors, but he claims that this suggests that the guests actually stayed for a full year, for they had come to witness the consecration in the spring and now, at the conclusion of the cold season, a full year has elapsed. (evaṃ teṣāṃ vasatām upahārapradānasaṃmānena vasatāṃ śiśirartoḥ prathamo māso gataḥ. vakṣyati hi dvitīyaḥ śaiśiraḥ sukham ity anena teṣām ayodhyāyāṃ saṃvatsaraḥ paripūrṇa iti sūcyate. abhiṣekadarśanārthaṃ vasante samprāptānāṃ śiśirāpagamena saṃvatsaraḥ paripūrṇa iti.) Ck sees the two months as marking the conclusion of seven months added to the original five months that Ck calculates for the giving of gifts, etc., at verse 15 above. This, then, Ck argues, indicates that the guests dwelt happily in Rāma's presence for a year. (evaṃ teṣām iti vasante 'bhiṣiktena rāmeṇa māsānantaraṃ viśeṣasatkāraṃ prāptānāṃ teṣāṃ paścāc chaiśiraḥ śiśirasaṃbandhadvitīyo māsaḥ saptamaḥ sa māsaś ca sukhaṃ gataḥ. evaṃ ca saṃvatsaraṃ rāmasamīpe sukhoṣitā ity uktaṃ bhavati.) Cg understands similarly to Ck. Cm similarly explains: "In this way it is demonstrated that the monkeys, etc., dwelt in Ayodhyā for a year. Because of their devotion to Rāma, they considered, that is, they spent, that time as if it were a moment. (evaṃ ca teṣāṃ vānarādīnām ayodhyāyāṃ saṃvatsaranivāso darśito bhavati. rāmabhaktyā tat sarvaṃ kālajātaṃ sarvaṃ muhūrtam iva samarthayann atyavahann ity arthaḥ.) Ñ2,B1,3,4,D7, 10,11,T1,3,M1,6,9,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read śiśiraḥ, "cold," for śaiśiraḥ, "belonging to the cold season."

Following verse 17, Ś,D5 (Ś,D5 following 17, second occurrence)6–8,10–12,S (G2 following 16ab) insert, while Ñ2,B3,4 insert line 1 only, a passage of two lines [764*]: "And as they partook of the greatest delight through Rāma's gracious acts[1] the time passed pleasantly for them in the delightful city of the Ikṣvākus (ikṣvākunagare ramye parāṃ prītim upāsatām / rāmasya prītikaraṇaiḥ kālas teṣāṃ sukhaṃ yayau //)."

[1] "gracious acts" prītikaraṇaiḥ: Literally, "affectionate actions." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct gloss, "honors (saṃmānaiḥ—so Ck and Cg; Cm and Ct similarly).

1. "in this manner" tathā: Literally, "thus."

2. "dear friend" saumya: Literally, "gentle sir or gentle one."

"together with your ministers" sahāmātyaiḥ: The first two syllables of the compound sahāmātyaiḥ (i.e., sahā-) have been marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. T1,2,M6,8, and KK and VSP read instead the nominative singular sahāmātyaḥ, which would lend the phrase the sense "you . . . together with your ministers."

"you must guard your sovereignty, the threats to which have been eliminated" pālayasva . . . rājyaṃ nihatakaṇṭakam: Literally, "you must protect the kingship, the thorn of which has been destroyed." Evidently this is a veiled reference to Rāma's killing of Vālin in the Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa (see 4.16.25–4.23.21).

3. "great-armed warrior" mahābāho: Literally, "great-armed [one]."

"as you look upon . . . you must be filled with the greatest affection" prītyā paramayānvitaḥ / paśya tvam: Literally, "you must look, filled with the greatest affection." The construction is slightly unusual, but the idea is clearly that Sugrīva is to look upon the monkeys mentioned here with affection. The injunction perhaps has particular reference to Aṅgada, who is, after all, the son of Sugrīva's bitter rival, Vālin, and one whom he might be expected to view, at the least, with suspicion, particularly as it is he who had been consecrated as yuvarāja at 4.25.35. V3,D6,7,10,11,G2,M5,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the more or less synonymous prītyā paramayā yutaḥ, "endowed with the greatest affection," for prītyā paramayānvitaḥ, "filled with the greatest affection." See notes to verse 7 below. Cf. verses 4–7.

4–6. "filled with affection, you must look upon" paśya prītisamāyuktaḥ: Cf. notes to verse 3 above and see notes to verse 7 below.

"hero" śūram: D5–7,10,11,T1–3,G2,3,M1,3,6,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous vīram.

"immensely powerful" ca sumahābalam: Literally, "and of very great strength." D6,7, 10,11,T1,2,M1,3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead caiva mahābalam, "and of great strength, indeed."

"the immensely powerful and unassailable king of the apes, Jāmbavān," ṛkṣarājaṃ ca durdharṣaṃ jāmbavantaṃ mahābalam: Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 510), alone among the translators consulted, fails to recognize that Jāmbavān is, in fact, the king of the ṛkṣas, taking these as two different individuals. He translates: "the formidable King of the bears and Jāmbavān of the immense strength." T2,G2,M1, and KK and VSP omit this line. On the identification of the ṛkṣas, see notes to 1.16.10 and 6.4.17 and R. Goldman 1989.

Following verse 6, Ś,D7,8,10–12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,9,T4 insert following 5cd, a passage of one line [768*]: "and the valorous and reddish leaping monkey[1] Ṛṣabha (ṛṣabhaṃ ca suvikrāntaṃ plavaṅgaṃ ca supāṭalam)."

[1] "and the . . . reddish leaping monkey" plavaṅgaṃ ca supāṭalam: Literally, "the extremely red leaping [one]." KK and VSP read instead jāmbavantaṃ mahābalam, "[and] the immensely powerful Jāmbavān."

Following 768*, D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (in brackets, numbered as 7.40.6cd) insert a passage of one line [769*]: "[and] Kesarin,[1] Śarabha, Śumbha, and the immensely powerful Śaṅkhacūḍa (kesariṃ śarabhaṃ śumbhaṃ śaṅkhacūḍaṃ mahābalam /)."

[1] "Kesarin" kesarim: Literally, "Kesari." The name has been standardized to the expected Kesarin.

7. "And as for those other" ye cānye: Literally, "and the others who." D7,10,11,T1,G1,3, and KK and VSP read instead ye ceme, "and these who," while GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ye ye me, "whichever for me [lit., of me]."

"very great monkeys" sumahātmānaḥ: Literally, "very great [ones]."

"you must also look upon them with affection" paśya tvaṃ prītisaṃyuktaḥ: See notes to verse 4 above; cf. notes to verse 3 above.

8. "When . . . had addressed" uktvā ca: Literally, "and having addressed." Ñ2,V1,3, D1,3,4,T3,4,M4,6–8,10, and KK and VSP read the more or less synonymous uktvā tu, "but having addressed."

"praised" praśasya: Literally, "having praised." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āśliṣya, "having embraced."

9. "O king, for you are held in high esteem" saṃmato hy asi pārthiva: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmajñas tvaṃ mato mama, "You are a knower of righteousness [and are] esteemed by [lit., 'of'] me." One could also understand the phrase to mean: "You are regarded by [lit., 'of'] me as a knower of righteousness."

"by the rākṣasas of that city" purasya rākṣasānām: The commentators take purasya, "of that city," separately, to refer to the inhabitants of the city. Thus Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all gloss, "the creatures who live in the city (puravartiprāṇīnām)." Ck further specifies that this includes brahmans, etc. (brāhmaṇādīnām). Ck and Cm understand that the term rākṣasas is meant to include Vibhīṣaṇa's ministers (svāmātyādīnām).

"and by your brother Vaiśravaṇa" bhrātur vaiśravaṇasya ca: KK and VSP read instead svabhrātur saṃmato hy asi, "for you are highly esteemed by your own brother." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Ck, Cg, and Cm, who read the variant, agree that the reference is to Vaiśravaṇa.

10. "wise" buddhimantaḥ: Cr and Cs understand, "endowed with an intelligence that is focused on dharma (dharmaviṣayakabuddhiyuktāḥ—so Cr; Cs similarly)."

"securely" dhruvam: Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "for a long time (śāśvatam—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly)."

11. "may you . . . remember Sugrīva and me" aham . . . sugrīvasahitas tvayā / smartavyaḥ: Literally, "I, together with Sugrīva, must be remembered by you."

12. "speech" bhāṣitam: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

13. "sweetness" mādhuryam: As Cs notes, this quality is specific to Rāma's speech (vāṇmādhuryam api tathā).

"of self-existent Brahmā" svayaṃbhoḥ: Literally, "of the self-existent [one]." Ck and Ct mention that the reference is to Lord Brahmā, who is possessed of endless auspicious qualities (anantakalyāṇaguṇasya bhagavato brahmaṇaḥ).

15. "love" snehaḥ: Ck and Ct understand the term to be the type of love between a man and a woman that is the cause of constant remembrance. Interestingly, they differ slightly as to which of the couple is the lover and which the beloved. For Ck the love is like that of a woman for her beloved (priye priyāyā iva sadā smṛtihetuḥ). For Ct it is the other way around (priyāyāṃ priyasyeva sadā smṛtihetuḥ). Cg takes the term to refer to a more comradely affection (suhṛdi prītiḥ).

"devotion" bhaktiḥ: Ck and Ct understand the term to refer to the mental attitude of devotion with reference to attaining the next world (paralokaparagatitvenopāsyatvabuddhiḥ—so Ck; Ct similarly). Cg contrasts it with prīti, "love or affection," by indicating that this is affection directed toward the highest (utkṛṣṭe prītiḥ).

"constant" niyatā: D1,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nityadā, "eternally or constantly." Ct argues that the term suggests that Hanumān is unable to live without Rāma for even a moment, any more than a fish can live without water (nityadety anena jalaṃ vinā matsyasyeva kṣaṇam api taṃ vinā jīvitum aśakyatvaṃ sūcitam).

"May this affection never attach itself to anyone else." bhāvo nānyatra gacchati: Literally, "emotion or love does not go elsewhere." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the loṭ form gacchatu, "let it [not] go," for gacchati, "it does [not] go."

16. "may my life breaths . . . remain" mama prāṇā vatsyantu: Literally, "may my life breaths dwell." The ending -antu is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The form, as noted by several commentators, is irregular for the expected vasantu, "may they reside." The unusual form appears to be a future imperative. See, for example, Whitney 1889, pp. 333–34 (§ 938) and van Daalen 1980, p. 92 (§ 421c). Michelson (1904,

p. 136) identifies it specificially as a "future imperative." V1,D1–5,9,T1,2,G2,3,M1–3,5,8,9, and KK and VSP read instead the lṛt vatsyanti, "they will remain." Ct states that Hanumān's desire to remain alive so long as he can hear the Rāmāyaṇa shows that his desire to drink the nectar of Rāma's story causes him to disregard even spiritual liberation (etena muktim apy anādṛtya tvatkathāmṛtapānam evākāṅkṣitam iti darśitam). See 7.98.24–25 and notes, where Hanumān's vow to remain alive is mentioned again. Ñ2, V1,3,D1–7,9–11,T4,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read prāṇā mama, "my life breaths," by transposition.

"as long as I shall hear on earth the tale of Rāma" yāvad rāmakathām . . . śroṣye 'haṃ pṛthivītale: Ñ2,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yāvad rāmakathā . . . cariṣyati mahītale, "as long as the tale of Rāma shall circulate on earth."

Following verse 16, Ś,Ñ,V1,3 (repeats only line 2 after 17),B4,D,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [773*]: "And,[1] O Rāma,[2] delight of the Raghus and bull among men, the apsarases will sing this divine history, your tale,[3] to me.[4][1–2] Then, heroic lord, whenever I hear the nectar of your deeds, I will dispel my longing[5] as the does the wind, a line of clouds.[3–4]"

[1] "And" ca: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead te, "of you."

[2] "O Rāma" rāma: V3,D6, and KK and VSP read instead nāma, "indeed."

[3] "history . . . tale" caritam . . . kathā: The syntax of the line is defective, as the nominative kathā cannot be, as it should, the proper object of the verb śrāvayeyuḥ. Ct and Cr grapple with the problem by glossing kathā with "in the form of a tale (kathārūpam)," yielding the sense "that divine history in the form of a tale (kathārūpaṃ yad etad divyaṃ caritam—so Ct; Cr similarly)." KK and VSP offer a reading that corrects the problem, substituting the accusative kathām.

[4] "will sing . . . to me" mām . . . śrāvayeyuḥ: Literally, "they would or should cause me to hear." D2,7,9–11, and NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mama "of me" for mām. GPP (7.40.18) appears to have a typographical error, reading mayā (a reading known only to Ñ2) for mama (the reading known to all other printed editions of the southern commentators).

[5] "I will dispel my longing" utkaṇṭhāṃ vihariṣyāmi: Literally, "I will remove longing." Ct glosses, "longing that has as its object the sight of you (tvaddarśanaviṣayām)." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead utkaṇṭhāṃ tāṃ hariṣyāmi, "I will disperse that longing."

17. "Then . . . from his throne" athāsanāt: Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D2,3,5–7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, varāsanāt, "from that excellent throne."

"that best of kings" rājendraḥ: V1,3,B4,D2,3,5–7,9–11,M4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāmas tu, "and Rāma."

"and, embracing him" ca pariṣvajya: Literally, "having embraced." Ñ,V1,3,B1,4,D1–7,9–11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sasvaje snehāt, "he embraced [him] out of affection."

18. "As long as the worlds shall endure, so shall my tale." lokā hi yāvat sthāsyanti tāvat sthāsyati me kathā: Literally, "For as long as the worlds will or shall remain, so long will or shall my tale remain." Ñ2,V1,3,B1,3,D6,10,11,T2,M4,5,7,9,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the plural sthāsyanti me kathāḥ, "my tales remain," for the singular sthāsyati me kathā, "my tale remains."

Ñ2 and B2 read this line (18cd) following verse 19, while D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read 18cd (= GPP,NSP, and Gita Press 7.40.22cd; KK and VSP 7.40.21) following 777* (see below).

Following verse 18, Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [775*]: "Were I to give up my life to you, monkey, for every one of your acts of service, we should still remain indebted for all those acts to come[1] (ekaikasyopakārasya prāṇān dāsyāmi te kape / śeṣasyehopakārāṇāṃ bhavāma ṛṇino vayam //." (775* = GPP, NSP, and Gita Press 7.40.23; KK and VSP 7.40.22 [cd in brackets])

[1] "Were I to give up my life to you, monkey, for every one of your acts of service, we should still remain indebted for all those acts to come." ekaikasyopakārasya prāṇān dāsyāmi te kape / śeṣasyehopakārāṇāṃ bhavāma ṛṇino vayam //: Literally, "I will give life breaths to you, monkey, for each and every service. We are debtors here for the remainder of acts of service." Note the hiatus and the change of number. Cr takes this verse as the inspiration for a theological exegesis involving the possibility of the transfer of the life breaths of Rāma, who is coterminous with the entire universe, to Hanumān.

Following 775*, Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ś2,3,D8,12,T4 insert after 19, Ñ1,V1,B4,D1–5,9,T3 continue after 777*, and B3 inserts after 18, a passage of two lines [776*]: "[1]Let old age take over my limbs,[2] since you have performed acts of service for me, monkey. For a man only acquires the fruits[3] of reciprocation in emergencies. (añgeṣv eva jarā yātu yat tvayopakṛtaṃ kape/ naraḥ pratyupakārāṇām āpatsu labhate phalam //" (776* = GPP, NSP, and Gita Press 7.40.24; KK and VSP 7.40.23 [ab in brackets]).

[1] "Let old age take over my limbs, since you have performed acts of service for me, monkey. For a man only acquires the fruits of reciprocation in emergencies."añgeṣv eva jarā yātu yat tvayopakṛtaṃ kape / naraḥ pratyupakārāṇām āpatsu labhate phalam //: Literally, "May old age go in limbs, since assistance has been rendered by you. A man obtains the fruit of counterassistance in calamities." The verse is particularly obscure and elliptical, especially in the form in which it is recorded in the critical apparatus. The general idea, as brought out by some of the commentators, who read variants, is that Rāma, although capable of doing so, is not intending to immediately reciprocate Hanumān's assistance and would only do so should Hanumān be in dire straits. Cr sees the idea here as a suggestion that Hanumān, in fact, will never suffer such need (etena hanūmataḥ sarvadaivāpadabhāvaḥ sūcitaḥ).

[2] "old age . . . my limbs" añgeṣv eva jarā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead madañge jīrṇatām, which lends the line the somewhat more lucid sense of "Let the service you have performed, monkey, grow old in my body."

[3] "acquires the fruits" labhate phalam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āyāti pātratām, which lends the line the sense of "A man in emergencies becomes a recipient of reciprocity."

19. For the theme of the tale of Rāma enduring as long as the earth or the world, compare 1.2.35 and 2.54.18 and notes.

"this . . . throughout the worlds" lokān eṣā hi: Ñ2,B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead eṣā loke ca, "and this . . . in the world."

"so long will the breaths of life remain in your body. Of this there is no doubt." tāvac charīre vatsyanti prāṇās tava na saṃśayaḥ: For this line (19cd), Ñ,V1,3,B4,D1–7,9–11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [777*]: "so long will your fame endure and the life breaths in your body as well (tāvat te bhavitā kīrtiḥ śarīre 'py asavas tathā /)." (19ab = GPP 7.40.22ab; NSP 7.40.22ab; Gita Press 7.40.22ab; KK 7.40.20ef; VSP 7.40.20ef.)

20. The incident described here is strikingly at odds with the way it is represented in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.116.68–73). There, Rāma first presents the necklace to Sītā, who then, in turn, gives it to Hanumān. It is noteworthy that Sītā has now been completely elided from the scene of the rewarding of Rāma's allies.

"with its central gem of lapis lazuli" vaidūryataralam: We follow the gloss of Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand the term tarala in its sense of "the central gem of a pearl necklace (hāramadhyago maṇiḥ)." The compound could also be rendered as "glittering with lapis lazuli." Note that at 6.116.68–73 there is no mention of a central gem. On the word vaidūrya, see note to 7.12.8.

"lovingly fastened it on Hanumān" snehād ābabandhe hanūmati: Literally, "he fastened on Hanumān out of love." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kaṇṭhe babandha ca hanūmataḥ, "He fastened [it] on the neck of Hanumān."

21. "With the pearl necklace . . . that great monkey" hāreṇa sa mahākapiḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B3, 4,D2,5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hāreṇa mahatā kapiḥ, lending the phrase the sense "the monkey with that great pearl necklace."

"was as resplendent as the golden lord of mountains with the moon rising over its peak" rarāja hemaśailendraś candreṇākrāntamastakaḥ: Literally, "He shone [like] the golden lord of mountains, whose summit was overtaken by the moon." Ck, Cg, and Ct agree that the golden lord of mountains is Mount Meru, while Cr similarly identifies it as Sumeru. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that by the word "moon (candra)" here, we are to understand lunar rays. Thus their understanding is that Hanumān is as overspread by the luster of the necklace as would be Mount Meru when it is bathed from its base to its summit with the rays of the moon. (hemaśailendro meruś candreṇākrāntamastakas tādṛśaḥ parvato yathāmūlaśikharaṃ tatkiraṇair vyāpto bhavati tathā hanūmāṃs tadratnakiraṇavyāpto jāta ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Compare 6.116.73, where Hanumān, wearing this same necklace, is said to be as "resplendent as a mountain wreathed with a white cloud illuminated by a flood of moonlight."

22. "And when . . . had heard Rāghava's speech" śrutvā tu rāghavasyaitat: Literally, "but having heard that of Rāghava." As Ct understands, the elliptical reference is to Rāma's words starting at 775*, which he directed toward Hanumān and [then] to each of the monkeys individually (hanūmaduddeśyakam ekaikasyetyādi vākyam).

"they arose one after the other" utthāya utthāya: Literally, "having arisen, having arisen." Evidently we are to understand that the monkeys rise and individually make their prostrations to Rāma.

"they departed" prajagmuḥ: Ś,Ñ2,B1,4,D1 (both times),4 (first time),6–9,10–12,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nirjagmuḥ, "they went out."

23. "After this, Rāma embraced great-armed Sugrīva, and then he pressed righteous Vibhīṣaṇa close to his chest." sugrīvaś caiva rāmeṇa pariṣvakto mahābhujaḥ / vibhīṣaṇaś ca dharmātmā nirantaram urogataḥ //: Literally, "And indeed great-armed Sugrīva was embraced by Rāma and righteous Vibhīṣaṇa went to the chest with no interval." Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sugrīvaḥ sa ca, "and he, Sugrīva," for sugrīvaś caiva, "and, indeed, Sugrīva." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nirantaram urogataḥ, "he went to the chest with no interval," for pariṣvakto mahābhujaḥ, "the great-armed [one] was embraced," while D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sarve te bāṣpaviklavāḥ, "they were all overwhelmed with tears," for nirantaram urogataḥ, "he went to the chest with no interval." These variations lend the verse the sense: "And Sugrīva was pressed closely to the chest by Rāma, and so [was] righteous Vibhīṣaṇa. They [all] were overwhelmed with tears." See 7.37.4 and notes.

24. "All of them had their throats choked with tears" sarve ca te bāṣpagalāḥ: Literally, "and they all were tear-throated." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,M1,5,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarve ca te bāṣpakalāḥ, "and they all had voices indistinct because of tears."

"they . . . left" tyajante: D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1,3,5,6,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the present participle tyajantaḥ, "abandoning or leaving."

Following verse 24, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1,3–5,7,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [778*]: "Having been granted favors by the great Rāghava, they all departed for their respective homes, as an embodied being might upon abandoning its body[1] (kṛtaprasādās tenaiva rāghaveṇa mahātmanā / jagmuḥ svaṃ svaṃ gṛhaṃ sarve dehī deham iva tyajan //)."

[1] "as an embodied being might upon abandoning its body" dehī deham iva tyajan: Clearly the image is meant to suggest that the monkeys regard parting from Rāma to be as painful as death. Cg glosses, "The meaning is 'They were pained by their separation from Rāma' (rāmaviyogakhinnā ity arthaḥ)." Ck understands similarly. Ct, who also understands similarly, adds that their pain or despondency upon separation from Rāma was like that of the leaving of the body on the part of those who regard their bodies as their souls (śarīrātmābhimāninām dehatyāgeneva teṣāṃ rāmaviśleṣaṇakhedo 'bhūd ity arthaḥ). Cg notes that the dismissal of the monkeys, etc., was described previously at the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.116.75–76) in order to complete the kāṇḍa, but we are to understand that it is the same dismissal that is now mentioned here (yuddhakāṇḍānte vānarādīnāṃ visarjanoktiḥ kāṇḍasamāpanāyātraiva visarjanaṃ tatroktam iti mantavyam). Cg may be concerned that, unlike here, the Yuddhakāṇḍa version of the visarjana lacks the appropriate element of the grief of the monkeys, who are now to be separated from their beloved Rāma. Recall that when the monkeys are shown as leaving Ayodhyā at 6.116.76, they are described as being "delighted at heart."

Following 778*, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ñ,V3,B1,2,4, and Gorresio insert following verse 24, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [779*]: "Then, after prostrating themselves before Rāma, increaser of the lineage of the Raghus, the rākṣasas, apes, and monkeys, their eyes filled with the tears born of parting, departed as if they were natives of Ayodhyā[1] (tatas tu te rākṣasarṣkṣavānarāḥ praṇamya rāmaṃ raghuvaṃśavardhanam / viyogajāśrupratipūrṇalocanāḥ pratiprayātās tu yathā nivāsinaḥ //)." Note the hiatus in the compound rākṣasarṣkṣavānarāḥ.

[1] "as if they were natives of Ayodhyā" yathā nivāsinaḥ: Literally, "just like inhabitants." The idea appears to be that in returning to their homes, Rāma's allies feel as if they are being banished from their real home, Ayodhyā. Cr glosses, "habituated to living in Rāma's presence (rāmasamīpe nivasanaśīlā api)."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

1. "joyous . . . rejoiced happily" pramumoda sukhī sukham: Cg and Cr try to lessen the appearance of redundancy by specifying the exact sense of each term. Thus Cr understands the term sukhī to indicate that Rāma is always characterized by happiness. He then explains the phrase pramumoda sukham, "he rejoiced happily," to refer to the fact that Rāma is joyful because he knows that since he has dismissed the apes, etc., they are now free to happily return to their own wives in their own homes. This, Cr continues, makes it clear that Rāma rejoices in the joy of his devotees. (sukhī nityasukhaviśiṣṭo rāma ṛkṣādīn visṛjya pramumodarkṣādayaḥ svasvagṛhe svasvadārādyavāptyā sukhaṃ mokṣyanta iti buddhyā pramodaṃ prāpety arthaḥ. etena rāmasya bhaktasukhasukhitvaṃ vyaktam.) Cg understands that Rāma, who is inherently happy, rejoices happily in the cessation of the suffering of those who take refuge with him. The meaning, he claims, is that Rāma attained uninterrupted joy. (svataḥ sukhī rāma āśritaduḥkhanivṛttyā sukhaṃ pramumoda. avicchinnapramodam agamad ity arthaḥ.) Ś,V1,3,D1,3–5,7–12,T3,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read by transposition sukhaṃ sukhī. See verse 18 and notes below. Cg further notes that the syllable -da in the word pramumoda marks a syllable of the Gāyatrīmantra that is said to be mapped syllable by syllable onto the poem at roughly thousand-śloka intervals. Although, unusually, Cg fails to specify which syllable this is, it is clear from his comments on 7.1.1 and 7.67.10 (see notes) that this is the twenty-third syllable. For a discussion of the Gāyatrīmantra in the Rāmāyaṇa, see Introduction, "Gāyatrīmantra," pp. 187–98, and notes to 7.1.1.

2. "spoken from the sky" antarikṣāt prabhāṣitām: The commentators agree that the voice is uttered by some being moving through the sky (antarikṣacarabhūtenety arthaḥ—so Ck; Cg and Ct similarly). Cg further specifies that the speaker is the presiding divinity of the Puṣpaka (puṣpakābhimānidevatayoktām ity arthaḥ). D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read mahāprabhuḥ, "the great lord," for prabhāṣitām, "spoken."

3. "from the summit of Mount Kailāsa" kailāsaśikharāt: Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kuberabhavanāt, "from the palace of Kubera."

4. "After receiving your command" tava śāsanam ājñāya: Literally, "Having paid heed to your command." Rāma ordered the Puṣpaka to return to Kubera, its original owner, at 6.115.49–50.

"to Kubera, the bestower of wealth" dhanadaṃ prati: Literally, "to the bestower of wealth." D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhavanaṃ prati, "to the palace."

"to wait upon you, saying" upasthātum: Literally, "to wait upon or serve." Cr glosses, "to dwell near you (tvatsamīpe nivasitum)." The word "saying" has been added to provide a transition to the next verse, where the words of Kubera to Puṣpaka are quoted.

5. "You were won" nirjitas tvam: This is not technically correct. According to the Yuddhakāṇḍa, the Puṣpaka was given to Rāma by Vibhīṣaṇa, who had inherited it on the death of his brother. He gave it to Rāma so that he could return quickly to Ayodhyā. See 6.109.7–10 and notes.

"the . . . lord of the rākṣasas" rākṣasādhipam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous rākṣaseśvaram.

6. "gentle one" saumya: We must keep in mind that Kubera is addressing the presiding divinity of the Puṣpaka. Ñ2,B1,2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead caiva, "and also."

"his sons, his ministers, and his kinsmen" saputrāmātyabāndhave: Ñ2,V1,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saputre sahabāndhave, "along with his sons [and] together with his kinsmen."

8. "It is my greatest desire that" eṣa me paramaḥ kāmaḥ: Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous paramo hy eṣa me kāmaḥ. According to the critical apparatus, Ñ2,V1,B,D1,3–7,10,11,T1 similarly transpose eṣa me and paramaḥ. This word order appears in the printed editions with the particle hi placed between the words paramaḥ and eṣaḥ.

"on his journeys through the world" lokasya saṃyānam: Literally, "the journey of the world." The expression is ambiguous, and the commentators give a wide variety of interpretations. Our translation is most closely aligned with that of Cg, who glosses, "The meaning is 'the movement through the world' (lokasaṃcaraṇam ity arthaḥ)." Ck, Cm, and Ct understand the term to mean that the Puṣpaka has become an excellent vehicle for the attainment of any desired world, such as the earth, etc. (lokasya bhūrādyaśeṣābhimatalokaprāpaṇasya saṃyānaṃ samīcīnayānabhūtas tvam). Cs understands somewhat similarly: "the means of traveling to various places effortlessly (aśrameṇa nānāsthānagamanasādhanaṃ tvam)." Cv takes the phrase to be in apposition to rāghavanandanam, glossing, "the refuge of the world (lokasya śaraṇam)." Cr similarly interprets the phrase to mean "the refuge of all the words (sakalabhuvanāśrayam)."

"So go" gacchasva: Literally, "go." The final syllable -sva is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Cs proposes as an alternative a correction of the slightly awkward ātmanepada form gacchasva by breaking up the sequence into the normative parasmaipada form gaccha, "go," and a vocative sva, "one's own," i.e., servant, yielding the sense "O servant, go!" (gacchasva gaccha. he sva bhṛtya gaccheti vā.)

"free from any anxiety" vigatajvaraḥ: Cs understands that Kubera is urging Puṣpaka to have no anxiety about going against his, that is, Kubera's, wishes (manmanovaiparītyaśaṅkārahitaḥ san).

9. "Having received that command . . . I" tac chāsanam ahaṃ jñātvā: Literally, "having understood that command." Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–3,5–7,9,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead so 'haṃ śāsanam ājñāya, "having paid heed to the command . . . I."

"of . . . Kubera, the bestower of wealth" dhanadasya: Literally, "of the bestower of wealth."

"I have returned once again to your side." tvatsakāśaṃ punaḥ prāptaḥ: Literally, "[I] have once again attained your presence." Ñ1,V1,3,B,D1–4,6,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvatsakāśam anuprāptaḥ, "I have come back to your presence."

"Therefore please accept me." sa evaṃ pratigṛhṇa mām: Literally, "that one [you] should accept me in this fashion." Ñ2,3,B,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nirviśaṅkaḥ pratīccha mām, "Free from anxiety, please receive me." KK and VSP read instead nirviśaṅkaḥ pratīkṣa mām, "Free from anxiety, please behold or expect me. The variants appear to be corrections of the irregular imperative pratigṛhṇa.

Following verse 9, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [781*]: "Unassailable to all beings,[1] on the order of Kubera, bestower of wealth,[2] I shall travel by my own power[3] through all the worlds,[4] obeying your command." (adhṛṣyaḥ sarvabhūtānāṃ sarveṣāṃ dhanadājñayā / carāmy ahaṃ prabhāvena tavājñāṃ paripālayan //)"

[1] "Unassailable to all beings" adhṛṣyaḥ sarvabhūtānām: Ñ1,V1,3,D1–4,9,T4, and KK and VSP read instead adṛśyaḥ, "invisible." See note 4 below.

[2] "of Kubera, bestower of wealth" dhanadasya: Literally, "of the bestower of wealth."

[3] "by my own power" prabhāvena: Literally, "through power." We follow Cr, who glosses, "through my own blazing energy (svatejasā)." On the Puṣpaka's moving without any external motive force, see notes to 6.110.23.

[4] "through all the worlds" sarveṣāṃ: Literally, "of or among all." Clearly the pronominal genitive plural adjective cannot construe with sarvabhūtānām, "of all beings," in line 1 (see note 1 above). Therefore, like most translators consulted, we agree with Cr, who adds the word "worlds (lokānām)."

Following 781*, Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of four lines [783*]: "Then, when immensely powerful Rāma had been addressed in this fashion by the Puṣpaka, he gazed at that flying palace Puṣpaka that had returned and said: 'If that is the case, welcome to you, O Puṣpaka, foremost of flying palaces. Through the kindness of Kubera, lord of wealth,[1] we will not be transgressing the bounds of propriety.[2]' "

[1] "of Kubera, lord of wealth" dhaneśasya: Literally, "of the lord of wealth."

[2] "we will not be transgressing the bounds of propriety" vṛttadoṣo na no bhavet: Literally, "there would not be on our part a transgression of proper conduct." As Cr notes, "There would not be an act of unrighteousness taking the form of a transgression of the conduct of the virtuous (sadvyavahārātikramarūpo 'dharmo na bhavet)."

10. "And saying, 'So be it!' Kākutstha worshiped the Puṣpaka" bāḍham ity eva kākutsthaḥ puṣpakaṃ samapūjayat: For 10ab, Ñ2,B,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute and read after 10cd, while D6 inserts after verse 10, a passage of one line [784*]: "Then, having worshiped the Puṣpaka, great-armed Rāghava (pūjayitvā mahābāhū rāghavaḥ puṣpakaṃ tadā)."

"with parched grain, unhusked rice, flowers" lājākṣataiś ca puṣpaiś ca: The terms lāja and akṣata are overlapping in their semantic fields. We take lāja to refer to parched grain and akṣata to unhusked rice. For a similar use of the terms, see 6.100.16 and notes and 7.32.72 and notes (akṣata). Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead lājaiś caiva tathā puṣpaiḥ, "with parched grain and flowers as well."

"and extremely fragrant perfumes" gandhaiś ca susugandhibhiḥ: The first su of the word susugandhibiḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dhūpaiḥ, "with incense," for gandhaiḥ, "with . . . perfumes." Ś,Ñ2,B1,4,D6–12,G1,2, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read caiva, "and indeed," for ca su-.

11. "Now you may depart as you wish." gamyatāṃ ca yathākāmam: B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gamyatām iti covāca, "And he said, 'You may go.' " Note the hiatus between pādas a and b.

"But you must return whenever I call you to mind." āgacches tvaṃ yadā smare: Literally, "When I remember [you], you should come." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āgaccha tvaṃ smare yadā, "You must come when I remember [you]."

"the Puṣpaka was dismissed once again" visṛṣṭaḥ puṣpakaḥ punaḥ: Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pūjayitvā visarjitam, "having worshiped [that Puṣpaka], it was released."

"Adorned with flowers, the Puṣpaka departed in the direction of its choice." abhipretāṃ diśaṃ prāyāt puṣpakaḥ puṣpabhūṣitaḥ: B3,4,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead abhipretāṃ diśaṃ tasmāt prāyāt tat pūṣpakaṃ tadā, "Then the Puṣpaka departed from there in the direction of its choice." Ct takes note of the term puṣpaka here, which in his version (= GPP 7. 41.16) runs this line (11ef = GPP 16ab) together with the critical edition's 12ab (= GPP 16cd). This leads to the undesirable situation of having the word puṣpaka occur twice in the same verse. This repetition, in fact, also occurs in pādas d and f of verse 11 in the critical edition. Ct attempts to neutralize the redundancy by glossing the first occurrence of the term puṣpaka (puṣpakam) here as an adjective meaning "as light as a flower" through a technical application of the suffixation of the affix kan according to Pā 5.3.87 (puṣpakaṃ puṣpam iva laghv iti puṣpakam. saṃjñāyāṃ kan).

Following 11ab, Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11,S (except T4) insert a passage of one line [785*]: "And in the path of the perfected beings, gentle one, do not succumb to sadness[1] (siddhānāṃ ca gatau saumya mā viṣādena yojaya)."

[1] "do not succumb to sadness" mā viṣādena yojaya: Literally, "do not cause to be joined with sadness." The pāda is elliptical and ambiguous, and the commentators offer three distinct interpretations. The interpretation of Ck, Cg, and Ct, which we and most translators consulted have followed, is that Rāma is exhorting the Puṣpaka not to succumb to sorrow because of his separation from him while he is flying in the sky and that he should thus remain happy. (viṣādenāsmadviyogaduḥkhena mā yojayātmānam iti śeṣaḥ. sukham āsveti tātparyam—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Cv believes that Rāma is instructing the Puṣpaka to transport him [Rāma] in such a way as not to cause him [Rāma] any fatigue (mām aviṣādenāśrameṇa yojaya prāpaya). Cr believes that Rāma is urging the Puṣpaka not to trouble the siddhas who dwell along his path in the sky (gatau svagamane siddhānāṃ gaganasthasiddhān viṣādena mā yojaya svagamanena siddhān na pīḍayety arthaḥ).

Following 785*, Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,8,9,12,T4 insert after 11ab, a passage of one line [786*]: "And as you travel the directions as you please, may you not experience any obstacle[1] (pratighātaś ca te mā bhūd yatheṣṭaṃ gacchato diśaḥ)."

[1] "any obstacle" pratighātaḥ: Cr, in keeping with his unique interpretation of 785*, sees the obstacle that should be avoided as one possibly caused by a curse [pronounced by the irritated siddhas] (ata eva yatheṣṭaṃ diśo gacchatas te pratighātaḥ śāpena vighāto mā bhūt).

12. "varicolored" vividhātmani: Ñ2,V1,D5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sukṛtātmani, "finely constructed or well adorned." Cr reads the variant sukṛtātmani in two different ways. First, like us, he takes it to mean: "whose body was fashioned with extreme care or effort (atiprayatnena nirmita ātmā śarīraṃ yasya)." Then, exploiting the other common meaning of sukṛta, "meritorious action," Cr says, "Moreover, it means: 'whose nature or essence is associated only with those [beings] of extremely meritorious deeds' (kiṃca sukṛtair atipuṇyavadbhir eva yukta ātmā yasya)." This interpretation, however, seems to be at odds with the Puṣpaka's earlier history of transporting the depraved Rāvaṇa.

13. "Extraordinary things are seen when you are ruling the kingdom." atyadbhutāni dṛśyante tvayi rājyaṃ praśāsati: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vibudhātmani dṛśyante tvayi vīra praśāsati, "while you, O hero, who are of a godly nature, are ruling, there are seen . . ." Ck and Ct gloss vibudhātmani as "who are the embodiment of a god (devamūrtau)." Cs similarly glosses, "having the nature of a god (devasvarūpe)." Cr, however, takes ātman in the sense of "controller" and thus glosses, "who are the controller of even the gods (devānām apy ātmani niyantari)." KK and VSP read instead vividhātmani, "of manifold form." Cg glosses, "vividhātmani, that is to say, of various forms, the meaning is 'marvelous' (vividhātmani nānārūpe. citra ity arthaḥ)." On the Rāmarājya, see, too, notes to 7.89.9.

"Again and again nonhuman creatures are speaking." amānuṣāṇāṃ sattvānāṃ vyāhṛtāni muhur muhuḥ: Literally, "Again and again of nonhuman creatures there are speeches." Cg and Cm understand that the nonhuman creatures are those "such as the Puṣpaka, etc. (puṣpakādīnām)." D10,11,T1,G,M1,5,9,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead amānuṣāṇi sattvāni vyāhṛtāni muhur muhuḥ. In this variant, the word vyāhṛtāni, "speeches," becomes difficult to construe. Ck and Ct understand the suffix ac as having the possessive sense of the suffix matup and gloss, "possessing speech (matvārthīyājantaḥ vyāharavanti)." See Pā 5.2.127. Cr glosses, "speaking like humans (manuṣyavad ābhāṣamāṇāni)." The fact of nonhuman creatures speaking like humans suggests, according to Cr, that the power of Rāma is able to bring about unprecedented events (etena rāmaprabhāvasyāghaṭitaghaṭanāpaṭīyastvaṃ sūcitam). See 6.67.40 and notes for a similar interpretation on the part of Cr. Cs understands the creatures to be those such as the presiding divinity of the Puṣpaka (puṣpakādyabhimānidevāḥ) and understands the sequence amānuṣāṇi vyāhṛtāni to mean "disembodied voices (aśarīragīraḥ)."

14. "More than a month has passed since there was any illness among the people" anāmayāc ca martyānāṃ sāgro māso gato hy ayam: Literally, "and because of the non-illness of mortals this month and more have gone." Ck, Cg, and Cr understand the time frame to be calculated from Rāma's consecration (tavābhiṣekānantaraṃ sāgro hy ayaṃ māso gataḥ—so Ck; Cg and Cr similarly). Ct understands the expression sāgro māsaḥ here to be an example of the singular used for a collection. So, according to him, the meaning is "several months" (sāgro māsa iti jātāv ekavacanam. māsā ity arthaḥ). According to Cg, the arrival of the Puṣpaka occurred during the month following the consecration, and it is that month that Bharata is talking about. We know this, Cg says, because of the previous mention that Phālguna has come once again. (anena puṣpakāgamanaṃ māsābhyantara eva tatkālavṛttānto bharatena nidarśita ity avagamyate. punaḥ phālgunamāsaprapteḥ pūrvam uktatvāt.) Cr, however, understands that Bharata's speech actually takes place during the time that the monkeys are resident in Ayodhyā and that we should understand that when the text says "more than a month," there is no contradiction (iyaṃ bharatoktir vānarasthitikāla eva bodhyāta eva sāgro māso gata iti na virudhyate). Ś,Ñ1,V1,D3,5,7,8,10–12,T1,2,G3,M3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read anāmayaś ca, "free from disease, healthy," for anāmayāc ca, "because there was non-illness." This then must be taken as an adjective modifying māsaḥ.

15. "Women are giving birth to sons" putrān nāryaḥ prasūyante: This fact, in and of itself, is hardly miraculous. Probably the intention is that women give birth only to sons. Ñ,V1,3,D1–7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead arogapras[bha—V3]avā nāryaḥ, "women give [lit. 'are ones who have'] birth without infirmity." Probably the reference is to labor pains or complications during the birth process.

"and men have splendid bodies" vapuṣmantaś ca mānavāḥ: Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all understand, "endowed with happy and well-nourished bodies (hṛṣṭapuṣṭavapuryuktāḥ)." Cr offers, "possessing excellent bodies (praśastaśarīravantaḥ)."

16. "At the proper time, Vāsava sends down rains that are like the nectar of immortality." kāle ca vāsavo varṣaṃ pātayaty amṛtopamam: Ñ,B,D1–7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāle varṣati parjanyaḥ pātayann amṛtaṃ payaḥ, "Parjanya rains at the proper time, sending down water that is the nectar of immortality."

"And the winds blow softly to the touch, giving pleasure." vāyavaś cāpi vāyante sparśavantaḥ sukhapradāḥ: Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D2,4,6,7,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vātāś cāpi pravānty ete sparśayuktāḥ sukhāḥ śivāḥ, "Moreover, propitious and pleasant winds blow, endowed with a gentle touch."

17. "And . . . the people in the city and the folk in the countryside say" kathayanti pure paurā janā janapadeṣu ca: Literally, "the city folk in the city and the folk in the countryside say." Ñ2,3,V1,3,D1–4,6,9–11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kathayanti pure rājan paurajānapadās tathā, "and thus, your majesty, in the city do the city folk and country folk say."

"lord of men . . . 'May such a king be ours forever' " īdṛśo naś ciraṃ rājā bhavatv iti nareśvara: Literally, "O lord of men, 'May such a king long be ours.' " Ñ2,V3,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead īdṛśo naś ciraṃ rājā bhaved iti nareśvaraḥ. This substitutes the optative (liṅ) for the imperative (loṭ) with little change of meaning, but it awkwardly places what is now a nominative, "lord of men," technically outside of the quotation. Nevertheless, the meaning must be taken as "May such a king, a lord of men, long be ours." KK and VSP read [a]naśvaraḥ, "imperishable," for naś ciram, "long . . . ours." This nominative adjective must then modify rājā, "king."

18. "and, joyous, he rejoiced happily" pramumoda sukhī sukham: The phrase is repeated from verse 1. See verse 1 and notes above. Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,6,7,9,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead babhūva nṛpasattamaḥ. This lends the second line the sense "and having heard . . . Rāma, foremost of kings, became filled with delight."

The original Gita Press translation undertaken by Chimmanlal Goswami and published in 1969 was unfortunately halted at this point due to his illness. The remaining sargas were translated, published, and included in the revised 5th edition (Gita Press 1998, vol. 2), to which we will make reference from this point on in our annotation. The translator of the final sargas of the Uttarakāṇḍa is unknown to us. See Gita Press 1969, Editor's Apologia (at end of volume).

1. "golden" hemabhūṣitam: Literally, "ornamented or adorned with gold."

2. "tuṅgas" tuṅga-: Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 818) translates "cocoanut." However, according to Monier-Williams (s.v.), this is the acacia or the Rottleria tinctoria (Mimosa suma). Apte (s.v.) identifies it as a puṃnāga (Rottleria tincotoria or the Calophyllum inophyllum). Cg and Ct understand the tuṅga to be a variety of puṃnāga (puṃnāgaviśeṣaḥ). See Śrirāghava's Nānārthamañjarī 270. Brockington (1984, p. 107) notes that in this passage a number of trees are listed that are noted for their scent or fruit.

"kāleyakas" -kāleyakaiḥ: Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 818) translates "red-sandal." Apte (s.v.) understands aloe or black sandal. Ck identifies the kāleyaka as "a red sandalwood tree (raktacandanavṛkṣaḥ)." As noted by Brockington (1984, p. 107), Ct understands similarly, glossing, "red sandalwood (raktacandanam). Brockington also draws our attention to the fact that this is the only occurrence of the term in the Rāmāyaṇa.

"stands of devadārus" devadāruvanaiḥ: The devadāru is the deodar tree or the Cedrus deodara Laws. (Pinus devadaru).

Following verse 2, Ñ2,V3,B,D1,4,2–7,10,11,T,G,M1 (after 2cd, second occurrence), 2–4,6–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,D8,12 insert lines 3–4 only following verse 2, a passage of four lines [788*]: "It was adorned with campakas,[1] aśokas,[2] puṃnāgas,[3] madhūkas, asanas,[4] and pārijātas,[5] which were as radiant as smokeless flames.[1–2] And it was filled with lodhras, nīpas, arjunas, nāgas, saptaparṇas, atimuktakas, mandāras,[6] thickets of plantain, and tangles of creepers.[3–4]"

[2] "aśokas" -aśoka-: See notes to 521*, following notes to 7.26.3. D10 and GPP and NSP read instead -aguru-, "aloe" or Aquilaria agallocha.

[3] "puṃnāgas, madhūkas, jackfruits" -puṃnāgamadhūkapanasa-: The madhūka is identified as Bassia latifolia (Roxb.). For the other trees, see notes to 521*, following notes to 7.26.3.

[4] "asanas" -asana-: The asana is identified as Terminalia tomentosa Wt.

[5] "pārijātas" pārijātaiḥ: Monier-Williams (s.v.) identifies this as the coral tree (Erythrina indica), which is believed to be one of the five paradisiac trees produced at the churning of the ocean.

[6] "lodhras, nīpas, arjunas, nāgas, saptaparṇas, atimuktakas, mandāras" lodhranīpārjunair nāgaiḥ saptaparṇātimuktakaiḥ mandāra-: The lodhra tree is identified as Simplex racemosa, and the nīpa, or kadamba, tree, according to Brockington (1984, p. 103), is Antho- cephalus cadamba (Roxb. Miq.), while Monier-Williams (s.v.) understands Nauclea cadamba. The arjuna tree is the white murdah tree (Terminalia arjuna), the term nāga may refer to the nāgavṛkṣa (Barringtonia acutangula [Gaertn.]), and the saptaparṇa is the milkwood tree (Alstonia scholaris). Apte (s.v.) identifies atimuktaka as mountain ebony. This tree is identified by Brockington (1984, p. 106) as Hiptagne madhoblata (Gaertn.) syn. H. benghalensis (Kurz.). Monier-Williams (s.v.) identifies both the mandāra and the parijāta tree as the coral tree (Erythrina indica). He claims that this is one of the five trees of paradise.

3. "priyaṅgu creepers" priyaṅgubhiḥ: See notes to 521* following notes to 7.26.3.

"kurabaka trees" kurabakaiḥ: This is normally identified as red amaranth (Amaranthus cruentus). D5–7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca bakulair "and with bakula (Mimusops elengi [L.]) trees."

"jambū " jambūbhiḥ: This is the rose apple tree, or the Syzygium cumini (L.) Skeels.

"as well as . . . pāṭalī" pāṭalībhiś ca: The pāṭalī is the trumpet flower tree (Bignonia suaveolens [Roxb.], syn. Stereospermum suaveolens). D5–7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dāḍimaiś caiva, "and with dāḍimas" [pomegranate trees] as well."

"kovidāra" kovidāraiḥ: This tree is identified as Bauhinia variegata (L.), one of the trees of paradise. The kovidāra tree is the insignia on the standard of the House of Ikṣvāku. See 2.78.3; 2.90.14; and notes.

4–5. "It was . . . adorned . . . And it was also adorned" śobhitām: Literally, "[it was] adorned." The participle has been repeated for readability.

"variegated" citraiḥ: D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead citrām, which would then serve as a modifier of vanikām, "grove," of verse 1, lending the sense "[the grove] was variegated."

Following 4ab, Ñ2,V3,B,D1,4–7,10,11,S, and Gorresio insert a passage of two lines [789*]: "[It was adorned] with heavenly trees that had been beautifully shaped by skilled horticulturists.[1] These trees were endowed with heavenly scents and flavors, and were filled with tender sprouts and buds." (divyagandharasopetais taruṇāṅkurapallavaiḥ / tathaiva tarubhir divyaiḥ śilpibhiḥ parikalpitaiḥ //)

[1] "beautifully shaped by skilled horticulturists" śilpibhiḥ parikalpitaiḥ: Literally, "arranged or crafted by artisans." The idea, as we understand it, is that the trees have been pruned or otherwise trained into aesthetically pleasing shapes by skilled horticulturists. Ck, Cg, and Ct take the adjective divyaiḥ, "divine," with the artisans themselves. Cg says that the meaning of the phrase is that the trees are crafted by design (kratubhiḥ). As an alternative, he suggests that the phrase refers to those trees that [according to literary convention] only put forth buds when kicked or kissed by a beautiful woman (dohalakādibhir vā).

6. "the trees there shone" bhānti tatra sma pādapāḥ: KK and VSP read instead bhānti tatratyapādapāḥ, "the trees of that place shine."

Following verse 6, D5–7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [792*, line 2]: "and there were very many extremely fragrant[1] and variegated flowers (subahūni sugandhīni mālyāni vividhāni ca)."

[1] "very many extremely fragrant" subahūni sugandhīni: D5–7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead surabhīṇi ca puṣpāṇi, "and fragrant blossoms."

7. "with crystalline water" paravāriṇā: Literally, "with excellent water."

"Their steps were made of precious gems and their floors were inlaid with crystal." mahārhamaṇisopānasphaṭikāntarakuṭṭimāḥ: The syllables -pāna- are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D5–7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP read māṇikyakṛtasopānāḥ, "steps made of rubies," for mahārhamaṇisopāna-, "steps of precious gems," while KK (1905 and 1913) reads instead māṇikyavṛtasopāṇāḥ, "steps covered with rubies." No commentator consulted reads this variant, and it is not noted in the critical apparatus. It may well be a misprint, especially in light of the fact that VSP reads -kṛta- instead of -vṛta-. Ñ2,V3,B3,4,D4,10,11,T3,M3,5,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous sphāṭikāntarakuṭṭimāḥ. In general, the commentators note that the interiors or the floors of the pools are inlaid with crystal and jewels (sphaṭikaratnanibaddhāntarālavatkuṭṭimabaddhabhūmir yāsu tāḥ sthitāḥ—so Ck). Cg interprets slightly differently. He understands that the floors of the pools were suitable for bathing because they had crystal staircases at their edges. Or, he continues, their entire interiors were paved with crystal in order to prevent the growth of lotuses and other water plants. (sphaṭikamayasopānaprāntasnānārhā nibaddhabhūmayaḥ. anyathā sarvatrāntare sphaṭikakuṭṭimatve padmādyutpattivirodhāt.)

8. Following 8ab, Ñ2,V3,B2 (reading gaṇa for -ruta-),4,D5–7,10,11,S, and Gorresio (reading gaṇa for -ruta-) insert a passage of two lines [791*]: "They resonated with the cries of dātyuhas,[1] and they echoed with haṃsas and sārasa cranes.[1] They were adorned with trees, which were variegated with blossoms[2] and grew along their banks. [2] (dātyūharutasaṃghuṣṭā haṃsasārasanāditāḥ / tarubhiḥ puṣpaśabalais tīrajair upaśobhitāḥ //)"

[1] "with the cries of dātyūhas" dātyūharuta-: This bird is probably the cātaka, or the Cuculus melanoleucus. For a more detailed discussion of the identification of this bird, see notes to 6.30.9. Note that in the Yuddhakāṇḍa the term used is natyūha rather that the more common dātyūha. Ñ2 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dātyūhaśuka-, "[they resonated] with dātyūhas and parrots."

[2] "which were variegated with blossoms" puṣpaśabalaiḥ: KK and VSP read instead puṣpavadbhiś ca, "and [with trees] possessed of flowers." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

9. "Here and there" tatra tatra: D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatraiva ca, "And there as well."

"they were richly endowed" paramopetāḥ: The adjective must be construed with dīrghikāḥ, "pools," in verse 7 above. D10,11,M4–6,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the singular accusative feminine paramopetām. In this variant reading, the accusative must be construed with aśokavanikām, "the aśoka grove," at 11cd below.

"with . . . that resembled emeralds" vaidūryamaṇisaṃnibhaiḥ: Literally, "similar to vaidūrya gems." We normally translate vaidūrya as "lapis lazuli" or "cat's-eye beryl." Here, however, given the comparison with grass, we feel that the sense of vaidūrya as "emerald" is preferable. It is also used in this sense at 4.13.7–8. See notes to 7.12.8.

"and they were surrounded by flowering trees" puṣpitadrumasaṃyutāḥ: Literally, "[they were] endowed with flowering trees." D5–7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead puṣpitadrumakānanām, "with groves of flowering trees." Again, in this variant reading, the accusative must be construed with aśokavanikām at 11cd below.

Following verse 9, D5–7,10,11,T,G,M1–4,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [792*, lines 5–6.]: "The stone seats,[1] scattered with the blossoms of the flowering trees that grew as if in rivalry of one another,[2] resembled the vault of heaven with its masses of stars (saṃharṣād iva jātānāṃ vṛkṣāṇāṃ puṣpaśālinām [5] / prastarāḥ puṣpaśabalā nabhas tārāgaṇair iva [6] //)."

[1] "The stone seats" prastarāḥ: We take the term here in its sense of "a seat or couch." Our understanding is that since the stone seats (śilātala) are outdoors around the pools, described in verses 7 and 8 above, that they would be the stone benches mentioned in verse 8.

[2] "that grew as if in rivalry of one another" saṃharṣād iva jātānām: Literally, "born as if out of rivalry or delight." D5–7,10,11,T,G,M1–4,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar tatra saṃgharṣajātānām, "that were born there out of rivalry."

10. "The appearance . . . was just like that" yathā . . . tathārūpam: Literally, "just as . . . of such a form." D5–7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tathābhūtam, "of such a nature," for tathārūpam.

"which he had created" tanniveśitam: Literally, "established by him." D3,10,11,T2,G3,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃniveśanam, lending the phrase the sense "that grove which was beautifully arranged." In this we follow Ck and Ct, who gloss, "endowed with excellent arrangement (samīcīnasaṃsthānopetam)."

"Kubera's Caitraratha garden, which Brahmā had created" brāhmaṃ caitraratham: Literally, "the Caitraratha associated with Brahmā." As Ck, Cg, and Ct point out, we are to understand the adjective brāhmam here in the sense of "created by Brahmā (brahmanirmitam)." Ct adds that the grove belongs to Kubera (caitrarathaṃ kuberasya).

Following verse 10, Ñ1,V1,3,D1–4,9,T3,M2,4,7,9,10, and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.42.18) insert a passage of two lines [794*]: "There were lotus ponds that, since their waters were clear,[1] resembled dark clouds.[2] They were filled with haṃsas and kāraṇḍavas and adorned with cakravākas. (nīlajīmūtasaṃkāśāḥ padminyo vimale jale / haṃsakāraṇḍavākīrṇāś cakravākopaśobhitāḥ //)"

[1] "since their waters were clear" vimale jale: Literally, "in their clear water." We are forced to read the awkward locative here as an elliptical absolute construction (sati saptamī), in the sense of "as the water is clear." T2,M2,4,7,9,10, and KK read instead bahuvistarāḥ, "[lotus ponds], which were very broad."

11–12. "with bowers of creepers" latāgṛha-: D10,11,T3,4,M1,2,4,7,9, and GPP and NSP read instead latāsana-, "creeper-seats." Cv understands this term to mean that the grove is endowed with seats made up of creepers of cardamom, etc. (elālatādibhiḥ kṛtāsanayuktām). Ck and Ct understand, "in which there is an encirclement of seats that are made of creepers." They then gloss this as "creeper-bowers" (latānām āsanaṃ parikṣepo yeṣu tair latāsanair latāgṛhaiḥ samāvṛtām upetām—so Ct; Ck similarly).

"And" tu: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś3,Ñ2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"adorned with bunches of flowers" puṣpastabakabhūṣite: The word -bhūṣite is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś1,Ñ2,V1,3,4,D7,8,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar puṣpaprakarabhūṣite, "adorned with a multitude of flowers."

"furnished with a covering of carpets" kuthāstaraṇasaṃvīte: We take the term kutha here in its sense of "carpet or soft covering." It is in this sense that it is used twice in the Sundarakāṇḍa, once to describe the coverings of the seats in Rāvaṇa's aśokavana (5.13.4) and once to describe the soft carpeting on the floor of Rāvaṇa's puṣpaka (5.7.30). Outside of this, the word is quite rare in the literature. The DCS cites only these two Sundarakāṇḍa references and does not make reference to the word's occurrence here. Among the translators consulted, only Gorresio (7.45.20), Dutt (1894, p. 1716), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 818) read kutha. Gorresio (1870, p. 162) takes the term kutha in its sense of "kuśa grass," rendering, "ricoperto d'uno strato di poe." However, Dutt (1894, p. 1716) understands as we do, translating, "covered with a beautiful coverlet," as does Gita Press (1989, vol. 2, p. 819), which offers, "over which a carpet was spread out." Ś,Ñ2,V3,B1,D1,3,4,6–11,G2, and Lahore, GPP, and NSP read instead kuśāstaraṇasaṃstīrṇe, "strewn with a strew of kuśa grass," while V1,B3,D2, and Gorresio and Gita Press read instead kuthāstaraṇasaṃstīrṇe, "strewn with a strew of kutha (= kuśa) grass."

13. "Taking Sītā in his arms" sītāṃ saṃgṛhya bāhubhyām: Literally, "Having grasped Sītā with two arms." B1,2,4,D1–3,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sītām ādāya hastena, "having taken Sītā by the hand." Gita Press (1989, vol. 2, p. 819) alone construes the word maireya (see below) as the object of the gerund ādāya.

"gave . . . to drink" pāyayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused [her] to drink or he made [her] drink."

"excellent, sweet maireya" madhumaireyam uttamam: Maireya, according to Apte (s.v.) and Monier-Williams (s.v.), is a mixture of āsava, a kind of rum, and surā, another spirituous alcoholic drink, possibly wine. Ct glosses, "a sweet intoxicating drink called maireyaka," citing the Vaijayantī in support of this identification. (maireyakaṃ madhu maireyakasaṃjñakaṃ madhu madyam. maireyamādhavo dhātrīdhātakīguḍavāribhir iti vaijayantī.) Prakash (1987, vol. 2, p. 149) calls it "spiced wine." Ck and Cg understand the drink to be water mixed with molasses and the herb dhātakī (Woodfordia fruticosa [L.] Kurz), which is then made into an intoxicating beverage (maireyakaṃ dhātakīguḍamiśravāribhiḥ kṛtaṃ madyam—so Cg; Ck similarly). Cg also cites the same verse from the Vaijayantī that Ct quotes. Cr understands the drink to be a sweet flower-nectar that is intoxicating like liquor (maireyakaṃ madyam iva mādakaṃ madhu puṣparasam). See S. Goldman 2014. Ñ2,3,B1,D2–4,7,9–11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead madhumaireyakaṃ śuci, "pure, sweet maireya liquor." The exact identification of this drink is uncertain, and the translators offer a wide variety of renderings. Gorresio (1870, p. 162) understands, "dolce e puro sugo di lythro fruiticoso," while Dutt (1894, p. 1716) translates, "the wine distilled in the province of Mirā." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 537) renders, "du miel fermenté, savoureux." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 519) offers, "delicious wine made of distilled honey, and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 514), translates, "the pure maireya," while Benoît (1999, p. 1330), influenced by Roussel, offers, "du vin de miel pur." Gita Press (1989, vol. 2, p. 819) understands the phrase less literally, translating, "[Taking in his hand] the pure nectar of flowers as intoxicating as the 'Maireyaka' wine."

"just as Indra might give the nectar of immortality to Śacī" śacīm indro yathāmṛtam: Literally, "just as Indra . . . the nectar of immortality to Śacī." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śacīm iva puraṃdaraḥ, "as the smasher of citadels might to Śacī."

14. "various meats" māṃsāni vicitrāṇi: Only Cr among the commentators consulted seems disturbed at this direct reference to Rāma as a meat eater. For the term māṃsāni, "meats," he glosses, "Things fit for royal consumption, such as rice porridge, etc. (rājyabhogyavastūni śālyodanādīni)." Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 819) shares this idea, offering, "edibles (fit for the royalty)." Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead māṃsāni ca sumṛṣṭāni, "and well-prepared meats." KK and VSP read instead samṛṣṭāni, lending the phrase the sense "meats together with savories." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

15. "And . . . young" bālāś ca: Ñ1,V1,3,B4,D2,3,7,10,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dakṣiṇāḥ, "skilled." Ct glosses dakṣiṇāḥ as skillful (kuśalāḥ), while Cr, taking the term dakṣiṇa in its sense of "south," glosses, "women born in the southern regions (dakṣiṇadeśodbhavāḥ striyaḥ)."

"inebriated" pānavaśaṃ gatāḥ: Literally, "gone to the influence of drink." D5,T2,G3, M3,6,8, and KK (first time) and VSP read instead the synonymous pānavaśānugāḥ.

"danced before" upanṛtyanti: Literally, "they dance near." B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead upānṛtyaṃś ca, "and they danced." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the preposition upa to mean "in proximity to the king (rājānam upa rājñaḥ samīpe—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly)."

Following 15ab, B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP (= 7.42.21ab), NSP, and Gita Press insert, while B1 and Gorresio insert following verse 14, and KK inserts (in brackets, numbered as 7.42.24ab) following 15, a passage of one line [795*]: "and hosts of apsarases and great serpents,[1] surrounded by kiṃnarīs [sang and danced] (apsaroragasaṅghāś ca kiṃnarī-parivāritāḥ)."

[1] "hosts of apsarases and great serpents" apsaroragasaṅghāḥ: B and Gorresio and KK read instead the redundant apsarogaṇasaṅghāḥ, "hosts of troupes of apsarases."

Following 795*, KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.42.24cd) repeats 15cd, reading dakṣiṇāḥ, "skilled," for bālāś ca, "and young women."

Following 15cd, B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press (= 7.42.22cd) repeat 15ab, while KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.42.24ef) repeats, following 15cd second time, substituting upānṛtyanta kākutstham, "They danced before Kākutstha," for upanṛtyanti (upānṛtyaṃś) rājānam, "they dance (danced) before the king."

Following verse 15, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–3,4 (after 14 owing to omission),8,9,12,T4, and Lahore insert, while Ñ2 inserts after 15ab (owing to omission), B2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert after 15ab (second occurrence), a passage of four lines [796*]: "Righteous Rāma, foremost among those who give delight, constantly delighted those delightful and enchanting[1] women, who were exquisitely ornamented.[2][1–2] Seated there with Sītā, he was as resplendent in his blazing energy as is Vasiṣṭha seated with Arundhatī.[3][3–4]"

[1] "Rāma . . . among those who give delight . . . delighted . . . delightful . . . enchanting" manobhirāmā rāmāḥ . . . rāmo ramayatām . . . / ramayāmāsa: Note the anuprāsa, which plays on the verbal root √ram, "to delight." Cs understands that the verb ramayāmāsa, "he delighted," means that Rāma gratified the women with garments, jewelry, etc. (vasanabhūṣaṇādibhis toṣayāmāsa). Ct simply states that he gratified them (toṣayāmāsa). Cr suggests that Rāma urges the women to amuse one another (parasparaṃ vihartuṃ prerayāmāsa).

[2] "who were exquisitely ornamented" paramabhūṣitāḥ: Ś,D6–8,12, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular masculine, paramabhuṣitaḥ, which makes the adjective refer to Rāma rather than the women.

[3] "as . . . with Arundhatī" arundhatyā saha . . . iva: GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the redundant arundhatyā iva . . . iva. The two iva-s are extraordinarily difficult to construe. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Only Cr comments on the line. But he, untypically, reads with the critical edition and KK.

16. "lovely" surucirānanām: Literally, "the beautiful-faced [one]." Ñ,V1,3,D2,6,7,9–11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead surasutopamām, "who was like the daughter of a god or of the gods."

17. Here, as elsewhere, the mention of the passage of time excites the interest of the commentators. Cv understands that the verse suggests that Rāma's enjoyment of Sītā continues for a year and that when spring comes again, at the end of the cold season, that year is completed. (tathā tu ramamāṇasyetyādinā sītāsaṃbhogakālaḥ saṃvatsara iti sūcyate. vasante prāpte śiśirātyayena saṃvatsarapūrtir bhavati.) Ck, commenting on the statement that the winter season has passed, understands that another year has gone by (punaś ca saṃvatsaro 'tīta ity arthaḥ). Cg has a more specific analysis. He agrees with Ck that the mention of winter indicates that another year has passed; however, he goes on to state that since there was no opportunity [for Rāma] to dally [with Sītā] because [he] was engaged in conversation with his allies, the monkeys, etc., one year passed with them. Then, he argues, a second year passes after the dismissal of his allies, during which [Rāma] is engaged in dalliance [with Sītā]. Thus, Cg concludes that at this point in the text, two years have elapsed since Rāma's consecration. (punaś ca samvatsaro 'tīta ity arthaḥ. vānarādisuhṛtsaṃlāpādinā krīḍāvasārābhāvāt taiḥ sahaikasaṃvatsaro gataḥ. tadvisarjanānantaraṃ krīḍayā punar ekaḥ saṃvatsaro gataḥ. tathā cābhiṣekānanataraṃ varṣadvayaṃ jātam.) Cr comments on verse 17 and 797*, line 2, together. He bases his remarks on his comments to 6.116.82 and 90, where he argues that Rāma's rule consisted of three discrete periods of ten thousand years each, after each of which there was a period of sacrifice of one thousand years. Thus Rāma's rule on earth lasted thirty-three thousand years. See 6.116.82,90; 7.50.13; and notes. Cr claims here that after Rāma and Sītā had greatly enjoyed various pleasures during the winter, ten thousand years passed. That is, according to Cr, really a period of thirty thousand years (i.e., three periods of ten thousand years each). This, Cr continues, is to show that the remaining period [of Rāma's reign] is the three thousand years he employed to perform sacrifices. Thus, he claims, the passage is not in contradiction with that in the Bhāgavatapurāṇa, where the period of Rāma's sacrifices is stated to be thirteen thousand years (see BhāgP 9.11.18). The idea is that we must take together a period of ten thousand years of Rāma's rule plus three thousand years of sacrificing. And there is also no fault of undercounting the years [of Rāma's reign] from the time of his consecration for sacrifice until the completion of his sacrifices. For, as Cr concludes, we account for a considerable period of time for the collection and arrangement of all the necessary things for sacrifice. (śiśira āgamo 'tyantaprāptir yasya sa bhogo yadātītas tadā vividhān bhogān prāptayoḥ sītārāmayor daśavarṣasahasrāṇi triṃśadvarṣasahasrāṇīty artho gatāni. etena sahasratrayavarṣāṇi yajñārtham avaśiṣṭānīti phalitam. trayodaśābdasāhasram iti bhāgavatena tu na virodhas tatra trayodaśaparimitavarṣāṇy abdasāhasraṃ cety arthaḥ. nyūnatādoṣas tu na tatra dīkṣāgrahaṇāvadhikayāgasamāptikālaparimāṇabodhanasyaiva vivakṣitatvāt. atra tu sāmagrīsampādanādikālaparimāṇabodhakatvam iti dik.) Ct, as usual, has the most to say concerning the chronological as well as the textual issues raised by 797*, line 2. Ct understands, with Cg and with Ck, whom he quotes, that one year has passed since the departure of the monkeys. Ct, however, argues that we must understand that 797*, line 2, is an interpolation. He then argues that Vālmīki's actual utterance is contained only in the text from his curse of the Niṣāda in the upodghāta of the Bālakāṇḍa (1.2.14) to the statement in the Uttarakāṇḍa that Rāma performed horse sacrifices for ten thousand years (7.89.5) after the banishment of Sītā. Alternatively, Ct proposes, as he will again at 7.64.5, that we take the word varṣa, "year," in the sense of "day." He then estimates that that many (i.e., ten thousand) days have passed since the marriage of Rāma and Sītā. He calculates that they spent slightly more than twelve years in Ayodhyā, fourteen in the forest, and another year, once again, back in Ayodhyā. In this way, he believes that we are to understand that somewhat more than twenty-seven years have passed [since the marriage]. (sītārāghavayoś ciram ity anantaram atyakrāmac chubhaḥ kālaḥ śaiśiro bhogadaḥ sadety eva ślokaḥ. vānarāṇāṃ gamanottaraṃ punaś ca saṃvatsaro 'tīta iti katakavyākhyānāt.

On the ages of Rāma and Sītā, see notes to 2.17.26.

"While . . . was enjoying himself in this fashion, the pleasant winter season" tathā tu ramamānasya tasyaivaṃ śiśiraḥ śubhaḥ: D2,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [797*, line1]: "While Sītā and Rāghava were thus enjoying themselves for a long time (tathā tayor viharatoḥ sītārāghavayoś ciram)."

"great Rāghava, foremost of men . . . passed" atyakrāman narendrasya rāghavasya mahātmanaḥ: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead atyakrāmac chubhaḥ kālaḥ śaiśiro [śiśiro—KK, VSP] bhogadaḥ sadā, "the pleasant winter time, which always gives enjoyment passed."

Following verse 17, D7,10,11, and GPP (in brackets between l7.43.26ab and 17.43.26cd), KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [797*, line 2]: "ten thousand years passed while those two great ones [were enjoying themselves] (daśavarṣasahasrāṇi gatāni sumahātmanoḥ)."

18. "had . . . discharged . . . he would spend" kṛtvā . . . /. . . abhavat: Literally, "having performed, he was."

"his duties to the people of the city" paurakṛtyāni: Literally, "the duties or business of or for the people of the city." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmakāryāṇi, "his obligations to dharma," or "his righteous obligations." The compound is ambiguous, as it could refer to religious or moral activities as well as to the duties involving judgment, justice, and the law, since the king is the chief magistrate as well as the chief sacrificer.

19. "And as for Sītā" sītā ca: Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–4,7,10,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar sītāpi.

"her morning obligations to the gods" devakāryāṇi . . . paurvāhṇikāni tu: Literally, "and duties to the gods, which pertain to the morning." Ŝ,Ñ,B2,D6–8,10–12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vai, "indeed," for tu, "and or but." See 7.58.12 and 7.63*, lines 46–47 and notes.

"she would stand, cupping her hands in reverence without distinction, before all of her mothers-in-law" śvaśrūṇām aviśeṣataḥ sarvāsāṃ prāñjaliḥ sthitā: Literally, "hands cupped in reference, she stood without distinction among all the mothers-in-law." Ś,Ñ, B,D1–4,6–12,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śvaśrūṇām akarot pūjāṃ sarvāsām aviśeṣataḥ, "She honored all of her mothers-in-law without distinction." Cs notes that the term shows Sītā's lack of hostility (aviśeṣata ity anena sītāyā amātsaryaṃ dyotayati). Presumably the reference is to her possible resentment of Kaikeyī, but it might be merely Cs's oblique allusion to the traditional tension between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law.

20. "After that, adorned with exquisite and abundant jewelry, she would go to Rāma" tato rāmam upāgacchad vicitrabahubhūṣaṇā: Literally, "Then she, adorned with exquisite and abundant jewelry, went to Rāma." Ñ2,B1,2,4,D6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead abhyagacchat tato rāmaṃ vicitrābharaṇāmbarā, "then she, [wearing] exquisite ornaments and garments, approached Rāma." On the relevance of Sītā's ornamentation, see S. Goldman 2000a.

"to thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣam: Literally, "to the thousand-eyed [one]."

"in his heaven Triviṣṭapa" triviṣṭape: Literally, "in Triviṣṭapa." See 7.19.26 and notes.

21. "Now one day, seeing" dṛṣṭvā tu: Literally, "but or and having seen."

"with an auspicious glow" kalyāṇena: Literally, "with happiness or prosperity." As Cr points out and the context makes clear, the reference is to pregnancy (fetus—so Cr) that produces happiness (kalyāṇajanakagarbheṇety arthaḥ).

Following verse 21, Ñ,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [800*]: "And he said to fair-hipped Sītā, who was like a daughter of the gods (abravīc ca varārohāṃ sītāṃ surasutopamām)."

22. "The acquisition of a child is at hand for me" apatyalābhaḥ . . . mamāyaṃ samupasthitaḥ: Literally, "This acquisition of offspring is at hand for me." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tvayy ayam, "this [acquisition of offspring is at hand] in you," for mamāyam, "this . . . for me," while KK and VSP read tvayi me, "in you . . . for me," a variant not noted in the critical apparatus. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the meaning here is that Sītā's signs of pregnancy are apparent (garbhalakṣaṇaṃ tava spaṣṭaṃ vartata ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Cr understands the phrase to mean that the time in which there will be the acquisition of offspring has arrived (apatyasya lābho yasmin so 'yaṃ kālaḥ samupasthitaḥ).

"So what do you desire? Tell me, what desire of yours must be fulfilled?" kim icchasi hi tad brūhi kaḥ kāmaḥ kriyatāṃ tava: The word hi, "so," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,V3,B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kim icchasi varārohe kāmaḥ kiṃ kriyatāṃ tava. This lends the line the sense "What do you desire, fair-hipped woman? Is there some desire of yours that must be fulfilled?" The allusion here is to dohada, or pregnancy longing. It is thought that such longings must be fulfilled, lest the fetus come to harm. See Bloomfield 1920 and S. Goldman 2014. See, too, 7.46.15 and notes.

23–24. "Smiling" prahasantī: Literally, "smiling or laughing." Ñ2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar smitaṃ kṛtvā, "having made a smile." Ct remarks that by Sītā's smile is suggested the appropriateness of the true fulfillment of the brahman's curse, as she reflects that this would mark the fufillment of her mission as an avatāra (smitaṃ kṛtvā. svāvatārakṛtyaṃ pūrṇam iti brāhmaṇaśāpasya satyatvakaraṇaucityaṃ ca hāsena sūcitam). The reference is, no doubt, to the ṛṣi Bhṛgu's curse of Viṣṇu to take on worldly births, or avatāras. On Bhṛgu's curse of Viṣṇu, see notes to 7.42.5–6.

"Heroic" vīra: Ñ,B1,2,4,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead deva, "lord or god."

"holy" puṇyāni: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"that are located on the bank of the Ganges" gaṅgātīre niviṣṭāni: B2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gaṅgātīropaviṣṭānām, "[of the seers] who dwell on the banks of the Ganges."

"I may spend some time at the feet" pādamūleṣu vartitum: Literally, "in order to dwell at the roots of the feet."

"of holy deeds" puṇyakarmaṇām: Ś,Ñ,V1,B1,2,4,D1–4,6–12,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ugratejasām, "of fierce blazing energy."

"who live on fruits and roots" phalamūlāśinām: Literally, "those who have fruits and roots for their food." Cs, eager to spare the poet the charge of repetitiveness, specifies that the term here refers specifically to those whose food consists of the fruits and roots of trees (phalamūlāśināṃ vṛkṣasaṃbandhiphalamūlabhojinām). This is, apparently, to distinguish the term from the seemingly synonymous term mūlaphalabhojiṣu in verse 25 below. See notes to verse 25 below.

25. "I might spend . . . among those holy sages" vaseyaṃ puṇyaśāliṣu: Literally, "I would dwell among those abounding in or conversant with holiness." The word -śāliṣu is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ1,V1,B1,4,D1–4,6–12,T4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nivaseyaṃ tapovane, "I would stay or dwell in a penance grove."

"even a single night" apy ekarātram: The word ekarātram is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous ekarātrim. Ct believes that the phrase "even a single night" suggests that Sītā really desires to stay for a long time (apy ekarātrim ity anena cirakālavāsamanoratho dhvanitaḥ). Ct, looking ahead to what will be an enforced and lengthy stay in the ashram of Vālmīki, may be trying to defuse the sensitive matter of Sītā's abandonment by suggesting that such a prolonged stay is really her ultimate wish.

"who subsist on roots and fruits" mūlaphalabhojiṣu: Ñ2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the genitive plural mūlaphalabhojinām, "among those who subsist on roots and fruits." Cs, as noted above, takes the transposition of the terms phala, "fruit," and mūla, "root," compared to the way they appear in verse 24 above and in most of the epic literature, to offer a different interpretation that has nothing to do with the seers' diet. He takes the compound mūlaphala- to mean "the prime reward, that is, spiritual liberation (mokṣa). [The seers are thus] those who enjoy the bliss of that. (mūlaphalabhojināṃ mūlaphalaṃ mokṣas tatsukhabhojinām.)"

26. "Rest assured" visrabdhā bhava: Literally, "Be confident." Ck, Cg, and Ct believe that Rāma is trying to allay Sītā's concern that it will be difficult or inappropriate for him to send his queen off to an ashram. (visrabdhā bhaveti. mahārājo mahiṣīṃ māṃ katham āśramaṃ preṣayiṣyatīti śaṅkāṃ mā kurv ity arthaḥ—so Ck; Cg and Ct similarly.)

"Kuśa" kuśaḥ: Ñ1,D5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kulaḥ, "Kula," while D6,T1,2,M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead kuṭaḥ, "Kuṭa."

"stories" kathāḥ: According to Cs, these are tales of the past (atītavārtāḥ).

4. "Bhadra" bhadra: Cs claims that Rāma speaks to only one of his friends, namely Bhadra, even though he is not mentioned as the foremost among them, because of the latter's particular knowledge of the current goings-on in the kingdom. According to Cs, Bhadra has acquired this information because he alone had been dispatched (presumably to acquire it) (bhadrety ekam aprathamaṃ praty uktir vārtāvittayaitasyaiva prasthāpanāt). Compare Raghuvaṃśa 14.31, where Bhadra is specifically identified as a spy (apasarpa). Note also Uttararāmacarita (1.38.1ff.), where Durmukha, who plays the same role as Bhadra, is similarly identified as a spy (apasarpa), whom Rāma had dispatched to gather information from the people.

According to Cs, Bhadra has acquired this information because he alone had been dispatched (presumably to acquire it) (bhadrety ekam aprathamaṃ praty uktir vārtāvittayaitasyaiva prasthāpanāt). Note also Uttararāmacarita (1.38.1ff.), where Durmukha, who plays the same role as Bhadra, is similarly identified as a spy (apasarpa), whom Rāma had dispatched to gather information from the people.

"what are people talking about in the city and provinces" kāḥ kathā nagare . . . vartante viṣayeṣu ca: Literally, "what tales are current in the city and the regions." Cg, Ct, and Cr all gloss the polysemic term viṣayeṣu as deśeṣu, "in the regions."

5–6. Cs sets Rāma's questions in a theological context. He argues that the real meaning here is that Rāma asks about the goings-on in the city because, despite the fact that he is omniscient, he inquires in the manner of an ignorant person in order to bring about his separation from Sītā, according to the practices of ordinary people. He does so, Cs continues, in his compassion for the sage Bhṛgu in order to make the curse uttered by that ascetic come true. (sarvajño 'py ajñavad bhṛgumukhatāpasaśāpaṃ taddayayā yathārthaṃ cikīrṣuḥ sītāviyogaṃ lokarītyecchann eva janapadajanapurajanavṛttāntaṃ pṛcchati rāma iti bhāvaḥ.) We believe that the reference is to the curse that the ṛṣi Bhṛgu pronounced upon Viṣṇu in his anger at the latter's beheading of his wife. According to this curse, Viṣṇu was condemned to be born in the world many times. At 7.50.12, the curse specifies that Rāma will abandon his wife for a long time. See also App. I, No. 7, following notes to 7.50.10. The episode is narrated in the Matsyapurāṇa (47.94–113) and the Padmapurāṇa ([ĀnSS] 2[Bhūkhaṇḍa].121). See R. Goldman 1971. Ct offers a similar explanation of Rāma's actions here, adding that Rāma desires to bring about his separation from Sītā in order to instruct people that even virtuous actions must be abandoned if they incur the condemnation of the people (lokanindyaṃ sad api karma tyājyam iti bodhanāyeti bodhyam).

"What are the people . . . saying about me" mām āśritāni kāny āhuḥ . . . janāḥ: Literally, "what [things] with reference to me do people say?" Ck, Ct, and Cr supply the missing substantive "words (vacanāni—so Ck and Cr; vākyāni—so Ct)."

"what indeed of Lakṣmaṇa" kiṃ nu lakṣmaṇam: Ś,Ñ,V3,B,D5–8,10,12,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kiṃ ca lakṣmaṇam, "and what about Lakṣmaṇa?"

"and my mother, Kaikeyī" kaikeyīṃ mātaraṃ ca me: D6,7,10, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kaikeyīṃ kiṃ nu mātaram, "and what indeed of mother Kaikeyī," while GPP and NSP read kaikeyīṃ kiṃ ca mātaram, "and what of mother Kaikeyī," a reading not noted in the critical apparatus.

"For" hi: Ñ1,D6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"at the beginning of a reign" nave rājye: Literally, "in a new kingship or when kingship is new." D1,4,6,7,10,T2–4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vane rājye, yielding the sense "in the forest and in the kingdom." Ct, who shares this reading, glosses, "in the forest, that is to say, in an ashram of the ascetics, and in the kingdom (vane tāpasāśrame rājye ca)." KK and VSP read instead vare rājye, "in an eminent kingdom."

"the royalty must certainly be talked about" vaktavyatāṃ ca rājānaḥ . . . vrajanti: Literally, "for kings or people of the ruling class go to the state of having to be talked about." Given the context in which Rāma asks for the public opinion concerning various members of the royal family, we believe that the term rājānaḥ should be taken in its generic sense of "royalty." Ct explains the context in which Rāma's comments are to be framed, observing that the intention is that, in the absence of knowledge obtained through the mouths of agents concerning what is going on in their own kingdoms, kings will, through the condemnation of the entire populace, go to hell (dūtamukhena svadeśavṛttāntājñāne rājānaḥ sarvajananindādvārā narakaṃ prāpnuvantīty āśayenāha vaktavyatāṃ ceti). Ct glosses the phrase by saying: "Kings who lack discrimination as to what is righteous and unrighteous, whether in the forest, i.e., the ashram of ascetics, or the kingdom at large, come to be the object of negative criticism by everybody (vane tāpasāśrame rājye ca dharmādivicārahīnā rājāno vaktavyatāṃ sarvajanakṛtadurbhāṣaṇaviṣayatāṃ vrajanti—so Ct; Cm similarly)." Ck glosses, "In an eminent kingdom kings become talked about, that is to say, become objects of praise through their devotion to protection (vare rājye vaktavyatāṃ rakṣāprasaṅgena kīrtanīyatām ity arthaḥ)." Cg understands, "When a kingdom is new, kings are talked about whether properly or improperly (nave rājye sati rājāno vaktavyatāṃ samyagasamyag vā kīrtanīyatāṃ vrajanti hi)."

7. "The comments . . . are consistently favorable" sthitāḥ kathāḥ śubhāḥ . . . vartante: Literally, "the conversations are constant [and] auspicious." D5,10,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read śubhāḥ kathāḥ, "auspicious conversations," for kathāḥ śubhāḥ by transposition.

8. "it is the victory in connection with the slaying of Daśagrīva" ayaṃ . . . vijayaḥ . . . daśagrīvavadhāśritaḥ: Literally, "that victory dependent on the slaying of Daśagrīva." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ayam . . . vijayam . . . daśagrīvārjitam. This reading creates a problem with case agreement, since ayam is nominative and vijayam is accusative. Ck and Ct propose dealing with the problem by supplying the phrase "with reference to (uddiśyeti śeṣaḥ)." This would lend the phrase the sense "this [is what is told] with reference to the victory gained through the killing of Daśagrīva." KK and VSP read the accusative singular amum for ayam, which then would agree with their reading of vijayam.

10. "Once I hear what the residents of the city say is good and what is bad, I will continue the good and not perpetuate the bad." śubhāśubhāni vākyāni yāny āhuḥ puravāsinaḥ / śrutvedānīṃ śubhaṃ kuryāṃ na kuryām aśubhāni ca //: Literally, "Now, having heard the good and bad words, which the residents of the city are speaking, I will enact the good and not enact those that are bad." The literal meaning does not, perhaps, convey the sense very well, as the context will famously show. Rāma is attempting to find out his peoples' judgment as to the morality of his actions as ruler, and he vows to do only those things of which they approve. Cs understands śubham to refer to something that is not inimical to others, while aśubhāni refers to things that are harmful to others. (śubhaṃ parāvirodhi. aśubhāni parāhitāni.) GPP, NSP, and Gita Press substitute the interrogative kāni for yāni, making the statement a question, "What things are they saying?" This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

11. "without fear" nirbhayaḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the adverbial nirbhayam, "fearlessly."

"just what . . . are saying" kathayante yathā: Literally, "how they are talking." Ś,Ñ, V1,3,B,D1,3–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous parasmaipada form kathayanti for the ātmanepada form kathayante.

"folk" janāḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pāpāḥ. The reading is somewhat awkward. Normally, it would mean "wicked or malicious people," and this is, indeed, how Cr interprets it, glossing, "even the malicious people (pāpā api janāḥ)." Ct, however, sees the term as an inappropriately gendered substitute for the neuter plural pāpāni, "evil [things or words]." The sense for him would then be "whatever evils are the people talking about."

12. "great-armed Rāma" mahābāhum: Literally, "the great-armed [one]."

"in these well-chosen words" suruciraṃ vacaḥ: Literally, "very beautiful or sweet words." Given the nature of what Bhadra is about to say, it would appear that a literal translation would be inappropriate. The commentators are silent as to the force of the adjective suruciram, "very beautiful." The seeming inappropriateness of the adjective here has forced other translators to resort to various strategies to address the awkwardness. Gorresio (1870, p. 165) renders, "con nobilissime parole" but appears to apply the adjective to the words of Rāma, a syntactical device that is somewhat questionable. Dutt (1894, p. 1718) similarly ascribes the adjective to Rāma's words. He translates, "Hearing the sweet accents of Rāma," which clearly violates the syntax and meaning of the verse.

Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 539) renders, "un trés digne langage." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 521) translates, "in measured tones." Benoît (1999, p. 1332) offers, "cette réponse éloquente." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 516) ignores the phrase entirely. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 821), seemingly aware of the irony, translates more literally, "in these pleasing words"!

13. "what . . . are saying" yathā . . . kathayanti: Literally, "in what way they talk." See notes to verse 11 above.

"They say:" The phrase has been added to provide a transition into the following direct quote.

14. "the . . . bridging of the ocean" samudre setubandhanam: Literally, "the construction of a bridge or causeway in the ocean." See Yuddhakāṇḍa sarga 15.

"which no one . . . had ever done before" akṛtaṃ pūrvakaiḥ kaiścit: Literally, "not done by any previous ones at all." D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read aśrutam, "unheard of," for akṛtam, "not done." Ct understands the reference specifically to be to earlier kings (pūrvakai rājabhiḥ).

16. "in battle" yuddhe: D5–7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous sañkhye, "in battle."

"his anger" amarṣam: Literally, "anger." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs agree that the reference is to Rāma's righteous indignation at Sītā because she was touched by Rāvaṇa. Cs puts this most strongly, stating that the real meaning here is that Rāma puts the anger born from the touch of another man aside, that is to say, he takes no notice of it because of his powerful sexual desire for that wanton woman. (amarṣaṃ parapuruṣasaṃsparśajaṃ prṣṭhataḥ kṛtvālakṣīkṛtya. lalanālaulupyād iti bhāvaḥ.) Cr, however, is unwilling to accept that Rāma is angry at Sītā and instead argues that Rāma's anger is self-directed because of his failure to kill Rāvaṇa at the very moment of abduction through merely wishing it (amarṣam akṣamāṃ prṣṭhataḥ kṛtvā kṣamāṃ kṛtvety artho 'paharaṇakāla evecchāmātreṇa rāvaṇam ahatveti tātparyam). This is in keeping with Cr's consistent position that there is never any tension between the divinities Rāma and Sītā. See, too, notes to verse 17 below and notes to 7.44.3,4,10,11,13,15,17,18 and 7.46.11–12,14,16. Compare notes to 7.43.1; 7.86.5,6,13; and 7.87.14,15,20.

17. This and the following two verses (17, 18, and 19), provoke Cr to launch into a fairly lengthy and complex deconstruction and reconstruction of the text in keeping with his consistent theological stance, which holds that the two omniscient deities, Rāma and Sītā, are never, in fact, subjected to any insult, injury, or stress. In this case, Cr makes full use of the lexical potential of Sanskrit, including the use of the ekākṣarakoṣa and the resegmentation of sequences, to avoid the apparent meaning of the text, in which it appears that the people are criticizing both Rāma and Sītā. Cr argues as follows: The compound sītāsaṃbhogajam, "produced through enjoyment of Sītā" [is explained as follows]. Sītā is she who is the gateway to all creatures, up to and including Brahmā, etc., and Rāma is he who is the agent of the protection of all beings. That which is produced from the enjoyment of both of them is pleasure (sukham). [The sequence] hṛdayam [Cr's variant for hṛdaye, "in his heart"] [is understood as] hṛt, that is, the abductor of her [i.e., Sītā], and ayam, "he," that is, Rāvaṇa. What is he like? [He is] an extremely cruel-hearted one, that is the meaning. But if one takes the term ayam as a generic neuter, it means a "non-goer (a-yam)." The meaning is that that rākṣasa, Rāvaṇa, does not go to, that is, does not obtain, refuge with Rāma. [On the other hand], if one believes that it is not a generic neuter, then the first half of the verse [17ab—kīdṛśaṃ hṛdaye (-am—Cr) tasya sītāsambhogajaṃ sukham] must be taken as a separate syntactical unit. But if one takes it as syntactically connected to what follows, then, having described the evil deed of Rāvaṇa [in the first half], [the author] once more praises Rāma [in the second half and following, i.e., 17cd, etc.—aṅkam āropya hi purā rāvaṇena balād dhṛtām]. The word aṅ means "earlier," that is to say, "previously." Rāma, who is the author of all good things, went to, that is, recovered Sītā, who had been supported by the gods, that is to say, caused to be accepted [by Rāma], by means of a proclamation (āvaṇena), that is to say, by many expressions to the effect that "she is pure." He did this after having forcibly caused her to ascend the fire, that is to say, having caused her to be placed there for the purpose of proving her innocence. That is to say, Sītā is the one who was characterized by the fulfillment of her own dharma and who had earlier been forcibly brought to Laṅkā by Rāvaṇa, that is to say, made to go there, and thus placed in the aśokavanikā, and thus placed under the control of the rākṣasas [= 18ab laṅkām api punar (purā—Cr) nītām aśokavanikāṃ gatām]. As for the sequence katham [in 18cd = rakṣasāṃ vaśam āpannāṃ kathaṃ rāmo na kutsate], we must understand that the syllable tham means "evil," while kam means "pleasure." He who takes pleasure in [causing] terror is Rāvaṇa. But Rāma never condemns him. Therefore, this one [occurrence of the word] purā is not useless. With regard to the word "balāt" [in 17cd], because there is no difference between the two alternatives, it construes with both [our enemies, i.e., Rāvaṇa, and with our wives, i.e., Sītā] [19ab = asmākam api dāreṣu sahanīyaṃ bhaviṣyati]. Thus we must tolerate our dāras, that is to say, both our enemies and our wives. In the case of our enemies, this means non-condemnation, even though we recall their offenses. In the case of our wives, it means not being agitated with regard to unhappiness caused by not having performed ordeals prompted by suspicions concerning their offenses. We get both meanings from the word dāra by ekaśeṣa [one word of a dvandva compound standing for both, i.e., ripu, "enemy," and dāra, "wife," are reduced to only dāra]. The basis [for this ekaśeṣa] is the lack of difference between the two alternatives and the context [19cd = yathā hi kurute rājā prajā tam anuvartate]. Just as, that is to say, in which fashion the king performs which dharma, in the same fashion, the people imitate that same dharma, that is to say, they practice [that dharma]. According to [the lexicon called] Medinī, the word ka, when masculine, can mean "a peacock or fire"; when in the neuter, it can mean "pleasure, the head, or water." The word tha is a neuter and can mean "protection, auspiciousness, or terror." And this [definition] also accords with that [i.e., the Medinīkośa]. These two and one-half verses [17cd–19] are a single syntactic unit. (sītāsambhogajaṃ sītā cābrahmādidvārā sarvarakṣākārako rāmaś ca tayoḥ sambhogāj jātaṃ yat sukhaṃ tasyā hṛd ayaṃ rāvaṇaḥ kīdṛśam atikrūrahṛdaya ity arthaḥ. sāmānye napuṃsakaṃ yadi tv ayam ity asya na yāti rāmaśaraṇaṃ prāpnoti tad rakṣo rāvaṇa ity arthaḥ. tadā na sāmānyanapuṃsakatvakalpanārdhaṃ pṛthak. prasaṅgato rāvaṇāpakṛtiṃ saṃvarṇya punar api rāmakīrtim āha 'aññ' iti purā pūrvaṃ balād api laṅkām ānītāṃ rāvaṇena prāpitām ata evāśokavanikāṃ gatām ata eva rakṣasāṃ vaśam āpannāṃ purā svadharmapūrttyopalakṣitām api sītāṃ balāt ke vahnau ropyāropya śapathārthaṃ saṃsthāpya vidyamānā aṅ sarvasatkārakarttā rāma āvaṇeneyaṃ viśuddhetyādibahūktyā dhṛtāṃ devaiḥ svīkāritāṃ sītām āra prāpa. kathaṃ thaṃ pāpam eva kaṃ sukhaṃ yasya thaṃ rāvaṇaṃ tu na kutsyati kadāpi na nindatīty arthaḥ. ata evaikasya pūrety asya na vaiyarthyaṃ balād iti vinigamanāvirahād ubhayānvayy ata evāsmākam api dāreṣu ripuṣu strīṣu ca sahanīyaṃ bhaviṣyati. ripuṣu sahanīyatvaṃ ca tadaparādhasmaraṇe 'pi tannindāyā akaraṇatvaṃ strīṣu sahanīyatvaṃ ca tadaparādhaśaṅkāhetukaparīkṣākaraṇajanitaduḥkheṣv anudvignatvam. dāraśabdenobhayalābhas tv ekaśeṣeṇa mūlaṃ tu vinigamanāvirahaḥ prakaraṇaṃ ca tatra hetur yathā yena prakāreṇa yaṃ dharmaṃ rājā kurute tathā taṃ dharmaṃ prajā anuvartate 'nuvartante kurvanti. mayūre 'gnau puṃsi syāt sukhaśīrṣajaleṣu kam iti medinī thaṃ rakṣaṇe maṅgale ca sādhvase ca napuṃsakam ity api saiva. sārdhaślokadvayam ekānvayi.) See notes to verse 16 above.

"since" hi: D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "and or but."

"clutching her to his side" aṅkam āropya: Literally, "having placed on his flank or hip." But see Cr's comments on this phrase above.

18. See Cr's comments at notes to verse 17 above.

"how can . . . not despise" katham . . . na kutsate: The syllable -te is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G1–3,M1,3,6,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous kutsyati. Cs glosses the people's words as "What sort of pleasure can there be from union with Sītā, as if he were some pauper unable to make another marriage? 'Does he not despise [her]?' [which means] 'Is he not disgusted [with her]?' (vivāhāntarakaraṇāśaktanirdhanamānavavat sītāsaṃbhogajaṃ sukhaṃ kīdṛśaṃ, na kutsati na jugupsate)."

"and, what is more" punaḥ: Literally, "again." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ1,D2,5–7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead purā, "earlier."

19. See Cr's comments at notes to verse 17 above.

"Now we shall have to put up with this from our own wives as well." asmākam api dāreṣu sahanīyaṃ bhaviṣyati: Literally, "It will have to be endured even in respect to our wives." Cm glosses sahanīyam, "what is to be endured," saying, "The meaning is 'The sin takes the form of taking back a wife that has been touched by another man' (paraspṛṣṭadārānayanarūpaṃ kaśmalam ity arthaḥ)." Ck and Ct understand that the word kaśmalam, "impropriety or sin," should be added (kaśmalam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck; Ct similarly).

"For people always follow what the king does." yathā hi kurute rājā prajā tam anuvartate: Literally, "For as the king acts, the people follow him." Ś1,2,D10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the plural prajāḥ but do not replace the singular verb. Ct and Cr, however, gloss the plural form anuvartante.

20. "And that . . . is what . . . are saying" evam . . . vaco vadanti: Literally, "thus they speak words."

21. "this" etat: D5–7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evam, "thus."

"he was deeply pained" paramārtavat: Literally, "as if deeply pained." Given the general tenor of the poem, we agree with Ck and Cg, who gloss, "having become extremely miserable (paramaduḥkhībhūtvā)." On the other hand, given the more devotional tone of much of the Uttarakāṇḍa, it may be that Ct is correct in taking the suffix -vat in its literal sense of "like, as if." He explains, "Having taken on the appearance of one who is deeply miserable. In reality, the poet speaks like this even though there is no possibility of either joy or sorrow in the case of the Lord. (paramaduḥkhīvākāraṃ kṛtvā. vastuto bhagavati harṣaduḥkayor abhāvād evam uktiḥ.)" Cr takes the term to refer to Rāma's friends, glossing, "He spoke to them even though they were deeply pained (paramārtān api vadate)."

"all his friends" sarvān suhṛdaḥ: Literally, "all friends." Ś,V3,D6–8,10–12, G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suhṛdaḥ sarvān by transposition.

"What about this?" katham etat: Literally, "How is this?" As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr note, Rāma is asking his friends whether these disgraceful words reported by Bhadra are true or not (bhadroktam etad apayaśovacanaṃ kathaṃ tattvam atattvaṃ veti—so Ck and Cg; Ct and Cr similarly).

"You must tell me." nivedyatām: Literally, "It must be reported or informed." GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vadantu mām, "[You gentlemen] must tell me," while D5,7,10,11,T3,4, and KK and VSP read instead bravītha mām, "You [all] must tell me."

23. "all of them" sarveṣām: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"them all" sarvāṃs tān: D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vayasyān, "friends." Cs notes that we are to understand that Rāma dismisses his friends so that he may consult with his trusted [advisers] (vayasyavisarjanam āptaiḥ saha saṃmantraṇāyeti jñeyam).

Sarga 43

1. Cr has a rather interesting and unusual explanation for the impending banishment of Sītā. According to him, Rāma reflects, first of all, that since Sītā is pregnant, it is not an appropriate time for them to have sexual relations. However, he feels that if they remain in the same place, he will find it hard to restrain himself. Therefore Rāma regards Sītā's request to go to the forest to be an opportune one in the absence of any feasible alternative for him. Moreover, according to Cr, Rāma reflects that, as he is about to undertake a sacrifice, sexual intercourse would be inappropriate in any case, and, therefore, he resolves that Sītā should remain in the forest until the completion of the ritual. It is only after this reflection that he addresses the doorkeeper. (rāghavo buddhyā sītāyā garbhavatītvena nāyaṃ saṃbhogakālaḥ sa caikatra sthitau durnivāra iti sītāvanagamanaprārthanaṃ samīcīnam eva matkartavyāntarābhave yāgo 'py ārabdhavyas tatrāpi saṃbhogasyānaucityam eveti tāvatparyantaṃ sītayā vana eva sthātavyam iti vicāreṇa niścitya yāgaparyantaṃ sītāvanasthitiviṣayakaniścayaṃ kṛtvā samīpa āsīnaṃ dvāḥstham abravīt.) See notes to 885*, note 3, following notes to verse 7.47.10; and also notes to verse 7.87.14, where Cr brings up this issue again. See, too, 7.47.5,8; and App. I, No. 7, note 10, following notes to 7.50.10. See, too, notes to 7.42.16.

"And" tu: The word tu is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"the circle of his friends" suhṛdvargam: Literally, "his group or company of friends."

"he took a resolution in his mind" buddhyā niścitya: Literally, "having resolved with his mind." Ck, Cg, and Ct suggest adding "what he had to do (kartavyam iti śeṣaḥ)."

"the doorkeeper" dvāḥstham: KK (1913) and Gorresio read instead dvāstham, a variant not noted by the editors of the critical edition.

2. "Lakṣmaṇa . . . of auspicious marks" lakṣmaṇaṃ śubhalakṣaṇam: This common alliterative epithet, typical of the sort of which the poet is so fond, is also used at 7.66.5 and Prakṣipta III, sarga 1.6 (= App. I, No. 8, line 313). On this epithet in the Yuddhakāṇḍa, see note to 6.14.3. For other alliterative epithets of Lakṣmaṇa, see 7.45.4–5,11; 7.51.14; and notes. See also R. Goldman 1984, pp. 105–6, on the echoing of names in epithets.

"great-armed" mahābāhum: D6–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābhāgam, "most illustrious or noble [one]."

"and invincible" cāparājitam: D5–7,10,11,T1,2,G1,M3,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aparājitam, "invincible."

3. "the doorkeeper" dvāḥsthaḥ: KK (1913) reads instead dvāsthaḥ, a variant not noted by the editors of the critical edition.

"words" bhāṣitam: Literally, "speech." B4,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vacanam, "speech."

"unhindered" anivāritaḥ: Cs observes that the doorkeeper would not have been delayed, since he comes directly from the king (bhūpasamīpād āgamanāt).

4. "And then . . . words" ca tadā vākyam: D5–7,10,11,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sumahātmānam, "the very great [Lakṣmaṇa]."

"after glorifying Lakṣmaṇa" vardhayitvā: Literally, "having glorified." Ck, Cg, and Ct supply the phrase "with blessings of victory (jayāśiṣeti śeṣaḥ)." Compare notes to 7.23.2.

5. "Upon hearing" śrutvā: Literally, "having heard." B3,D10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kṛtvā, which here would construe with rāghavaśāsanam in the sense of "having carried out Rāghava's command."

"with the words, 'So be it!' " bāḍham ity eva: Literally, "immediately [having said], 'So be it!' "

Following 5ab, M1,2,4,7,9,10, and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.74.5cd) insert a passage of one line [815*]: "The great-armed tamer of his foes swiftly leapt up from his seat[1] (utpapātāsanāt tūrṇaṃ mahābāhur ariṃdamaḥ /)."

[1] "swiftly leapt up from his seat" utpapātāsanāt tūrṇam: The reference, of course, is to Lakṣmaṇa. Pāda a (utpapātāsanāt tūrṇam) = 7c.

6. "the doorkeeper" dvāḥsthaḥ: KK (1913) and Gorresio read instead dvāsthaḥ, a variant not noted by the editors of the critical edition.

"he went to the presence of Bharata and . . . spoke" bharatam antikāt / uvāca . . . vākyam: Literally, "he spoke words to Bharata from the vicinity." Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr all flesh out the elliptical syntax by adding the phrase "having reached Bharata's vicinity (bharatasamīpaṃ prāpyety arthaḥ)." D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tatra, "there," for vākyam, "speech or words."

"cupping his hands in reverence" prāñjaliḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bharatam, "Bharata."

Following 6c [uvāca prāñjalir vākyam], D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line, printed as two half lines in the critical apparatus (= 7.44.6d–7a in all printed editions of the southern commentators) [817*]: "[the doorkeeper] having glorified [Bharata] with hands cupped in reverence and having bowed low in humility (vardhayitvā kṛtāñjaliḥ / vinayāvanato bhūtvā /)."

7. "from the doorkeeper" dvāḥsthāt: KK (1913) and Gorresio read instead dvāsthāt, a variant not noted by the editors of the critical edition.

"departed from there" tato 'gamat: Literally, "went from there." The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D5–7,10,T1,2,G1,3,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mahābalaḥ, "the immensely powerful one." The absence of a finite verb of motion in this reading impels Cr to supply one in the form of "he went" (jagāmeti śeṣaḥ). M3, KK, and VSP read instead yayau balī, "that mighty one went."

"on foot" padbhyām: Literally, "by two feet." Cs believes that Bharata goes on foot out of anxiety over the delay in the arrival of a vehicle (yānāgamanavilambabhiyā). It is interesting to note that Cs implicitly remarks on the distinction between Lakṣmaṇa, who is described at verse 5 as taking his chariot to go to Rāma's residence, and Bharata, who goes on foot. Other possible explanations for this difference would be that Lakṣmaṇa, as Rāma's most devoted and constant helper, goes as quickly as possible or that, as a prince junior to Bharata, his residence is farther than Bharata's from that of the king. Śatrughna's mode of travel is not specified. See verse 10 below.

8. "When the doorkeeper had seen" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen." Like Cr, we add the word "doorkeeper" for the sake of clarity (dvāḥstha iti śeṣaḥ).

"He . . . said" jagāda: D5–7,10,G1,2,M5,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous uvāca, "he said."

9. "Come! Come along" ehy āgaccha: Literally, "come, come." No doubt the repetition is intended to convey a sense of urgency. Nonetheless, Cr seems disturbed by the redundancy and argues that we should take the first imperative, ehi, in the sense of "to know or understand." Thus he constructs pādas ab as follows: "The king wishes to see you. You must know that. Therefore you must come, that is, you must go. (rājā tvāṃ draṣṭum icchatīty ehi jānīhy ata āgaccha vraja.)"

10. "the doorkeeper's words" vacanaṃ tasya: Literally, "his speech."

"he acknowledged Rāma's command by bowing his head to the ground" rāmaśāsanam / śirasā vandya dharaṇīm: Literally, "having honored Rāma's command with his head to the earth." The syntax of the critical reading is confusing. The object of Śatrughna's veneration is not clear, since both rāmaśāsanam, "Rāma's command," and dharaṇīm, "the earth," are in the accusative. According to the cultural norm, one acknowledges or receives a command of a superior by bowing one's head reverentially. In this case, it appears that the intention is that Śatrughna bows his head to the ground, although the construction is elliptical. None of the commentators consulted shares the reading rāmaśāsanam. Ñ1,V1,D1–4,9,T3,4, and Lahore read instead rāmaśāsanam / śirasā pratigṛhyāśu, "having received or accepted Rāma's command with [his] head, [he went] quickly." Ñ2 [śirasā],B,D5, and Gorresio read śirasi pratigṛhyājñām, "having received or accepted the command on his head," for śirasā vandya dharaṇīm. Both of these northern variants appear to be glossing the awkward construction that we find in the critical edition. D5–7,10,11,T,1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read paramāsanāt, "from that excellent seat," for rāmaśāsanam, "Rāma's command," while KK and VSP read śirasā dharaṇīṃ prāpya, "having reached the earth with his head," for śirasā vandya dharaṇīm, "having honored . . . with his head to the earth." This lends the reading of GPP, NSP, and Gita Press the sense "And when Śatrughna had heard his words, he honored the earth with his head and departed from his excellent seat to where Rāma was." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "Having honored the earth with his head, that is to say, having reached the earth with his head. The sense is 'having honored Rāma.' (śirasā vandya dharaṇīṃ śirasā dharaṇīṃ prāpya. rāmāya vanditvety arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.)" The variant found in KK and VSP would lend the line the sense "And when Śatrughna had heard his words, he reached the earth with his head, and departed from his excellent seat to where Rāma was." Compare the similar expression at 7.47.13 below and notes.

Following verse 10, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–5,7–12,T3,4,M3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [819*]: "And the doorkeeper,[1] having returned, then[2] reported to Rāma, with hands cupped in reverence, that all of the brothers[3] were present (dvāḥsthas tv āgamya rāmāya sarvān eva kṛtāñjaliḥ / nivedayāmāsa tadā bhrātṝṃs tān samupasthitān //)."

[1] "the doorkeeper" dvāḥsthaḥ: KK (1913) and Gorresio read instead dvāsthaḥ, a variant not noted by the editors of the critical edition.

[2] "then" tadā: Ś1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tathā, "thus."

[3] "the brothers" bhrātṝṃs tān: Ñ1,B3,4,D7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhrātṝn svān, "his own brothers."

11. "his head sunk, and his mind distressed" avākśirā dīnāmanāḥ: Literally, "having a head which was down, having a distressed mind." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead avāṅmukhaḥ, "his face turned downward," for avākśirāḥ, "his head sunk." While both expressions are common in the epic, the collocation of the two adjectives, with some variations, is a particular favorite of the epic poet. Compare, for example, 7.46.10; 7.51.5; and 7.95.17.

"the doorkeeper" dvāḥstham: KK (1913) and Gorresio read instead dvāstham, a variant not noted by the editors of the critical edition.

12. "They are indeed my life breaths outside my body." ete prāṇā bahiścarāḥ: Literally, "these [are] breaths moving outside." The phrase prāṇā bahiścarāḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The idiom, with variations, occurs four times in the critical edition. The first two refer specifically to Lakṣmaṇa, while the third, at 6.40.46, is in reference to Garuḍa. See 1.17.14–17; 3.32.13; 6.40.46; and notes. D6,7,10,11, T1,2,G,M2–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ete prāṇāḥ priyā mama, "these [are] life breaths dear to me." Cs glosses, "they are as dear as life breaths (prāṇā yathā tathā priyāḥ)."

13. "And" tu: The word tu is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"clad in white" śuklavāsasaḥ: KK and VSP read instead śakratejasaḥ, "whose blazing energy was that of Śakra."

"together" samāhitāḥ: Literally, "grouped together." The term could also mean here "composed."

14–16. "They saw . . . They saw . . . and they observed" dṛṣṭvā . . . dṛṣṭvā . . . vīkṣya: Literally, "Having seen . . . having seen . . . having observed." We have broken up the clauses into sentences for the sake of readability.

"the hare-marked moon dimmed by an eclipse" sagrahaṃ śaśinaṃ yathā: Literally, "the hare-marked one together with the eclipse-demon [i.e., Rāhu]."

"robbed of its splendor" hataśobham: Literally, "whose splendor was destroyed." Cs notes that a lotus would be robbed of its splendor by such things as frost (nīhārādinā).

"together" samāhitāḥ: See note to verse 13 above.

"while Rāma" rāmaś ca: Literally, "and Rāma." Ś,V1,3,D1–4,7–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāmas tu, "but Rāma."

Following 14ab, KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.44.16) inserts a passage of one line, not noted in the critical apparatus: "Having entered, those delights of the Raghus were agitated, their mouths dry, their minds overwhelmed with the anxious thought:[1] 'What has happened to Rāma?' (kim etad iti rāmasya cintāvyākulacetasaḥ / vyathitāḥ śuṣkavadanāḥ praviśya raghunandanāḥ //)"

[1] "their minds overwhelmed with the anxious thought: 'What has happened to Rāma?' " kim etad iti rāmasya cintāvyākulacetasaḥ: Alternatively, one might understand, "[Having entered . . . they thought]: 'What has happened to Rāma, whose mind is overwhelmed with worry?' " In either case, the placement of the iti is awkward. As far as we can determine, no translator has rendered this line.

17. "great-armed Rāma" mahābhujaḥ: Literally, "the great-armed [one]." D6,7,10,11, T1,3,4, M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalaḥ, "the immensely powerful [one]."

"Please take your seats" āsaneṣv ādhvam: Literally, "You must sit on seats." Ś,V3,B3,D6–8,10–12,T1,2,G,M1,3,10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous parasmaipada loṭ form āsata, "You [all] please sit."

18. "You gentlemen are my life." bhavanto mama jīvitam: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhavanto jīvitaṃ mama by transposition.

"you have created the kingdom that I rule" bhavadbhiś ca kṛtaṃ rājyaṃ pālayāmi: It is not completely clear as to the sense in which the kingdom of Kosala was created by Rāma's brothers, because no earlier reference to such a history appears in the poem. Ck explains: "And together with you gentlemen the kingdom was created, that is to say, occupied or extended (bhavadbhiś ca sahakṛtaṃ vyāptaṃ rājyam)." Cm, Ct, and Cr gloss, "brought about or accomplished by you gentlemen (bhavadbhiḥ kṛtaṃ saṃpāditam)." Cm understands alternatively that Rāma is saying that he has brought about the kingdom together with his brothers (bhavadbhiḥ kṛtaṃ bhavadbhiḥ saha rājyaṃ saṃpāditam iti vā).

19. "highly advanced in intelligence" buddhau . . . pariniṣṭhitāḥ: Literally, "accomplished in mind or intelligence." Ś3,B1,2,D6,7,10,11,G3,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead buddhyā . . . pariniṣṭhitāḥ, "accomplished by means of intellect." Cr understands that the brothers are advanced in intelligence, that is, of mature minds, because of their grounding in the substance of the śāstras (kṛto hṛdaye sanniveśitaḥ śāstrārtho yair buddhyā pariniṣṭhitāḥ paripakvāḥ paripakvabuddhimanta ity arthaḥ).

"Lords of men" nāreśvarāḥ: The compound is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"must be considered" anveṣṭavyaḥ: Literally, "to be sought out or desired." We follow the interpretation of Cs, who glosses, "which is to be considered (vicāraṇīyaḥ)." Ck and Ct gloss, "that needs to be pursued (anusaraṇīyaḥ)."

Following verse 19, Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–7,9–11,T1,2,G,M, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T3,4 insert after verse 18, a passage of two lines [824*]: "Now as Kākutstha was speaking in this fashion, all of them, paying close attention,[1] were disturbed in their minds, thinking: 'What on earth[2] is the king going to say?' (tathā vadati kākutsthe avadhānaparāyaṇāḥ / udvignamanasaḥ sarve kiṃ nu rājābhidhāsyati //)." Note the hiatus between kākutsthe and avadhānaparāyaṇāḥ.

[1] "paying close attention" avadhānaparāyaṇāḥ: Literally, "given over to attentiveness." KK and VSP read instead hy avadhānaparāyaṇāḥ, "indeed, given over to attentiveness," to avoid hiatus.

[2] "thinking: 'What on earth . . .' " kiṃ nu: Literally, "What indeed?"

2. "Bless you, you must all hear" śṛṇuta bhadraṃ vaḥ: The formula bhadraṃ te or bhadram vaḥ, "blessings or auspiciousness to you," is frequently used, as it is here, to somewhat soften the force of the imperative, as in "please," or "I pray you." See note to 6.6.4. See also Tubb 2006.

"the sort of talk that is circulating among the people of the city regarding Sītā and me" paurāṇāṃ mama sītāyāṃ yādṛśī vartate kathā: Literally, "What sort of tale exists among the people of me concerning Sītā." The syntactical force of the genitive pronoun mama is not entirely clear. If one takes it simply as a genitive, it could refer either to the people of the city (paurāṇām), as in "my subjects," or to Sītā (sītāyām), i.e., "my Sītā." However, given the context of the preceding sarga and what follows in this one, we agree with Cr, who takes the pronoun elliptically in the sense of "regarding me (madviṣaye)," and thus reads it as parallel to sītāyām, which he similarly glosses, "regarding Sītā (sītāviṣaye)." Ck, Cg, and Ct read the genitive pronoun in an ablative sense, construing it with the imperative śṛṇuta in pāda a. This yields the sense "You [all] must hear from me (matsakāśāc chṛṇuta—Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)."

"and do not think of objecting to it" mā kurudhvaṃ mano 'nyathā: Literally, "You must not make your mind otherwise." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all agree that Rāma is telling his brothers not to go against his intention in any way (madabhiprāyānanukūlaṃ kurudhvam ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck, Cm, and Ct similarly). Dutt (1894, p. 1721), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 518), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 824) follow this interpretation. Cr understands somewhat differently, believing that Rāma is telling his brothers not to make their minds averse to hearing what he is about to say (anyathā śravaṇavimukhaṃ mano mā kurudhvam). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 541), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 524) and Benoît (1999, p. 1334), appears to base his interpretation on Cr's gloss. It is interesting to note that although Rāma has summoned his brothers, seemingly for consultation, and has extolled them as deeply learned in the śāstras, etc. (7.43.19), he appears to intend to forestall any dissent from the outset. See verses 18–20 below, where Rāma makes it clear that he will not tolerate any criticism of his plan.

3. "There is severe criticism on the part of the people of the city as well as of the countryside." paurāpavādaḥ sumahāṃs tathā janapadasya ca: Literally, "there is very great city-folk criticism and of the countryside as well." As Cs notes, we have to understand that the conjunction ca, "and," serves to bring the word -apavādaḥ, "criticism," even though it is in compound, into conjunction with the genitive janapadasya, "of the countryside" (caś cāpavādapadānukarṣakaḥ).

"There is disgust directed toward me . . . it" vartate mayi bibhatsaḥ . . . saḥ: Literally, "there is disgust in reference to me . . . [and] it." Cr, alone among the commentators consulted, is, as always, unwilling to entertain the idea that there can be any criticism directed toward Rāma. He uses the possibility of reading the sequence vartate mayi as vartate 'mayi, that is to say, "with respect to anyone other than me." He thus argues, interestingly, that Rāma is saying, "In my opinion, there is great criticism on the part of the residents of the city, that is, there is blame that is cast by the people of the city and of the countryside as well," and Cr continues that we must supply the word "criticism" again. He has Rāma continue to say, "This disgust and blame on the part of both these groups pierces the vitals, but it is not directed toward me, but rather toward those that oppose me. In my case, there is only praise." That is the intention. By this, Cr continues, it is suggested that in Rāma's kingdom there is an abundance of righteousness, etc., and this, in turn, suggests that Rāma has nothing more to do in regard to his kingship. (me mate mahān paurāpavādaḥ paurakartṛkanindā janapadasyāpavādaś ceti śeṣaḥ. marmāṇi kṛntati sobhayakartṛkā bibhatsā nindā amayi madvirodhini vartate mama tu stutir eva vartata iti tātparyam. etena svarājyasya dharmādisaṃpattimattvaṃ sūcitam. tena rājya-viṣayakasvakṛtyantarābhāvo dhvanitaḥ.) D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G2,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vartate mayi bibhatsā . . . sā, "there is disgust in reference to me [and] it." See notes to 7.42.16. Compare notes to verses 4,10,11,13,17, and 18 below.

"pierces me to the vitals" me marmāṇi kṛntati: Literally, "it cuts my vitals."

4. "How then could I have brought Sītā, whose conduct has been sinful, back into the city?" sītāṃ pāpasamācārām ānayeyaṃ kathaṃ pure: Literally, "How could I bring Sītā, of sinful conduct, in the city?" The word pure, "in the city," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. For 4cd, D7,10,11,G1,M1,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [830*]: "Sītā, too, was born into the virtuous House of the great Janakas (sītāpi satkule jātā janakānāṃ mahātmanām)." Cr, in keeping with his project of trying to spare Rāma and Sītā of any taint of unrighteousness, reads the verse consisting of 4ab and 830* to serve as a demonstration of his position. His argument is that the mention of the two noble lineages into which Rāma and Sītā were born, respectively, suggests the impossibility of imputing any contact with unrighteousness to either of them. Therefore, he continues, by this it is suggested that any blame that may have been levied has been misplaced. (etenobhayor adharmasaṃsargasambhāvanāyā asambhavaḥ sūcitaḥ. tena nindāyā aviṣayatvaṃ dhvanitam.) See notes to verse 3 above.

5. "For you know, gentle brother" jānāsi hi . . . saumya: Literally, "For you know, gentle one." Ñ2,V1,D2,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tvam, "you," for hi, "for." As Cs notes, from the use of the singular and the reference to the direct experience, Rāma singles out Lakṣmaṇa among the three brothers for this comment (trayāṇām apy ekānte sattve 'pi prātyakṣikānubhavo lakṣmaṇasyaiveti tam eva lakṣīkṛtyāhety āha).

Following verse 5, D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of three lines [831*]: "There, a thought occurred to me with reference to Janaka's daughter: 'How can I bring back to the city Sītā, who has dwelt here [in Laṅkā]?' Because of that, in order to inspire trust, Sītā then entered the fire."

6. "Right before your eyes . . . and those of the gods, Agni, bearer of oblations" pratyakṣaṃ tava devānāṃ havyavāhanaḥ: Literally, "right before your eyes . . . and of the gods . . . the bearer of oblations." We read the genitive plural devānām in parallel with the genitive singular tava. With a similar sense, Ck and Ct suggest, respectively, either bringing over [from verse 7] or supplying the word saṃnidhau, "in the presence of," to construe with devānām. This is the interpretation that has been followed by most of the translators consulted. It is, however, grammatically possible to read pāda b as an extended kenning for fire in the sense of "bearer of oblations of the gods." This is not a very likely solution, but it has been followed by Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 824), which renders, "Fire-god, bearer of oblations to gods."

"as well as Vāyu, who moves through the sky, declared Maithilī to be innocent" apāpāṃ maithilīm āha vāyuś cākāśagocaraḥ: Rāma's account here of the agniparīkṣā differs in a number of respects from the description of the event in the Yuddhakāṇḍa. There, at 6.106.1–9, it is Agni alone who testifies to Sītā's fidelity. There is no mention of Vāyu taking part in the event. Interestingly, in the Mahābhārata's account of Rāma's first repudiation of Sītā, there is no agniparīkṣā. Instead Sītā herself swears to her innocence by Vāyu alone, and then by Agni, the Waters (Varuṇa), Ākāśa, Earth, and, again, Vāyu (MBh 3.275.23–24). It is Vāyu alone that then first testifies to her innocence, followed by Agni and Varuṇa (MBh 3.275.26–28). And finally Brahmā similarly urges Rāma to take Sītā back, asserting that her chastity had been preserved through the curse of Nalakūbera, which Brahmā himself had arranged (MBh 3.275.29–34). On Nalakūbera's curse, see 7.26.41–44. It appears that the Uttarakāṇḍa combined various versions of the event, although, aside from the Yuddhakāṇḍa, it is not clear what additional epic and purāṇic sources might have been influential here, although the Rāmopakhyāna might well be one of them. See notes to verses 7 and 8 below. See, too, Vaidya 1971, p. xxxiii, and van Buitenen 1975, pp. 213–14. Compare notes to 7.46.13.

7. "the moon and the sun extolled Janaka's daughter as innocent" candrādityau ca śaṃsete . . . / . . . apāpāṃ janakātmajam: Neither the Yuddhakāṇḍa nor the Rāmopakhyāna makes any reference to the sun or the moon in the vindication of Sītā. See notes to verse 6 above.

8. "was handed over by great Indra" mahendreṇa mama haste niveśitā: Literally, "she was placed in my hand by great Indra." Once again this version differs from that of the Yuddhakāṇḍa, where it is Agni alone who restores Sītā to Rāma (6.106.1–9). There Indra plays no role. See notes to verse 6 above. D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP and NSP read haste niveditā, "she [was] delivered into [my] hand," for haste niveśitā, "she was placed in [my] hand."

"in the presence of the gods and gandharvas" devagandharvasaṃnidhau: In the Yuddhakāṇḍa's account of Sītā's agniparīkṣā (Yuddhakāṇḍa 104–106), there is no mention of the gandharvas being present among the gods who assembled to observe the event.

9. "And in my heart of hearts I knew" antarātmā ca me vetti: Literally, "My innermost feeling or soul knows."

10. Cr continues his stalwart defense of Rāma against all charges of impropriety. Startlingly, he argues that the public criticism is directed not at Rāma but instead at those despised rākṣasas who were killed by the voracious rampages of Kumbhakarṇa long ago and that the sorrow that Rāma mentions as being in his heart is directed to their state and the effort to doing something on their behalf. (idānīṃ kumbhakarṇabhakṣaṇādinā mṛtānāṃ lokaninditarākṣasānāṃ kathaṃ gatir iti śocann āha—ayam iti. ādau kumbhakarṇabhakṣaṇakarmībhūtasya rākṣasajātasya sumahān eva paurāpavādaḥ paurakartṛkanindā janapadasya cāpavāda iti śeṣo me hṛdi mahān eva śokaḥ śokahetur vartata evaitena tatkalyāṇārthaṃ yatnaḥ kartavya iti sūcitam.) See notes to verse 3 above and verse 11 below. See, too, notes to 7.46.11–12.

"But now there is this grave allegation against me" ayaṃ tu me mahān vādaḥ: Literally, "And there is this great rumor or talk of me."

11. Cr now explains his argument that Rāma is concerned about the fate of the dead rākṣasas. He posits an objection to his earlier position. The objector asks what would criticism mean to those who have already been killed in some way or other in battle. Cr replies that this verse is the answer to that, in that those people will remain in hell so long as the criticism continues. (nanu yuddhe kathañcid api mṛtānāṃ kalyāṇam eva bhaviṣyatīti kiṃ lokāpavādenety ata āha—akīrtir iti. loke yasyākīrtir gīyeta sa janaḥ yāvac chabdo 'kīrtibodhakapadaṃ prakīrttyate tāvad adhamāṃl lokān patati.) See notes to verses 3 and 10 above.

"is bruited about" gīyeta: Literally, "it might be sung."

"the lowest hells" adhamāṃl lokān: Literally, "the lowest worlds." We follow Ct, who glosses, "hells (nirayān)."

"that gossip is repeated" śabdaḥ sa kīrtyate: Literally, "that word is recited." Cg and Ct gloss, "conveying or indicating infamy (akīrtibodhakaḥ)." Ck understands the term śabda, "word," to refer to the name of the man who is associated with infamy. (śabda iti. akīrtimataḥ puruṣasya nāmety arthaḥ.) D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śabdaḥ prakīrtyate, "the word is proclaimed."

12. "And" ca: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "and or but."

"by the gods . . . among them" devaiḥ . . . deveṣu: Literally, "by the gods . . . among the gods." Ñ,B,D3 (second time),6,7,10,11,G2,M8,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read lokeṣu, "among the people or in the worlds," for deveṣu, "among the gods."

"Every . . . of the great" sarva eva mahātmanām: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarveṣāṃ sumahātmanām, "of all truly great ones."

13. Cr again refuses to associate Rāma with any form of scandal. He reads the verse as follows: "Although I may be fearful of scandal, my constant desire is that I may spare you from the fear of scandal, that is, may the fear of scandal not come upon you. That is the meaning. Moreover, I would spare Janaka's daughter as well. But would I ever abandon [her] my living self? (apavādabhayād bhīto 'ham apy apavādabhayād yuṣmāñ jahyāṃ tyājayeyam apavādabhītir na prāpnotv iti sadaivecchāmīty arthaḥ. janakātmajāṃ ca jahyāṃ tyājayeyaṃ jīvinaṃ svātmānaṃ jāhyām iti kim?)" See notes to verse 3 above.

"alarmed by the fear of criticism" apavādabhayād bhītaḥ: Literally, "fearful of the fear of malicious or evil speech." Cs argues that the phrase apavādabhayād bhītaḥ is a single word. He then analyzes the term apavādabhayāt and interprets it to mean those who are constantly causing fear of scandal or criticism to spread. Or, he says, it is the spread itself [that he fears]. (apavādabhayādbhīta iti padam ekam. apavādabhayam ātayanti te 'pavādabhayātaḥ. tebhyo bhītaḥ. bahulagrahaṇāt kvip. ātayantīty ātaḥ. apavādabhayasyāta iti vā.)

"bulls among men" puruṣarṣabhāḥ: Cs believes that in addressing his brothers with the term "bulls among men" Rāma is suggesting the question of how long the wide-eyed lady born in another lineage, i.e., Sītā, should be abandoned (puruṣarṣabhā anena kīyad idam āyatākṣyāḥ kulāntaraprabhavāyā hānam iti sūcayati). Cs does not clarify the connection between the epithet and the duration of Sītā's impending abandonment.

"what to say of" kiṃ punaḥ: Literally, "what more or how much more."

14. "you . . . have been forced to see me fallen into an ocean of sorrow. Moreover . . ." paśyantu patitaṃ śokasāgare . . . /. . . bhūyaḥ: Literally, "Let [you gentlemen] see [me who is] fallen into an ocean of sorrow. Moreover . . ." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhūtam, "existing or arisen," for bhūyaḥ. Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "arisen (utpannam)," the referent being Rāma's agony. Cr takes advantage of the lack of a specific object to continue his project of sparing Rāma any suffering. Cr supplies the word janam, "people," whom he understands to be suffering because of the admittedly small degree of criticism circulating [among them]. He then glosses bhūtam as "come to (prāptam)" and takes the adjective as modifying "the people (janam)." He thus understands that Rāma's brothers should observe the suffering of the people who have fallen into an ocean of sorrow. (kiṃcid apavādaṃ bhūtaṃ prāptaṃ janaṃ śokasāgarapatitaṃ paśyantu.) See notes to verse 3 above.

"I cannot imagine any agony greater than this" na hi paśyāmi . . . kiṃcid duḥkham ato 'dhikam: Cr believes that Rāma is not referring to any personal suffering but rather is making a general observation that he cannot imagine any suffering greater than criticism (ato 'pavādād adhikaṃ duḥkhaṃ na paśyāmi).

15. "Tomorrow at daybreak" śvaḥ . . . prabhāte: Note that at verse 21 below, Rāma orders Lakṣmaṇa to carry out his instructions "today (adya)."

"driven by Sumantra" sumantrādhiṣṭhitam: Literally, "regulated or superintended by Sumantra."

"helping Sītā to get in" sītām āropya: Literally, "having caused Sītā to mount."

"you are to abandon her at the border of the realm" viṣayānte samutsṛja: Literally, "abandon at the border of the realm." Ck and Ct gloss, "beyond my country (svadeśaparataḥ)." Cg similarly glosses, "outside my country (svadeśabahiḥ)." Cr continues his own unique interpretation of the episode. He says: "Now, in order to fulfill Sītā's request and to protect the limits of propriety, which prohibit sexual intercourse with a pregnant woman, Rāma, in order to perform a sacrifice righteously without engaging in sexual activity that might result in harm in the form of offenses committed by his people, speaks [to Lakṣmaṇa] in this way." Cr's understanding of the phrase viṣayānte samutsṛja is "Establish her at the border region of Sītā's choice." (idānīṃ sītāprārthitasiddhaye garbhavatīsaṃgamo na kartavya iti maryādāpālanāya ca svakīyaprajādyaparādhādividhvaṃsaphalakastrīsaṃgamābhāvādidharmasādhyayāgakaraṇāya cāha śvar iti . . . viṣayānte sītepsitadeśānte samutsṛja saṃsthāpaya.) On this argument of Cr, see notes to 7.43.1 and notes to verse 18 below.

16. Cr understands the verse as follows: "On the far, that is to say, the southern, bank of the Ganges, situated on the bank of the Tamasā, that is, a river of that name, there is the ashram of Vālmīki. It is heavenly in appearance, that is to say, resembling Ayodhyā, etc., in its possession of all affluence. We must add the verbal phrase 'it is.' (gaṅgāyāḥ pare dakṣiṇe pāre tīre tamasāyās tadabhidhanadyās tīram āśrito divyasaṃkāśaḥ sarvasaṃpattimattvenāyodhyādi sadṛśo vālmīker āśramo 'stīti śeṣaḥ.)"

"On the far side of the Ganges . . . on the banks of the Tamasā" gaṅgāyās tu pare pāre . . . tamasātīram: Literally, "on the far bank of the Ganges . . . at the bank of the Tamasā." The idea is that the Tamasā River lies some distance beyond the Ganges. Ct claims that there are two rivers called Tamasā, one in the vicinity of Ayodhyā and the other beyond the far shore of the Ganges (tamasāsaṃjñaṃ nadīdvayam ayodhyāsamīpe gaṅgārvāktatparapāre ca). Cr notes that the reference is to the southern bank of the Ganges (gaṅgāyāḥ pare dakṣiṇe pāre tīre). Ck, along with T1,2,G2,M6, reads apare, "on the other bank," for pare (apare pāre 'nyasmin tīra ity arthaḥ). The commentators seem to be trying to negotiate the problem of the location of Vālmīki's ashram. As is well known, in the upodghāta of the Rāmāyaṇa at 1.2.3–4, we are told that the Tamasā River is not far from the Ganges and that the Tamasā appears to be the closest bathing spot for Vālmīki.

"of the very great" sumahātmanaḥ: Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,D2,6,9–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu mahātmanaḥ, "and the great [Vālmīki]."

17. "her" enām: Ś2 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous etām.

"in a desolate wood" vijane kakṣe: Literally, "in a forest without people." B3,D6,7, 10,11,T3,4,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vijane deśe, "in a desolate region or place." Cr subjects this phrase to an extraordinary exegesis. He takes the word jana, normally, "people," in the compound vijana, "devoid of people," to mean "similar to Janaka," an adjective that he claims describes Vālmīki. Thus, for him the phrase means "a place from which Vālmīki is [temporarily?] absent." Cr then argues that once Sītā is established, [Vālmīki?] will establish you, i.e., Lakṣmaṇa, as well a little distance away, as is suggested by the phrase "come quickly, into [this] desolate [place]

(vijane)." Cr also notes that the term janakasadṛśa, "like Janaka," is fitting for Vālmīki because of his friendship with Daśaratha. Cr concludes his comment by noting that the river Tamasā mentioned in verse 16 must be understood as different from the one near Ayodhyā. (tatrāśrame vijane vigato jano janakasadṛśo vālmīkir yasmād vālmīkirahitadeśa ity arthaḥ. enāṃ sītāṃ visṛjya saṃsthāpyety arthaḥ. śīghram āgaccha vijana ity etat saṃnidhigamane tvām api sthāpayiṣyatīti sūcitam. janakasadṛśatvaṃ ca daśarathasakhatvenāyodhyāsamīpavartitamasāto 'nyeyaṃ tamasā nadīti bodhyam.) See notes to verse 3 above and notes to 7.46.14.

"Saumitri" saumitre: V3,M6, and KK and VSP read instead bhadraṃ te, "bless you." On this expression, see notes to verse 2 above.

18. Cr's interpretation of this verse, including 836* (see below), is that Rāma says he is not to be questioned about his reasons for setting Sītā up elsewhere, and there can be no deliberation in regard to sending her off. This is so, as Cr has noted several times before, because it would be improper for Rāma to have sex with her while she is pregnant and because he is about to carry out a sacrifice. Moreover, [should she remain] he would not be able to restrain himself. It is suggested, however, that the real reason that he will not permit questions is that, should Lakṣmaṇa realize that he would be separated from Sītā for a very long time, his grief would be extreme. This, according to Cr, makes it clear that, in turn, Rāma would be unable to endure the sight of grief-stricken Lakṣmaṇa. (sītāṃ prati sītāsaṃsthāpane hetum ity artho na prativaktavyaḥ praṣṭavyo 'smi tasmād atra preṣaṇaviṣaye vicāraṇā na kāryā. etena hetupraśne garbhasamaye yāgasamaye cātra sthitāv anucitasaṃgamo durnivāro bhaviteti vaktavyaṃ syāt tatkathane ca cirakālakaviyogo jñāto bhaviṣyatīti lakṣmaṇasya śokātiśayo bhaviṣyatīti hetur dhvanitas tena śokavallakṣmaṇadarśanāsahiṣṇutvaṃ rāmasya vyaktam.) See notes to verses 3 and 15 above.

"For if I were to be opposed, it would give rise to my most extreme displeasure." aprītiḥ paramā mahyaṃ bhavet tu prativārite: Literally, "But in opposition, there would be for me the most extreme displeasure." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hi parā, "great [displeasure], indeed," for paramā, "most extreme." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tvayaitat, "[in opposition] to this by you," for bhavet tu, "there would be."

Following 18ab, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [836*]: "Therefore, go,[1] Saumitri! Do not hesitate in this regard (tasmād gacchasva saumitre nātra kāryā vicāraṇā /)."

[1] "go" gacchasva: D7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvaṃ gaccha, "you go." Given the manuscript evidence, one wonders at the choice of the editors of the critical edition.

19. "I bind you to an oath, swearing by my arms and my life, you who might speak in the midst of my words in an effort somehow to conciliate me." śāpitāś ca mayā yūyaṃ bhujābhyāṃ jīvitena ca / ye māṃ vākyāntare brūyur anunetuṃ kathaṃcana //: Literally, "And you are sworn by me by two arms and life, those who, in the midst of speech, would speak to conciliate me somehow." Note the shift from the singular, with which Rāma had been addressing Lakṣmaṇa alone, to the plural, here and in the following verse. See verse 5 and notes above. The verse as it stands in the critical edition and in those editions and manuscripts that read with the critical edition (e.g., Lahore, Ś,V, D1,4,5,12) does not make a very clear connection between the first and second lines of the verse. As noted below, various manuscript traditions attempt to resolve the difficulty by inserting one or another of two lines. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hi, "indeed," for ca, "and." Cg notes that swearing by one's arms is the speech of a hero (vīravacanam). Ck argues that by the term "arms," the feet are meant through secondary denotation, and he believes that Rāma speaks in this way for the sake of modesty (bhujābhyāṃ lakṣaṇayā pādau gṛhyete. tathā vādaś ca vinayārthaḥ). D6,7,10,11,T1, 3,4,M2–4,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read pādābhyām, "by [my] two feet," for bhujābhyām, "by [my] two arms." Ct, who reads the variant, pādābhyām, "by [my] two feet," acknowledges the reading bhujābhyām as a variant but argues [no doubt under the influence of Ck] that the meaning is still "by [my] two arms." (bhujābhyām iti pāṭheti. pādābhyām ity evārthaḥ.) Cs notes that the brothers are being sworn by Rāma's feet and life breaths, which serve as witnesses. He also notes the critical reading bhujābhyām, which he understands to mean "by my two hands," as a variant. He indicates that with regard to an oath on the part of kshatriyas we are to understand that the expression "by my hands" is appropriate because the hands are used for holding weapons, etc., because Rāma is very fond of his bow and arrows, and because both of his hands serve as the means for holding both of those things [i.e., his bow and arrows]. Cs justifies his interpretation of the term bhuja by quoting the Viśvakośa, which allows for its usage in the senses of both "hands" and "arms." Cs concludes his comments by quoting Ct, whose interpretation, as usual, he mocks. Cs understands that if one, without offering any proof, were to say of the word pradeśa, "this is a place on earth," then another might say, "it is a measurement somewhat different from a vitasti [the length between the tip of the thumb and the little finger]," and so on, and then it would be an endless or inconclusive argument [lit., 'assault and armor']. (yūyaṃ mayā pādābhyāṃ jīvitena ca śāpitāḥ pādau sākṣiṇau prāṇāḥ sākṣiṇa iti sthāpitaśapathāḥ. bhujābhyām iti kvacit pāṭhaḥ. tatra kṣatriyāṇāṃ śapathaviṣaya āyudhopālambhanāder vidhānād rāmasya dhanurbāṇapremopetatvāt taddhāraṇasya śayadvayasādhyatvād bhujābhyām ity uktir yukteti mantavyam. bhujaḥ pāṇau ca bāhau ceti viśvaḥ. bhujābhyām iti pāṭhe 'pi pādābhyām ity evārtha iti vadan nāgojibhaṭṭo yadi hi pratyayam anutpādya eko 'yaṃ bhūmadhyapradeśa iti brūyāt tadā paro 'pi kiṃ na brūyāt parastād vitaster itītyādi dhāṭīmāṭīkatā iti jñeyam.) Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand the phrase vākyāntare to mean "in the middle of my speech (asmadvākyamadhye)." Cr glosses, "in words different from my words (madvākyād bhinnavākye)."

Following verse 19, D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G,M1,3–5,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [838*]: "They would be my[1] enemies forever because of thwarting my will (ahitā mama te nityaṃ madabhīṣṭavighātanāt /)."

[1] "my" mama: D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the emphatic particle nāma, "indeed, surely."

Several northern manuscript traditions, Ñ,B,D2,3, and Gorresio similarly insert a passage of one line [837*], which resolves the syntax of verse 19: "He would be understood as my enemy. I am telling you the truth. (sa me śatrur iti jñeyaḥ satyam etad bravīmi vaḥ /)"

20. "If . . . are obedient to my commands" yadi macchāsane sthitāḥ: Literally, "if [you] abide in my command." The participle sthitāḥ, "abide," is plural. Cr notes that on some occasions the plural refers primarily to Lakṣmaṇa (kvacid bahutvaṃ tu lakṣmaṇe prādhānyam āropya). See verses 5 and 19 and notes above.

"This very day" adya: Literally, "now or today." Lakṣmaṇa, in fact, had been told at verse 15 above to take Sītā away "tomorrow at daybreak (śvaḥ . . . prabhāte)."

"You must carry out my instructions." kuruṣva vacanaṃ mama: Literally, "You must do my word." The verbal form in the singular refers specifically to Lakṣmaṇa; see verses 5 and 19 and notes above.

21. Ck and Cg understand Rāma's comments here as a way of anticipating the objection that it would be difficult to tell Sītā that she is going to be abandoned (so Ck) or that she would not be able to endure the cruelty (so Cg). (nanu kathaṃ vane visarjanāyāgaccheti mayā vaktuṃ śakyata ity atrāha—pūrvam ityādi—so Ck; katham imaṃ nṛśaṃsatvaṃ soḍhuṃ śakyam ity atrāha—pūrvam ityādi—so Cg.)

"the great ashrams" mahāśramān: Ś,V3,D2,3,6–12,T3,4,G2,M7, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead [a]ham āśramān, "I . . . ashrams."

22. "his eyes filled with tears" bāṣpeṇa pihitekṣaṇaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and KK and VSP read instead bāṣpeṇa pihitānanaḥ, lending the phrase the sense "his face covered with tears." T1,2,M3,6, and GPP read the somewhat awkward bāṣpeṇa vihitekṣaṇaḥ, "endowed with tears." Cr notes that the tears are produced by Rāma's thought of his impending separation from Sītā (bāṣpeṇa bhaviṣyatsītāviyogasmṛtijanitāśruṇā).

"surrounded by his brothers" bhrātṛbhiḥ parivāritaḥ: The syntax is somewhat ambiguous here, suggesting that Rāma enters his residence in the company of his brothers. We, however, tend to agree with Ck, Cg, and Ct, who believe that Rāma would have dismissed his brothers before entering his residence alone. They add the phrase "having dismissed them (tān visṛjya—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly)."

"he went inside" praviveśa: Literally, "he entered." Ck, Cg, and Ct supply the phrase "his own residence" (svaveśmeti śeṣaḥ). Ś,V3,D8–12, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous saṃviveśa. This is misprinted in GPP as sa viveśa [sa].

Following verse 22, Ñ1,V1,D1–5,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [842*]: "His heart overwhelmed with grief,[1] he sighed like an elephant (śokasaṃvignahṛdayo niśaśvāsa yathā dvipaḥ)."

[1] "His heart overwhelmed with grief" śokasaṃvignahṛdayaḥ: Literally, "having a heart overwhelmed with grief." KK and VSP read instead śokasaṃlagnahṛdayaḥ, "having a heart attached or fallen into grief."

Sarga 45

1. "his mind distressed" dīnacetanaḥ: Literally, "having a distressed mind or heart." The word -cetanaḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

2. "quickly" śīghram: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the masculine plural adjective śīghrān, "swift," which thus becomes a modifier of turagān, "horses."

"bring": The verb has been added to fill out the elliptical syntax. Ck, Cg, and Ct supply the gerund ānīya, "having brought."

"beautiful" śubham: KK and VSP read instead the madhyama eka loṭ, form kuru, "make." In any case, Ck, Cg, and Ct apparently supply the verb kuru, "make." Cr explicitly does so (kurv iti śeṣaḥ). They all understand Lakṣmaṇa to be saying: "Having brought a beautiful seat for Sītā from the king's palace, make the chariot such that it is well covered or well upholstered (sītāyāś ca śubham āsanaṃ rājabhavanād ānīya svāstīrṇaṃ rathaṃ kuru—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly).

"from the king's palace" rājabhavanāt: Ś1,D6,8,10,11,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rājavacanāt, "on the instructions or orders of the king."

3. "from the king's palace" rājabhavanāt: Ś1,3,Ñ1,V1,B1,3,D2,5–7,9–11,T3,4,G2,M7,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rājavacanāt, "on the instructions or orders of the king."

4–5. "brought" ādāya: Literally, "having taken." B3,D10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ānīya, "having brought."

"exquisitely beautiful" suruciraprakhyam: Literally, "of very beautiful splendor." Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "having a beautiful splendor (sundaraśobham)."

"well-furnished" svāstīrṇam: Literally, "well-covered."

"Saumitri, the increaser of his friends' joy" saumitriṃ mitrāṇāṃ harṣavardhanam: This is another example of the type of etymological epithet of which the epic poet is so fond. For a similar epithet, see 7.51.14 and notes. For other alliterative epithets of Lakṣmaṇa, see notes to 7.43.2. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saumitriṃ mitrāṇāṃ mānavardhanam, "Saumitri, increaser of the honor or pride of his friends."

6. "that . . . the king's residence" rājaveśma saḥ: Literally, "he or that one . . . to the king's residence." Ñ1,V1,D1–7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the locative, rājaveśmani, "[he entered] into the king's residence."

Following verse 6, D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [847*, lines 2–3]. For the translation, see notes to verse 7 below.

7. "I am to go . . . and take you" mayā . . . gatvopaneyāsi: Literally, "having gone, by me you are to be taken." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gatvā tu vaidehi, "and having gone, Vaidehī," for gatvopaneyāsi, "having gone, you are to be taken." This reading requires that the verse be construed with 847*, line 1 (see below).

"to the lovely ashram" āśrame śubhe: Literally, "in the lovely ashram." Ñ,B,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative plural āśramāñ śubhān, "to the lovely ashrams."

"of the sages" munīnām: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ṛṣīṇām, "of the seers."

Following verse 7, D6,7,T3,4 insert; while G2,M2,4,5,7,8,10 substitute for 7cd; T1,2, G3,M1,3 insert following 7ab; G1 inserts line 1 after 7ab, lines 2,3, following verse 7; and D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert line 1 following verse 7, lines 2,3, following verse 6; a passage of three lines [847*]: "You are to be taken by me to the holy [ashram] inhabited by seers.[1][1] As you know, you requested a boon from our lord the king, and the wise king gave his promise. Now you are directed [to go].[2][2–3]"

[1] "You are to be taken by me to the holy . . . inhabited by seers" puṇye ca ṛṣijuṣṭe ca mayā neyā bhaviṣyasi: Literally, "[You] will have to be taken by me into the holy and inhabited by seers [ashram]." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK (1913), and VSP read instead araṇye munibhir juṣṭe avaneyā bhaviṣyasi, "[You] will have to be led into the forest inhabited by sages." KK (1905) reads apaneyā, "to be led away," for avaneyā, "to be led."

[2] "the wise . . . Now you are directed [to go]" ājñaptā cāsti dhīmatā: Literally, "and [you] are directed or ordered by the wise one." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ājñaptaś cāśramaṃ prati, "and [I] am commanded with respect to the ashram."

8. "for she was delighted to go" gamanaṃ cābhyarocayat: Literally, "a going was pleasing [to her]." Ś,D6–8,10–12,M8,10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read cāpy arocayat, "moreover [a going] was pleasing," for cābhyarocayat.

9–10. "Vaidehī . . . saying" vaidehī: Literally, "Vaidehī." The critical text provides no transition into Sītā's speech.

"with swift horses" śīghraturagaḥ: Literally, "he of swift horses or possessing swift horses." Ñ1,D1–4,9–11,T3,4,M4,7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the accusative singular śīghraturagam, which then modifies ratham, "chariot," lending the phrase the sense "the chariot, with its swift horses." Ś,V1,3,B2,D6–8,12, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead the instrumental śīghraturagaiḥ, "with swift horses."

Following 10ab, Ñ1,V1,3,B,D (except D1),T,G1,3,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP repeat 9ab: "[I shall give . . .] costly garments[1] and various precious things[2] (vāsāṃsi ca mahārhāṇi ratnāni vividhāni ca)."

[1] "garments" vāsāṃsi: B,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous vastrāṇi.

[2] "precious things" ratnāni: B1,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dhanāni, "wealth."

11. "Lakṣmaṇa, the increaser of prosperity" lakṣmaṇaṃ lakṣmivardhanam: This is another example of the type of etymological epithet of which the epic poet is so fond. See notes to verses 4–5 above and 7.43.2 and notes.

"Today" adya: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. B3,4,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the emphatic particle eva.

"inauspicious signs" aśubhāni: Literally, "inauspicious [things]." Cr, once again unwilling to see unmitigated misfortune befall his hero and heroine, glosses, "evil omens indicative of prolonged separation from one's husband." Cr, however, puts great emphasis on the conjunctive particle ca, "and," in pāda a, noting that it suggests that Sītā is also seeing auspicious signs. Therefore he concludes that the particle is particularly meaningful here. (cirakālakapativiyogasūcakakuśakunān. cakāreṇa śubhāny apy ahaṃ paśyāmy ata eva caḥ sārthaḥ.)

12. "my eye is throbbing" nayanaṃ me sphurati: Although the particular eye is not specified here, the throbbing of the right eye or any part of the right side of the body is considered to be an inauspicious sign for women. See note to 6.4.6.

"my heart seems ill at ease" hṛdayam . . . asvastham iva lakṣaye: Literally, "I perceive that [my] heart is somewhat uneasy." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss hṛdayam, "heart," as "mind (manaḥ)."

13. "I feel the greatest anxiety and a great faintheartedness seizes me." autsukyaṃ paramaṃ cāpi adhṛtiś ca parā mama: Literally, "Of me there is the greatest anxiety and also the greatest unsteadiness or lack of resolve." Note the hiatus between the pādas. Ct understands that Sītā's anxiety is in regard either to the city or to Rāma (nagaraviṣayaṃ rāmaviṣayaṃ vā). Ck and Cg understand autsukyam in its sense of "eagerness or longing." They gloss, "eagerness or anxiety produced with regard to seeing the holy ashram[s] (autsukyaṃ puṇyāśramadarśanaviṣayajam—so Cg; Ck similarly)." Cr similarly takes autsukyam to mean "eagerness" and adds the verb jāyate, "it is produced." He glosses, "There is produced a longing the object of which is the sight of the sages, which would foretell auspiciousness." It is because of that eagerness, Cr continues, that she experiences uncertainty with regard to her sojourn [in the ashram]. (śubhasūcakamunidarśanaviṣayakātyautkaṇṭhyaṃ ca jāyata iti śeṣo 'to 'dhṛtiḥ sthitiviṣayakadhairyābhāvo jāyate.)

"wide-eyed prince" pṛthulocana: Literally, "O wide-eyed [one]."

"I see the earth as if it were desolate" śūnyām iva . . . paśyāmi pṛthivīm: Literally, "I see the earth as if it were empty." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss śūnya-, "empty," as "empty of happiness (sukhaśūnyām)." Cr understands the phrase to mean that Sītā can see nothing to give her happiness other than the immediate sight of the sages (idānīṃ munidarśanād anyat sukhapadaṃ nāvalokayāmīty arthaḥ). Ñ2,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead eva, lending the phrase the sense "I see the earth as utterly desolate."

14–15. Cr believes that Sītā utters these words in order to negate any evil effects of the appearance of the inauspicious omens. He believes that what is suggested in Sītā's praying to the gods in this fashion is that her intention is to question Lakṣmaṇa as to why he is delaying, since she believes that her meeting [with the sages] is vital to the well-being of Rāma, etc. (idānīm aśakunadarśanasyākiñcitkaratvaṃ saṃpādayanty āha—apīti . . . evaṃ prakāreṇa devatāḥ sītābhyayācataitena rāmādīnāṃ svastimattve saṃgamo bhavitaiveti kiṃ vilambeneti sītābhiprāyaḥ sūcitaḥ.)

"together with his brothers" bhrātṛbhiḥ saha: B3,D5 (first time),6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhrātṛvatsala, "O you who are affectionate toward your brothers."

16. "But Lakṣmaṇa, aware of the real state of affairs, bowed his head to Maithilī and, feigning happiness, though his heart was deeply pained, said: 'All is well.'" lakṣmaṇo 'rthaṃ tu taṃ śrutvā śirasā vandya maithilīm / śivam ity abravīd dhṛṣṭo hṛdayena viśuṣyatā //: Literally, "But Lakṣmaṇa, happy, having heard that purpose and having bowed with his head to Maithilī, said: 'Auspicious,' with a heart that was drying up." The word "happy (hṛṣṭaḥ)" is clearly inappropriate to the emotional state of Lakṣmaṇa here. Ck, Cg, and Ct therefore understand that Lakṣmaṇa is trying to put on a good face so as not to alarm Sītā at this point. They thus gloss, "as if happy (hṛṣṭa iva)." We, like most other translators consulted, follow this interpretation. The sandhi permits Cs to read the word as both dhṛṣṭaḥ, "bold," and hṛṣṭa, "happy." In the first reading, he takes the term dhṛṣṭa to mean that Lakṣmaṇa is steadfast because of Rāma's command. In the second reading, he simply reads as do Ck, Cg, and Ct. (dhṛṣṭo rājña ājñāto dhīraḥ. [d]hṛṣṭaḥ sa iva vā.) Cr has a characteristically forced interpretation of the entire verse. He understands that earlier Lakṣmaṇa was happy, as he was endowed with a heart that was viśuṣyatā, that is to say, which had come to know the particular cause of the falling of Rāma's tears. Afterward Lakṣmaṇa is filled with joy that is caused by the sight of Sītā's joy [at being taken to see the sages]. (viśuṣyatā pūrvaṃ rāmāśrupātadarśanahetukaviśeṣaṃ prāpnuvatā hṛdayenopalakṣito hṛṣṭaḥ paścāt sītāharṣadarśanahetukaharṣaprāpto lakṣmaṇaḥ.) D3,5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tataḥ, "then," for taṃ tu, "But . . . that."

"aware of the real state of affairs" [a]rtham . . . taṃ śrutvā: Literally, "having heard that purpose." The phrase is ambiguous at best. The translators consulted who share this reading, like Cr, understand the phrase simply to refer to Lakṣmaṇa's having heard what Sītā had said (sītoktapadārthaṃ śrutvā). Ck, Cg, and Ct take the reference to be to the substance of the evil omens that are reported by Sītā (durnimittarūpaṃ vastv ity arthaḥ). In a somewhat similar vein, we understand the reference to be to the true state of affairs, that is to say, the fact that Sītā is being banished as Lakṣmaṇa had been instructed by Rāma in the previous sarga.

17. "in an ashram on the banks of the Gomatī" gomatītīra āśrame: Literally, "in an ashram on the bank of the Gomatī." The Gomatī River, the modern Gomti (Goomti) River, is a tributary of the Ganges, which it joins between Varanasi (Benaras) and Ghazipur. See Law 1944b, p. 21, and Bhattacharyya 1991 (s.v. gomatī). See, too, Guruge 1991, p. 77. Lakṣmaṇa will camp on its banks once again after leaving Sītā near the Ganges (see 7.50.20 and 7.51.1). Rāma performs his aśvamedha on the banks of the Gomatī (see 7.82.14 and notes). This river is also mentioned in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa (see 2.43.9,10; 2.65.10–11; and notes) and the Yuddhakāṇḍa (see 6.17.21–22ab; 6.113.24; and 6.115.21).

18. "quickly" śīghram: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"just as did three-eyed Śiva on the mountain" tryambakaḥ parvate yathā: Literally, "just as Tryambaka on the mountain." Cg notes that, in the example for comparison, we are to understand that Rudra bore the Ganges for the sake of his bath (dṛṣṭānte rudro 'pi snānārtham eva gaṅgāṃ dadhāreti gamyate). D7,10,11,T2,G1,2,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead triyambaka ivaujasā, "as did Triyambaka with his might." Despite Cg, both variants seem to be allusions to Śiva's role in the story of the descent of the Ganges, where he bore the force of the river on his head. See 1.42.1–7. See, too, notes to 7.55.18.

19. "After he had quickly exercised the horses . . . and yoked them to the carriage" so 'śvān vicārayitvāśu rathe yuktvā: Literally, "he, having quickly caused the horses to move about [and] having yoked [them] to the carriage." Cr explains the term "having exercised (vicārayitvā)" as "having made the horses move here and there to reduce somewhat their extreme flightiness (aticāñcalyasya kiñcin nivṛttaya itas tatas saṃcālya)." Cs understands that Sumantra leads the horses off in order to groom them, etc. (añgaparimarjanādivicāraṃ kṛtvā). The word āśu is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,G1,M4,5,7–9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tu, "and," for [ā]śu, "quickly," while Ñ2,V1,3,D2,7,9–11,T3,4,M9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yuktān, "yoked [horses]," for yuktvā, "having yoked." This lends the passage the sense "And he, having caused those horses that were yoked to the chariot to move about." T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead so 'śvān rajjvātha caturo rathe yuktvā [T1,M1, and KK and VSP—yuñktvā] manojavān, "Then he, being dexterous, having yoked the horses, who were as swift as thought, with a rope."

20. "And on his instructions . . . together with . . . the wise charioteer Sumantra" tu sutasya vacanāt . . . /. . . sārdhaṃ sumantreṇa . . . dhīmatā: Literally, "and on the instructions of the charioteer . . . together with the wise Sumantra."

Following verse 20, D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G2 (following 21ab),3,M1,4,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [856*]: "The wide-eyed woman approached the Ganges, which destroys sins (āsasāda viśālākṣī gañgāṃ pāpavināśinīm)."

21. "waters" jalāśayam: Literally, "lake or body of water." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "the current or stream of water (jalapravāham)."

"wept loudly" praruroda mahāsvanam: Literally, "he wept with a loud or great sound." Ś3,B2,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read praruroda mahāsvanaḥ, lending the phrase the sense "he, having a loud sound, wept."

22. "deeply concerned" paramāyattā: Literally, "extremely docile or compliant." The term seems an odd one here, and the commentators are silent. We agree with Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 544), who renders, "dans son extrême sollicitude." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 527) and Benoît (1999, p. 1337) understand similarly. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 521) appears to take the adjective in its sense of "prepared or ready." He then renders, "who . . . was all eagerness to bathe in the river." Dutt (1894, p. 1724) offers, "waxing anxious," while Gita Press (1989, vol. 2, p. 827) understands, "well composed." Ñ2,B2,4[paramā-], and Gorresio (7.49.23) read paramatrastā, "greatly alarmed," which is perhaps a gloss on paramāyattā.

"Knower of righteousness" dharmajña: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2–4,D1,3–5,7,8,10,11,T3,4,M5,6,8,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative feminine dharmajñā, which then modifies Sītā.

23. "which I have longed for all this time" cirābhilaṣitam mama: Literally, "long desired by [lit., 'of'] me."

24. "Rāma's feet" rāmapādeṣu: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāmapārśveṣu, "at Rāma's sides." Cg explains the rather awkward reading as an example of a plural of respect (pūjāyāṃ bahuvacanam).

"for two nights" dvirātre: Literally, "in a period of two nights." D7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative singular dvirātram, "for two nights."

25. "as life itself" jīvitenāpi: Literally, "even by life." Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,T2,G2,3, M3,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jīvitād api, "even than life."

26. "Take . . . across . . . let . . . see" tārayasva . . . darśayasva: Literally, "you must cause [me] to or make [me] . . . cross . . . you must cause [me] to or make [me] . . . see."

"Then I shall distribute the wealth, garments, and ornaments." tato dhanāni vāsāṃsi dāsyāmy ābhāraṇāni ca: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read munibhyaḥ, "to the sages," for dhanāni, "wealth," while KK and VSP transpose vāsāṃsi and dāsyāmi.

27. "according to their merit" yathārham: D1–4,9, and KK and VSP read instead yathāvat, "properly."

Following verse 27, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,7–12,T3,4,M3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [859*]: "For my heart, too, is in haste to see Rāma, foremost of those who give delight, with his eyes like lotus petals, his shoulders like those of a lion, and his slender waist (mamāpi padmapatrākṣaṃ siṃhoraskaṃ kṛśodaram / tvarate hi mano draṣṭuṃ rāmaṃ ramayatāṃ varam //)."

28. "had a lovely boat brought up" śubhāṃ nāvam upāharat: Literally, "he brought a lovely boat." The adjective śubhām, "lovely or beautiful," can also be taken to modify gaṅgām, "the Ganges," in pāda c, and this is how all translators who share the reading—with the exception of Raghunanthan (1982, vol. 3, p. 521), who ignores the adjective entirely—understand it. We, however, see it as more closely bound to nāvam, "boat," for metrical reasons. We read the simplex upāharat, "he brought," as a causal, on the assumption that Lakṣmaṇa himself would not bring a boat but would have the boat brought by boatmen. D10,11,T2,M2,4,7,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead upāruhat, "he boarded."

Following 28ab, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert; while Ñ1 continues following 860*; V1,3,D1,2 (which reads following the colophon),3–5,T3,4 substitute for 28cd; Ñ2 continues after 863*; and D9 inserts before 7.46.1; a passage of two lines [861*]: "Lakṣmaṇa, slayer of enemy heroes, summoned the boatmen, and those ferrymen, cupping their hands in reverence, said: 'These, that is, we, are ready, and so is the boat'[1] (nāvikān āhvayāmāsa lakṣmaṇaḥ paravīrahā / ime sma sajjā nauś ceti dāśāḥ prāñjalayo 'bruvan //)."

[1] "These, that is we, are ready, and so is the boat." ime sma sajjā nauś ceti: Literally, "Indeed, these [are] ready and the boat." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read iyam, "this," for ime, "these."

Following verse 28, D6,7,10,11,M2,4,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D9 substitutes for 28cd, and M9 continues following 865*, a passage of one line [862*]: "With his mind composed, Lakṣmaṇa took her across the Ganges (gaṅgāṃ saṃtārayāmāsa lakṣmaṇas tāṃ samāhitaḥ /)."

1. "After . . . helping Maithilī board" āropya maithilīm: Literally, "having caused Maithilī to ascend."

"fully rigged" samāyuktām: Literally, "prepared or ready." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand, "made ready (sajjīkṛtām)."

"of the Niṣādas" naiṣādīm: Literally, "belonging to the Niṣāda or Niṣādas." The commentators understand the term to mean either "brought up by the Niṣādas (Cm)" or "belonging to the Niṣāda named Guha (Ck, Cg)" (naiṣādīṃ niṣādopanītāṃ guhākhyaniṣādasaṃbandhinīm iti vā—so Ct).

2. "Please remain here" sthīyatām: Literally, "Please stay." Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand that Sumantra is to remain "on the bank of the Ganges (gaṅgātīra iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg)." Ct specifies that he should remain on the near bank (arvācīnagaṅgātīre).

"Cast off" prayāhi: Literally, "go or proceed." Ct adds, "to the farther bank (paraṃ tīram iti śeṣaḥ)."

3. "the farther bank" tīram: Literally, "the bank." Ck and Ct note that this is the farther bank (paraṃ tīram iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly), while Cg specifies the southern bank (dakṣiṇatīram ity arthaḥ).

"his voice choked with tears" bāṣpagadgadaḥ: Literally, "sobbing or stuttering with tears." The syllables -gadaḥ are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bāṣpasaṃvṛtaḥ, "enveloped or constricted by tears," while KK and VSP read bāṣpasaṃplutaḥ, "awash with tears."

4. "Vaidehī, it is as if there were a massive dart through my heart in that my wise and noble brother has in this matter made me an object of censure for the world." hṛdgataṃ me mahac chalyaṃ yad asmy āryeṇa dhīmatā / asmin nimitte vaidehi lokasya vacanīkṛtaḥ //: Literally, "A great dart has gone to my heart since by that wise, noble one in this cause I have been turned into speech or rumor by [lit., 'of'] the world, Vaidehī." We follow the commentators in unpacking this rather difficult verse. They generally agree that Lakṣmaṇa is saying that since he has been appointed to this cruel task by Rāma, he would become an object of universal condemnation and that it is this that has caused this great, painful dart, as it were, to enter his heart. This is most lucidly stated by Ct. (vaidehy asmin nimitte yasmād dhīmatāpy āryeṇa lokanindāhetubhūte krūrakārye yad ahaṃ niyuktas tallokasya vacanīkṛtaḥ. yalopa ārṣaḥ. vacanīyo nindyaḥ kṛtaḥ. ato me mahacchalyaṃ hṛdgataṃ hṛdayaṃ praviṣṭam—so Ct.) The form vacanīkṛtaḥ is quite unusual in the sense that is evidently intended here. Ck, Cg, and Ct argue that it is simply an irregular form for vacanīyakṛtaḥ, "made an object of speech," with the irregular loss of the ya (yalopa ārṣaḥ). Cs takes this opportunity to roundly critique Ct's grammatical knowledge in this regard. Ś,D6–8,10–12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yasmād, "since," for yad asmi, "in that I."

5. "Death would be better . . . what would be still better than death" śreyaḥ . . . maraṇam . . . mṛtyoḥ . . . yat paraṃ bhavet: Literally, "Death [would be] better . . . [or] what would be better than death." D6,7,10,11,T2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the nominative singular mṛtyuḥ, "death," for mṛtyor, "than death." Since this variant has both maraṇam, "death," and mṛtyuḥ, "death," in the nominative, it makes for a more difficult reading. Ck and Cg attempt to distinguish the normally synonymous terms mṛtyuḥ and maraṇam, perhaps taking one as death and one as dying (me mṛtyur maraṇaṃ hi vā yat yadi syāt). Cr is similarly unclear. Ct, not very convincingly, attempts to resolve the issue by defining maraṇam as the state of unconsciousness prior to death, while mṛtyuḥ is death itself (maraṇaṃ tat prāgavasthā mūrcchā mṛtyur mukhyaṃ maraṇaṃ vā).

"if I were not to be enjoined to" na . . . niyojyaḥ: Literally, "not to be enjoined to." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that, despite his agonizing, Lakṣmaṇa has no choice but to carry out the king's order, and he will do so (athāpi rājaniyogasya sarvathā kartavyatvān niyogaṃ karomīti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

6. "Forgive me" prasīda: Literally, "be gracious."

"and do not be angry with me" na ca me roṣaṃ kartum arhasi: B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na ca me pāpaṃ kartum arhasi, "and please do not impute sin to me." Ct glosses, "Please do not think that this is a wrongdoing on my part (doṣaṃ jñātum ity arthaḥ)." Cr glosses, "Please do not have the thought: 'He is a sinner with respect to me' (me mahyaṃ pāpam ayaṃ pāpīti buddhiṃ kartuṃ nārhasi)."

"woman of excellent vows" suvrate: Literally, "O one of excellent vows." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śobhane, "O lovely [one]."

8. "I see that you are distraught." paśyāmi tvāṃ ca na svastham: Literally, "and I see you who are not at ease or well." D7,T1,2,M2,4,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read na ca for ca na by transposition.

9. "You must have been compelled to take an oath" śāpito 'si: Literally, "you are one to whom an oath has been administered."

"Tell me, here and now, about this anguish of yours." yat tvaṃ saṃtāpam ātmanaḥ / tad brūyāḥ saṃnidhau mahyam: Literally, "In [my] presence you should tell me that anguish which is yours." The syntax of the critical edition is somewhat awkward and can only be construed by reading pādas b and c together. This interpretation of the syntax is supported by the reading of the Lahore Edition (7.49.9—śāpito 'si mama prāṇair yas tvaṃ saṃtāpam ātmanaḥ / na brūyāḥ sannidhau me 'dya ahaṃ āñjāpayāmi te, "You are sworn by my life breaths, you who would not speak in [my] presence of your anguish today. I command you."), which requires a similar alignment of pādas b and c. D10,11,M1,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yat tvaṃ saṃtāpam āgataḥ, which solves the syntactic problems. In this variant, the verse would mean "Since you have experienced this anguish, you must have been sworn to an oath by the lord of men. Tell me that in [my] presence. I command you."

10. "his mind distressed, his face downcast" dīnacetanaḥ / avāṅmukhaḥ: Literally, "having a distressed mind, having a face that was downward." For other occurrences of the phrase avāṅmukhaḥ, see 1.56.7,15; 2.23.5; 6.6.1; 7.59.15; 7.87.9; and 7.96.1. On the use of these two adjectives together, see notes to 7.43.11.

"his throat choked with tears" bāṣpagalaḥ: Literally, "tear-throated." M1 and KK and VSP read instead bāṣpakalaḥ, "inarticulate or inaudible with or from tears."

11–12. The sequence of verses in the critical edition is almost impossible to construe or interpret. Verse 11 lacks both a subject and a finite verb, while verse 12 seems syntactically disconnected from verse 11 and also wanting in specificity regarding who the actors are and what they are actually doing.

"Daughter of Janaka, in the middle of his assembly the king heard vile rumors about you that are current in the city and countryside. I cannot repeat those things before you, my lady, those things that the king lodged in his heart. All anger has been set aside." śrutvā pariṣado madhye apavādaṃ sudāruṇam / pure janapade caiva tvatkṛte janakātmaje [11] // na tāni vacanīyāni mayā devi tavāgrataḥ / yāni rājñā hṛdi nyastāny amarṣaḥ pṛṣṭhataḥ kṛtaḥ [12] //: Literally, "Having heard in the midst of the assembly very terrible criticism in the city and the countryside regarding you, daughter of Janaka,[11] those are not to be spoken by me before you, my lady, which by the king were deposited in the heart. Anger has been placed behind.[12]" Note hiatus between 11a and 11b. D10,11, G2,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead amarṣāt, "from anger," for the nominative singular amarṣaḥ, "anger." The commentators also struggle to make sense of these lines. Cv understands the term "anger (amarṣaḥ)" as the anger that was directed toward the scandalous rumors, etc. [about Sītā]. It is this anger that the king has now put behind him (amarṣaḥ pṛṣṭhataḥ kṛto yair apavādādiṣu kopo rājñā pṛṣṭhataḥ kṛtaḥ). Ck, Cg, and Ct form something of an interpretive community on this passage. They all read the variant amarṣāt for amarṣaḥ. The interpretation, as expressed by Ck and Ct, is that those [critical] words, which out of anger the king has lodged in his heart, cannot be spoken by Lakṣmaṇa in the presence of Sītā. Therefore, Lakṣmaṇa has put the criticism behind him, and so it is not mentioned. (yāni vacanāni rājñāmarṣād dhṛdi nyastāni tāni he devi mayā tavāgrato na vacanīyāny vaktum aśakyāni. ata eva mayā tasya vādaḥ pṛṣṭhīkṛto nopanyastaḥ—so Ck; Ct similarly.) Cg's interpretation is quite similar, except that it is the anger (amarṣaḥ) and not the speech (vādaḥ) of Rāma that Lakṣmaṇa puts behind him (ata evāmarṣaḥ pṛṣṭhataḥ nopanyastaḥ). Cs has a different understanding of the passage. He believes that the king, because of anger (amarṣāt), has become a follower (pṛṣṭhataḥ kṛtaḥ) of it, that is to say, entirely dependent upon his anger. The words that the king spoke cannot be repeated in front of Sītā. With that in mind, Lakṣmaṇa has kept them within his own heart. Cs then quotes the interpretation of Ct and calls upon the learned to judge between the two interpretations. (yo rājāmarṣāt pṛṣṭhataḥ kopaparādhīnaḥ kṛtaḥ. tena rājñā yāni vacanāni proktāni tāni tavāgrato 'vacanīyāny avyavahāryāṇi. iti mayā hṛdi nyastāni sthāpitāni. nāgojibhaṭṭas tu . . . asmattadvyākhyānayor madhye saṃlagnatvālagnatve vidāṃ kurvantu vidvāṃsaḥ.) Cr, continuing his campaign to spare Rāma all imputations of anger or impropriety toward Sītā, reverts to his earlier, rather bizarre, arguments (see notes 14 and 16 below and notes to 7.44.10,11). Cr has Lakṣmaṇa say: "Rāma was despondent upon recalling his certain future separation from you [Sītā], given your [Sītā's] efforts to go into the forest. Then, in the midst of the assembly, he heard about his good fortune [mā], that is to say, his success in his own victory—which was being talked about in the city and the countryside—as well as the terrible censure, that is to say, the condemnation causing the hearts of the extremely compassionate ones to tremble. Once he had informed us, that is to say, caused us to hear about that condemnation, which had as its object the rākṣasas devoured by Kumbhakarṇa, he went home. (tvatkṛte tvatkartṛkavanagamanaprayatne sati saṃtaptahṛdayo niścitabhaviṣyattvadviyogasmṛtyā khinnamānaso rāmaḥ pure janapade cocyamānāṃ māṃ svavijayasaṃpattiṃ sudāruṇaṃ paramadayālūnāṃ hṛdayaprakampakam apavādaṃ kumbhakarṇabhakṣitarākṣasakarmakanindāṃ ca pariṣado madhye śrutvā nivedyāsmāñ śrāvayitvā ca gṛhaṃ gataḥ.)" Cr continues, noting: "The sense of the word pṛṣṭhataḥ, 'behind,' here is 'dead,' that is to say, that which was done by his dead enemy. The meaning is '[that which was done] by that rākṣasa, who did not respect him.' Because of Rāma's intolerance, that is to say, his inability to endure the suffering, those deeds have been lodged by the king [i.e., Rāma] in his heart. The meaning is 'They are not talked about.' And those [deeds] must not be talked about by me [Lakṣmaṇa] or by you [Sītā] in front of, that is to say, in the presence of anybody. By this it is made clear that Rāma's intentions are impossible to comprehend even for the gods. (pṛṣṭhato mṛtasyāpīty arthaḥ kṛtaḥ śatroḥ kiṃca pṛṣṭhataḥ kṛtaḥ svānādarakartur api rākṣasasyety arthaḥ. amarṣād duḥkhāsahanād dhetor yāni kṛtyāni rājñā rāmeṇa hṛdi nyastāni na kathitānīty arthaḥ. tāny agrataḥ kasyacit samīpe mayā na vacanīyāni vaktavyāni tava tvayā ca na vacanīyāni. etena rāmābhiprāyasyeśvarāṇām api durjñeyatvaṃ vyaktam.)" It is also possible that Lakṣmaṇa is saying that he is suppressing any anger that he may have toward Rāma. See, too, notes to 7.42.16 and 7.43.1.

Following verse 11, D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M1–5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [871*]: "Rāma, deeply pained at heart, gave me his orders[1] and went home (rāmaḥ saṃtaptahṛdayo māṃ niyojya gṛhaṃ gataḥ)."

[1] "gave me his orders" māṃ niyojya: Literally, "having enjoined me." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead māṃ [mā—D6, NSP, Gita Press, VSP] nivedya, "having informed me." For Cr's comments on this, see above.

13. "Although you were shown to be innocent in my presence" sā tvam . . . nirdoṣā mama saṃnidhau: Literally, "she, you, without fault in my presence." Ct explains, "Although you were declared to be without fault in my presence by Agni, etc. (yady api tvaṃ mama saṃnidhāv agnyādibhir nirdoṣā khyāpitā)." See Yuddhakāṇḍa sargas 104–106, where Sītā undergoes the agniparīkṣā and the gods declare her purity (esp. 6.106.1–9). See, too, notes to 7.44.6 and notes.

"who is fearful of the criticism of the people" paurāpavādabhītena: Cr's interpretation of the verse is, of course, at odds with that of the other commentators. He understands the term nirdoṣā to mean that Sītā is eternally free from contact with any flaw or fault. He breaks the sequence paurāpavādabhītena rather fancifully into paura-āpavād abhītena (by the not-frightened one . . . because of the previous purification). He understands: "The word paura means 'previously.' The meaning is 'That [purification] that was previously petitioned [by you, i.e., Sītā].' The word āpavaḥ means 'purification,' that is to say, the sight of the sages, which is the agent of the purification of all. And because of that [previously petitioned purification] the lord of men, Rāma, was permanently without fear and so abandoned [you, i.e., Sītā] in [my, i.e., Lakṣmaṇa's] presence. Therefore [you, i.e., Sītā] should not take it, that is to say, should not understand, that [Lakṣmaṇa], having understood Rāma's intention to be otherwise, failed to speak out, etc. (nirdoṣā sarvakālaṃ doṣasaṃsargarahitā tvaṃ paurāpavādāt pauraḥ pūrvaṃ prārthita ity arthaḥ. ya āpavaḥ sarvapāvanakārakamunidarśanam ity arthaḥ. tasmād dhetor abhītena sarvakālaṃ bhayarahitena nṛpatinā rāmeṇa mama saṃnidhau tyaktāto 'nyathāyaṃ rāmābhiprāyaṃ jñātvā na vadatītyādi na grāhyaṃ jñātavyam.)"

"You should not understand it in any other way" grāhyam . . . na te 'nyathā: Literally, "it is not to be taken by you otherwise." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the word "otherwise (anyathā)" to mean that Rāma might have acted out of an idea that she was really guilty (anyathā vāstavadoṣabuddhyā—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

14. "And so, taking cognizance of the king's command, as well as your reported pregnancy-longing in this regard" rājñaḥ śāsanam ājñāya tavaivaṃ kila daurhṛdam: Literally, "having thus acknowledged the king's order [and] your reported pregnancy-longing or pregnancy." Ck and Cg understand the term daurhṛdam in its sense of "fetus or pregnancy" and note that the desire of a pregnant woman must be fulfilled. (tad evaṃ kila daurhṛdaṃ garbhaḥ. garbhiṇyā abhilaṣitam avaśyaṃ kāryam—so Cg; Ck similarly.) Ct has a similar explanation. However, he does not specify in which sense he understands daurhṛdam. Ct understands the gerund ājñāya to mean "having known that a pregnant woman's craving must be fulfilled. (daurhṛdaṃ cājñāya. garbhiṇyā abhilaṣitam avaśyaṃ kāryam iti jñātvety arthaḥ.)" Cs understands that daurhṛdam is a sign of pregnancy and that the reason Sītā is being abandoned on the outskirts of the ashram is because of Rāma's taking into consideration the fact that more than one person (i.e., mother and child) will need to be nourished. (āśramānteṣv anena tatrāpi naikapoṣakatā tasya saṃmateti dhvanayati. daurhṛdaṃ garbhalakṣaṇam.) Ck understands similarly that Lakṣmaṇa drops Sītā off at the outskirts of the ashram, which is inhabited, in order to carry out what is necessary for that [pregnancy] (tatkṛtyapravṛttyuṣiteṣv āśramāntareṣu). Cr again has a unique reading. In his view, daurhṛdam refers to Rāma's inscrutable intention. Cr argues that according to his order, Lakṣmaṇa has come to leave Sītā, that is, to settle her on the periphery of Vālmīki's ashram (daurhṛdaṃ durjñeyābhiprāyaṃ rājñaḥ śāsanam ādāyāgatena mayāśramānteṣu vālmīkyāśramaparabhāge tvaṃ tyaktavyā saṃsthāpyā bhaviṣyasi). See notes to 7.44.17. V1,B2,D1,3,4,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read ādāya, "having accepted," for ājñāya, "having understood." G1,2,M1,3,10, and KK and VSP read tavedam, "this of yours," for tavaivam, "thus of yours," while V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tathaiva, "in just this way." See 7.41.22 and notes on the dohada, "pregnancy longing."

16. Cr sees this verse as expressing Lakṣmaṇa's reassurance to Sītā, who is worried as to how she will be able to live there alone. The fact that Vālmīki was such a close friend of Daśaratha suggests, Cr believes, that Sītā will have no need of any other companionship. (nanv ekākinyā mama katham iha sthitir ity ata āha—rājña iti. vālmīkir me pituḥ paramako 'tyuttamaḥ sakhaitena tatra na sāhāyyāntarāpekṣeti sūcitam.) See notes to 7.44.17. Compare notes to 7.48.11.

"The" eṣaḥ: Literally, "this [one]." D7,10,11,T3,G2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the emphatic, eva, "indeed," while T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead iṣṭaḥ, "dear or cherished."

"the greatest" paramakaḥ: Ck, Ct, and Cs all remark that the suffix ka is indicative of compassion (paramaka ity anukampāyāṃ kan—so Ct; Ck and Cs similarly). Cs adds that one should understand that Vālmīki was a worthy recipient of Daśaratha's compassion and that this was fitting because Daśaratha was a king. (paramako daśarathānukampāpātraṃ. kann ayam anukampāyām. daśarathasya rājatvād upapannam idaṃ mantavyam.)

17. "Resorting to the shade of the feet" pādacchāyām upāgamya: Literally, "having approached the foot-shade." Ct understands the phrase to mean "resorting to the soles [lit., 'roots'] of the feet." The meaning, he observes, is that Sītā should become the sage's dependent. (asya pādacchāyāṃ pādamūlam upāgamya. etatpāratantryaṃ prāpyety arthaḥ.)

"devoted to fasting" upavāsaparā: According to Cr, this means restricting oneself to foods that are appropriate for a woman utterly devoted to her husband (pativratocitabhojanaparā).

18. "Living the life of a completely devoted wife" pativratātvam āsthāya: Literally, "having resorted to the state of totally devoted wife."

"holding Rāma always in your heart" rāmaṃ kṛtvā sadā hṛdi: Literally, "having placed Rāma in your heart."

"conducting yourself in this way" tathā kṛtvā: Literally, "having acted thus."

1. "she was devastated and she collapsed" paraṃ viṣādam āgamya . . . nipapāta ha: Literally, "having come to extreme despair, she fell."

2. "her eyes filled with tears" bāṣpavyākulitekṣaṇā: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous bāṣpaparyākulekṣaṇā. Ck and Ct suggest adding the phrase "having regained consciousness" (saṃjñāṃ prāpyeti śeṣaḥ). Cg notes that the compound suggests the recovery of consciousness (anena punaḥ saṃjñāprāptiḥ sūcitā).

3. "a veritable incarnation of suffering" duḥkhamūrtiḥ: Literally, "the embodiment of suffering." We follow Ck, who understands, "having a form of misery that has been embodied (mūrtikṛtaduḥkhākāraiva)." Ct glosses, "the aggregation of all misery (sakaladuḥkhasamūhaḥ)." Compare UttaRāC 1.47, where Rāma expresses a similar emotion.

4. "What sin did I commit previously, or whom did I separate from his wife that I . . ." kiṃ nu pāpaṃ kṛtaṃ pūrvaṃ ko vā dārair viyojitaḥ / yāham: Literally, "What sin indeed was done previously? Or who was separated from a wife? I who . . ." The verse is slightly elliptical, as no agent is specified in the first half, nor is there any clear syntactic subordination of the second line. Like most translators consulted, we have fleshed out the verse. In keeping with a common trope, Sītā is most likely referring to sins she may have committed in a previous life. See 5.23.18 and 485*, following notes to 6.23.27.

"a virtuous wife" satī: Literally, "a chaste or virtuous woman." Ck, Ct, and Cr gloss, "a faithful or devoted wife (pativratā)." The term satī in this context occurs elsewhere in Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa at 2.7.4; 2.27.8; 2.54.10; 4.19.7; 4.20.14; 5.12.47; 5.19.6; 5.35.63; 7.47.4; 7.48.8,18. See, too, notes to verse 18 below.

5. "living in that hardship, I endured it" anurudhyāpi . . . duḥkhe viparivartinī: Literally, "even having overcome, [I was] one who moved about in suffering." Ck and Ct understand duḥkhe, "suffering," to refer to the hardships of forest life (vanavāsaduḥkhe). They and Cg gloss "having overcome (anurudhya)" as "having endured (soḍhvā)." Ck and Ct both supply the phrase "I enjoyed life in the ashram (āśrame vāsaṃ arocayam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly)." Cr reads the verse in a unique way. He glosses it as follows: "Earlier, that is, previously, following Rāma's footsteps, I made my residence in the ashram, that is to say, the dwelling place of sages in non-misery, that is, in happiness, which is the opposite of misery." By this, Cr argues, it is suggested that even seeming misery is happiness when in union with Rāma. (purā pūrvaṃ rāmapādānuvartiny aham āśrame munīnāṃ nivāsasthāne vāsam anurudhya kṛtvāpy aduḥkhe duḥkhavirodhinī sukha ity artha eva parivartinī vidyamānābhavam iti śeṣaḥ. etena rāmasaṃyoge prātibhāsikaṃ duḥkham api sukham eveti sūcitam.) Ñ2,D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for vi- (of viparivartinī). See notes to 7.43.1.

6. "dear boy" saumya: Literally, "O gentle [one]."

"am I to live" sā . . . vatsyāmi: Literally, "she, I will live."

"cut off from everyone" vijanīkṛtā: Literally, "rendered devoid of people." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "devoid of my loved ones (iṣṭajanarahitā—so Cg and Ct; Ck similarly)." Cr glosses, "made to attain the state of being devoid of Rāma, the source of happiness (sukhasaṃpādakarāmarāhityaṃ prāpitā)." Cs understands, "deprived of my protector, my lord, etc. (trayakanayakādihīnā)."

"my sorrows" duḥkham: Literally, "sorrow."

7. "And what" kiṃca: B4,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G1,M1,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kiṃ nu, "what indeed?"

"to the sages when they ask" muniṣu: Literally, "among the sages." The verse is elliptical. We follow the general opinion of the commentators that a form of the verb √pracch, "to ask," must be supplied. Cr suggests, for example, "among the munis, that is, in the midst of the munis. The phrase 'who are asking' needs to be supplied. (pṛcchatsv iti śeṣo muniṣu munimadhye.)"

"what wrong I have done to the king" kiṃ mayāpakṛtaṃ nṛpe: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead karma cāsat kṛtaṃ prabho, "and [what] evil action was done, O lord?" D6,7,T4 read vāsat kṛtaṃ ca kim, "or what evil action was done." KK (1905 and 1913, 7.48.7) and VSP (7.48.7) read vā sat kṛtam ca kim, "or what virtuous action was done." The critical apparatus, however, notes KK's reading as cāsat kṛtaṃ ca kim. No commentator addresses this variant. In general, one would not expect Sītā to address her younger brother-in-law as prabho, "lord." Cs is the only commentator to note the term. He offers several explanations. The first is that she simply cries out in her distress. In the second interpretation, he does allow that it could refer to Lakṣmaṇa. As a third alternative, he notes that prabho is given as among the names used in the vocative to invoke or call upon Rāma. (prabho iti khedena lakṣmaṇasya vā. svāmin nāma sujña śiromaṇe prabho iti rāmasya vā saṃbodhanam.)

"and for what reason" kasmin vā kāraṇe: Literally, "and in regard to what cause." KK and VSP read instead kasmiṃścit, "in regard to some cause." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

8. "this very day" adyaiva: Cg understands this expression to mean that Sītā may well take her life after the birth of her children (adyaivety anena prasavānantaraṃ tu tyājyam evety arthaḥ).

"waters of the Jāhnavī" jāhnavījale: Literally, "in the water of the Jāhnavī." Compare UttaRāC 3.2.4–8, where the river goddess Tamasā says that upon her abandonment by Lakṣmaṇa and the onset of her labor pains, Sītā threw herself into the Ganges. See, too, S. Goldman 2014.

"for then my husband's royal lineage would be cut off" rājavaṃśas tu bhartur me parihāsyate: Ck, Cg, and Ct explain that the verb parihāsyate, literally, "it would decrease or fail," needs to be understood to mean "is cut off (vicchidyate)." They explain that this is because Sītā is pregnant with Rāma's child (children). (rājavaṃśa iti. rājasaṃtānaḥ parihāsyate. vicchidyata ity arthaḥ. mayi garbhasya vidyamānatvād iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Ck and Cg add that Sītā must sustain or support her body [during the pregnancy] (mayā deho dhartavya iti bhāvaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly). Cr understands the verb here to be a causal form of the verb pari + √has, "to laugh or ridicule," and not pari + √hā, "to decrease or fail." He sees that the consequence of Sītā's potential suicide would be that Rāma's royal lineage would become the object of ridicule, as people would mock him, wondering how his wife came to die. (me bhartū rājavaṃśaḥ parihāsyate katham etasya patnī mṛtety ityādy uktvā parihāsaṃ kariṣyatīty arthaḥ.) See notes to 7.43.1. Cg reports a variant reading, not noted in the critical apparatus, that lends itself to a reading similar to that of Cr. If Cg understands that the present indicative (laṭ) parihāsyati must be read as the imperative (loṭ) parihasatu, in this case, the variant would mean: "I would not abandon [my life] so that [people] would not mock [my] lord Rāghava, alone, in his lineage [lit., 'would not mock Rāghava in [my] lord's lineage']." Cg's explanation of this line is that Sītā feels that she ought to end her life in the waters of the Ganges that very day because of Rāma's cruelty. Nonetheless, she will not do so. The reason for this is that people should not mock Rāghava alone in his [otherwise] stainless lineage. The phrase mā parihāsyati [must be read as] mā parihasatu, "let [no one] mock [him]." The transposition [of forms] is irregular. The real meaning is that were she to commit suicide, Rāma would have to bear the criticism based on his having killed a woman. (tyajeyaṃ rāghavaṃ vaṃśe bhartur mā parihāsyatīti pāṭhaḥ. rāmakṛtakrauryād adyaiva jāhnavījale jīvas tyaktavyaḥ. tathāpi taṃ na tyajeyam. kuto bhartur vaṃśe niṣkalaṅke rāghavam ekaṃ mā parihāsyati mā parihasatu. vyatyayas tv ārṣaḥ. jīvitatyāge strīhatyāmūlo 'pavādo rāmasya syād iti bhāvaḥ.)

9. "as you are ordered" yathājñām: T1 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous yathājñam.

"Leave me" tyaja mām: Ñ,V1,3,B1,2,D9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the irregular tyajya mām, "having abandoned me."

"You must abide by the instructions of the king." nideśe sthīyatāṃ rājñaḥ: Literally, "It is to be remained in the king's command." Cs, perhaps concerned at the redundancy of this expression in the light of the first pāda, takes the phrase to mean that Lakṣmaṇa should by all means remain in his own country, that is to say, in Ayodhyā. Cs also reads the phrase to mean that Lakṣmaṇa should obey Sītā's instructions, just as he does his lord's. Her instructions are made clear in the expression "now listen, etc." (nideśe nitarāṃ svakāvāsapradeśe 'yodhyāyām iti yāvat. sthīyatāṃ yathā patyus tathā mama nideśe 'pi kiṃcit sthīyatām. tam eva nideśaṃ vyanakti śṛṇv ityādinā.)

10. Ck, Cg, and Ct all note that the words and gestures that Lakṣmaṇa is to employ in the royal court are those of Sītā herself. As Ct puts it: "It should be done in the capacity of my representative (matpratinidhitayeti bhāvaḥ). Ck and Cg note that one should supply the phrase "on my behalf (madartham iti śeṣaḥ)." Cs reads the verse somewhat differently. Cs takes Sītā's instructions to Lakṣmaṇa to say that she, i.e., Sītā, having bowed to the feet with respect to the king, inquires after his welfare (pārthivaṃ rāmaṃ prati caraṇāv āvandya kuśalaṃ pṛṣṭavatīti brūhi).

"with your hands extended and cupped in reverence . . . affectionately" prāñjaliḥ pragraheṇa: Literally, "having hands cupped in reverence, with a stretching forth [of hands]." The word pragraheṇa, "stretching forth or holding in front," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ1,B1,3,D10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the compound prāñjalipragraheṇa, which is probably best taken as "stretching forth hands that are cupped in reverence." Ct and Cs understand somewhat differently. They take the compound as an adjective modifying śirasā, "with the head," in pāda c, giving the sense "with your head that is endowed with an attached cupping of the hands in reverence (añjalipragraheṇāñjalisamāsajjanena sahitena śirasā—so Cs; Ct similarly)." Compare notes to 7.50.7; 7.73.13; and 7.90.15, where the term pragraha is once again used in a similar context with prāñjaliḥ.

"your head . . . bowed to the feet" śirasā vandya caraṇau: Literally, "having honored the two feet with the head." KK and VSP read instead the synonymous śirasāvandya, which is the reading of Cg and Cs.

"of my mothers-in-law" śvaśrūṇām: Cs explicitly notes that this refers to the three (tiṣṛṇām) [wives of the late king Daśaratha], i.e., Kausalyā, Kaikeyī, and Sumitrā.

"you must inquire . . . saying" brūhi: Literally, "you must say." The following will be the words of Sītā that Lakṣmaṇa is supposed to tell Rāma on her behalf.

Following verse 10, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ,V1,3,B1,2,4,D1,2,4,5,9, and Gorresio substitute for 10cd, and B3,D3 insert after 10ab, a passage of one line [884*]: "You should bow with your head[1] to all of those [mothers-in-law], Lakṣmaṇa (śirasā vandanaṃ kuryāḥ sarvāsām eva lakṣmaṇa)."

[1] "You should bow with your head" śirasā vandanaṃ kuryāḥ: Literally, "you should make reverence with your head." V1,3,D2,4,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śirasābhinato brūyāḥ, "Bowing with your head, you should say."

Following 884*, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (first time) continue, while D6,T,G, M1–5,7–10 insert, a passage of one line [886*]: "And you must tell the king, who is intent on righteousness . . . [1] (vaktavyaś caiva nṛpatir dharmeṇa susamāhitaḥ)."

[1] "And you must tell the king, who is intent on righteousness . . ." vaktavyaś caiva nṛpatir dharmeṇa susamāhitaḥ: This is the reading of the second occurrence [which follows 885*]. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a slight variant for the first occurrence: vaktavyaś cāpi nṛpatir dharmeṣu susamāhitaḥ, "Moreover, you must tell the king, who is intent on righteous actions . . ."

Following 886* (first occurrence), D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while D6,T,G,1,3,M1–5,7–10 insert following verse 10, a passage of five lines [885*]: "For you know,[1] Rāghava, that Sītā is in reality pure and that she is filled with the highest devotion and always well-disposed toward you.[1–2] You abandoned me, hero, out of fear of infamy among the people[2] since what might be said about you might arise from criticism.[3][3–4] It is for me to spare you from it,[4] for you are my highest refuge.[5]"

[1] "For you know" jāniṣe hi: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the parasmaipada form jānāsi ca, "and you know."

[2] "out of fear of infamy among the people" prajāsv ayaśa[o?]bhīruṇā: Literally, "being fearful of infamy among the people." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ayaśobhīruṇā jane, "being fearful of infamy in reference to the people." Cs breaks up the words to read ayaśobhīruṇā ajane. He then uses ajane as an adjective to modify an implied vane, lending the sense "in a desolate forest." He then reads this with the word tyaktā, in the sense "[I am] abandoned in a desolate forest [by you,] who were fearful of infamy (ayaśobhiruṇā ajane vane tyaktā)."

[3] "might arise from criticism" apavādasamutthitam: Literally, "arising from criticism." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead apavādaḥ samutthitaḥ, "criticism, which has arisen." Cr, who remains in denial with regard to the criticism leveled against Rāma, has a unique and rather tortuous explanation of the line. He understands the term apavādaḥ, "scandal or criticism," to be somehow a massively truncated compound made up of the words apāpa, "innocent," and vāda, "speech," which he interprets to mean "effort." Thus he understands the phrase "criticism has arisen" to mean that an effort must be undertaken to avoid Rāma's kissing of the lower lip, etc., of innocent Sītā. Therefore, Cr goes on, Rāma abandons Sītā in a deserted place because of his fear of ill fame in the form of people saying of him that he has done something improper. Therefore, so that he may achieve his desired ends, Sītā has to spare him these reproaches because of his excellent conduct, etc. In this way, people will not criticize him for his kissing her, etc. (te 'pavādo 'pāpamadadhararasapānādyabhāvāya vādo yatnaḥ samutthitaḥ kartavyatvena prāptaḥ. ata evāyaśobhīruṇāyaśaso 'kartavyaṃ kṛtam iti duṣkīrtibhīruṇā tvayājane deśe 'haṃ tyaktātaḥ syāt tavābhīṣṭasiddhir bhavet. tatra hetur yat te 'vacanīyaṃ sauśīlyādinā vaktavyādharapānādyabhāvādi tan mayāpi parihartavyaṃ.) See notes to 7.43.1.

[4] "It is for me to spare you from it" mayā hi parihartavyam: Literally, "It is to be avoided or spared by me." Cs attempts to explain the mechanism whereby Sītā will spare Rāma from infamy. He expresses Sītā's thinking as follows: "Let the infamy, in the form of statements like 'Sītā has performed impermissible actions' fall on me alone, but let it not be used of you [i.e., Rāma] simply because of your connection with me (sītā kṛtāvihitavyāpāreti mamaivāpayaśo bhavatu na bhavatu matsaṃgitāprayuktam apayaśas ta iti tatparihṛtiprakāro bodhyaḥ.)"

Following 885*, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (second time) insert a passage of one line [886*]: "And you must tell the king, who is intent on righteousness . . . (vaktavyaś caiva nṛpatir dharmeṇa susamāhitaḥ /)." See above.

11. "always" nityadā: The syllable -dā is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"would be" syāt: Literally, "it would be." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead te, "your."

"this" eṣā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmāt. This would lend the second half of the verse the following sense: "For this is your greatest righteousness, and from it [would arise] unsurpassed glory or fame."

12. "I do not grieve for my own body, bull among men. But, your majesty, you must act righteously toward the people in such a way that you avoid their criticism, O delight of the Raghus." yat tvaṃ paurajanaṃ rājan dharmeṇa samavāpnuyāḥ / ahaṃ tu nānuśocāmi svaśarīraṃ nararṣabha / yathāpavādaṃ paurāṇāṃ tathaiva raghunandana //: The verse, which consists of three lines in the critical edition, is elliptical, jumbled, and difficult to construe. A literal rendering would be: "In that you should obtain the people of the city through righteousness, your majesty; but I do not grieve for my own body, bull among men; just as there is criticism among the townsmen, in that very same way, delight of the Raghus." The commentators struggle to make sense of this confused passage, and we have perforce followed them. We take the term samavāpnuyāḥ, "you should reach or obtain," in the sense of "you should act or behave." Ck and Ct flesh out the last line and gloss it as follows: "You must act, delight of the Raghus, in such a way that the condition of the people precludes criticism (yathā paurāṇām apavādaṃ parihṛtya sthitir bhavati tathaiva raghunandana vartasveti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly)." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yat tu paurajane rājan dharmeṇa samavāpnuyāt for yat tvaṃ paurajanaṃ rājan dharmeṇa samavāpnuyāḥ. This lends the line the sense "And in that one should act in accordance with righteousness with respect to the people, your majesty." Ct takes the subject of the third person optative (vidhi liṅ) samavāpnuyāt to be "you, sir (bhavān)," a reference to Rāma. KK and VSP read instead the nominative singular masculine paurajanaḥ, in which case the people themselves become the subject and the line becomes even more obscure contextually. The meaning with this variant becomes "In that people should act in accordance with righteousness, your majesty." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus, and no commentator consulted remarks on it.

Following verse 12, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [888*]: "For a husband is a woman's divinity;[1] a husband is her friend; a husband is her refuge.[2] Therefore, one must especially please one's husband even at the cost of one's life.[3][1–2] And that, in my words, is what you are to tell Rāma, who knows righteousness.[4] Now, having observed that I am pregnant,[5] go.[3–4]"

[1] "divinity" daivatam: D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous devatā, "divinity."

[2] "refuge" gatiḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead guruḥ, "guru."

[3] "Therefore, one must especially please one's husband even at the cost of one's life." prāṇair api priyaṃ kāryaṃ bhartus tasmād viśeṣataḥ: Literally, "Therefore, even with one's life breaths, something pleasing is to be done for a husband especially." D6,7,10,11, T1,2,G2,3,M3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP transpose the words kāryam and tasmāt.

[4] "who knows righteousness" dharmasaṃgaraḥ: The expression is somewhat obscure. And it is not clear whether it refers to Rāma or what Sītā wishes Lakṣmaṇa to tell him. In the former case, which we have chosen, saṃgaraḥ must be taken in its lexical sense of "knowledge" and read as a bahuvrīhi in the sense of "who possesses knowledge of dharma." In the latter case, it could be rendered as "in agreement with dharma." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mama saṃgrahaḥ. This, too, can be read in two ways: either as referring to Rāma in the sense of "Rāma my all-in-all" or referring to Sītā's speech as "my gist or summary." Cs understands the latter meaning, glossing, "the summary of her communication of her instructions (ājñāvijñāpanāsaṃkṣepaḥ)." Ck and Ct similarly gloss, "the summary of the message that is to be addressed by me to Rāma (mayā rāmaṃ prati vaktavyasaṃdeśasya saṃgraha ity arthaḥ)."

[5] "having observed that I am pregnant" nirīkṣya mā . . . ṛtukālātivartinīm: Literally, "having observed me who have passed beyond my period of ovulation or menstrual period." As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr point out, this appears to be a circumlocution for pregnancy. They gloss, "characterized by signs of pregnancy (garbhalakṣaṇavatīm—Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly)." Ck and Ct argue that Sītā says this in order to stop the persistent criticism (punaś cāpavādaprasaktivyāvṛttyā—so Ck). Ct adds that the criticism emanates from Rāma, etc. (punā rāmādikṛtāpavādaprasaktinivṛttaya iti bhāvaḥ). Cs indicates that in asking Lakṣmaṇa to testify that she is visibly pregnant, she is saying that one should let previous criticisms [i.e., about her living in the house of another man] be, but that henceforward there should be no repeated infamy. Cs, quoting 7.46.14 above (rājñaḥ śāsanam ādāya tathaiva kila daurhṛdam), further notes that although Sītā realizes that Lakṣmaṇa already knows that she is pregnant, we are to understand that she speaks in this fashion to once again reinforce this knowledge. (purāprāptāpavādas tv astu. punaḥ punar ayaśo na saṃpādanīyam iti bhāvaḥ . . . yady api sītā māṃ gurviṇīṃ lakṣmaṇo jñātavān iti jñātavatī rājñaḥ śāsanam ādāya tathaiva kila daurhṛdam ity ukte. tathāpi punar dārḍhyāya tathoktavatīti jñeyam.)

Following 888*, line 3, KK (in brackets numbered as 7.48.18cd; not noted in the critical apparatus) inserts, while M4,5 continue following 888*, a passage of one line [889*]: "And once more, overwhelmed by the force of grief,[1] she addressed Saumitri (punar apy āha saumitriṃ śokavegapariplutā)."

[1] "overwhelmed by the force of grief" śokavegapariplutā: KK reads instead the synonymous śokavegasamāplutā.

13. "bowed his head to the ground" śirasā dharaṇīṃ gatvā: Literally, "having gone to the earth with his head." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śirasā vandya dharaṇīm, "having honored the earth with his head." Cr expands the expression, glossing, "the earth near Sītā's feet," for dharaṇīm, "earth" (dharaṇīṃ sītācaraṇasamīpabhūmim). Compare the similar expression at 7.43.10 and notes.

14. "Then, after making a respectful circumambulation, he" pradakṣiṇaṃ ca kṛtvā sa: Literally, "And having made a a respectful circumambulation." Ñ1,V3,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pradakṣiṇaṃ ca tāṃ kṛtvā, "And having respectfully circumambulated her."

"weeping loudly" rudann eva mahāsvanam: Literally, "weeping a great sound or weeping loudly." Ñ,V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mahāsvanaḥ, "he of great sound or possessing a great sound," for mahāsvanam. This would lend the passage the sense "he, possessing a loud sound, wept."

"he . . . boarded" āruroha: Literally, "he ascended or mounted." G1 and KK and VSP read instead āruhya ca, "and having boarded."

Following 14ab, D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [890*]: "After brooding for a moment, he said to her: 'What are you saying[1] to me, lovely lady? I have never before looked at your figure. I have only seen your feet, blameless woman.[1–2] How then am I to look upon you here in the forest when you are apart from Rāma?' And having said this, he bowed to her respectfully and once again boarded the boat.[3–4]"

[1] "What are you saying" kim . . . vakṣyasi: Literally, "What will you say?" Ct and Cs attribute Lakṣmaṇa's use of the wrong tense here to his being in the grip of sorrow. Ct adds that for that reason it is not a grammatical fault. (kiṃ vadasīty arthaḥ. śokavaśāt kālāntare prayogo na doṣāya.) Cr takes the future tense at its full value and claims that its usage suggests Lakṣmaṇa's fear of some anticipated harsh speech on the part of Sītā (etena saṃbhāvitasītādurukter bhītiḥ sūcitā).

15. "he reached the northern bank" sa gatvā cottaraṃ kūlam: Literally, "and he, having gone to the northern bank." V1,D5–7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous tīram, "bank," for kūlam.

"crushed under a great burden of grief" śokabhārasamanvitaḥ: Literally, "endowed with a burden of grief."

"almost unconscious" samūḍha iva: Literally, "as if stupefied."

16. "Lakṣmaṇa then set forth" lakṣmaṇaḥ prayayau: It should be noted that Lakṣmaṇa apparently does not leave immediately. See 7.49.1 and notes, where Lakṣmaṇa watches until Sītā is taken into Vālmīki's ashram.

"turning around . . . to gaze at" apāvṛtya . . . dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having turned around . . . having looked at." D6,7,10,11,G2,M1,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous parāvṛtya, "having turned back," for apāvṛtya.

"who, like a woman without a protector, was clutching herself" anāthavat / veṣṭantīm: Literally, "wrapping [herself] like one without a lord." Ct takes a theological approach to the adverb anāthavat. He glosses, "like someone without a lord," but explains that this means "not actually without a lord," because, as he claims, Sītā is, in fact, the bodily form of absolute consciousness. (anāthavad anātheva na tu vastuto 'nāthā. pūrṇacidghanasvarūpatvād iti bhāvaḥ.) The root √veṣṭ can mean either "to twist or writhe" or "to wrap or enclose." In our opinion, the context supports the view that Sītā is huddled, clutching her arms about her as one might expect of a woman abandoned in a fearsome, deserted forest. One might also reasonably understand that Sītā was rolling [in the dust] on the ground like grieving women of Rāvaṇa's antaḥpuram. See 6.98.2 and notes. D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the less appealing ceṣṭantīm, "moving about or struggling."

17. "She gazed again and again at the distant carriage and Lakṣmaṇa, and as she watched, terrified, grief overwhelmed her." durasthaṃ ratham ālokya lakṣmaṇaṃ ca muhur muhuḥ / nirīkṣamāṇām udvignāṃ sītāṃ śokaḥ samāviśat //: Literally, "Grief fully entered or possessed terrified Sītā, who was gazing, having looked again and again at the distant chariot and Lakṣmaṇa." D10,11 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tūdvignām, "and or but . . . terrified," for udvignām, "terrified."

18. "the virtuous . . . woman . . . not seeing anyone to protect her . . . given over to her suffering" nātham apaśyatī satī . . . duḥkhaparāyaṇā satī: Literally, "the virtuous woman not seeing a protector . . . being one who has suffering as her principal object." The phrase nātham apaśyatī could also be taken to mean "not seeing her lord," i.e., Rāma. To avoid redundancy, we have taken the first occurrence of the term satī nominally in its sense of "virtuous or chaste woman" and the second as a participle, "[she] being." See notes to verse 4 above.

"glorious woman" yaśodharā: Literally, "[she] maintaining fame or glory." Ct glosses, "possessing glory through her devotion to her husband (pātivratyayaśovatī)." Cr glosses, "to whom all women are inferior in glory (yaśasādharāḥ sakalanāryo yasyāḥ sā sītā)."

"now wretched" tapasvinī: Literally, "possessed of suffering." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the redundant yaśasvinī, "glorious."

"in the woods, which resounded with the cries of peacocks" barhiṇanādite vane: Literally, "in the woods resounding with peacocks." The plaintive cries of peacocks, which are typically repeated by one bird after the other, provide a striking backdrop to the wailing of forlorn Sītā.

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

1. "Seeing Sītā crying, the sages' sons, who were nearby" sītāṃ tu rudatīṃ dṛṣṭvā ye tatra munidārakāḥ: Literally, "But, having seen weeping Sītā, those sons of the munis [who were] there." D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read te, "they or those," for ye, "those who." KK and VSP read instead sītāṃ rudantīṃ dṛṣṭvā tāṃ tatra vai munidārakāḥ, "Having see her, Sītā, weeping, the sons of the munis, there indeed."

"of profound intellect" agryadhīḥ: Literally, "of excellent or foremost mind or thought." D7,10–12,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ugradhīḥ, "of fierce intellect." This, in turn, is glossed by Ct as "whose mind was focused on fierce austerities (ugratapoviṣayabuddhiḥ)."

2. "all" sarve: Cs feels that the poet specifies that all of the boys report to Vālmīki to eliminate any chance of falsehood or error on the part of any of them (sarve 'nṛtatvabhramabhraṃśārtham). D7,T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK, and VSP read instead sarvam, lending the line the sense "The sons of the sages informed that great seer all about the sound of her weeping."

3. "a woman such as we have never seen before" adṛṣṭapūrvā: Literally, "a not previously seen [one]."

"perhaps the wife of some great man" kasyāpy eṣā mahātmanaḥ / patnī: Literally, "she [is] the wife of some great one." Since the boys have no real knowledge of Sītā's identity and are, presumably, unfamiliar with worldly affairs, we assume that their remark is intended to be speculative.

"with strangled cries" vikṛtasvarā: Literally, "having distorted tones or sounds." The sequence -svarā is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,

11,G,M1,2,4–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vikṛtānanā, "having a contorted face."

4. "You should see her . . . She looks like some goddess" paśyemāṃ devatām iva: Literally, "See her, who is like a divinity." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read paśyes tvam, "you should or must see," while KK and VSP read paśya tvam, "you must see," for paśyemāṃ, "see her."

"For we do not think she is a mortal, and we should welcome her fittingly." na hy enāṃ mānuṣīṃ vidmaḥ satkriyāsyāḥ prayujyatām: Literally, "For we do not think this one a human. For [lit., 'of'] her a satkriyā, or hospitable reception, must be performed." NSP omits 4cd–6, while GPP reads 4cd–6, in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.49.5 and 7.49.6.

Following 4ab, D6,7,10,11,S (except M6) insert a passage of three lines [896*]: "And on the bank[1] of the river, blessed one, we saw a fine lady in distress. She was weeping and entirely given over to profound grief.[2] Alone and despondent, like someone without a protector, she does not deserve suffering and grief.[3]"

[1] "And on the bank" tīre tu: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tu tīre by transposition.

[2] "given over to profound grief" dṛḍhaśokaparāyaṇā: D6,7,10,11,M2,4,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dṛḍhaṃ śokaparāyaṇā, "profoundly given over to grief."

[3] "she does not deserve suffering and grief" anarhā duḥkhaśokābhyām: We follow Cr, who proposes reading the instrumental dual as a genitive (duḥkhaśokābhyāṃ duḥkhaśokayor anarhāyogyā). Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all, however, propose reading the adjective separately and supply the term "of suffering" (anarheti duḥkhasyeti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Cm and Ct similarly).

Following verse 4, these same editions and manuscripts insert a passage of two lines [897*]: "She is not far from the ashram, and it is clear that she has come for refuge.[1] That virtuous woman is seeking a protector, blessed one, please protect her.[2] (āśramasyāvidūre ca vyaktaṃ sā śaraṇaṃ gatā / trātāraṃ icchate sādhvī bhagavaṃs trātum arhasi //)"

[1] "it is clear that she has come for refuge" vyaktaṃ sā śaraṇaṃ gatā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvām iyaṃ śaraṇaṃ gatā, "lending the pāda the sense "she has come to you for refuge."

[2] "please protect her" trātum arhasi: Literally, "you are worthy to protect or you please protect."

5. D11 and NSP omit 4cd–6, while GPP reads 4cd–6 in brackets, unnumbered, between verses 7.49.5 and 7.49.6.

"those words of theirs" teṣāṃ tad vacanam: Literally, "that speech of those." D6,7,10,G2,M8,10, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tu, "and or but," for tat, "that," lending the phrase the sense "and their speech."

"who had obtained special insight through asceticism" tapasā labdhacakṣuṣmān: Literally, "one possessed of an acquired sight through asceticism." The compound is sāpekṣa, that is to say, it suffers from the flaw of having a prior member of the compound [labdha] syntactically construe with an outside referent [tapasā]. Cr explains that Vālmīki possesses a sight that he has obtained through the power of asceticism, a sight that gives him the capacity to see everything (tapasā tapobalena labdhaṃ cakṣuḥ sakaladarśanasāmarthyaṃ tadvān vālmīkiḥ). This fits the common epic trope according to which ascetics acquire supranormal vision or knowledge through the practice of asceticism.

"reached certainty in his mind" buddhyā niścitya: Literally, "having determined with his mind." Cr explains that Vālmīki ascertains correctly, that is to say, through his mind, that is to say, through his own knowledge obtained through asceticism (buddhyā tapolabdhasvajñānena niścitya tattvena jñātvā). The idea here, although it is not explicitly stated, is that through his supranormal knowledge, Vālmīki determines that the woman the boys have been describing is Sītā.

Following verse 5, V2,D6,7,10, and Gita Press, GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.49.5 and 7.49.6), KK (7.49.8ab), and VSP (7.49.8ab) insert, while Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B4,D1–5, 8,9,12,T3,4 substitute for 6ab, a passage of one line [899*]: "Seeing him departing, his disciples followed the brahman-seer (taṃ prayāntam abhiprekṣya śiṣyā brahmarṣim anvayuḥ)."[1]

[1] D6,7,10, Gita Press, GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.49.5 and 7.49.6), KK (7.49.8ab), and VSP (7.49.8ab) read instead taṃ prayāntam abhipretya śiṣyā hy enaṃ mahāmatim, "Having approached that one of great intellect who was departing, the disciples . . ."

6. D11 and NSP omit 4cd–6, while GPP reads 4cd–6, in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.49.5 and 7.49.6.

"When he had almost reached" abhipretya kiṃcid: Literally, "having approached to a certain extent or somewhat."

"the great sage" mahāmuniḥ: D6,7,10, Gita Press, GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.49.5 and 7.49.6), KK (7.49.8c), and VSP (7.49.8c) read instead mahāmatiḥ, "the one of great intellect."

"a . . . guest-offering" arghyam: For a list of the various articles of food and drink traditionally offered to a respected or venerable visitor, see 16*, note 1, following notes to 7.1.10.

"stood on" āśritaḥ: Literally, "rested on or had recourse to." V1,3,D1–3,7,10, and Gita Press, GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, between 7.49.5 and 7.49.6), KK (7.49.9b), and VSP (7.49.9b) read instead āgamat, "he came to or he arrived at."

7. "who was crushed under the weight of her grief" śokabhārārtām: Literally, "afflicted with the weight of sorrow."

"gentle words" madhurāṃ vāṇīm: Literally, "pleasant or sweet words."

"with his ebullient spirit" tejasā: We normally render the term as "blazing energy." Given the context here, however, it seems that Vālmīki's softer side is intended as he tries to cheer the despondent queen.

8. "virtuous" satī: Ś,Ñ2,V2,B,D6–8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead priyā, "beloved." See notes to 7.47.4. See, too, verse 18 below.

9. "Through my pious meditation" dharmasamādhinā: Literally, "through dharma-concentration." The precise meaning of the term is not clear. The commentators interpret somewhat differently. Ck glosses, "meditation for the purpose of dharma (dharmāya samādhis tathā)." Cm understands, "through the fruition of meditation that was recalled through dharma (dharmasaṃsmṛtadhyānaparipākenety arthaḥ)." Ct glosses, "through the fruition of meditation acquired through dharma produced by yoga (yogajadharmalabdhadhyānaparipākena)." Cr, continuing his devotionalist reading, takes the compound as a bahuvrīhi modifying the pronoun mayā, "by me." He glosses, "by me, who possess concentration, that is to say, single-pointed mental focus, on that supreme action, which has the form of service to your [i.e., Sītā's] feet according to my own dharma (svadharme bhavatpādasevārūpaparamakarmaṇi samādhiś cittaikāgryaṃ yasya tena mayā)."

"I recognized you, even as you were coming" āyānty evāsi vijñātā mayā: Literally,

"Even while coming you are known by me." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B3,D1–5,8–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read cāsi, "and you are," for evāsi, "even as you are."

"and . . . the entire reason" kāraṇaṃ caiva sarvam: Literally, "and indeed the entire reason." As the commentators generally note, the elliptical expression refers to the reason for Sītā's arrival (āgamanakāraṇam ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct and Cr similarly).

"in my heart" hṛdayena: Literally, "by the heart." Ct glosses, "The meaning is 'through meditation' (dhyānenety bhāvaḥ)." Cr understands, "through my mind, which has been purified by mediation on you (tvaddhyānapūtamanasā)."

Following verse 9, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [901*]: "I know the truth about you,[1] illustrious lady. For, I also know everything that goes on in the triple world. (tava caiva mahābhāge viditaṃ mama tattvataḥ / sarvaṃ ca viditaṃ mahyaṃ trailokye yad dhi vartate //)"

[1] "I know the truth about you" tava . . . viditaṃ mama tattvataḥ: Literally, "of you it is known truthfully by [lit., 'of'] me." Ct glosses, "Truthfully means truth, that is, truth about you in the form of your being of a pure nature. That is known of me, that is to say, by me. (tattvatas tattvaṃ tava tattvaṃ śuddhabhāvatvarūpaṃ mama mayā viditam.)"

10. "that you are without sin" apāpām . . . tvām: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read te for tvām. Ck, Ct, and Cr struggle with the awkward te, simply glossing tvām. Cr glosses, "I know that you are without sin, that is to say, that you are one who removes sin simply through being seen (te tvām apāpām avalokanamātreṇa pāpanivartikāṃ vedmi)."

"As you are of a pure nature" viśuddhabhāvā: Ñ2,V,B,D1–4,9,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead visrabdhā (D1–4,9, Gorresio, viśrabdhā) bhava, "be trusting." Cr, the only commentator to take note of this variant, glosses, "You should be endowed with confidence with regard to Rāma's love (rāmaprītiviṣayakaviśvāsayuktā bhava)."

11. "there are some ascetic women engaged in austerities" tāpasyas tapasi sthitāḥ: Literally, "ascetic women who are fixed [lit., 'stand'] in asceticism." Cr understands that the specific ascetic practice [of the women] has as its reason the gaining of Sītā's darśana (tapasi tvaddarśanahetukatapaścaraṇe). Cs understands the whole discussion of the ascetic women to be Vālmīki's way of dispelling Sītā's anxiety that since she has now been approached by a man, that is to say, by Vālmīki, and she is distressed [i.e., vulnerable] once more, just as before [i.e., when she was abducted by Rāvaṇa in the form of an ascetic], she will have no recourse. (tāpasyas tapasi sthitā yoṣitaḥ. anena puruṣasya tava samīpopagateḥ punar api pūrvata eva śrāntāyāḥ kā gatir iti śaṅkā nirākṛtā.)

"my child" vatse: Cr believes that the use of this term of endearment suggests Vālmīki's extremely close friendship with Janaka, which, he notes, is not in contradiction with his previously stated friendship with Daśaratha (vatsa ity uktyā janakena sahaitasya mahatī maitrīti sūcitā taddvāraiva daśarathena maitrīti pūrveṇa na virodhaḥ). See notes to 7.46.16.

"as . . . their own child" yathā vatsam: Literally, "as a child." Ck and Ct both understand, "like a son (yathā vatsaṃ putraṃ yathā—so Ck; Ct similarly)."

12. "You should be no more despondent than if you were returning home." yathā svagṛham abhyetya viṣādaṃ caiva mā kṛthāḥ: Literally, "just as having reached your own home, you should not make despondency." Ck, Cg, and Ct flesh out the elliptical expression, supplying a finite verb: "Just as you live when you have reached your own home, in the very same way you should live—those words are to be supplied (yathā svagṛham abhyetya tiṣṭhasi tathaiva tiṣṭheti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)."

13. "she bowed her head to his feet" śirasā vandya caraṇau: Literally, "having honored the two feet with the head."

14. "She followed him to where the ascetic women, composed and constantly engaged in righteousness, dwelt." anvayād yatra tāpasyo dharmanityāḥ samāhitāḥ: Literally, "She followed where the ascetic women, constant in dharma [and] composed, [were]." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP omit this line (14cd).

15. "And . . . followed by Vaidehī, then" vaidehyānugataṃ tadā: Literally, "followed by Vaidehī, then." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vaidehyā munipatnayaḥ, "[Vālmīki] with Vaidehī . . . the wives of the sages [came forward]."

16. "It has been a long time since you have come, lord." cirasyāgamanaṃ prabho: Literally, "the coming is after a long time, O lord." D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca te, "and your [coming]," for prabho, "O lord."

"all . . . you" sarvās tvām: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tvāṃ sarvāḥ by transposition.

"Now please tell us" ucyatām: Literally, "Let it be said or told."

18. "virtuous" satī: See notes to 7.47.4. See, too, verse 8 above.

"Although she is without sin" apāpā: Literally, "sinless." Cr, continuing his devotionalist reading, glosses, "she who removes the sins of those who worship her (apāpā sevakānāṃ pāpanivartikā)." See S. Goldman 2014 on the reception of Sītā by the ascetic women.

19. "You venerable ladies" bhavatyaḥ: Ś,D2,5,6,8,9,G1,2, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous and expected bhavantyaḥ.

"because of the respect owing to my words" gauravān mama vākyasya: Literally, "because of the weight or venerableness of my speech." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gauravān mama vākyāc ca. This lends the phrase the sense "because of [her] venerableness and my words." Our interpretation of this variant follows the gloss of Cr, who understands, "because of the venerableness through her having been born in an extremely noble family, etc., and because of my words (gauravād atipraśastavaṃśotpannatvādinā gurutvān mama vākyāc ca)." This interpretation, in which the gaurava belongs to Sītā, is also followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 526), who renders, "because of her status and dignity." It is conceivable that the poet uses the term gauravam to mean "pregnancy." The term gurviṇī refers to a pregnant woman, and this could be taken as a euphemism for Sītā's condition here. A number of northern manuscripts and the text of Gorresio substitute the term strībhāvāt, "because of her being a woman or her woman's condition." The term seems somewhat otiose for Vālmīki to specify Sītā's gender for the ascetic women, so this, too, may be an indirect reference to her pregnancy. Dutt (1894, p. 1730), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 549), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 532), Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 832), and Benoît (1999, p. 1341), reading the variant, all understand that the gaurava belongs to Vālmīki or his words.

20. "after comforting" parisāntvya: D10,11,G,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead paridāya, "having deposited or given over," while KK and VSP read praṇidhāya, "having deposited." Ck, Cg, and Ct, regardless of their variant, all gloss, "having given her into the hands of the ascetic women (tāpasīnāṃ haste dattvā)." Cr similarly glosses, "having delivered [her] to the wives (patnībhyo grāhayitvā)."

At the end of his translation of this sarga (7.49 of GPP), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, pp. 532–33), alone among the translators consulted, includes a series of what appear to āśirvādas, or blessings, concerning Rāma and some of the other characters in the Rāmāyaṇa. He introduces these by saying, "The following Traditional Verses appear here in the original text." We find no reference to this passage in any of the editions that we have consulted.

1. "he felt terrible anguish" saṃtāpam akarod ghoram: Literally, "he made terrible pain." Ś1,D5–7,10–12, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃtāpam agamad ghoram, "he went to terrible pain." See 7.50.18 and notes, where the same idiom is used.

"as he watched Sītā Maithilī" dṛṣṭvā tu maithilīṃ sītām: Literally, "having seen Sītā Maithilī." When we last saw Lakṣmaṇa, at 7.47.16, he was turning around to see Sītā as he traveled back to Ayodhyā. Now, however, it appears that he had stayed back to watch her interaction with Vālmīki. Ct claims that Lakṣmaṇa had remained on the northern bank, and from there he was able to see Vālmīki take Sītā in (udakkūle sthitvā vālmīki-kartṛkasītāpraveśadarśanam). Cr notes that the fact that Lakṣmaṇa sees Sītā being taken in suggests that all this time he has been watching her from afar (etena tāvatkālaṃ lakṣmaṇo dūrataḥ paśyann atiṣṭhad iti sūcitam). See 7.47.16 and notes.

"being taken into the ashram" āśramaṃ saṃpraveṣitām: Literally, "[she] who had been caused to enter the ashram." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the locative singular āśrame, "[she who had been caused to enter] into the ashram."

2. "that prince of immense blazing energy" mahātejāḥ: Literally, "the one of immense blazing energy."

"his counselor and charioteer, Sumantra" sumantraṃ mantrasārathim: Literally, "Sumantra, the counsel-charioteer." The compound mantrasārathim is an odd one and is, no doubt, reflective of the poet's fondness for epithets that echo characters' names (see, for example, 7.16.27; 7.43.2; and notes). The compound is thus an echo and a play on the name Sumantra, which means "he of good counsel." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "a charioteer who serves as a companion in counsel (mantrasahāyabhūtaṃ sārathim—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cr observes that there is equal grammatical governance of the character's status as a counselor and a charioteer (mantritvasamānādhikaraṇasārathitvaviśiṣṭaṃ sumantram).

"Just imagine wise Rāma's suffering on account of Sītā's pain." sītāsaṃtāpajaṃ duḥkhaṃ paśya rāmasya dhīmataḥ: Literally, "Look at wise Rāma's suffering born of Sītā's pain." The commentators differ somewhat in how they understand Rāma's suffering. Ck, in our transcription of his commentary, appears to ascribe the suffering both to his separation from Sītā and to her pain (sītāviyogasītāsaṃtāpajam ity arthaḥ). The critical apparatus, quoting Ck, whom the editors of the critical edition conflate with Cg and Ct, drops the second occurrence of the name Sītā. Cg and Ct understand that the suffering (duḥkham) is born from the pain of separation from Sītā (sītāvirahasaṃtāpajam—so Cg; Ct similarly). The ascription of Rāma's suffering to the perception of Sītā's pain is articulated by Cr, who glosses, "Rāma's suffering produced from his imagining [lit., 'memory of'] Sītā's pain caused by separation (viyogajanitasītāsaṃtāpasmṛtijanitaṃ rāmasya duḥkham). The word dhīmataḥ, "of wise [Rāma]," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sārathe, "O charioteer."

3. "than this" ataḥ: Ś1,Ñ2,V3,B3,4,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "than that."

4. "separation from Vaidehī" vinābhāvam / vaidehyā . . . sārdham: Literally, "separation together with Vaidehī." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nityam, "always," for sārdham, "together with." This, then, best construes with the last clause, lending it the sense "Fate is always impossible to avert."

5. "must submit to fate" daivam anuvartate: Literally, "he follows or conforms to fate." V3,D10,11,T1,2,G,M1,3,5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read paryupāsate, "he respects or waits upon," for anuvartate, "he follows." Ct glosses paryupāsate with anuvartate. Ck, Cg, and Ct observe that this means that Rāma is unable to avert it [fate] (na tu tan nirasituṃ śaknotīty arthaḥ—Cg and Ct; Ck similarly). Cr argues that this suggests that Rāghava is the protector of all limits (etena rāghavasya sarvamaryādāpālakatvaṃ sūcitam).

6. "because of . . . words" vākyaiḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2–12,T3,4,M3,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the ablative singular vākyāt, "from or because of the speech."

"my" mama: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,D2–12,T3,4,M1, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular rāmaḥ, "Rāma [dwelt]."

"he dwelt" uṣitaḥ: B2,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the gerund uṣitvā, "having dwelt." In this reading, the verse has no finite verb.

"very fearsome" sudāruṇe: Ś,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the redundant mahāvane, "in the great wilderness."

"for nine years and five" navavarṣāṇi pañca ca: This curious way of referring to the fourteen years of Rāma's exile is a favorite expression of the poet in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa, where he uses it at least six times. See 2.9.23; 2.10.28; 2.16.24; 2.21.14; 2.34.31; 2.73.8; and 3.45.13, where the same or similar phrases are used.

7. "Still much more painful than that" tato duḥkhataraṃ bhūyaḥ: Ct believes that Sītā's banishment is more painful than Rāma's because her banishment [unlike his] was for an unlimited time (aparimitakālatvād duḥkhataraṃ sītāvipravāsanam). Cr attempts to deflect criticism from Sītā [and Rāma]. He understands vacanam, here, "criticism or gossip," to refer, in fact, to her banishment, which, since it will continue for a long time, is more painful than Rāma's exile in the forest (sītāyā vacanam ucyamānaṃ bhūyo bahukālakaṃ sītāyā vipravāsanaṃ tato vanavāsaduḥkhād bhūyo duḥkhataram).

"It seems cruel to me." nṛśaṃsaṃ pratibhāti me: Lakṣmaṇa is referring to Rāma's cruelty to Sītā. Ct glosses, "In that he was the author of Sītā's banishment, it seems rather cruel (sītāvipravāsanaṃ yat kṛtavāṃs tan nṛśaṃsaṃ krūrakalpam iti bhāti)." Ck and Cg appear to regard Sītā's banishment as a cruel but necessary duty on Rāma's part (tataḥ sītāyā vipravāsanaṃ nṛśaṃsaṃ krūrakṛtyam iti pratibhāti).

8. "Moreover, charioteer, what practice of righteousness has been accomplished in subjecting Maithilī to this act—so destructive to one's reputation—at the instigation of the townsmen with their baseless allegations?" ko nu dharmāśrayaḥ sūta karmaṇy asmin yaśohare / maithilīṃ prati saṃprāptaḥ paurair hīnārthavādibhiḥ //: The verse is rather difficult to render, since its syntax is somewhat disordered and many of its key terms are highly polysemic. A more or less literal rendering might be: "Indeed, what connection to dharma is attained, charioteer, in this action that is destructive to glory, with reference to Maithilī by means of accusations by the people of the city, who are making allegations that have deficient substance?" Our rendition of the translation relies somewhat on the construction proposed by Ck, Cg, and Ct, who take the phrase karmaṇi yaśohare as an elliptical sati saptamī meaning "When such an act so conducive to infamy, that is to say, the action in the form of the abandonment of Sītā, has been performed (apayaśaskare 'smin karmaṇi sītāparityāgarūpakarmaṇy anuṣṭhite sati—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly). These commentators also understand that saṃprāptaḥ is a bhūte kṛdanta of which Rāma is the unexpressed kartṛ. For them, the question is that, in doing such a thing, what practice of dharma will Rāma have performed (ko nu dharmāśrayo dharmaparigraho rāmeṇa saṃprāptaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)? Cg takes Lakṣmaṇa's point to be that, far from performing any act of righteousness, in abandoning a virtuous woman, an act of unrighteousness would take place (praty uta sādhvītyāgād adharma eva syād iti bhāvaḥ). Ck and Ct are more specific. They argue that since a virtuous woman is the very foundation of righteousness, to abandon one is to destroy righteousness in its entirety. (dharmāṇāṃ satstrīmūlatvāt. tattyāge sarvo 'pi dharmo nāśita evety arthaḥ.) Cs believes that Rāma has committed an act of unrighteousness in that he has sent away the woman he married after previously uttering the [wedding] vow [not to transgress against the bride]: "In righteousness and in property [etc.]" (ko nu dharmāśrayaḥ prāpto dharme cārthe ceti saṃkalpapūrvakaṃ vivāhitāpavāhiteti na dharmo rāmasyeti bhāvaḥ). The vow "dharme cārthe ca kāme ca imāṃ nāticarāmi" is the first of seven that a couple makes as they take the first of the seven steps of the saptapadī during the Hindu wedding ceremony. Cr typically has a unique reading of the verse, one that absolves Rāma completely of any blame or even agency in the abandonment of Sītā. According to him, the term hīnārthavādibhiḥ means that the people are talking about Lakṣmaṇa, who is the agent of this inglorious action, and therefore it is he who is deprived of artha, that is to say, it is he who is deficient in goals (hīnārtha), in the sense that he is now deprived of Sītā, who is the means of the accomplishment of all ends or goals. Therefore, he is approached by the people with respect to Maithilī in that they question him about his account of Sītā's abandonment. (hīnārthavādibhir yaśohare 'smin maithilītyāgarūpe karmaṇi vidyamāna etatkarmakartety arthaḥ. ata evārthena nikhilārthasādhakasītayā hino 'yaṃ lakṣmaṇa iti vādibhiḥ pauraiḥ samanuprāpto 'haṃ maithilīṃ prati maithilītyāgavṛttāntapraśna ity arthaḥ.) GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read samanuprāptaḥ, "is acquired or is gained," for prati saṃprāptaḥ, "with reference to . . . is acquired." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Cr is the only commentator who clearly follows this reading, although in his commentary he adds the word prati, "toward, with reference to."

"what practice of righteousness" ko nu dharmāśrayaḥ: Literally, "what, indeed, is the basis of or sanction for dharma?" Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "What is this performance of dharma (dharmaparigrahaḥ)?" Cr understands, "What [basis of dharma] shall I say (kiṃ vakṣyāmīty arthaḥ)?"

"in subjecting . . . this act so destructive to one's reputation" karmaṇy asmin yaśohare: Literally, "in this act, which destroys glory or fame." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "This act productive of infamy in the form of [people saying], 'He abandoned a virtuous woman in the forest' (yaśohare sādhvīṃ vane visṛṣṭavān ity apayaśaskare 'smin karmaṇi)."

9. "various words" bahudhā vācaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vāco bahudhā by transposition.

"he cupped his hands in reverence" prāñjalir bhūtvā: Literally, "having become one whose hands are cupped in reverence." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śraddhayā prājñaḥ, "the wise one in confidence or with trust." The translators who share this variant offer a variety of interpretations. Dutt (1894, p. 1731) renders, "the wise Sumantra reverentially replied." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 550) offers, "Sumantra, plein de loyauté et de sagesse." In this interpretation, he appears to be followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 534), who translates, "the loyal and sagacious Sumantra," and Benoît (1999, p. 1342), who offers, "Sumantra . . . en sa loyale sagesse." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 526) uniquely understands, "Sumantra, who had won wisdom through faith." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 833) avoids the term śraddhayā, translating merely, "Sumantra, the wise one." We believe, however, that the phrase "in confidence" is an appropriate rendering of śraddhayā here since, as will be made clear in verses 14–15 below, the matter that Sumantra is about to disclose was not intended to be repeated either in public or even to Lakṣmaṇa.

10. "all this was foretold" dṛṣṭam etat: Literally, "this was seen." We have forced the language somewhat to cover the fact that the brahmans would have had to make an announcement of what they had foreseen. In a similar vein, Cr glosses, "was made known or announced (bodhitam)." Cs notes that the brahmans would have perceived these future events through the power of their asceticism and also would have proclaimed them.

(dṛṣṭaṃ tapaḥsāmarthyena. śrāvitaṃ ca.) As Ct points out, what the sages foresaw was the banishment of Sītā, etc., which will be discussed in the following verses (etat sītāvipravāsanādi vakṣyamāṇaṃ viprair dṛṣṭam eva). Cg, anticipating the following verses, understands that Sumantra is saying that what was foreseen in the presence of Daśaratha was that unfortunate Rāma would be largely miserable and, having foreseen this, they told it to Sumantra (purā tava pitur agrato 'lpabhāgyavān rāmo duḥkhaprāyo bhaviṣyatīty etad dṛṣṭaṃ dṛṣṭvā mahyam uktam ity arthaḥ).

11. "will be unhappy for the most part and will experience little happiness" bhaviṣyati . . . duḥkhaprāyo 'lpasaukhyavān: Literally, "he will be one for whom unhappiness is the general condition . . . [and] one who possess little happiness." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read visaukhyabhāk, "will be one who enjoys or experiences the absence of happiness," for alpasaukhyavān, "one who possesses little happiness," while KK and VSP read instead [a]pi saukhyabhāk, "even though he is an enjoyer of happiness." Cr, not unexpectedly, attempts to minimize or localize Rāma's suffering. He explains that visaukhyabhāk, "enjoying the absence of happiness," should be understood to mean that even though he will enjoy extraordinary happiness, he will, because of the separation from his loved ones, be largely unhappy, that is to say, he will appear like one who is unhappy. This is certain. (visaukhyabhāg viśeṣasukhabhoktāpi rāmaḥ priyair viprayogaṃ prāpsyata ata eva rāmo 'pi duḥkhaprāyo duḥkhisadṛśo bhaviṣyati dṛḍhaṃ niścitam etat.)

"will abandon you and Maithilī as well as Śatrughna and Bharata" tvāṃ caiva maithilīṃ caiva śatrughnabharatau tathā / saṃtyajiṣyati: The commentators differ somewhat as to the circumstances under which Rāma can be said to abandon his various relatives. According to Ct, the abandonment of Lakṣmaṇa will take place when he has to go out [into exile] because of [Rāma's] conversation with Durvāsas (Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 95–96). The abandonment of Śatrughna and Bharata occurs when Rāma appoints them to establish the kingdoms of Mathurā (Madhura) (Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 55) and the gandharvas [Gāndhāra] (Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 91), respectively. (durvāsaḥsaṃbhāṣaṇanimittake niryāṇakāle lakṣmaṇatyāgaḥ. śatrughnabharatayos tu mathurārājyagandharvarājyayoḥ karaṇāya pratiṣṭhāpanam eva tyāgaḥ.) Cs believes that the abandonment of Bharata and Śatrughna took place when Rāma himself was banished to the forest. He notes that the abandonment of Sītā is the one they are currently discussing, while the abandonment of Lakṣmaṇa is his final abandonment, i.e., death, which follows on his abandonment, i.e., banishment because of Durvāsas. Cs then quotes Ct's commentary and observes that it is poorly stated since it does not conform to the theme of abandonment that causes suffering. (bharataśatrughnayos tyāgo vanavāsasamaye. tvāṃ maithilīṃ ca maithilyāḥ prastutas tyāgaḥ. lakṣmaṇasya svasmāt pūrvaṃ durvāsaso 'ntas tyāgāt tyāgaḥ. yat tu nāgojibhaṭṭena śatrughnabharatayos tu madhurārājyagandharvarājyayoḥ karaṇāya pratiṣṭhāpanaṃ tyāga ity uktam. paraṃtu tad duruktam. duḥkhakaratyāgaprastāvānanuguṇatvāt.) Ck gives an explanation of the abandonment of Bharata and Śatrughna that is similar to that of Ct, except that he assigns Bharata to the kingdom of Ayodhyā rather than to that of the gandharvas. He follows with an esoteric explanation according to which the two were established by means of a radiant kingship, owing to their being manifestations of Brahmā Virāṭ. As for Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa, Ck argues that they are universal sovereigns because they quintessentially consist of blazing energy. Therefore, they are pure in both essence and purpose. Then, when there is a departure to his own world, [that is] the Brahmaloka, on the part of him [i.e., Rāma] who is by his inherent nature the universal ruler, there is an abandonment of those two [that is, of Sītā and Lakṣmaṇa]. That is the esoteric matter that is to be expressed. That is the meaning. (śatrughnabharatayor madhurāyodhyayoḥ pratiṣṭhāpya niryāṇam eva tayos tyāgaḥ. anayor vairājatvā[?]rci[ī?]rājyena pratiṣṭhāpanaṃ. sītālakṣmaṇau saṃrājau tejastattvatvāt. atas tayor api śuddhārthasattvaṃ. svatattvasvarāṭsvapadabrahmalokaniryāṇe tyāga ity abhidheyam idam iti rahasyam ity arthaḥ.) Ñ2,V2,B1,D5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa tyajiṣyati, "he will abandon," for saṃtyajiṣyati, "[he] will relinquish altogether."

D5,G1,M1,2,4–9, and KK and VSP read ubhau, "both," for tathā, "as well." This is also the reading of Cv.

Pādas ef are a close variant of 7.50.13cd.

Following 11ab, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [912*]: "And, great-armed prince,[1] he will surely[2] experience separation from his loved ones (prāpsyate ca mahābāho viprayogaṃ priyair dhruvam)."

[1] "great-armed prince" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]." D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular mahābāhuḥ, "the great-armed [one]."

[2] "surely" dhruvam: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead drutam, "soon or shortly."

12. "And . . . I really should not tell . . . you" na tv idaṃ tvayi vaktavyam: Literally, "and this should not be told to you." Ck, Cm, Ct, and Cr all gloss "by you (tvayā)" for tvayi, "to [lit., 'in reference to'] you (tvayi)." This lends the line the sense "and you should not tell this even to Bharata." This interpretation, no doubt, is a result of these commentators reading the sequence vo 'vyāhṛtam, "[the king] did not tell you," as vo vyāhṛtam, "[the king] told you." (See below.) Obviously it would make no sense, given this reading, for Sumantra to say that he should not tell Lakṣmaṇa what Lakṣmaṇa had already been told by the king. D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a slightly different word order: idaṃ tvayi na vaktavyam.

"those words . . . which the king himself did not tell you" rājñā vo 'vyāhṛtaṃ vākyam: Literally, "what the king did not tell you." As several of the commentators point out, the king mentioned here would be the former king, Daśaratha. Ck and Cm note that what was told was concerning Rāma and the others (rājñā daśarathena vo yuṣmān rāmādīn prati vyāhṛtaṃ vākyam). GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all read the sequence as rājñā vo vyāhṛtaṃ vākyam. Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, Cr, and Cs, like the printed editions, read the sequence as rājñā vo vyāhṛtaṃ vākyam, "what the king told you." Cs notes that the words of Durvāsas were not to be divulged to the princes until this time because they would only make them unhappy. (he saumitre tvayi bharate 'pi na vaktavyam. asvāsthyāpādakatvāt. durvāsā yad uvāca vo yuṣmadviṣaye yad vyāhṛtaṃ rājñā tat tad idam.) Among the commentators consulted, only Cv explicitly identifies the reading vyāhṛtam as a variant and prefers the division of the words (padaccheda) as found in the critical edition. (vyāhṛtam iti pāṭhaḥ. avyāhṛtam iti padacchedaḥ.)

"uttered by Durvāsas" durvāsā yad uvāca ha: Literally, "what, indeed, Durvāsas, said." The well-known irascible seer Durvāsas was evidently the spokesman for the otherwise unnamed group of brahman soothsayers mentioned in verse 10 above.

13. In terms of the social history of class, it is interesting to note that although the text itself is silent on the subject, the principal concern of the majority of the commentators on this verse is how a relatively low-caste sūta like Sumantra could have come to know of the contents of a private communication between a great seer and the king. Ck prefaces his comments with the following introduction: " 'How did you come to know of the words of Durvāsas?' Sumantra's presumptive reply to this question is that he was in the presence of King Daśaratha and was not ejected from the meeting. (nanu durvāsovacanaṃ tvayā katham avagatam ity atrāhaṃ . . . daśarathasamīpe 'ham āsthito 'bhūvaṃ tadā mama caiva saṃnidhau mām aniṣkāsyety arthaḥ.)" Ct has a similar comment, but he uses the slightly more euphemistic phrase mām anutthāpyaiva, "without having me get up," in place of Ck's more explicit term aniṣkāsya, "not having ejected." Cg merely poses the question as to how Sumantra came to know of the sage's prediction (durvāsaso vacanaṃ kathaṃ tvayāgatam ity atrāha . . .). Cs poses a similar question and remarks that Sumantra's inclusion suggests both Daśaratha's immense compassion and Sumantra's trustworthiness (kathaṃ kathanaṃ durvāsodaśarathayos tvayā śrutam . . . etena purukaruṇāpadatayā svasyāptatvaṃ sūcitaṃ bhavati). This issue is perhaps reflected in the various commentators' representations of how many people are privy to the secret prediction. According to Cg, Ct, and Cs, only three people have thus far been privy to this information. The three would be Daśaratha, Vasiṣṭha, and, of course, Durvāsas himself. In other words, according to these commentators, Sumantra does not include himself among the [important] people who know about this. (etāvat paryantaṃ trayāṇām eva tad avagama iti bhāvaḥ—so Cs; Cg and Ct similarly.) Only Ck thinks of including Sumantra among those who know (evaṃ ca puruṣacatuṣṭayam etat vṛttāntaparijñam ity uktaṃ bhavati)." On the status of sūtas in the epic literature, see Dayal 2009, 2011.

"in . . . presence and that of the great king" mahārājasamīpe: Literally, "in the presence of the great king." Ŝ1,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahājanasamīpe, "in the presence of the great man." Ck and Ct analyze the compound mahājanaḥ as "he who has great people, that is, Daśaratha (mahānto janā yasya daśarathasya tasya . . . saṃnidhau)." Cg simply glosses, "The meaning is 'in the presence of Daśaratha' (daśarathasamīpa ity arthaḥ)." Cs glosses the term mahājanaḥ as "a person worthy of reverence, that is, a king (mahājanaḥ pūjāyogyo jano rājā)."

14. "you must never divulge this to anyone" na kvacid evaṃ te vaktavyaṃ janasaṃnidhau: Literally, "It must not be spoken by you in this fashion at any time in the presence of people."

15. "Mindful of that" tatsusamāhitaḥ: Literally, "intent upon that." Ct and Cs gloss, "I will be one whose mind is heedful or attentive (sāvadhānacitto bhaviṣyāmīti)." D6,7,T2, G1,3,M1,3,6,8, and KK and VSP read instead tatsusamāhitam, in which case the adjective must modify Daśaratha's words. Cg glosses, "entirely secret (samyagguptam)."

"it was my intention" iti me . . . darśanam: Literally, "such [was] my view." Normally, the terms means "sight, view, or opinion." We take the word darśanam in its sense of "intention," as do Ct and Cs, who gloss, "firm intention or determination (saṃkalpaḥ)." Cg glosses, "matam," which no doubt is used in the same sense here. Cr understands, "resolution or resolve (niścayaḥ)."

"gentle prince" saumya: Literally, "O gentle [one]."

16. "However, by no means should I leave this unsaid in your presence" sarvathā nāsty avaktavyaṃ mayā . . . tavāgrataḥ: Literally, "by all means, it is not to be unspoken by me before you." The reading of the critical edition, with its double negative indicating that Sumantra really must divulge this information to Lakṣmaṇa, is confined to only M manuscripts (M2,6,7,10). A few northern manuscripts (Ñ1,2V1,B4,D1–4) and Gorresio's edition (7.52.19) have no negative, yielding, like the double negative of the critical edition, the sense that Sumantra must divulge this information to Lakṣmaṇa (sarvathā tv eva vaktavyaṃ mayā saumya tavāgrataḥ = Gorresio 7.52.19). Gorresio (1870, pp. 178–79) renders, "Ma io debbo pur ora manifestar qui tutto al tuo cospetto." All other manuscripts and editions consulted read the line as a negative, showing Sumantra as violating his intention not to speak of these matters. D10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarvathaiva na vaktavyam mayā . . . tavāgrataḥ, lending the line the sense "By no means should it be spoken about by me before you."

"if you really want to hear it" yadi te śravaṇe śraddhā: Literally, "if there is of you curiosity or strong desire in respect to hearing." The word śraddhā normally means "faith or trust." But in this particular context, the term must be taken in its sense of "curiosity or strong desire." For the identical usage, see 7.51-3*.1 (= App. I, No. 8, line 83) and notes. The translators consulted are divided. Gorresio (1870, p. 179), who translates, "Se tu desideri udire"; Dutt (1894, p. 1732), who offers, "for thy curiosity hath been greatly excited"; and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 834), which reads, "but if you are eager (to know)," all interpret as we do. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 551) stretches the semantic range of śraddhā, "trust," to mean "trustworthiness, discretion." He renders, "si je puis me fier à ta discrétion." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 534), who offers, "if I can trust thy discretion," and Benoît (1999, p. 1343), who translates, "considérant que je puis avoir confiance en toi." Cr remarks on the awkward issue of why, after vowing to adhere to the orders of the king, Sumantra is violating them. Cr's interpretation is that, although he has vowed not to falsify the king's orders, he does so by all means, without hesitation, before Lakṣmaṇa. As Cr argues here, the suggestion is that the king's command is only meant to exclude potential listeners who are not endowed with faith in what they might hear. The secret, however, can be divulged in the presence of those who are extremely faithful. (ata eva tavāgrato 'pi mayā sarvathāvicāreṇāpīty arthaḥ. na vaktavyaṃ yadi śravaṇe te śraddhā tadā śruyatām etenāpi śraddhālusaṃnidhau vaktavyam eveti rājājñā sūcitā.) Cg understands that Sumantra is forbidden to divulge the king's secret only if Lakṣmaṇa is untrustworthy. (na vaktavyam iti. rājarahasyam iti śeṣaḥ. tavātiśraddhārahitasya.) Ck and Ct observe that Sumantra's intention here is that since Lakṣmaṇa is supremely trustworthy and is the king's son, revealing the secret to him for the purpose of dispelling the suffering of one who is suffering is not wrong, despite the late king's prohibition on divulging the secret before anyone (lakṣmaṇasya paramāptatvād rājaputratvāc ca janasaṃnidhāv eva narendreṇa pratiṣedhāc ca duḥkhitaduḥkhanivāraṇāya [Ct only] rahasyaprakaṭaṇe 'pi na doṣa iti sumantrāśayaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly).

17. "at that time" purā: Literally, "long ago or earlier."

"told me" aham . . . śrāvitaḥ: Literally, "I was caused to hear." Ñ1,V1,2,B1,4,D8,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead śrāvitam, in which case the adjective must be taken as "communicated or caused to be heard," modifying rahasyam, "secret."

"even so" tac cāpi: Ñ2,V2,B,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathāpi, "even so."

"fate" daivam: Ck, Cg, and Ct (quoting Ck) understand the term to refer to the force of one's prior actions (prācīnaṃ karma—so Cg; similarly Ck and Ct). Cr, however, understands the term to refer to the ineluctable desire of the Supreme Spirit, which he then takes as the object of the verb udāhariṣyāmi, "I will tell" (taṃ duratikramaṃ daivaṃ paramātmecchām udāhariṣyāmi).

Following verse 17, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [918*]: "[a fate] by means of which such a thing so filled with suffering and grief[1] has come about (yenedam īdṛśaṃ prāptaṃ duḥkhaśokasamanvitam)."

[1] "so filled with suffering and grief" duḥkhaśokasamanvitam: D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead duḥkhaṃ śokasamanvitam, lending the line the sense "suffering about accompanied by grief."

Following 918*, D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [919*]: "By you it should not [be divulged] even before Bharata or in the presence of Śatrughna (tvayā bharatasyāgre śatrughnasyāpi saṃnidhau)."

18. "he then said these words to the charioteer" sūtaṃ vākyam athābravīt: Literally, "he now spoke speech to the charioteer." D6,7,10,11 (in margin), and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sūtaṃ taṃ vākyam abravīt, "he spoke speech to that charioteer."

2. Vasiṣṭha will allude to the following account of Durvāsas's prophecy to Daśaratha when he attempts to console Rāma at 7.96.8–11.

"the great sage" mahāmuniḥ: The compound is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"passed the rainy season" sa vārṣikyam uvāsa ha: Literally, "he dwelt for the rainy season." Ś1,D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous vārṣikyaṃ samuvāsa ha. As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, Durvāsas is staying in the ashram in observance of the four-month-long period of restriction during the rainy season (vārṣikyaṃ varṣāsu bhavaṃ cāturmāsyaniyamam uddiśyovāsa—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly). Cv merely notes that this is the four-month-long period [of the rainy season] (cāturmāsyam). Ct continues, remarking that Durvāsas stays in one place in observance of the four-month-long prohibition on travel for ascetics during the rainy season (yatīnāṃ varṣākāle bhramaṇaniṣedhād vārṣikamāsacatuṣṭayam ekatraiva sthitavān ity arthaḥ).

3. "of immense blazing energy" mahātejāḥ: The term -tejāḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"his . . . purohita" purodhasam: Literally, "the purohita." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous purohitam. We render the term purodhas with its more commonly encountered synonym purohita.

4. "to the left of Vasiṣṭha" vasiṣṭhasya savye pārśve: Literally, "at the left side of Vasiṣṭha." Ś2 (first time),V2,B4,D6,7,9–11,T1,3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous compound savyapārśve," at the left side," for savye pārśve.

"humbly saluted" vinītas tv abhyavādayat: Literally, "and he, humble, respectfully greeted." D10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead the dual, vinītāv abhyavādayat, "he respectfully greeted the two humble [sages]." In this case, the adjective applies to the sages, which, given the all-but-invariable epic trope of the king's deference to the ascetic sage, seems highly improbable. KK and VSP read instead vinīto hy abhyavādayat, "indeed, he, humble, respectfully greeted." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

5. "he stayed" so 'py āste: Literally, "he, too, remained." D7,10,11,G2,M1,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead uvāsa, "he dwelt."

6. "around midday" madhyādityagate 'hani: Literally, "when the day had gone to the middle-sun." Cg glosses, "when the day was connected with the sun that had gone to the middle; this amounts to saying 'midday' (madhyādityagate madhyagatādityayukta ity arthaḥ. madhyāhna iti phalitārthaḥ—so Cg; Cv and Ct similarly)." Ck understands somewhat similarly but additionally analyzes the compound as a bahuvrīhi (madhyaṃ gata ādityo yasya tan madhyādityagatam).

7. "with his hands extended and cupped in reverence" prāñjaliḥ pragrahaḥ: Literally, "cupping his hands in reverence [and] extending [them]." The polysemic term pragraha, as at 7.47.10, is awkward to construe in the present context. The commentators offer a variety of glosses on the term pragrahaḥ, "extended." Ck, Cm, and Ct gloss, "with his arms raised (ūrdhvabāhuḥ)." Cr takes the word as a kind of compound consisting of an abbreviated adjective pra from prakṛṣṭa, "excellent," and the word graha, which he takes to mean "knowledge." Thus he takes pragraha as a bahuvrīhi compound in the sense "the one who possesses excellent knowledge, that is to say, Daśaratha." (prakṛṣṭo graho jñānaṃ yasya sa nṛpo daśarathaḥ.) Cg, whose interpretation seems to be at least contextually apposite, glosses, "with humility (savinayaḥ)." This phrase is used elsewhere in the Uttarakāṇḍa in the sense given here (see 7.47.10; 7.73.13; 7.90.15; and notes).

8. "how long" kiṃpramāṇena: Literally, "by what extent or measure?" The sequence -māṇena is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Cr glosses, "up until what time (kiyatkālaparyantam ity arthaḥ)?" Ct understands that Daśaratha is asking whether his lineage will last only through the lifetime of his sons or whether it will extend beyond that (kiṃpramāṇeṇa matputraparyantaṃ tato 'py adhikaṃ vā).

KK and VSP read the word kim as a separate interrogative marker. Cg glosses the term kim with the interrogative marker uta and explains, "The meaning is 'Will there be a greater extension than this?' (kiṃ pramāṇeṇa. uta tato 'py adhikapramāṇenety arthaḥ)."

9. "In keeping with my desire . . . please tell me" kāmyayā . . . brūhi: Literally, "according to desire, speak." The term kāmyayā, "by wish or desire," is ambiguous here as it can either refer to Daśaratha's desire to hear Durvāsas' prediction or serve as a polite encouragement to Durvāsas to speak if he so desires. We have followed the former interpretation in keeping with the interpretation of Cr, who glosses, "Through my desire, that is to say, through my wish, please tell the destiny of my lineage (mama kāmyayecchayā mama vaṃśasya gatiṃ brūhi)." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 528) translates, "Please tell me of the future of my family; I am eager to know," Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 835) translates, "I wish you may speak (predict)," and Benoît (1999, p. 1343) understands, "Satisfais ma curiosité, en me révélant ce que sera l'avenir de notre dynastie." Gorresio (7.53.10) reads the slight variant kāmaṃ me . . . brūhi, which he (1870, p. 180) renders as "Dimmi di grazia." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 552), possibly influenced by Gorresio, translates, "Aie la bonté . . . de me dire." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 535) simply follows Roussel, rendering, "Be so good as to tell me." Dutt (1894, p. 1733) ignores the term.

"What does the future hold for my lineage?" vaṃśasyāsya gatiṃ mama: Literally, "the progress or course of my lineage."

10. "the words that were spoken by King Daśaratha" vyāhṛtaṃ vākyaṃ rājño daśarathasya: Literally, "the words of King Daśaratha that were spoken."

Following verse 10, Ś1,D5–7,9–11,S (except M6) insert a passage of eighteen lines [App. I, No. 7]: "Listen your majesty, to what happened long ago. At that time, during the war between the gods and asuras, the daityas, being slaughtered[1] by the gods, took shelter with Bhṛgu's wife.[1–2] Given shelter by her, they dwelt there at that time, free from fear.[2][3] Seeing that they had been taken in by her, the foremost of the gods[3] was furious, and, with his sharp-edged discus, he cut off the head of Bhṛgu's wife.[4][4–5] Then, seeing that his wife had been slain, the foremost of the Bhṛgu clan,[5] furious, immediately cursed Viṣṇu, the destroyer of enemy hosts:[6][6–7] 'Since, you, Janārdana, distracted with anger, killed my wife, who should not have been killed,[7] you shall therefore be born in the world of men.[8–9] And there you shall experience separation from your wife for many years.[8]'[10] But, his mind afflicted because of his curse, he meditated in his innermost heart.[9][11] Oppressed by that curse, Bhṛgu praised that god.[12] Propitiated by his austerities, the god, who is loving toward his devotees, said:[13] 'And in order to please the worlds, having accepted the curse, I set you free.[10]'[14] Cursed in this fashion by Bhṛgu in a previous birth, that god of immense blazing energy has become your son, foremost of kings.[15–16] Famed as 'Rāma,' in the three worlds, O crusher of pride, he will reap the great fruit of Bhṛgu's curse.[17–18]"

[1] "being slaughtered" hanyamānāḥ: Ś1,D5,7,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhartsyamānāḥ (Cv—bhartsyamānam?), "being menaced or threatened."

[2] "free from fear" nirbhayāḥ: Ś1,D5,6,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the nearly synonymous abhayāḥ, "fearless."

[3] "the foremost of the gods" surottamaḥ: Ś1,D5–7,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sureśvaraḥ, "the lord of the gods." The reference is to Viṣṇu.

[4] "Bhṛgu's wife" bhṛgupatnīm: As Ct points out, this is the mother of the daityas' own purohita (Uśanas Kāvya or Śukrācārya). The story of her rescue and revival of the slaughtered asuras in the absence of her son, her subsequent beheading by Viṣṇu, and Bhṛgu's curse of Viṣṇu to undergo a series of avatāras is borrowed here from a purāṇic sources such as MatsyaP 47.94–113, PadmaP (ĀnSS) 2(Bhūkhaṇḍa).121. Here the story is condensed and modified to focus specifically on the life and suffering of the Rāmāvatara. See notes to 7.42.6–7. See, too, R. Goldman 1971; 1977, pp. 40–41, 80–81; and 1982.

[5] "the foremost of the Bhṛgu clan" bhṛgukulodvahaḥ: Literally, "the upholder or propagator of the Bhṛgu race or family." In this context, this would be Bhṛgu himself.

[6] "the destroyer of enemy hosts" ripubalārdanam: D7,10,11,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ripukulārdanam, "the destroyer of troops of enemies."

[7] "you . . . killed" hy avadhīḥ: Ś1,D5–7,10,11,T,G,M3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the verb avadhīḥ (vyavadhīḥ—Cv) without the pleonastic particle hi.

[8] Following line 10, M5 and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.51.17) and VSP (in brackets, numbered as 7.51.16) insert a passage of one line [1*]: "When he had thus pronounced that curse, recalling regretfully that it was Viṣṇu, he was disturbed[a] (evaṃ śapaṃ bhṛgur dattvā viṣṇoḥ smṛtvā ca vivyathe)."

[a] "recalling regretfully that it was Viṣṇu, he was disturbed" viṣṇoḥ smṛtvā ca vivyathe: KK and VSP read vaibhavam, "grandeur or greatness," for vivyathe, lending the phrase the sense "and having remembered Viṣṇu's grandeur."

[9] "But, his mind afflicted because of his curse . . . in his innermost heart" śāpābhihatacetās tu ātmanā: Note the hiatus. KK and VSP read instead śāpābhihatacetāḥ saḥ, "he, with mind afflicted because of the curse, for śāpābhihatacetās tu, "but his mind afflicted because of the curse." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read svātmanā, "his own innermost heart," for ātmanā. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

Following line 11, D6,T1,2,G1,3,M3, and KK (in brackets, numbered as 7.51.17–21) insert a passage of twelve lines [2*]: "And again, that seer, infatuated with arrogance, resorted to a curse.[a][1] Ignorant of Viṣṇu's power, he fainted because of that curse. He was unconscious for a long time, shrouded in the blinding darkness of that curse.[2–3] And upon seeing him,[b] the seven seers were filled with compassion because of their devotion.[c][4] Unable to escape his own curse,[d] Bhṛgu arose once more and faintly said: 'Protect me from this curse, most excellent seers,[e] since you are standing before me.'[5–6] And when those supreme seers had heard Bhṛgu's words, they said to him:[7] 'With hymns of praise, O you of excellent vows, you must throw yourself at the feet of Nārāyaṇa, who is praised night and day by Brahmā, Īśa, Śakra, and the rest, who themselves are worthy of praise.'[8–9] Propitiated by Bhṛgu, Viṣṇu came to Bhṛgu at once.[f][10] 'Have no fear, Bhṛgu. The words of you, a twice-born sage, can never be false.[g] In freeing you from the curse, I have accepted it.[h][11–12]' "

[a] "infatuated with arrogance, resorted to a curse" yayau śāpam . . . durmadadurmadaḥ: Literally, "he, intoxicated or arrogant with intoxication or arrogance, went to a curse." KK reads instead yayau tāpam, "he experienced anguish." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[b] "And . . . him" cainam: D6,G3, and KK read instead caivam, "And thus."

[c] "because of their devotion" bhaktibhiḥ: Literally, "through devotions." G1,3, and KK read instead bhaktitaḥ, "because of or from devotion."

[d] "Unable to escape his own curse" saktaśāpaḥ: Literally, "having an attached curse." G1,3, and KK read instead tyaktaśāpaḥ, "one by whom a curse had been released (i.e., uttered)."

[e] "Protect me . . . most excellent seers" rakṣadhvam ṛṣayaḥ śreṣṭhāḥ: Literally, "protect, O most excellent seers." G1,3, and KK read instead rakṣadhvaṃ māṃ muniśreṣṭhāḥ, "protect me, O foremost of sages."

[f] "at once" tvaritam: KK reads instead prāha tam. This lends the half line the sense "came and said to that Bhṛgu." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[g] "The words of you, a twice-born sage, can never be false." anṛtaṃ vākyaṃ nābhaviṣyad dvijasya te: Literally, "The speech of you, a twice-born one, would not be false." KK reads anṛtaṃ vākyaṃ na bhaviṣyati te dvija, "the speech of you, O twice-born [one], will not be false." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[h] "In freeing you from the curse, I have accepted it." saṃmocayitvā śāpāt tvām aham enaṃ gṛhītavān: KK reads instead saṃmocayasi pāpān mām aham enaṃ gṛhītavān, "You are freeing me from this sin [of killing a woman], and so I have accepted it [the curse]." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[10] "And in order to please the worlds, having accepted the curse, I set you free." lokānāṃ saṃpriyārthaṃ tu taṃ śāpaṃ gṛhya muktavān: T1,G2,M1,10, and KK, and VSP read instead lokānāṃ saṃhitārthaṃ tu taṃ śāpaṃ grāhyam uktavān, "For the benefit of the world, I declare that this curse must be accepted." Ck, Cg, and Ct analyze the rather opaque term saṃhitārtham as "for the sake of producing proper [sam] benefit [hita] for the worlds in the form of the destruction of Rāvaṇa (lokānāṃ saṃhitārthaṃ samyagrāvaṇavadharūpahitasaṃpādanārtham—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)." Ct provides an interesting discussion of this verse. Like the other commentators, he understands that Viṣṇu will accept the curse for the benefit of the world through the destruction of Rāvaṇa, etc. His discussion of the curse, which occurred in a previous birth, however, adds a new dimension to this episode. Like Ck and Cg, he understands the previous birth to have been a prior incarnation of Viṣṇu as Upendra, the son of Kaśyapa [i.e., the vāmanāvatāra, or dwarf incarnation]. But he also understands the statement that he [Viṣṇu] was cursed by Bhṛgu in a previous life to refer to a future curse by a seer of that gotra. But here, too, according to Ct, it is suggested that the reference is to this particular embodiment of the Lord, i.e., as Rāma. Ct then quotes what he claims is a passage from the Padmapurāṇa according to which Rāma summons Lakṣmaṇa and imparts to him the secret concerning the abandonment of Sītā. He then tells Lakṣmaṇa that he himself had been cursed by a Bhṛgu, that is to say, by Vālmīki, and that this curse was the reason for his abandonment of Sītā and not [the gossip of] the people. Ct notes that it is said that Vālmīki is a member of the Bhṛgu lineage because of his being known as Prācetasa. Ct concludes by remarking that he himself has discussed this matter at length in the introduction to the poem in his comments to Bālakāṇḍa 2.14 [mā niṣāda]. [There, in subjecting Vālmīki's curse to a variety of interpretations, Ct argues that Vālmīki is cursing Viṣṇu to suffer prolonged separation from his wife for having killed one of the pair of mating krauñca birds or one of the pair of Rāvaṇa and Mandodarī.] (lokānāṃ bhūrādīnām. saṃpriyārthaṃ samyagrāvaṇavadhādirūpapriyasaṃpādanārtham. taṃ śāpaṃ manuṣyatvādiprāpakaṃ gṛhyam aṅgīkāryam eva svasyoktavān. iti śapta uktaprakāreṇa śaptaḥ pūrvajanmani kaśyapaputrarūpopendrāvatāre. atra pūrvajanmani bhṛguṇā śapta ity uktvā tadvaṃśyarṣiśāpo bhāvī. atrāpi śarīre bhagavataḥ sūcitaḥ. sa pādme darśitaḥ—āhūya lakṣmaṇaṃ prāha rāmo rājīvalocanaḥ / śṛṇu me vacanaṃ guhyaṃ sītāsaṃtyāgakāraṇam // vālmīkinātha bhṛguṇā śapto 'smi kila lakṣmaṇa / tasmād enāṃ tyajāmy adya jano naivātra kāraṇam // iti. vālmīker api prācetasatvād bhṛguvaṃśyatvena bhṛghutvam astīti vadanti. etac ca nirūpitaṃ bālakāṇḍe vistareṇāsmābhir granthopakrame mā niṣāda iti śloke.) The passage quoted by Ct is not found in either the ĀnSS or the VSP version of the Padmapurāṇa. In fact, the Padma twice mentions the separation. In one passage Rāma blames the people of Ayodhyā (1.36.10 ĀnSS), and in the other Rāma merely says that Sītā has abandoned him (māṃ tyaktvā—5.36.117–118 ĀnSS). See Bālakāṇḍa 2.14 and notes. See, too, R. Goldman 1976. Cr, as usual in this kāṇḍa, has an elaborate reinterpretation designed to spare Rāma any negative experiences, including, in this case, the curse of Bhṛgu, which Cr argues was actually directed at Bharata. He argues that it was Viṣṇu who was famed in the three worlds (line 17) in his form as Bharata, who became Daśaratha's son near the time of Rāma's birth. He makes this out by reading "rāma iti" in line 17 as rāme iti. Cr derives his authority for this from a verse he quotes without attribution. The verse says that Bharata is the lord of Vaikuṇṭha and Lakṣmaṇa is the lord of the ocean of milk (presumably in the form of Śeṣa), while Śatrughna himself is [the lord of] the earth, and all of them have come to serve Rāma. Therefore, Rāma will receive the great fruit created by Bhṛgu's curse in that he will be the ruler of the visible (i.e., earthly) Ayodhyā for a long time. By this is suggested that in order to enjoy, that is, take, the suffering of Bharata caused by the curse of Bhṛgu directed at the latter, Rāma underwent exile in the Daṇḍaka forest and abandoned Sītā. (pūrvajanmani janmanaḥ pūrvasamaye bhṛguṇā śapto viṣṇur uktavān iti hetos triṣu lokeṣv abhivikhyāto viṣṇur bharata ity artho rāme rāmajanmasaṃnidhau tava putratvam ihāyodhyāyāṃ gataḥ prāptas tatra pramāṇaṃ—vaikuṇṭheśas tu bharataḥ kṣīrābdhīśas tu lakṣmaṇaḥ / śatrughnas tu svayaṃ bhūmā rāmasevārtham āgatāḥ // ityādy ata eva bhṛguśāpakṛtaṃ mahat phalaṃ prāpsyate rāmas tu dīrghakālaṃ bahukālaparyantam ayodhyādhipatiḥ prakaṭāyodhyāpālako bhaviṣyati. etena bharatoddeśyakabhṛguśāpahetukabharataduḥkhabhogārtham api rāmasya daṇḍakāraṇyavivāsanaṃ sītātyāgaś ceti sūcitam.) See notes to 7.43.1.

11. "his younger brothers" asya cānujāḥ: Literally, "and his younger brothers." Ś1,2,D5,6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead asya ye 'nugāḥ, "and those who are his followers."

Following 11ab, T1,2,M3, and KK (in brackets, between 7.51.26ab and cd) and VSP (in brackets, between 7.51.22ab and cd) insert a passage of one line [926*]: "And he will experience separation from his wife there for a long time (tatra patnīviyogaṃ ca dīrghakālaṃ gamiṣyati /)."

[1] "he will experience separation from his wife" patnīviyogam . . . gamiṣyati: Literally, "he will go to separation from his wife."

12. Ś,V1,D1,2,4–12,S omit this verse. The grounds for admitting this verse to the critical text are unclear. Following the principles established for the critical edition, this verse should be relegated to the apparatus. See Introduction, "Text," pp. 199–205. See Bhatt 1960, p. xxxiv, for the principles established for the construction of the critical text. Compare, for example, the textual evidence for 927* below, following notes to verse 14.

Pādas bc are a close variant of 7.49.11ef.

13. This verse = 1.1.76. See Bālakāṇḍa 1.76 and notes.

"for eleven thousand years" daśa varṣasahasrāṇi daśa varṣaśatāni ca: Literally, "for ten thousand years and one thousand years." On the vexed issue of the length of Rāma's reign, see 6.116.82,90; 7.41.17; and notes.

"the Brahmaloka" brahmalokam: The idea that Rāma, at the conclusion of his incarnation, will go to the Brahmaloka has puzzled commentators and has given rise to various theories about the Vaiṣṇava nature of Rāma among scholars, who saw this verse as evidence that Rāma was not originally identified with Viṣṇu (see R. Goldman 1984, p. 43).

Commentators explain the fact that Viṣṇu goes or appears to go to the Brahmaloka in various ways. Ck and Ct argue that by brahmaloka is meant the world of Hiraṇyagarbha (brahmalokaṃ hiraṇyagarbhasya lokam ity arthaḥ—so Ck). Ct continues and identifies this with Vaikuṇṭha, or the heaven of Viṣṇu, which he claims is one and the same place. (brahmalokaṃ hiraṇyagarbhasya lokaṃ vaikuṇṭham. tasyāpi hiraṇyagarbhalokaika-deśatvam iti bhāva—so Ct). Cr simply glosses, "Sāketa (sāketam)," which is a name for the heavenly city of Ayodhyā, where Rāma rules eternally. Cs offers three interpretations of the term. First, he sees the compound brahmalokam as actually consisting of two words: brahman, "Brahman (the Supreme Spirit)," and loka, "world." In this interpretation, the term brahman refers to Rāma because of his being non-different from the Supreme Spirit (brahman). The word "world" refers to Rāma's own world, that is, Vaikuṇṭha. In Cs's second interpretation, the compound refers to the world of the four-faced deity Brahmā. Cs supports this second interpretation with a quote from the master (i.e., Madhva), to the effect that the Supreme Lord (i.e., Viṣṇu) was lauded in the assembly of Brahmā. In the third interpretation, the term refers to the "place" of the universal Supreme Spirit (brahman). This interpretation is supported by a citation that appears to be a continuation of the first (Madhva's MBhTN 9.116cd–117ab). (*brahmalokam iti padadvayam. brahma tadabhinno rāmaḥ. lokaṃ svalokaṃ vaikuṇṭham. brahmaṇaś caturmukhasya lokam iti vā. 14. "Kākutstha" kākutsthaḥ: Ś1,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the redundant bahuśaḥ, "many." Cs, the only commentator to attempt to resolve the redundancy, glosses, "whose felicity is complete (pūrṇasukhaḥ)."

"conqueror of enemy citadels" parapuraṃjayaḥ: Ś1,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead paramadurjayaḥ, "supremely invincible."

"aśvamedhas" hayamedhaiḥ: The term hayamedha, "horse sacrifice," is a common alternative to the term aśvamedha. See 1.11.8; 1.17.1; 7.75.3; 7.76.21; 7.77.19; 7.81.17,20; and 7.83.9,10. On the aśvamedha, see notes to 7.75.2.

"he will establish many royal lineages" rājavaṃśān . . . bahūn saṃsthāpayiṣyati: Ct notes that Rāma will accomplish this through the sons of Lakṣmaṇa, etc. This, Ct argues, virtually indicates that Rāma's sons will also be long-lived. (lakṣmaṇādiputradvāreti bhāvaḥ. etena rāmaputrāṇām api cirajīvitvam uktaprāyam eva.) Cs understands that Rāma will establish many other royal lineages, each in its own kingdom; otherwise, he says, this is an esoteric discourse. Cs also glosses the term rājavaṃśān as "lineages of the king, that is to say, of you, i.e., Daśaratha. And those lineages will be generated by the sons of Bharata, etc. (rājavaṃśān itararājavaṃśān bahūn saṃsthāpayiṣyati svasvarājye. athavā pārokṣyena nirdeśo 'yam. rājñas tava vaṃśān bharatādisutadvārā.)"

Following verse 14, Ś1,D5–7,10,11,T,G,M1–7,9,10 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while M8 inserts before 11, a passage of one line [927*]: "And Rāghava will have two sons with Sītā (dvau putrau tu bhaviṣyete sītāyāṃ rāghavasya tu)."

Following 927*, D5,M3, and KK and VSP (M3, KK, and VSP transpose lines 1 and 2) insert, while Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,2,D1–4,6–12,T,G,M1,2,4–10 insert following verse 17, a passage of two lines [930*]: "And according to the words of the sage, Rāghava will consecrate the two sons of Sītā, but elsewhere, not in Ayodhyā[1] (sītāyāś ca tataḥ putrāv abhiṣekṣyati rāghavaḥ / anyatra na tv ayodhyāyāṃ munes tu vacanaṃ yathā //)."

[1] "And according to the words of the sage, Rāghava will consecrate the two sons of Sītā, but elsewhere, not in Ayodhyā." sītāyāś ca tataḥ putrāv abhiṣekṣyati rāghavaḥ / anyatra na tv ayodhyāyāṃ munes tu vacanaṃ yathā //: On Rāma's establishing Lava and Kuśa in cities other than Ayodhyā, see 7.97.17–19 and 7.98.3–6. M3 and KK and VSP transpose lines 1 and 2 and read the lines together with 927* ["And Rāghava will have two sons with Sītā (dvau putrau tu bhaviṣyete sītāyāṃ rāghavasya tu)"]. KK (7.51.29–30) reads this as one and a half ślokas and VSP (7.51.25), as a three-line verse. M3 and KK and VSP read satyam etan na saṃśayaḥ for munes tu vacanaṃ yathā, "And according to the words of the sage." The three lines taken together with the transposition then yield the somewhat different sense "And Rāghava will have two sons with Sītā [927*] but not in Ayodhyā, somewhere else. This is the truth, there is no doubt.[930*, line 2] Then Rāghava will consecrate the two sons of Sītā.[930*, line 1]"

15. "that sage . . . of . . . tremendous radiance" mahādyutiḥ: Literally, "that one of tremendous radiance." GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāmuniḥ, "the great sage." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"the" asya: Ś1,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āha, "he said."

16. "Then . . . sage" munau . . . tadā: Ś,D6,7,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP transpose these two words.

"those two great sages" mahātmānau: Literally, "the two great [ones]."

17. "All this will not prove otherwise." nānyathā tad bhaviṣyati: Literally, "that will not be otherwise."

Following verse 17, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,2,D1–4,6–12,T,G,M1,2,4–10, insert, while D5,M3, and KK and VSP (M3 and KK and VSP transpose lines) insert following verse 927*, a passage of two lines [930*]. See notes to verse 14 above.

18. "Such being the case" evaṃ gate: Literally, "when it has gone thus." Cr glosses, "when this is understood (evaṃ gate jñāte sati)."

"you must not be tormented" na saṃtāpaṃ gantum arhasi: Literally, "you must not go to pain." Ś1,Ñ2,V2,3,B,D1–7,9–11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kartum for gantum, lending the phrase the literal meaning "you must not make pain." See 7.49.1 and notes, where the same idiom is used.

"Rāghava" rāghava: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

19. "When Lakṣmaṇa had heard" tac chrutvā: Literally, "having heard that." Ś1,D6,7, 10,11,G2,M8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śrutvā tu, "And having heard." See Cr's comments below.

"he experienced unequaled delight" praharṣam atulaṃ lebhe: Cr notes that we should supply the name "Lakṣmaṇa" as the subject here and then goes on to argue that in saying Lakṣmaṇa experienced delight, the poet suggests that Lakṣmaṇa realizes that the grief displayed by Rāma and Sītā is not real because through their omniscience they would have known that all of this was inevitable. This, in turn, Cr continues, suggests that Lakṣmaṇa is happy because of their happiness. (atulaṃ praharṣaṃ lebhe lakṣmaṇa iti śeṣaḥ praharṣaṃ lebha ity anena sītārāmayoḥ sarvajñatvād etaj jñānasyāpy āvaśyakatvena tayor vāstavaḥ śoko nāstīti sūcitam. tena lakṣmaṇasya tatsukhasukhitvaṃ vyañjitam.)

20. "the two" tayoḥ: Ś,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "then."

"the sun set" astam arko gataḥ: Literally, "the sun went to setting or to the western mountain." Ś1,D6,7,10,11,M1,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead astam arke gate, "when the sun had set." See, too, 7.26.1; 7.36.42; 7.72.21; and notes.

"beside the Gomatī" gomatyām: Literally, "at or on the Gomatī." The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś1,Ñ,V,B1,3,4,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead keśinyām, "on or at the Keśinī." Cr understands this to be the name of a river that is near the Gomatī (keśinyāṃ tadabhidhanadītīre gomatīsamīpa ity arthaḥ). Ck, in his comments to 7.51.1, identifies the Keśinī (v.l. Kaiśikī) as "some river (kācin nadī)." Ct quotes Ck to this effect (keśinī kācin nadīti katakaḥ). Cs, in his comments to 7.51.1, notes: "Some people say that the Keśinī is the name of a river, while others say that it is the name of a village (keśinīti kecana nadīṃ kecana grāmaṃ ca pracakṣate)." Concerning the Gomatī River, see notes to 7.45.17.

1. "beside the Gomatī" gomatyām: Ś1,Ñ,V1,2,B,1,2,4,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead keśinyām, "beside the Keśinī." There is no apparent reason why the variant gomatyām has not been marked as uncertain, as it was in 7.50.20, where the textual evidence is nearly identical. Concerning the Gomatī River, see notes to 7.45.17.

3. "thinking": The verse provides no term to mark the quotation. The word has been added for the sake of readability.

"Once I get there" ahaṃ gataḥ: Literally, "I who have gone." Cr reads the dangling participle with Saumitri so that the two terms frame the entire verse. He glosses, "When Saumitri had reached Ayodhyā (gato 'yodhyāṃ prāptaḥ)."

5. "the foremost of men" narottamaḥ: D5,T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead rathottamāt, "from that splendid chariot," which would then construe with the gerund avatīrya, "having descended."

"his face downcast, his mind distressed" avāṅmukho dīnamanāḥ: On the use of these two adjectives together, see notes to 7.43.11.

"unhindered" anivāritaḥ: Compare 7.43.3 and notes for a similar usage.

7. "Rāma's feet" caraṇau tasya: Literally, "his two feet."

"and then composing himself" susamāhitāḥ: Literally, "well composed."

8. "I have abandoned" visṛjya: Literally, "having abandoned."

"as was specified" yathoddiṣṭe: Literally, "as was instructed." The participle uddiṣṭe agrees with the locative āśrame, "in or near the ashram."

"beautiful" śubhe: KK and VSP read instead śucau, "pure or holy."

"Now I have returned again" punar asmy āgataḥ: Literally, "I am [one who has] come again." Ś1,Ñ2,V1,2,B1,2,4,D5–7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read [punar] api, "once again," for punar asmi, "again I am."

Following 8cd, Ś1,Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11,T1, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [933*]: "and [having abandoned] her—the illustrious one of pure conduct—there at the outskirts of the ashram (tatra tāṃ ca śubhācārām āśramānte yaśasvinīm)."

9. "the course of fate" kālasya gatiḥ: Literally, "the movement of time or fate." Here the polysemic term kāla is best taken in its sense of "fate or destiny."

"men like you . . . never grieve" tvadvidhā na . . . śocanti: Literally, "those of your kind do not grieve."

"strong" sattvavantaḥ: Ś1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the somewhat redundant buddhimantaḥ, "intelligent."

10. This verse is found in many other places. See, for example, 2.98.16 and notes. See, too, notes to 7.96.2. See also MBh 11.2.3; 12.27.29; 12.317.20; and 14.44.18. See also GaruḍaP 1.115.6; Nāradīyapurāṇa 1.61.36; Avadānaśataka 92.1; Divyāvadāna 17.6–7; 63.16–17; 428.25–26; and Saṅgabhedavastu 1.57; etc. See Kane 1973, vol. 4, p. 237.

Following verse 10, Ś1,D5–7,10,11,S insert a passage of two lines [934*]: "Therefore, one should not be overly attached to one's sons, one's wives, one's friends, and one's wealth, for separation from them is certain (tasmāt putreṣu dāreṣu mitreṣu ca dhaneṣu ca / nātiprasaṅgaḥ kartavyo viprayogo hi tair dhruvam //)."

11. The commentators interpret their reading of the verse along the standard lines of discourse on self-control. Ct believes that the verse is intended to teach Rāma that through a reflection of his true [divine] nature [he would see that] he should not grieve (nijasvarūpaparyālocanāyāpi śoko na kārya iti). He sums up the sense of the verse as follows: "O Kākutstha, you are able to control all the worlds, that is to say, in your form as the innermost spirit, you are able to discipline; what then need be said of your ability to restrain your grief? (he kākutstha, sarvalokāṃś ca vinetuṃ antaryāmirūpeṇa śikṣituṃ samarthas tvam ātmanaḥ śokaṃ nivārayituṃ samartha iti kiṃ vaktavyam)." Ck and Cg understand the message to be that Rāma is able to ward off the suffering of worldly life (sāṃsārikaduḥkhād vārayitum ity arthaḥ). Cv, who reads vijetum with the critical edition (see below), glosses, "'vijetum' means 'to ignore,' and it amounts to saying 'to abandon (vijetum upekṣituṃ tyaktum iti yāvat).'"

"Through your mind alone, you are able to conquer yourself by yourself" śaktas tvam ātmanātmānaṃ vijetuṃ manasaiva hi: Ś1,D10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead śaktas tvam ātmanātmānaṃ vinetuṃ manasā manaḥ, "You are able to discipline the self with the self and the mind with the mind." T1,3,G2,3,M3,5,10, and KK, and VSP read vinetum, "to discipline," for vijetum, "to conquer."

"What then to say about suffering such as this?" kiṃ punar duḥkham īdṛśam: Literally, "how much more [easily] such suffering?" Ś1,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G2,M8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kiṃ punaḥ śokam ātmanaḥ (ātmajam G2,M8,10, Ck), "how much more [your] own sorrow."

12. Following 12ab, Ś1,V2,B,D5–7,10,11,T1,2,G,M, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [936*]: "That same criticism of you will assuredly return, Rāghava (apavādaḥ sa kila te punar eṣyati rāghava)."

Following verse 12, Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,D1–7,9–11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [939*]: "That malicious rumor in the city, your majesty, will arise [again] without a doubt (so 'pavādaḥ pure rājan bhaviṣyati na saṃśayaḥ)."

Several of the commentators, reading 12cd ("on account of which Maithilī was abandoned out of fear of malicious rumors, your majesty [yad arthaṃ maithilī tyaktā apavādabhayān nṛpa]") with 939*, understand the idea to be that malicious rumors, the fear of which led to Rāma's abandoning Sītā, will only come back to haunt him in a different form if it is perceived that he is now grieving for her. Ct, who slightly paraphrases a portion of Ck's commentary, puts it most clearly and succinctly. He explains: "O king, the purpose for which you, fearful of malicious rumors, abandoned Sītā, that is, in order to quell those rumors, those very rumors, O king, will arise in a different form. That is to say, that [people will say]: 'Having abandoned that woman who lived in the house of another man, he now constantly mourns for her.' Of this, there is no doubt. As Kataka (Ck) explains: 'In the city, that is, in the city of the gods, etc., there will be this criticism: "Like some common person, Rāma abandoned a woman even though 1) she was pregnant, 2) Agni, etc., had testified to her innocence, and 3) he himself had witnessed her purification." All of that [should be] disregarded because it does not lead to the abandonment of sorrow.' (he nṛpa! apavādabhayād bhītena tvayā yadarthaṃ yadapavādanivṛttaye sītā tyaktā so 'pavādaḥ. he rājan! paragṛhoṣitāṃ striyaṃ tyaktvā sarvadā tām evānuśocatīti prakārāntareṇa sa bhaviṣyati nātra saṃśayaḥ. yat tu katakenāgnyādinā śuddhatvenoktāṃ svayaṃ dṛṣṭaśuddhiṃ garbhiṇīm api rāmaḥ prākṛtavad visṛṣṭavān iti pure devādipure 'pavādo bhaviṣyatīti vyākhyātaṃ tat tu śokatyāgānupapādakatayopekṣitam)."

13. "this feeble mental state" imāṃ durbalāṃ buddhim: Literally, "this weak mind or intellect." Ct glosses, "Give up the mental attitude of grief (śokabuddhiṃ tyaja)." Ck understands that the term buddhi here refers to Rāma's intense suffering. The meaning, he explains, is that Rāma should have no mental state of suffering that has as its foundation the rumors of the people (imāṃ buddhim iti duṣpīḍā nāsya [duṣpīḍām asya?] lokavādamūladuḥkhabuddhim ity arthaḥ). The grammar of Ck in the transcription available to us is awkward to construe. The critical editors propose emending Ck to make the grammar more transparent. Thus, they suggest reading duṣpīḍām asya for duṣpīḍā nāsya, lending Ck's gloss the sense "The meaning of the expression 'this mental state (imāṃ buddhim)' is 'his mental state,' which is extremely painful (duṣpīdām), and which has suffering that has as its foundation the rumors of the people." Ñ2,B1–3, and KK and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous pronoun enām for imām, "this."

"You must not torment yourself." saṃtāpaṃ mā kuruṣva: Literally, "Do not make pain." See 7.49.1; 7.50.18; and notes, where similar phrases are used.

14. "And" tu: Ś1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saḥ, "he."

"Saumitri, who was so loving to his friends" saumitriṃ mitravatsalam: This is yet another example of the echoing etymological epithets of which the poet is so fond. For a similar epithet, see 7.45.4–5. For other alliterative epithets of Lakṣmaṇa, see notes to 7.43.2. Ś1,Ñ,B2,3,D2,6,7,10,11,G1,2,M2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular mitravatsalaḥ, which then modifies Rāma.

15. "Lakṣmaṇa, best of men . . . hero" naraśreṣṭha . . . lakṣmaṇa . . . vīra: Ct, apropos this verse, and Cm, apropos verse 16, note the plethora of vocatives directed toward Lakṣmaṇa and attribute it to an abundance of respect (he lakṣmaṇa! vīra saumya lakṣmaṇety ādareṇa bahuśaḥ saṃbodhanam—so Cm and Ct). Cs goes to some lengths to explain the precise connotation of each of the three vocatives with which Rāma addresses Lakṣmaṇa. He says that the term naraśreṣṭha, "best of men," suggests Rāma's respect for Lakṣmaṇa as a result of the return of his own natural state of mind by means of Lakṣmaṇa's use of worldly wisdom [in verses 9–13]. The use of the name Lakṣmaṇa suggests his [Lakṣmaṇa's] immediate connection to the cause of [Rāma's] cheerfulness through being his brother. The term vīra, "hero," suggests that [in acting] together with Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa's heroic skill was demonstrated through his causing the death of Indrajit, etc., because of his being the cause of the carrying out of whatever he was told [to do]. Thus, Cs concludes, the triad of vocative expressions is truly meaningful. (naraśreṣṭhety anena lokadṛṣṭyā svabuddhipratyāvartanagauravaṃ sūcayati. lakṣmaṇeti bhrātṛtvena svasaumukhyakaraṇānubandhaḥ sūcyate. vīrety anena svena sahendrajidādivadhakaraṇapradarśitavīryadākṣiṇyam uktānuṣṭhānahetutayā sūcitam. ataḥ sārthakaṃ saṃbodhanatrayam.)

"with regard to my command as to what had to be done" mama kāryānuśāsane: Cg glosses, "what you did in the form of abandonment on the bank of the Ganges (gaṅgātīratyāgarūpe tvatkṛte)." Ct glosses, "with respect to the carrying out of what needed to be done for the protection of the people (prajārakṣaṇakāryasyānuṣṭhāne)."

16. "You have brought me happiness, gentle brother" nirvṛtiś ca kṛtā saumya: Literally, "happiness has been made, gentle [one]." Cg glosses nirvṛtiḥ as "happiness (sukham)." The words kṛtā and saumya are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś1,Ñ,B1,3,V1,3,D1,3–7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nivṛttiś cāgatā saumya, "cessation or repose has come, gentle [one]," while M6 and KK and VSP read nirvṛtiś cāgatā saumya, "happiness has come, gentle [one]." Ck and Ct want to understand that "the cessation (nivṛttiḥ)" is the cessation of the mental state of suffering (duḥkhabuddher iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck)." Cs understands the line somewhat idiosyncratically. He breaks up the sequence cāgatā as ca agatā, "and has not come," and interprets nivṛttiḥ as "separation from Sītā." Thus he interprets: "Cessation, that is, separation from Sītā, has not come, that is, has not reached me, that is to say, that she is still close by. Therefore, [my] torment is banished. (nivṛttiḥ sītāvirahaḥ. agatā māṃ na prāptā. sā samīpe vartata eva. ataḥ saṃtāpaś ca nirākṛtāḥ.)"

"by your very sweet words" bhavadvākyaiḥ sumadhuraiḥ: Ś1,Ñ2,B1,3,D1,3,4,9,T3,4, M2,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read suruciraiḥ, "very splendid or charming," for sumadhuraiḥ, "very sweet."

Sarga 51-1 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 1–48*

Sargas 51.1*–51.7* have been relegated to Appendix I, No. 8, lines 1–302, by the editor of the critical edition. These lines are found in all recensions collated for the critical edition and all printed editions consulted. Therefore, we have emended the critical text and included the passage, broken into sargas as it appears in the Appendix. It should be noted that Ś1 reads lines 1–64, but they are written in a different hand, while Ś2 and Ś3 omit lines 1–58. D8 and D12 omit lines 1–63. If all of the Ś manuscripts were to omit these first lines, there would be no doubt about their exclusion from the critical text. But Ś1 technically shows them, and one might argue that since they are represented in Ś, they should be included. On the other hand, this argument is weakened by the fact that they are written in a second hand and because "Ś2 is superior in value than Ś1" (Shah 1975, p. 5). Thus, a more conservative interpretation would relegate these 58 lines to an appendix. Compare, however, the evidence found in the apparatus for sarga 51, which shows identical evidence (Ś1 reads in second hand, while Ś2,3,D8,12 omit; this evidence is also identical for 7.50.17–20), but there are no doubts raised as to its inclusion in the critical text. However, lines 63–82, describing Nṛga's cave-palace, are known to all manuscripts and editions and should properly be included in the critical text. See S. Goldman 2015a and 2015b and Introduction, "Text," pp. 212–13.

Sarga 51.1* = App. I, No. 8, lines 1–48 = Lahore 7.55.1–25; Gorresio 7.55; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.53.

The story of King Nṛga occurs also at Mahābhārata 13.69.1–33 and Bhāgavatapurāṇa 10.64.1–30. See S. Goldman 2015a and Introduction, "Text," p. 213. See, too, Brockington 1984, pp. 231–32, note 9, and MBh 13.6.38c, 69; 13.71.2; 14.93.47.

2. "especially in these days" asmin kāle viśeśataḥ: Literally, "at this time especially." Note the pessimistic tone of Rāma's discourse, which seems quite at variance with the notion of the utopian era of the Rāmarājya as mentioned in the Bāla- and Yuddhakāṇḍas (see 1.1.71–74 and 6.116.82–90). The Uttarakāṇḍa, too, has a brief description of the Rāmarājya (7.40.13–17). See, too, Introduction, "Work," pp. 145–46, where the perfection of Rāma's kingship is discussed. Cr glosses, "in these times that give rise to the appearance of misfortunes (asmin vipattyābhāsasaṃpādake kāle)." Cs has an unusual interpretation of the adverb viśeṣataḥ. He takes it to mean that such companions as Lakṣmaṇa are hard to find with the exception of "the bird (vi) and Śeṣa," that is to say, Garuḍa and the great serpent Śeṣa. These are taken together because of their equality. As an alternative, he notes that Rāma makes this comment because of Lakṣmaṇa's being [an incarnation of] Śeṣa. (viśeṣato garuḍaśeṣau vinā durlabha iti vā. samatvād viparigrahaḥ. śeṣatvāl lakṣmaṇasyaivam uktir vā.)

"wide-eyed and highly intelligent Lakṣmaṇa" mahābuddhe lakṣmaṇāyatalocana: Ś1,Ñ2,V2,3,B,D3,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mahābuddhir mama saumya mano 'nugaḥ, "[as] greatly intelligent and agreeable [lit., 'conformable to (my) mind'] [as you], gentle [one]," while KK and VSP read instead mahābuddhe mama saumya mano 'nugaḥ, "[as] agreeable [as you], greatly intelligent and gentle one."

3. "Now" tu: Literally, "And or But." Ś1,Ñ2,V2,3,B,D3,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the contextually synonymous ca, "And."

"listen to" niśāmaya: Literally, "cause to hear or announce." As Cr notes, we must take the causative here in the sense of the simplex. He glosses, "Listen (śṛṇu)."

"gentle brother" saumya: Literally, "gentle one." Ś1,Ñ2,V2,3,B3,4,D3,6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kiṃcit, "something."

4. "Four days have passed" catvāro divasāḥ: Literally, "four days." We follow the suggestion of Ck, Ct, and Cs in supplying the participle gatāḥ, "have gone or passed."

"gentle brother" saumya: Literally, "O gentle [one]."

"during which I have not issued" akurvato 'sya: Literally, "of this one [i.e., me] not doing or while this one [i.e., I] am not acting." Ś1,Ñ,V1,2,B1–3,D1–7,9–11,T3,4,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous ātmanepada participle akurvāṇasya.

"any instructions as to what needs to be done" kāryānuśāsanam: Ś1,Ñ,V1,3,D1–4,6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāryaṃ paurajanasya ca, "and . . . the business of the people of the city and the countryside." Although it is not mentioned in the text or any of the commentaries, we are doubtless to understand that Rāma has withdrawn himself from the affairs of state as a result of his distress over the loss of Sītā during the four days of Lakṣmaṇa's absence. See Introduction, "Structure," pp. 139–41.

5. "and" ca: D5,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vā, "or."

6. "will . . . be hurled" pātyate: Literally, "he is caused to fall." Ś1,Ñ2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead patitaḥ, "[is] fallen."

"after death" sa mṛtaḥ: Literally, "he, dead." Ś1,B2,D10,11,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃvṛte, "enclosed or shut up." Ck understands the term to be the name of the particular hell in question, Saṃvṛta (saṃvṛtākhye). Ct glosses, "devoid of even the touch of wind (vāyusparśahīne)." Cs glosses, "having no way out (anutthāne)." Cg notes the critical reading as a variant.

7. "a great chariot-warrior" mahārathaḥ: Ś1,Ñ2,V2,B,D5–7,10,11,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāyaśāḥ, "immensely illustrious."

"on earth" pṛthivyām: Ś1,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,6,7,9–11,T2,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead babhūva, "he was."

8. "Now, on one occasion at Puṣkara that foremost of kings gave to the brahmans ten million cows, adorned with gold, together with their calves." sa kadācid gavāṃ koṭiṃ savatsāṃ rukmabhūṣitām / brāhmaṇebhyo nṛpavaraḥ pradadau puṣkareṣv iha //: Ś1,Ñ2,V2,B1–3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa kadācid gavāṃ koṭīḥ savatsāḥ svarṇabhūṣitāḥ / nṛdevo bhūmidevebhyaḥ puṣkareṣu dadau nṛpaḥ /: "On one occasion at Puṣkara that god among men, the king, gave to those gods on earth tens of millions of cows, adorned with gold, together with their calves." Ct addresses the unusual plural puṣkareṣu by glossing, "at the pilgrimage sites at Puṣkara (puṣkaratīrtheṣu)." Cs glosses, "at that and other places of pilgrimage (tadāditīrthakṣetreṣu)." "gods on earth (bhūmideva)" is a kenning for brahmans.

9. "At that time, there was a poor brahman, a keeper of the sacred fires, who lived by gleaning. His cow, a good milker, wandered off, together with her calf, through mingling with other cows." tataḥ saṅgād gatā dhenuḥ savatsā bahudohanā / brāhmaṇasyāhitāgnes tu daridrasyoñcchavartinaḥ /: Literally, "Then a cow—belonging to a poor brahman, who maintained the sacred fires and lived by gleaning—milking abundantly, together with a calf, went through contact with [other cows]."

"a good milker" bahudohanā: Literally, "milking abundantly." Ś1,Ñ2,V2,B1,2,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sparśitānagha, "offered [lit., 'caused to be touched'] . . . O sinless one." Ct glosses sparśitā as "given to a brahman (brāhmaṇāya dattā)." See notes to verse 14 below.

10. "his lost cow" vinaṣṭāṃ: Literally, "the disappeared [one]." Ś1,Ñ2,V2,B,D5,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead naṣṭāṃ gām, "the disappeared or lost cow."

"here and there" tatra tatra ca: Literally, "there and there." Ś1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, read instead the emphatic particle ha for ca, "and."

"even after many, many years" saṃvatsaragaṇān bahūn: Literally, "for many multitudes of years."

11. "Kanakhala" kanakhalam: According to Cg, this is the name of a village (kanakhalākhyagrāmam)." Cr, however, identifies it as a place inside Haridvāra (haridvārāntargatakṣetram).

"he saw . . . his own cow" sa dadarśa svakāṃ dhenum: Literally, "he saw his own milch cow." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dadṛśe tāṃ svikāṃ dhenum, "He saw his own milch cow." KK and VSP read instead the somewhat redundant dadarśa gāṃ svakāṃ dhenum, "He saw his own cow, a milch cow."

"whose calf had grown up" jīrṇavatsām: Literally, "having an aged or decrepit calf." Since the cow is in good health and the brahman still wants her back, we understand that the calf has simply matured. But see verse 22 below, where the cow is described as "feeble."

12. "the twice-born brahman" sa dvijaḥ: Literally, "the twice-born [one]." Ś1,D6,7, 10,11,T1,2,4,M3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead brāhmaṇaḥ, "the brahman."

"Then" tu: Literally, "And or But." Ś1,Ñ2,V,B2,D7,10,11,T4,M2,4,5,7,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous ca, "and."

13. "that twice-born brahman" sa dvijaḥ: Literally, "the twice-born [one]."

"who was like fire" analopamam: Literally, "like Anala." Ś1,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1, 3–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pāvakopamam, "like Pāvaka."

Following verse 13cd (= line 26), Ś1,D6,7,10,11,T23,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [8*]: "But the brahman who had been keeping her also hurriedly followed the cow (yo 'pi pālayate vipraḥ so 'pi gām anvagād drutam)."

14. "And as that twice-born brahman went along, he said to the seer" gatvā tam ṛṣim ācaṣṭe . . . sa dvijaḥ: Unless one reads the insert 8* (see notes to 13 above), the text does not make clear the identities of the twice-born one and the seer, respectively. However, the context is that the twice-born is the one pursuing the seer, who was the original owner of the disputed cow. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous gatvā ca tam ṛṣiṃ caṣṭe, "having gone, he said to that seer." D6,7,10,11,T1,3,4,G1,3,M3–5,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read satvaraḥ, "quickly," for sa dvijaḥ, "that twice-born [one]."

"She was given to me by that lion among kings, Nṛga, during a donation." sparśitā rājasiṃhena tasmin dāne nṛgeṇa ha: Ś1,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sparśitā rājasiṃhena mama dattā ṇṛgeṇa ha, "offered by that lion among kings, Nṛga, she was given to me." See notes to verse 9 above.

16. "and yet not receiving an audience with Nṛga" aprāpya nṛgadarśanam: Literally, "not having obtained the sight of Nṛga." Ś1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na prāptau nṛgaśāsanam, "and they did not receive a ruling from Nṛga."

17. "outstanding twice-born brahmans" dvijasattamau: Literally, "those two foremost among twice-born [ones]."

"these terrible words" vākyaṃ ghorābhisaṃhitam: Literally, "speech that was uttered terrifyingly."

18. "you do not grant an audience to those who are petitioners" arthinām . . . tvaṃ naiṣi darśanam: Literally, "You do not come to a meeting or viewing of petitioners."

19. "For a long time . . . having become a lizard, you will live in a burrow" śvabhre tvaṃ kṛkalībhūto dīrghakālaṃ bhaviṣyasi: Literally, "having become a lizard, you will be in a burrow for a long time." KK and VSP read instead śvabhre 'smin kṛkalāso vai dīr- gḥakālaṃ vasiṣyasi, "in that burrow, a lizard, indeed you will dwell for a long time." Ś1,Ñ,V,B2–4,D2–5,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read nivatsyasi, "you will dwell," for bhaviṣyasi, "you will be."

20. "shall be born" utpatsyati ca: Literally, "And he shall be born." Ś1,D10,11,M6, and KK and VSP read instead utpatsyate hi, "Indeed, he shall be born."

21. "he shall liberate you" sa te mokṣayitā: Literally, "he is the liberator of you."

"from this curse uttered by the twice-born brahmans" śāpāt . . . dvijeritāt: Literally, "from this curse uttered by the twice-born [ones]." D1–4,6,7,9, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhaviṣyati, "he will be," for dvijeritāt, "[from the curse] uttered by the twice-born [ones]," yielding the line the sense "He will be the liberator of you from this curse." Ś1,D10,11,T4, and GPP and NSP read bhaviṣyasi, "you will be," for dvijeritāt. According to Ct, one must understand bhaviṣyasi to be an elliptical statement that Nṛga will remain a lizard until the time of the Kṛṣṇāvatāra (tasmāc ca tvaṃ bhaviṣyasi. kṛkalāsa iti śeṣaḥ.) Cr glosses this awkward reading as "you will obtain" and adds the words "a divine form" (tvaṃ bhaviṣyasi prāpsyasi divyarūpam iti śeṣaḥ).

Following 21cd (= line 42), Ś1,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [13*, lines 1–2]: "And when the Kali Yuga arrives, two mighty [heroes], Nara and Nārāyaṇa, will be born for the sake of removing a burden[1] (bhārāvataraṇārthaṃ hi naranārāyaṇāv ubhau / utpatsyete mahāvīryau kalau yuga upasthite //)."

[1] This is a clear reference to the central thematic of the Mahābhārata, where Arjuna and Kṛṣṇa, along with the other Pāṇḍavas, etc., relieve the earth of its burden of rapacious, demonic kings. This is one of the extremely rare allusions to Kṛṣṇa in the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa. See, for example, 6.105.25 and notes.

22. "that old and feeble cow" tāṃ gām . . . durbalāṃ vṛddhām: Compare verse 11 above, where the cow is said to be in good health (nirāmayām).

"to some other brahman" brāhmaṇāya: Literally, "to a brahman."

24. "For does not a king obtain the fruit of an affair that is well transacted?" sukṛtasya hi kāryasya phalaṃ nāvaiti pārthivaḥ: Literally, "For a king does not go to the fruit of an affair that is well conducted." As it stands, the statement seems counterintuitive, since one would expect that the king does indeed benefit from taking care of his subjects' concerns properly. We are inclined to follow Ct and Cr, who take Rāma's comment here to be an example of kāku, that is, the use of the tone of voice to give a different, even radically opposite, sense to an utterance. Thus Ct glosses: "[The fruit] of an affair, that is to say, something that must be done, that is well conducted, that is to say, the duty of the protection of the people. The king does not obtain the fruit of that. This is [an example of] kāku. The meaning is 'He does receive it.' (kāryasya kartavyasya sukṛtasya prajāpālanadharmasya phalaṃ pārthivo nāvaiti. kākuḥ. prāpnoty evety arthaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly.)" We understand that Rāma would have inflected his voice to indicate that he is asking a rhetorical question.

Following 24cd (= line 42), Ś1,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [16*]: "Therefore go, Saumitri, and wait for [those] people [who] have something they want done (tasmād gaccha pratīkṣasva saumitre kāryavāñ janaḥ /)."[1]

[1] The syntax is highly elliptical. It is fleshed out by Ct and Cr. Ct glosses, "Whoever may come, wait for them, standing at the doorway; those words should be supplied (ka āyāti, tat pratīkṣasva dvāri sthitveti śeṣaḥ)."

App. I, No. 8, lines 49–82 = Lahore 7.55.26–42; Gorresio 7.56; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.54.

1. Compare 51-4*.1 (= lines 124–125), which are virtually identical with the exception of "who grasped their essential meaning (paramārthavit)," which is replaced there by the expression "slayer of enemy heroes (paravīrahā)" in 51-4*cd (= line 124). See 51-4*.1 and notes.

"who grasped their essential meaning" paramārthavit: The expression occurs only one other time in the Rāmāyaṇa. At Yuddhakāṇḍa 3.1, it refers to Rāma as he grasps the significance of Sugrīva's words. There, Cg takes the term to be expressive of Rāma's ability to grasp the essence of anything (sāragrāhitvam). The term is found only once in the Mahābhārata (MBh 1.101.22), where it is used more generally of the sage Aṇīmāṇḍavya in the sense of "knowing the highest truth."

"of brightly blazing energy" dīptatejasam: Cs observes that this adjective suggests that Rāma is no longer despondent from brooding over the fact that Sītā is gone (anena sītāvītatācintātāntir neti sūcyate).

2. "pronounced . . . a very grave curse" śāpa īritaḥ / mahān: Literally, "a great curse was uttered." Ñ2,B1–3,D1,4–7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read īdṛśaḥ, "such [a grave curse]," for īritaḥ, "uttered." Cs explains that the curse was "so great in that it could not be avoided by anyone other than the Lord himself (īdṛśo mahān bhagavaditarāśakyaparihāratvena)."

3. "that bull among men" puruṣarṣabhaḥ: Ñ2,V2,3,B2–4,D1,4,6,7,10,11,T1,2,3 (second time),G,M1–5,7,8 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative puruṣarṣabha, "O bull among men," which then refers to Rāma.

"those two twice-born brahmans" dvijau: Literally, "the two twice-born [ones]."

4. "gentle brother" saumya: Literally, "gentle [one]."

"how that king . . . acted" yathā sa rājā: Literally, "in what manner that king." The syntax of the sentence is incomplete, as it lacks a finite verb or equivalent. Cg, Ct, and Cr all add uvāca, lending the phrase the sense "in what manner he spoke (yathovāca tathā śṛṇv iti śeṣaḥ—so Cr; Cg and Ct similarly)." We follow Ck, who adds the verb "he did or acted," lending the line the sense "in what manner he acted" (akarot tac chṛṇv iti yojanā).

5–6. "Then" tataḥ: Ś,V2,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1,2,5,6,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nṛgaḥ, "Nṛga."

"townspeople" naigamān. The term naigama can refer to people learned in the vedic texts, merchants, or the general population of a town or country. Here we follow Ct and Crm, who gloss, "townsfolk (paurān—so Cr; Ct similarly)." For a discussion of this term see notes to 7.55.5.

"along with his purohita" sapurodhasaḥ: Literally, "together with the purodhas." The term is a common variant of purohita, "the household priest." We use the latter term for the sake of consistency.

7. "Now . . . brahmans" viprau: The word "now" has been added to make clear that the two divine brahman seers are different from the two brahmans who cursed Nṛga. Ś,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhadrau, "blessed."

"Nārada and Parvata" nāradaḥ parvataś caiva: These two figures have not been introduced, at least by name, previously in the episode, nor have we heard anything about them. It appears that Ct and Cr are probably correct in taking Nārada and Parvata to be the two well-known devarṣis of that name, who are often mentioned together as companions in the Mahābhārata. (MBh 1.178.7,12; 3.51.12; 3.91.17; 3.134.8; 12.274.10; 12.281.15; 12.310.19; etc.) Ct's reconstruction is that the two sages happened to come there and informed Nṛga of the curse that had been placed upon him by the two brahmans, and thus alerted him to the great danger he faced. However, Ct seems to be not entirely certain of his analysis and offers as an alternative that these are the names of the two brahmans themselves, in which case, he argues, the king would have become aware of the curse through meditation. (nāradaparvatau munī yadṛcchayā samāgatya dvijendraprayuktasya śāpasya nivedanena mama mahadbhayam dattvoktvā . . . yadvā tau brāhmaṇāv etau tatsaṃjñau. tatprayuktaśāpajñānaṃ ca rājño dhyāneneti bodhyaṃ.) Cr simply understands the two to be the seers Nārada and Parvata (nāradaḥ parvataś carṣī).

"having alerted me to the great danger facing me" mama dattvā mahadbhayam: Literally, "having given me great danger." Ct, as noted above, and Cr understand that the seers inform Nṛga of his peril. Cr understands, " 'great danger' means 'the curse given by the two brahmans'; 'having given' means 'having caused me to hear' (brāhmaṇābhyāṃ dattaṃ śāpam ity artho dattvā śrāvayitvā)."

"the highest heaven" tribhuvanam: Literally, "the triple world." Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "the Brahmaloka (brahmalokam)." Ck and Ct add that this is the "third world (tribhuvanaṃ tṛtīyaṃ bhuvanaṃ brahmalokam)." Cr takes it to refer to the world of the three [divinities], Brahmā and the rest (tribhuvanaṃ trayānāṃ brahmādīnāṃ bhuvanaṃ lokam).

"having become as the wind" vāyubhūtau: Literally, "having become wind or air." Ct understands this obscure expression to mean that the two seers were as exceedingly swift as the wind (vāyuvadativegau). Cs glosses, "unattached (asaṅgau)." Compare 7.51-4*.4 (= line 131); 7.51-5*.15,16 (= lines 201–203); and notes.

8. "the . . . here and now" sa ihādya: Literally, "he . . . here today." Ś,D7,10,11,T3,4,M9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa cehādya, "and he . . . here today." KK and VSP read instead sa devo 'dya, "he . . . [as] king [lit., 'god'] today." This lends the passage the sense "You must consecrate the prince named Vasu as king today." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"And" caiva: Ś,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca yat, "and which."

"approved by the artisans" śilpisaṃmatam: Ś3,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śilpibhir mama, "[Let a burrow be fashioned] by my artisans or by the artisans for me."

Following 8cd (= line 64), Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B2,4,D1–5,7–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [26*]: "where I will expiate[1] the curse issued by the brahmans (yatrāhaṃ kṣapayiṣyāmi śāpaṃ brāhmaṇaniḥsṛtam /)."

[1] "I will expiate" kṣapayiṣyāmi: Literally, "I will pass or bring to an end." D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃkṣayiṣyāmi, "I will exhaust [the curse]."

9. "proof against the rainy season . . . proof against the cold season" varṣaghnam . . . himaghnam: Literally, "destroying the rain or rainy season . . . destroying the cold season or the snow."

"during the summer" graiṣmikam: Literally, "that is suitable for the summer." V1,D6,7,10,11,T,G2,3,M1,2,5,8,10 (graiṣmaghnam), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead grīṣmaghnam, "destroying the heat or hot season," i.e., proof against the hot season.

10. "let . . . be planted thickly around them" viropyantām . . . gulminaḥ: Literally, "let those clustered [plants] be planted around." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all gloss, "forest trees (kakṣavṛkṣāḥ)."

"fruit trees, bearing many different kinds of flavors, as well as flowering creepers" phalavantaś ca ye vṛkṣāḥ puṣpavatyaś ca yā latāḥ /. . . bahvāsvādāḥ: Despite the syntax, which places the adjective bahvāsvādāḥ, "bearing many different kinds of flavors," after latāḥ, "flowering creepers," it applies best to the fruit trees alone. Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read chāyāvantaḥ, "possessing shade," for bahvāsvādāḥ. Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct, who share this variant, all gloss gulminaḥ, "clustered thickly," as "forest trees (kakṣavṛkṣāḥ)" (see note above). In this reading, there are three categories of plants that are to hide the entrances to Nṛga's burrows, i.e., fruit trees, flowering creepers, and shade trees. The variant chāyāvantaḥ is not noted in the critical apparatus.

Following 10cd (= line 68), D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ2,V2,B,D3, and Gorresio continue line 2 only following 30*, a passage of two lines [29*]: "And let the entire area around those burrows be made beautiful. I will dwell here comfortably until the time [of the curse] lapses (kriyatāṃ ramaṇīyaṃ ca śvabhrāṇāṃ sarvato diśam / sukham atra vasiṣyāmi yāvat kālasya paryayaḥ //)."

11. "burrows" śvabhreṣu: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kriyantām, "let them place [lit., 'make']."

12. "saying": The verse contains no explicit transition from the narrative to the direct speech of Nṛga. We have added the word for the sake of clarity.

13. "was made to fall upon me" me nipātitaḥ: Ś,Ñ2,V2,B,D8,10–12,T3,4,G2,M3,8, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous mayi pātitaḥ.

"by . . . twice-born brahmans" dvijābhyām: Literally, "by the two twice-born [ones]."

"for even such a minor offense" aparādhe 'pi tādṛśe: Literally, "in reference to such an offense." Compare verse 2 above.

14. "But you must not suffer" mā kṛthās tvaṃ tu saṃtāpam: Literally, "But you must not do or make suffering." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tv anusaṃtāpam, "but . . suffering," for tvaṃ tu saṃtāpam, "but you . . . suffering." KK and VSP read tanusaṃtāpam for tvaṃ tu saṃtāpam, lending the phrase the sense "You must not experience the slightest suffering." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"bull among men" puruṣarṣabha: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hi nararṣabha, "indeed bull among men," while KK and VSP read instead [matkṛte] [a]pi nararṣabha, lending their line the sense "Moreover, you must not experience the slightest suffering . . . bull among men." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"For destiny, which has brought me to this misfortune, is all powerful" kṛtāntaḥ kuśalaḥ . . . yenāsmi vyasanīkṛtaḥ: Literally, "Fate, by which I have been made into a calamity, is capable."

15. "Everyone receives what he must receive, whether pleasure or pain, according to his deeds" prāptavyaṃ labhate sarvaḥ sukhaṃ dukhaṃ yathākṛtam /: For 15cd (= line 77), D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of two lines [31*]: "One obtains those things one must obtain, one goes to those places where one must go, one attains those things one must attain, whether they be painful or pleasant (prāptavyāny eva prāpnoti gantavyāny eva gacchati / labdhavyāny eva labhate duḥkhāni ca sukhāni ca //)."

16. "that bull among men" puruṣarṣabhaḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B,1,4,D1,6,7,10–12,T1,2,G,M1–7,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative puruṣarṣabha, "O bull among men," which would then refer to Lakṣmaṇa.

"Nṛga" nṛgaḥ: D6,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nṛpaḥ, "king," which is redundant with rājā, "king," in the same line.

17. "the command of the twice-born brahmans" dvijājñām: Literally, "the command of the twice-born [ones]."

"for many tens of thousands of years" bahuvarṣagaṇāyutam: Literally, "for ten thousand [times] many multitudes of years." Compare 7.57.19 and notes.

For verse 17 (= lines 81–82), Ñ2,B1–3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute, while V2 inserts lines 3–4, following 17cd (= line 82), a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas)) [35*]: "Having thus entered[1] a large burrow, adorned with jewels,[2] the great king then fulfilled the curse, which had been unleashed in anger by the two twice-born [men] (evaṃ praviśyaiva nṛpas tadānīṃ śvabhraṃ mahadratna-vibhūṣitaṃ tat / saṃpādayāmāsa tadā mahātmā śāpaṃ dvijābhyāṃ hi ruṣā vimuktam //)."

[1] "Having . . . entered" praviśyaiva: Literally, "having truly entered." Ñ,B2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead praviśyeva, "having entered, as it were."

[2] "a large burrow, adorned with jewels" śvabhraṃ mahad ratnavibhūṣitaṃ tat: Literally, "that large burrow, adorned with jewels." KK and VSP read instead śvabhraṃ mahāratnavibhūṣitaṃ tat, "that burrow adorned with large jewels."

The meter is indravajrā.

App. I, No. 8, lines 83–123 = Lahore 7.56.26–42; Gorresio 7.57; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.55.

1. "if you desire to hear more" yadi te śravaṇe śraddhā: Literally, "if there is of you curiosity or strong desire in respect to hearing." The word śraddhā normally means "faith or trust." But in this particular context, the term must be taken in its sense of "curiosity or strong desire." Here, unlike at 7.49.16, where the same phrase is used, all translators consulted understand the word in the sense of "strong desire." See notes to 7.49.16.

3. "exemplary of righteousness" paramadharmiṣṭhām: Literally, "supremely righteous." Cr glosses, "indicative of the highest dharma (paramadharmasūcikām)."

4. "Heroic and established in righteousness" vīro dharme ca pariniṣṭhitaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vīrye dharme pariniṣṭhitaḥ, "[he was] established in righteousness and heroism."

"of the extremely great Ikṣvāku" ikṣvākoḥ sumahātmanaḥ: D5,10,11,T1,G3,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ikṣvākūṇāṃ mahātmanām, "of the great Ikṣvākus." Ck and Ct gloss, "of the sons of Ikṣvāku (ikṣvākuputrāṇām)." In the Rāmāyaṇa and in some purāṇic dynastic lists, Nimi is associated with the lineage of the kings of Mithilā in Videha. His placement here in the Ikṣvāku episode is the reason cited by Shah (1975, pp. 28–29) for the relegation of this episode to the appendix. However, a king by the name of Nimi is listed as a descendant of King Ikṣvāku in numerous purāṇic accounts. See S. Goldman 2015a.

5. "near the ashram of Gautama" abhyāśe gautamasya: Literally, "in the vicinity of Gautama." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who all understand, "the meaning is 'in [the vicinity of] his, that is to say, Gautama's, ashram' (gautamasyeti tadāśramasyety arthaḥ)."

6. "He himself aptly named the city 'Vaijayanta.'" purasya sukṛtaṃ nāma vaijayantam iti svayam: Literally, "The city's name Vaijayanta was well made by himself." The name is also that of Indra's heavenly palace. Cg notes that the name reflects the similarity to Indra's palace. (vaijayantam indraprāsādam. sādṛśyāt tadvyapadeśaḥ.) D6,7,10,11,T, G3,M1–3,5–7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read śrutam, "heard or famed," for svayam, "himself." This lends the line the sense "It is well known that the apt name of the city was 'Vaijayanta.'"

7. "that very great city" sumahat puram: Ś,Ñ2,V1,2,B3,D6,8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous sumahāpuram (sumahāpurīm—so Gorresio).

"I will perform a long sacrificial session." yajeyaṃ dīrghasatreṇa (sic): Literally, "I would sacrifice with a long soma sacrifice."

"This delighted his father's heart." pituḥ prahlādayan manaḥ: Literally, "delighting the father's heart or mind."

8–9. "Then that royal seer Nimi, foremost of the Ikṣvākus . . . chose Atri, Aṅgiras, and that treasure-store of austerities,[1] Bhṛgu, as well as that bull among the twice-born brahmans, Vasiṣṭha, who was the first to be born of Brahmā." atrim aṅgirasaṃ caiva bhṛguṃ caiva taponidhim [98] / vasiṣṭhaṃ caiva yaḥ pūrvo brahmayonir dvijarṣabhaḥ [99] / varayāmāsa rājarṣir nimir ikṣvākusattamaḥ [100] /: B1,D6,7,10,11,T3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read lines 98–100 in a different order, i.e., 99 (= 7.51-3*.8cd), 100 (= 7.51-3*.9ab), 98 (= 7.51-3*.9cd). In addition, D6,10,11,T3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the following variants:

vasiṣṭhaṃ varayāmāsa pūrvaṃ brahmarṣisattamam /
[99 = 7.55.8cd = GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, VSP]
anantaraṃ sa rājarṣir nimir ikṣvākunandanaḥ /
[100 = 7.55.9ab = GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, VSP]
atrim aṅgirasaṃ caiva bhṛguṃ caiva taponidhim
[98 = 7.55.9cd = GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, VSP]

These variations lend the passage a somewhat different sense: "He first chose Vasiṣṭha, the foremost of brahman-seers. And after that, the royal seer Nimi, the delight of the Ikṣvākus, [chose] Atri, Aṅgiras, and that treasure-store of austerities,[1] Bhṛgu."

[1] "that treasure-store of austerities" taponidhim: Ñ2,V2,B1–3,M1, and Gorresio, KK and VSP read instead tapodhanam, "whose wealth was asceticism."

10. "the delight of royal seers" rājarṣivardhanam: Literally, "the increaser or gladdener of royal seers." B2,D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G1,3,M1,3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājarṣisattamam, "the foremost of royal seers."

"previously" pūrvam: Cs understands that Vasiṣṭha had been chosen previously "since he was a purohita (purohitatvāt)."

"Please wait until after that." pratīkṣa tadanantaram: Ck, Cg, and Cm understand that Vasiṣṭha is telling Nimi to wait until the conclusion of his sacrifice for Indra, after which he will return and perform the sacrifice for Nimi. (pratīkṣa pratīkṣasveti yāvat. indrayājanasamāptiparyantaṃ māṃ pratīkṣasva. tadanantaraṃ tvāṃ yājayiṣya iti śeṣaḥ. anantaraṃ vasiṣṭhasya gamanānantaram—so Ck; Cg and Cm similarly.) V3,D1,3,4,10,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead antaraṃ pratipālaya, "wait for an opportunity." Ct's gloss on the variant antaraṃ pratipālaya is that Vasiṣṭha instructs Nimi to wait for an occasion after the completion of Indra's sacrifice, at which point the priest will return and sacrifice for Nimi. (antaraṃ pratipālaya. indrayāgasamāptiparyantāvakāśaṃ pratipālaya pratīkṣasva. indraṃ yājayitvā tvāṃ yājayiṣya iti bhāvaḥ.)

11. "Then the brahman Gautama took his place." tadantaram atho vipro gautamaḥ pratyapūrayat: Literally, "Now the brahman Gautama filled his vacancy." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead anantaraṃ mahāvipraḥ for tadantaram atho vipraḥ, "now, his vacancy, the brahman," which lends the line the sense "After that, the great brahman Gautama filled in."

12. "those brahmans" tān viprān: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read viprāṃs tān by transposition.

"sacrificed" yajate: Literally, "he sacrifices." Ś,Ñ1,V2,3,B4,D1,3,4,7,8,10–12,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the imperfect (lan̄), ayajat, "he sacrificed."

"not far from" pārśve: Literally, "on the side of or near."

13. "The king entered a state of consecration for five thousand years." pañcavarṣa sahasrāṇi rājā dīkṣām upāgamat: Gita Press, KK, and VSP read verse 12 (= lines 105 and 106) with 13 (line 107), while GPP and NSP run 13 (107) together with 14ab (line 108). Cr understands that we must read this verse (line 107) with the preceding one, understanding: "He performed his consecration, that is to say, his vow connected with that, for five thousand years, and therefore sacrificed. One and one-half constitute a single syntactic unit (pañcavarṣasahasrāṇi dīkṣāṃ tatpratijñām akarod ata eva ayajat sārddhaśloka ekānvayī)."

"entered" upāgamat: Literally, "he approached." D10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead athākarot, "then he made or performed." This lends the phrase the sense "He took consecration (dīkṣām)." Cr glosses, "He made or took a vow for that (tatpratijñām akarot)."

14. "the duties of the hotṛ priest" hautram: Literally, "that which pertains to the hotṛ." The hotṛ is the priest who invokes the gods with verses from the Ṛgveda during the vedic sacrifice. Cr glosses, "the duty or rite which pertain to the hotṛ (hautraṃ karma)."

15. "But when . . . saw" apaśyat: Literally, "he saw."

"the foremost of brahmans" brahmasattamaḥ: D6,7,10,11,M2,4,7,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead brahmaṇaḥ sutaḥ, "the son of Brahmā."

"that sacrifice had been completed" tam adhvaram . . . abhipūritam: D,T3,4,M2,4,6–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadantaram . . . abhipūritam, "that vacancy had been filled."

"with a . . . rage" krodhena: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous kopena.

16. "he sat waiting for a while" muhūrtaṃ samupāviśat: Literally, "he sat down for a while."

"But as for the king, he had gone happily to sleep" rājāpi nidrām āhṛtavān sukham: Literally, "as for the king, he happily took sleep." D10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājarṣir nidrayāpahṛto bhṛśam, "the royal seer was powerfully carried off by sleep." Ck, Cg, and Ct believe that the king fell asleep while the sacrifice was still incomplete (asamāpta eva sattra iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

17. "anger flared up in great Vasiṣṭha" manyur vasiṣṭhasya prādur āsīn mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "the anger of great Vasiṣṭha became visible or arose."

18. "your body shall be devoid of consciousness" cetanena vinābhūto dehas tv eṣā bhaviṣyati: Literally, "this body will be devoid of consciousness." Ct understands the phrase cetanena vinābhūtaḥ, "devoid of consciousness," to mean "dead (mṛta ity arthaḥ)." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead cetanena vinābhūto dehas te pārthivaiṣyati, "Your body, O king, will go, devoid of consciousness." This variant results in the repetition of the vocative pārthiva, "O king," in the verse. Ct glosses the awkward verb eṣyati, "it will go," of this variant with bhaviṣyati, "it will be or become." Ś,D1,5,8,12, M3, and KK and VSP read instead cetanena vinābhūto dehas tava bhaviṣyati, "Your body will be devoid of consciousness." Nimi will be brought back to consciousness at 7.51-5*.12

19. "the royal seer" rājarṣiḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rājā tu, "But the king."

"heard about" śrutvā: Literally, "having heard."

"the king" sa rājā: M3 and KK and VSP read instead saṃrambhāt, "because of [his] agitation."

20. "you . . . unleashed upon me" muktavān mayi: Literally, "[you] released upon me." D7,10,11,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead uktavān mama, "you uttered in regard to [lit., 'of'] me."

"perverted by anger" krodhena kaluṣīkṛtaḥ: Literally, "made impure or tainted by anger."

21. "with its radiant splendor" *surucira*prakhyaḥ: V3,D3,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead *sa sucira*prakhyaḥ, "that [body] with its enduring splendor or radiance." Cs glosses, "The one of which there was previously enduring splendor, that is to say, beauty (prāksuciraṃ prakhyā śobhā yasya saḥ)."

Following 21cd (= line 123), D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ1 continues after 47*, Ś2,3, continue after 46*, and Ñ2,B, and Gorresio continue after 45*, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [48*]: "And in this way, in the grip of anger, the two of them, the king and the foremost of twice-born brahmans,[1] then cursed each other. And those two immensely powerful men, suffering from the same affliction,[2] suddenly became disembodied. (iti roṣavaśād ubhau tadānīm anyonyaṃ śapitau nṛpadvijendrau / sahasaiva babhūvatur videhau tulyavyādhigatau mahāprabhāvau //)"

[1] "the king and the foremost of twice-born brahmans" nṛpadvijendrau: Literally, "the king and the best among twice-born [ones]." The compound could also be read as "the foremost of kings and the foremost among twice-born [ones]."

[2] "And those two immensely powerful men, suffering from the same affliction" tulyavyādhigatau mahāprabhāvau: Literally, "those two of great power who had gone to equal affliction." Ś2,3,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tattulyādhigataprabhāvavantau. This somewhat awkward compound is ambiguous. It can mean either "the two who possessed power [and] who had gone to [-gata-] mental affliction [-ādhi-] equal to that," or "those two who possessed power that had gone [adhigata] to equality with him or that." Ct attempts to explain this reading by taking the pronoun tat to stand for the name Brahmā. He takes the first part of the compound to mean "equal to that of Brahmā," a phrase that he then uses to describe power that was equal to that of Brahmā, which power the two possessed. That is to say, Ct concludes, the two of them possessed power equal to that of Brahmā. (tad iti brahmanāma. brahmaṇas tulyaṃ tulyatayādhigataḥ prāpto yaḥ prabhāvas tadvantau. brahmatulyaprabhāvāv iti yāvat.) Cs, as is so often the case, rejects Ct's interpretation, regarding it as inappropriate to the context. Instead he offers two interpretations of his own. In the first, he breaks the sequence up into two elements. The first is gataprabhāvavantau, "whose power was gone." The second is tattulyādhi, "those two who shared an equal and well-known mental affliction (ādhi). His second interpretation is that the two of them possessed the acquisition of mutual disembodiedness and the power to bring that about, that is to say, they possessed the well-known capability of giving one another curses. (tattulyādhigataprabhāvavantau gataś cāsau prabhāvaś ca so 'sti yayos tau. sa lokaviditas tulyaḥ parasparam. ādhir manovyathā yayos tau. tau ca tau tau ca. nāgojibhaṭṭas tu . . . iti vyākurvan śāpataḥ parasparaṃ videhatāprāpteḥ śokamūlatayā prakaraṇānaucityaṃ saṃpāditavān iti mantavyam. tattulyādhigataprabhāvavantau tallokaprasiddhaṃ tulyādhigatam adhigatir ubhayoḥ parasparaṃ videhatāprāptis tatkārako yaḥ prabhāvo 'nyonyaśāpapradānasāmarthyaṃ tadvantāv iti vā.)

The meter is apparently a defective example of the triṣṭubh.

Sarga 51-4 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 124–171*

App. I, No. 8, lines 124–171 = Lahore 7.57; Gorresio 7.58; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.56.

The story of the seduction of Urvaśī by Varuṇa is known in numerous purāṇas. On the relations between these versions and that found in the Uttarakāṇḍa, see S. Goldman 2015a.

1. Compare 7.51-2*.1 (lines 49–50), which are virtually identical with the exception of the word paravīrahā, "the slayer of enemy heroes, which replaces paramārthavit, "who grasped their essential meaning," of line 49." See 7.51-2*.1 and notes.

"words" vākyam: Literally, "speech." Ñ1,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bhūtvā, "having become," lending the line the sense "having become one whose hands were cupped in reverence."

7.51-4*.1 (= lines 124–125) = 7.51-5*.2 (= lines 174–175).

2. "Once they had left their bodies" nikṣiptadehau: Literally, "those two by whom the bodies were deposited." V2,3,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nikṣipya dehau, "having abandoned the two bodies."

"how did those two . . . come to be embodied" katham . . . dehena saṃyogaṃ jagmatuḥ: Literally, "how did the two go to union with a body?"

"the twice-born brahman" dvija-: Literally, "the twice-born [one]."

3. "by Lakṣmaṇa . . . to that bull among men" lakṣmaṇena . . . / . . . lakṣmaṇaṃ puruṣarṣabham: Literally, "by Lakṣmaṇa . . . to Lakṣmaṇa, bull among men."

"Rāma, the delight of the Ikṣvākus" rāma ikṣvākunandanaḥ: Note the misprint in the critical edition (line 128). KK and VSP read instead rāmaś cekṣvākunandanaḥ, "and Rāma, the delight of the Ikṣvākus."

4. "those two righteous men" dhārmikau: Literally, "those two righteous [ones]."

"became as the wind" vāyubhūtau: Literally, "having become wind or air." The relatively unusual expression occurred earlier at 7.51-2*.7 (= line 62) above, as a description of the divine seers Nārada and Parvata when they fly up and vanish into the sky. Here the idea seems to be slightly different. We are to understand that Vasiṣṭha and Nimi, having become disembodied as a result of their mutual curses, continue to exist as ethereal spirits. Cs, the only commentator to discuss the term here, notes that they had become beings made of air, like piśācas and other supernatural creatures. Cs attributes this peculiar condition to the fact, as indicated in the same line, that they are both rich in austerities. (vāyubhūtau piśācādivad vātabhūtau. evam avasthāne kāraṇam āha—tapodhanāv iti.) The idea here is apparently that they are too pious or possessed of ascetic power to actually die. See 7.51-2*.7 (= lines 61–62); 7.51-5*.15,16 (= lines 201, 203); and notes.

5. "Vasiṣṭha, of immense blazing energy" vasiṣṭhas tu mahātejāḥ: Literally, "But Vasiṣṭha, of immense blazing energy." Ñ2,B1–3, and KK and VSP read instead vasiṣṭhaḥ sumahātejāḥ, "Vasiṣṭha, of truly immense blazing energy."

"to his father, Brahmā" pitaraṃ prati: Literally, "to his father." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK and VSP read instead pitur antikam, "[he went to] the vicinity of [his] father."

"for the sake of another body" śarīrasya kṛte 'nyasya: The commentators differ slightly as to how to characterize the new body Vasiṣṭha is seeking. Ct refers to it as a gross, physical body (sthūlaśarīra-). Cr believes that the sage is seeking a new birth (utpattyartham). Ck and Cg do not specify the type of body sought, glossing merely, "the sense is that it was for the sake of the acquisition of another body (anyaśarīraprāptyartham ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly)." Cs glosses anyasya, "another," as "visible to everyone (anyasya sarvadṛśyasya)."

6. "wise" dhīmataḥ: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T3,4,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmavit, "the knower of righteousness." The term then applies to Vasiṣṭha.

"who had become as air" vāyubhūtaḥ: See notes to verse 4 above.

"to Grandfather Brahmā" pitāmaham: Literally, "to the Grandfather."

7. "Lord, I have been rendered bodiless" videho 'smi kṛtaḥ prabho: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead videhatvam upāgamam, "I have gone to bodilessness."

Following 7ab (= line 136), D6,7,10,11,T (T3,4 line 1 only),G,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of three lines [49*]: "Lord of the worlds! Great God, born of a lotus![1] I have become as the wind.[2][1] All beings who are deprived of their bodies will suffer great misery, and all the duties of one who is deprived of his body come to naught.[2–3]"

[1] "Lord of the worlds . . . born of a lotus" lokanātha . . . abjaja: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead devadeva . . . aṇḍaja, "God of gods . . . born from the [cosmic] egg."

[2] "born of a lotus! I have become as the wind" vāyubhūto 'ham abjaja: KK and VSP read instead aṇḍajo 'pi tvam abjajaḥ, "although you were born of the [cosmic] egg, you are born from a lotus." On the compound vāyubhūtaḥ, see notes to verse 4 above.

8. "You . . . must first enter the semen discharged by Mitra and Varuṇa" mitrāvaruṇajaṃ teja āviśa tvam: Literally, "You must enter the blazing energy [i.e., semen] born from Mitra and Varuṇa." Ś,Ñ2,B2–4,D5,8,12, and Lahore, Gorresio, KK, and VSP read the synonymous praviśa for āviśa. Cr, reading ahead, notes that since eventually Mitra and Varuṇa will deposit semen in the same pot and the semen of the two of them will become mixed, Vasiṣṭha will be born in that sense from both of them. (vīryayoḥ saṃmilitatvād ubhayor api ubhayajatvavyavahāra upapadyata iti dik.) See verse 16 (= lines 154–155) and notes below; see, too, 51-5*.4 (= lines 178–179) and notes.

9. "And so you will not be born from a womb" ayonijas tvaṃ bhavitā tatrāpi: Literally, "in that [birth], too, you will be one who is not born from a womb." Cs characteristically resegments the sequence so as to demonstrate that Vasiṣṭha will still be Brahmā's son. He takes the syllable "a" in its sense of "Nārāyaṇa" and the term yoni in the sense of "cause." He then reads the compound as a bahuvrīhi in the sense of "he who has Nārāyaṇa as his cause," that is to say, Brahmā. Thus the entire compound ayonija means "born from me, that is, Brahmā." (ayonijaḥ—aḥ nārāyaṇo yoniḥ kāraṇaṃ yasya so 'yoniḥ. tasmān maj jāyata iti sa tathā.)

"you shall, once more, come under my control" punar eṣyasi me vaśam: Literally, "you will go to my power again." The idea, as most clearly expressed by Ct, is that even though Vasiṣṭha will now be born from the mixture of the semen of Mitra and Varuṇa, he will still be Brahmā's son and thus one of the primal sages created by that divinity to serve as the secondary Prajāpatis. (tatrāpi mitrāvaruṇaretaḥpraveśe 'pi, me vaśaṃ matputratvena pūrvavat prajāpatitvam api prāpsyasīti bhāvaḥ.)

10. "he made a reverential salutation and" abhivādya: Literally, "having reverentially saluted." KK and VSP read instead cābhivādya, "and having reverentially saluted," which prevents the hiatus in the original between devena, "by the god," and abhivādya, "having reverentially saluted."

"Varuṇa's abode" varuṇālayam: This, of course, is a reference to the ocean, as noted by Ct and Cr (samudram).

11. "Mitra" mitraḥ: Mitra is an ancient Indo-Iranian god, but he is a rather minor figure in the vedic pantheon. He is invoked alone only once in the Ṛgveda (3.59). More often he is linked with the more important divinity Varuṇa (see, for example, Ṛgveda 1.136; 1.137; 1.151–153; 5.62–72; 6.67; 7.60–66; 8.25; 10.132). There the pair is invoked as Mitrāvaruṇā. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all remark that Mitra is a form of the solar divinity Sūrya. Ck and Ct are most specific, saying that he is, like some other associated solar vedic divinities such as Pūṣan and Āryaman, a type of [divine] manifestation that is located in the solar orb (mitraḥ pūṣāryamādivat sūryamaṇḍalasthamūrtibhedaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly).

"was sharing Varuṇa's rule" varuṇatvam akārayat: It is hard to give a literal translation of this odd expression, which conveys something of the sense of "he caused someone or something to enact the state of being Varuṇa." The commentators, too, are puzzled by the expression, offering some four possible interpretations. Ck, followed by Ct, understands the sense to be that Mitra brings about his own identity with Varuṇa (varuṇatādātmyam akārayad bhāvayati sma). Cs takes exception to this interpretation, which he ascribes to Ct and others. He understands the phrase to mean simply that Mitra is in the same place or position as Varuṇa (varuṇatvaṃ tena sahaikasthānasthitatvam akārayat). Ct, perhaps himself uncertain about Ck's interpretation, offers an alternative, according to which Mitra was exercising Varuṇa's rule or authority (yadvā mitro 'pi varuṇatvaṃ varuṇādhikāram akarod ity arthaḥ). Cr follows this latter interpretation of Ct (varuṇatvaṃ tadadhikāram akārayad akarot). Cg, whom we have followed, understands that, for some reason or other, both divinities are ruling Varuṇa's kingdom simultaneously (kenāpi hetunobhayāv api yugapad varuṇarājyam akurvatām). On Mitra's attaining or sharing Varuṇa's position, see 7.74.5 and notes.

"He had come there and, together with that lord of the milk ocean" kṣīrodena sahopetaḥ: Literally, "together with the ocean of milk, he had come." Again the phrase is obscure. Ck and Ct, whom we follow, take the term kṣīrodena, "by or with the ocean milk," as a metonym for Varuṇa himself because of his close identification with that ocean. Thus they understand the phrase simply to mean that Mitra is in the company of Varuṇa (kṣīrodena kṣīrodātmakena varuṇenopetaḥ san). Cr takes the term at its face value, understanding that Mitra has come together with the ocean bearing the name of kṣīroda, "ocean of milk." The meaning is that he is situated there. (kṣīrodena tadabhidhasamudreṇa sahopetas tatra sthita ity arthaḥ.) Cs understands that Mitra is associated with or in contact with the kṣīroda, "ocean of milk" (kṣīrodeneti sahopeto yuktaḥ).

"by the lords of the gods" sureśvaraiḥ: M1 and KK and VSP read instead surottamaiḥ, "by the foremost of the gods."

12. "happened to come to that place" yadṛcchayā tam uddeśam āgatā: Literally, "[she] came to that place by chance." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead yadṛcchayā samudreśam āyayau, "she came by chance to the lord of the ocean."

13. "When Varuṇa saw Urvaśī, who was endowed with such beauty, playing in his own abode, he was overcome with tremendous lust for her." tāṃ dṛṣṭvā rūpasaṃpannāṃ krīḍantīṃ varuṇālaye / āviśat paramo harṣo varuṇaṃ corvaśīkṛte //: Literally, "And [he] having seen her endowed with beauty playing in Varuṇa's abode, extreme excitement entered Varuṇa for the sake of Urvaśī." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tadāviśat paro harṣaḥ, "then great excitement possessed [him]." The compound varuṇālaya is a standard kenning for the ocean.

14. "asked that foremost of apsarases . . . to make love with him" tām . . . vārayāmāsa maithunāyāpsarovarām: Literally, "He solicited that foremost of apsarases for sexual intercourse."

15. "But, cupping her hands in reverence, she" tataḥ sā tu . . . prāñjaliḥ sthitā: Literally, "but then standing with her hands cupped in reverence."

"I have already been asked by Mitra personally." mitreṇāhaṃ vṛtā sākṣāt pūrvam eva: Literally, "I was first solicited by Mitra personally." Cr points out that Urvaśī has been solicited for sexual intercourse by Mitra and that by telling this to Varuṇa, she is suggesting that she will not have sex with him (Varuṇa) (pūrvam ahaṃ mitreṇa vṛtā maithunāyeti śeṣa iti vacanam sorvaśī varuṇaṃ pratyuvācaitena tubhyaṃ ratiṃ na dāsyāmīti sūcitam).

16. "my semen" idaṃ tejaḥ: Literally, "this semen." Ck and Ct note that this would be in the form of the semen that was emitted at the mere sight of Urvaśī (idaṃ tejas taddarśanakṣubhitavīryarūpam).

"into this pot fashioned by the God" kumbhe 'smin devanirmite: Literally, "in this pot fashioned by the god or gods." Ck and Ct claim that this refers to the pot created by Brahmā to enable the production of his son (devanirmite kumbhe putrotpattisamarthatayā brahmasṛṣṭe). See verse 8 (= lines 138–139) and notes above.

17. "Since you do not wish to make love with me" yadi necchasi saṃgamam: Literally, "if you do not desire sexual union."

"I shall satisfy my desire for you and obtain release in this way" evam uṭsṛjya . . . tvayy aham . . . / kṛtakāmo bhaviṣyāmi: Literally, "having thus released with respect to you, I shall be one whose desire is accomplished."

18. "of the world guardian" lokapālasya: Ñ1,V1,2,D1–4,6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead lokanāthasya, "of that protector or lord of the worlds."

19. "Let this be as you wish." kāmam etad bhavatv evam: Literally, "Let this be thus, as desired." Alternatively, one could take the adverb kāmam in its sense of "very well," lending the sentence the sense "Very well, let this be thus." As Ct notes, the reference is to Varuṇa's expressed intention to ejaculate into a pot (kumbhe vīryotsargo bhavatu).

"My heart belongs to you." hṛdayaṃ me tvayi sthitam: Literally, "My heart is fixed or located in you." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss hṛdayam, "heart," in the sense of cittam, "mind or thoughts."

"My love for you is greater" bhāvaś cābhyadhikas tubhyam: Literally, "and [my] emotion for you is far greater." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bhāvaś cāpy adhikaṃ tubhyam, "and moreover, my emotion for you is greater." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the phrase to mean that Urvaśī is saying that Varuṇa's love for her is greater [than] Mitra's (tubhyaṃ tava ca bhāvo 'dhikaṃ mayi sthitaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Cr, however, like us, understands that she is saying that her love for Varuṇa is greater [than her love for Mitra] (me bhāvaḥ prītis tubhyaṃ tvayy adhikaṃ vartate).

"nevertheless, my body belongs to Mitra" deho mitrasya tu: Literally, "But the body is Mitra's."

20. "he discharged" vyapāsṛjat: G1 and KK and VSP read hy apāsṛjat, "indeed, he emitted," while D10,11,M8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nyavāsṛjat, "he poured forth."

"which was as radiant as blazing fire" jvaladagnisamaprakhyam: Literally, "having equal radiance to a blazing fire." T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead jvaladagniśikhāprakhyam, "whose radiance was that of a flame of blazing fire."

21. "in a towering rage" susaṃkruddhaḥ: Literally, "very angry." KK and VSP read instead the gerund susaṃkramya, literally, "having approached or come together with." The verb here should be taken in its sense "having had sexual relations with." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. M5 reads the close and here synonymous susaṃgamya, "having had sexual relations with." Cg, the only commentator to remark on the reading of KK and VSP, explains, "Having closely joined with (susaṃkramya), that is to say, having fully embraced [her]. Having observed her lack of passion for him, that is the meaning. Cg's understanding is that that Mitra has sexual intercourse and, in so doing, realizes that she has no love or passion for him. (susaṃkramya samyakpariṣvajya. tasyāḥ svasminn anurāgābhāvam ālokyety arthaḥ.)" Cg notes a variant reading that is closer to that of the critical edition (tāṃ tu mitraḥ susaṃkrudhyeti ca pāṭhaḥ). This reading substitutes the gerund susaṃkrudhya, "having become very angry with, for the participle susaṃkruddhaḥ, "very angry." GPP erroneously renders Cg's variant as susaṃkramya.

22. "Having been . . . solicited by me" mayā nimantritā: Literally, "being summoned or invited by me." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mayābhimantritā, literally, "having been consecrated by me with mantras," but here this must be read, as Cr notes, as "being solicited by me for sexual intercourse (mayābhimantritā maithunāya vṛtā).

"why did you not reject him" kasmāt tvam avisarjitā: The critical edition's reading is a relatively hard one. The most natural way to read the pāda would be "why, without being released or dismissed, did you . . . ," but such a reading cannot account for the two instances of the interrogative kasmāt, "why," in the verse, since there would be only one question. We therefore have chosen to read the bhūte kṛdanta as an active participle and the causal as a simplex, as several of the commentators do with the variant as discussed below. In the critical reading, the probable object of the participle would be "him," i.e., Varuṇa. Ś,Ñ1,B3,D10,11,M8, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead avasarjitā, "[you were] caused to be abandoned." Like the critical reading, this too must be read as an active and a simplex. Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "[she, i.e., you, abandoned (visṛṣṭavatī)" and add the pronoun "me" (mām iti śeṣaḥ), lending the variant the sense of "why have you abandoned me [i.e., Mitra]?" Cr similarly glosses, "you [i.e., Urvaśī] abandoned (tyaktavatī) [Mitra]" and explains that what is suggested is that unless Urvaśī desired another husband [i.e., Varuṇa], it would not have been possible for her to have gone to him when she had first been solicited for sex by Mitra. (mayābhimantritā maithunāya vṛtā tvaṃ kasmād avasarjitā tyaktavatī. kim arthaṃ cānyaṃ patiṃ vṛtavaty etena patyantaraviṣayakakāmanāṃ vinānyatra gamanaṃ na saṃbhavatīti niścayaḥ sūcitaḥ.)

"Why . . . you . . . slut" kasmāt tvaṃ duṣṭacāriṇi: Literally, "Why, you, woman of corrupt behavior." Ś,D5–8,10–12,T3,4,M6,8, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read kim artham, "for what purpose, why," for tasmāt tvam," while T1,2,M3,4,10, and KK and VSP read instead tasmāt tvaṃ duṣṭacariṇī, "therefore you [are] a woman of corrupt behavior."

"another with your heart" bhāvenānyam: Literally, "another with love." Ś2,3,D6,7, 10,11,T3,G1,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK and VSP read instead patim anyam, "another or different lord."

23. "descend to the world of mortals" manuṣyaṃ lokam āsādya: Literally, "having gone to the mortal world." V1,3,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous manuṣyalokam āsthāya, "having resorted to the world of mortals or the mortal world."

24. "You must go to him this very day" tam adya gaccha: Ś,D6–8,10–12,T1,3,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tam abhyāgaccha, "You must approach him."

This peculiar story seeks, among other things, to provide the rationale for the apsaras Urvaśī's famous liaison with the mortal King Purūravas, a relationship well attested in the literature from the time of the Ṛgveda (10.95).

Following 24cd (= line 171), Ś2,3,Ñ,V2,3,B,D3,6 (line 1 only),7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of ten lines [57*]: "Then, because of the evil consequences of the curse,[1] she approached Purūravas, that very Purūrava who was the legitimate son of Budha in Pratiṣṭhāna.[2][1–2] Then an immensely powerful son was born to him, the majestic Āyus, who had[3] a son Nahuṣa, who was the equal of Indra in splendor.[3–4] When Indra, the lord of the highest heaven, had become incapacitated after loosing the vajra at Vṛtra, it was Nahuṣa who took his place for a hundred thousand years.[4][5–6] Because of that curse, she descended to earth. And then, Urvaśī of the beautiful teeth, lovely eyes, and bewitching brows, dwelt there for many years. After the curse had come to an end, she went to the abode of Indra.[7–10]"

[1] "because of the evil consequences of the curse" śāpadoṣeṇa: Literally, "by the harm or detrimental effect of the curse."

[2] "Purūravas, that very Purūrava . . . in Pratiṣṭhāna" purūravasam . . . pratiṣṭhāne purūravam: Literally, "Purūravas, Purūrava in Pratiṣṭhāna." KK and VSP read pratiyātā, "she went," for pratiṣṭhāne, "in Pratiṣṭhāna." This variant lends the reading the sense "she approached Purūravas. So she went to Purūrava, who was the legitimate son of Budha."

Note the irregular form of purūravam, following the short "a" declension in 24cd (= line 171). On Pratiṣṭhāna, see notes to 7.51-7*.19 (= lines 295–296).

[3] "who had" yasya: Literally, "of whom [there was]." KK alone reads instead the awkward yatra, "where."

[4] "When Indra, the lord of the highest heaven, had become incapacitated after loosing the vajra at Vṛtra, it was Nahuṣa who took his place for a hundred thousand years." vajram utsṛjya vṛtrāya śrānte 'tha tridiveśvare / śataṃ varṣasahasrāṇi yenendratvaṃ praśāsitam /: Literally, "When the lord of the triple heaven had become distressed after having released the vajra at Vṛtra, the role of Indra was discharged by whom for a hundred thousand years." The syntax of 57*, line 5, of App. I, No. 8, is similar to that at verse 11 (= line 144) above. Cr glosses, "by whom Indra's kingdom was ruled (yenendratvam indrarājyaṃ praśāsitam)." On the debility of Indra following his killing of Vṛtra, see sargas 75–77. As we know from the mythology, Nahuṣa ruled in Indra's place for some time when the latter was incapacitated because of the taint of brahmahatyā, which he had incurred through his killing of Vṛtra or, in some versions, Triśiras (see, for example, MBh 5.10–11.) See 7.51-7*.19 (= lines 295–296) and notes. See, too, Introduction, "Structure," pp. 123–56.

Sarga 51-5 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 172–212*

App. I, No. 8, lines 172–212 = Lahore 7.57; Gorresio 7.58; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.56.

1. "divine . . . which was so wonderful to contemplate" divyasaṃkāśām . . . adbhutadarśanām: Literally, "of divine appearance . . . of wonderful sight." The use of these visual terms for an oral narration is somewhat peculiar. For the first term, Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "of wonderful form or nature (divyarūpām)," which avoids the problem. For the second, we are forced to take the term darśanam, "sight," in its sense of "understanding or doctrine. "

2. 2ab (= lines 174–175) = 7.51-4*.2 (= lines 126–127).

"Once they had left their bodies" nikṣiptadehau: Compare note to 7.51-4*.2.

"the twice-born brahman and the king" dvijapārthivau: Literally, "the twice-born [one] and the king."

4. "Then, best of men, from that pot of the great God, which was filled with semen" tataḥ kumbhe naraśreṣṭha tejaḥpūrṇe mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "then, best of men, in the pot of the great one, which was filled with semen." The syntax of the critical reading allows us to understand that the pot belongs to the great one (mahātmanaḥ), who, as we know from the context, must be Brahmā. See 7.51-4*.8 (= lines 138–139) and notes. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yaḥ sa [tu—KK and VSP] kumbho raghuśreṣṭha tejaḥpūrṇo mahātmanoḥ, "Foremost of the Raghus, that pot of the two great ones, which was filled with the semen." The dual mahātmanoḥ, "of the two great ones," must, as all the commentators who share the reading note, refer to Mitra and Varuṇa. This reading finally forces Ct to address the question previously unanswered in the story, except for an insert passage 57(A)* found only in D3, as to when and how Mitra's semen got into the pot. Ct fleshes out the story as follows: "In this matter, the story is like this. First Mitra, having seen Urvaśī, invited her. And he was told by her, 'I will come to your residence.' Then, when Mitra was in Varuṇa's world, he ejaculated his own semen into a pot at the sight of her, and, having released it into the pot, he went to his own home. After that Varuṇa, too, having seen her, released his semen into the pot. Then, when she went to Mitra's residence, she was cursed by Mitra. (atraivam ākhyāyikā.

prathamam urvaśīṃ mitro dṛṣṭvā tām āmantritavān. tayā ca tvannivāsam āgacchāmīty uktas tadā varuṇalokastha eva mitras taddarśanād ghaṭaskhalitaṃ nijatejaḥ kumbha utsṛjya svaṃ nijavāsaṃ jagāma. paścād varuṇo 'pi tāṃ dṛṣṭvā skhalitaṃ tejaḥ kumbhe vyasṛjat. tato mitranivāsaṃ gatā mitreṇa śaptā ceti.)"

"filled with blazing energy" tejomayau: Literally, "made of tejas." We suspect that Cg is correct in glossing, "possessing unlimited blazing energy (niravadhikatejaskau)." Nonetheless, given the tenor of this episode, with its focus on semen, it is possible to understand the term to mean "consisting or made from [their] semen." See notes to verses 6 and 7 below.

5. "first" pūrvam: Cr understands the adverb to refer to the priority of Agastya's birth from [lit., "in"] the pot (tatra tasmin kumbhe pūrvam agastyaḥ samabhavat). Cg, as mentioned at notes to verse 6 below, takes it to refer to Mitra's prior deposition of semen in the pot.

"from it" tatra: Literally, "there or in that." See comments below on "he left him."

"Agastya" agastyaḥ: KK and VSP read instead hy agastyaḥ, "indeed, Agastya," which avoids the hiatus of the critical text.

"Saying to Mitra, 'I am not your son'" nāhaṃ sutas tavety uktvā mitram: Literally, "Having said to Mitra, 'I am not your son.'" The syntax of the statement is quite clear, but the exact intention is debated by the commentators, who offer three possible interpretations. Ck and Ct take the position that what Agastya means by his statement to Mitra is "I am not the son of you alone." The idea here is that since the sage was born from the mixture of the semen of two divinities, he belongs to neither one exclusively. Ck and Ct will reinforce this argument in their comments on the following verse, where they understand it to be an explanation of Agastya's dual patronymic [Maitrāvaruṇi]. (nāhaṃ sutas taveti. yady api mitreṇāpi kumbhe reta utsṛṣṭaṃ tathāpi tavaikasya putro na bhavāmīty uktvāpākramat.) Interestingly, Gorresio (1870, p. 327), in a note to his translation of this phrase, quotes a commentator on what he calls the "Calcutta" text, which turns out to be nothing other than an excerpt from the commentary of Ct. This is in keeping with the fact that Gorresio's text of the Uttarakāṇḍa is, in fact, much more closely aligned with the text of Ct than is the text of his previous six kāṇḍas, on which he occasionally quotes the commentary of one Lokanātha. Cr similarly understands Agastya to be saying that he is, in fact, not the son of Mitra alone but also of Varuṇa (ahaṃ tavaiva suto na varuṇasyāpīty arthaḥ). Cv proposes breaking the sequence uktvāmitram, "having said to Mitra," as uktvā amitram, "having said to the one who was not Mitra, that is to say, Varuṇa." Cv, however, also claims that even if the sequence is broken up as uktvā mitram, he (Varuṇa) is intended since the two divinities, Mitra and Varuṇa, are essentially one and the same. (nāhaṃ sutas tavety uktvāmitram ity atrāmitram iti padacchedaḥ. amitraś ca varuṇaḥ. mitram iti cchede 'py ayaṃ vivakṣitaḥ. tayor aikyād ekībhūtau mitrāvaruṇau padaṃ cakratur iti hi pūrvam uktam.) Cg merely observes that Agastya addresses only Mitra because of [his] deposition of semen in the pot prior to that of Varuṇa. He defers his interpretation of Agastya's statement until his comments on the following verse (pūrvaṃ varuṇatejonidhānāt pūrvaṃ mitraṃ prati nāhaṃ tava suta ity uktvā).

"he left him" tasmād apākramat: Literally, "he went away from him or that." Given the tenor of Agastya's comment as we have understood it, we agree with Cr, who glosses, "he went away from that, that is to say, from the presence of Mitra (tasmān mitrasamīpād apākramat)." Cg, however, understands tasmāt to refer to the pot itself, glossing, "he went away from that, that is, he arose from that pot (tasmāt kumbhād apākramad udatiṣṭhata)." If one follows this interpretation, then one would have to understand that Agastya and Vasiṣṭha actually take birth in the pot rather than, as we understood, from it. See notes above on "from it."

6. "had first been deposited in Urvaśī" urvaśyāṃ pūrvam āhitam: As mentioned in the notes to verse 4 above, at no point in the narrative thus far has there been any direct account of an emission of semen by Mitra, whether in Urvaśī or the pot, nor has it been stated that Urvaśī deposited any semen from any source in the pot in which Varuṇa deposited his semen. The present verse does little to clarify the muddle, and the commentators struggle to make sense of the events in light of Agastya's enigmatic statement to the apparent effect that he is not a son of Mitra (see notes to verse 5 above). Ś,V2,D6–8,10–12,T1,G1,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the genitive singular urvaśyāḥ, "of Urvaśī," for urvaśyām, "in Urvaśī." This does little to improve the situation; if anything, it makes it worse. Ck and Ct understand the verse to mean that Mitra's semen, which was the source of the birth of Agastya, had, prior to the emission of Varuṇa's semen, been placed in the pot, that is, in the same pot in which Varuṇa's semen later came to be mingled [with Mitra's]. Therefore, it is because all the semen got mixed up inside [the pot] that Agastya said [to Mitra], "I am not the son of you alone." And that is why, Ck and Ct conclude, Agastya has the epithet "the son of Mitra and Varuṇa." (agastyotpattihetubhūtaṃ mitrasya teja urvaśyāḥ pūrvam urvaśīnimittavaruṇavīryavisargāt pūrvam āhitam. tasmin kumbhe tasminn eva kumbhe vāruṇaṃ tejaḥ samabhavat saṃgatam abhavat. yatra kumbhe tattejo mitrasya teja āsīt. atas tejo 'ntarasaṃgatād utpatter naikasya tava suta ity uktam agastyena. ata eva maitrāvaruṇir ity agastyanāma—so Ct; Ck similarly.) Cr has a slightly different understanding. He says: "In the place where Varuṇa's semen was, that is, ended up, that is, in that pot where Mitra's semen had earlier been deposited in the presence of Urvaśī." "That is why," Cr concludes, "Agastya was born first, i.e., before Vasiṣṭha. That is the intention." (yatra vāruṇaṃ tejaḥ samabhavat prāpnot tasmin kumbha urvaśyāḥ saṃnidhau mitrasya tejaḥ pūrvam āhitam. ato 'gastyaḥ pūrvam abhavad iti tātparyam.) Cg's lengthy comment on the verse shows most clearly the difficulty of the episode. Cg offers two alternative explanations of his own and then offers an opinion he ascribes to unidentified "others," a position that is very closely aligned with, if not derived from, the interpretation of Ck and Ct. Cg's first explanation of Agastya's denial that he is Mitra's son (see verse 5 [= lines 180–181] and notes to verse 5 above) is that, with Urvaśī serving as the stimulating cause, Mitra's semen was placed on that pot [in which Varuṇa's semen was already located, rather than in it], and therefore the denial was made. Alternatively, Cg says that at the time of her earlier solicitation [by Mitra], Urvaśī, unable to engage in sexual intercourse because of the proximity of her friends, placed the semen in the pot. In this interpretation, the word "mitrasya" actually refers to both Mitra and Varuṇa. Now there is no way that Agastya could actually be born from the semen of both Mitra and Varuṇa. He was simply born from the pot, for which reason he is referred to by such epithets as "pot-born, born in a jug, etc." Since he was not born of a womb and the pot belonged to both Mitra and Varuṇa, Agastya is known as Maitrāvaruṇi. Cg notes that in some places Vasiṣṭha is said to be born of the semen of both Mitra and Varuṇa, because Mitra's semen was deposited earlier by Urvaśī [into the pot] where Varuṇa's semen [already] was. Cg then notes that others argue that when Agastya says he is not Mitra's son, this shows the logical connection with what follows (i.e., in this verse). These others say that Mitra's semen was, in fact, the essential cause of Agastya's birth, because earlier, on account of Urvaśī, Mitra deposited his semen in the pot before the emission of Varuṇa's semen. But Varuṇa's semen was already in the pot because of his earlier encounter with Urvaśī. Therefore, Agastya is saying to Mitra, "I am not the son of you alone." This is why Agastya goes by the name of "Maitrāvaruṇi." He is called "pot-born" because of his birth from the pot. 7. "after some time" kasyacit . . . kālasya: Cg understands the expression to refer to a very long time after the birth of Agastya (agastyotpatter bahukālānantaram ity arthaḥ).

"that divinity of the Ikṣvākus" ikṣvākudaivatam: As Cs notes, the reference is to Vasiṣṭha's role as the purohita of the House of Ikṣvāku (ikṣvākukuladaivataṃ tatkulapurohitaḥ).

"endowed with blazing energy" tejasā yuktaḥ: Ck and Ct understand that Vasiṣṭha is endowed with the divine blazing energy of his two fathers (mitrāvaruṇayor divyatejasā yuktaḥ—so Ct; divyatejasā pitror ity arthaḥ—so Ck). Although possession of tejas, "blazing energy," is a commonplace among great seers and warriors in the epic, it is hard in this episode, with its almost obsessive emphasis on the use of term tejas in its sense of "semen," not to feel that there is a resonance of that usage here. See notes to verses 4 and 6 above.

"was born of Mitra and Varuṇa" mitrāvaruṇasaṃbhavaḥ: Cr takes the term as a bahuvrīhi compound in the sense of "he who has an assumption of paternity [with respect to Mitra and Varuṇa] (mitrāvaruṇasaṃbhavo mitrāvaruṇayoḥ saṃbhavaḥ pitṛtvasaṃbhāvanā yasya saḥ)."

8. "And the moment Vasiṣṭha was born" jātamātram: Literally, "as soon as [he was] born."

"blameless sage" aninditam: Literally, "blameless [one]."

"purohita" purodhasam: See notes to 7.51-2*.6. Ś1,3,Ñ1,V1,3,B4,D1–4,D8–9,12,T3,4, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous purohitam.

"for the prosperity" bhavāya: D6,7,10,11,M1,2,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hitāya, "for the benefit or well-being."

"gentle brother" saumya: Literally, "gentle [one]."

9. "you . . . with his new body" te 'pūrvadehasya: Literally, "to you . . . of him having an unprecedented body." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tv apūrvadehasya, "but . . . of him having an unprecedented body." Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand the term apūrvadehasya in its sense of "having a new body" (nūtanadehasya—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

"emergence" nirgamaḥ: Cg glosses, "birth or origin (utpattiḥ)," while Ct glosses, "the manner of [his] birth (utpattiprakāraḥ)."

"gentle brother" saumya: Literally, "gentle [one]."

"the birth . . . just as it happened" yathodbhavam: Literally, "according to birth or origin." Ś1,3,Ñ2,V2,B1–3,D6–8,10–12,G1,M2,4–8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yathābhavat, "as it was." Ck, Ct, and Cr all supply either the word vṛttam (—so Cr) or vṛttāntaḥ (—so Ck and Ct), "story."

10. "they then all performed a sacrifice on his behalf for the duration of his consecration" taṃ tato yājayāmāsur yāvaddīkṣāṃ: It will be recalled that at 7.51-3*.13 (= line 107), Nimi was said to have undertaken a five-thousand-year-long consecration for his sacrifice. This was presumably interrupted by his contretemps with Vasiṣṭha. V2(m.), B1,2,4,D7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read ca te, "and they," for the critical reading tataḥ, "then." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yajñadīkṣām, "consecration for a sacrifice," for yāvaddīkṣām, "for the duration of his consecration," while KK and VSP read the synonymous yāgadīkṣām, "consecration for a sacrifice." This latter reading is not noted in the critical apparatus. Ś,D1,3,8,12,T1,2,G2, and KK and VSP read yojayāmāsuḥ, "they caused him to be engaged in." This lends the line the sense "then the wise seers caused him to be engaged in sacrificial consecration." Cr attempts to complete the elliptical syntax, adding the gerund gṛhītvā, "having taken." In this case, it is the brahmans who would take dīkṣā and not the king.

11. "those foremost among the twice-born brahmans" dvijottamāḥ: Literally, "those foremost among the twice-born [ones]."

"preserved" rakṣanti sma: Literally, "they protected or preserved." Ck, Cg, and Ct add "in a cauldron of oil, etc." (tailakaṭāhādāv iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly). Compare the preservation of Daśaratha's body in a vat of oil at 2.60.12 and note and the similar preservation of the body of the brahman child at 7.66.2 and note.. On this practice, see Kane 1973, vol. 4, pp. 233–34.

"worshiping it with fragrances and garlands" gandhair mālyaiḥ pūjayantaḥ: D6,7, 10,11,M5,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gandhair mālyaiś ca vastraiś ca. This lends the passage the sense that the brahmans, etc., now preserve the king's body "with fragrances, garlands, and garments."

12. "upon the completion of the sacrifice" yajñasamāptau: Ñ1,D5–7,10,11,T1,2,3,G, M1,3,5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the locative absolute (sati saptamī) yajñe samāpte, "when the sacrifice was completed."

"who was there" tatra: Literally, "there."

"I shall make your consciousness return" ānayiṣyāmi te cetaḥ: Literally, "I will bring [back] your consciousness." It will be remembered that Nimi lost his consciousness at 7.51-3*.18 (= lines 116–117). See, too, notes to this verse.

13. "Then . . . said" tadābruvan: G1,M2,4,7,9,10, and KK and VSP read instead tathābruvan, "they spoke in this fashion."

14. "Nimi's consciousness" nimeś cetaḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the animate consciousness here is that of the individual soul, which is self-conscious (ceto 'bhimānī pratyagātmā). Ct explains that Nimi's consciousness is able to speak through his subtle body by means of his yogic powers (yogavaśāl liṅgadehenaiveti bhāvaḥ).

"in the eyes of all beings" netreṣu sarvabhūtānām: Ck, Cg, and Ct explain that through his special power, Nimi will be able to reside in the eyes that are present in all living creatures. Ck and Ct further understand that he will be able to do so simultaneously. They also understand that Nimi chooses the eyes since, because of their being of a solar nature [Ct] or the locus of the great light that is of a solar nature [Ck], they are the most excellent place in the body. (sarvabhūtānāṃ netreṣu dehavartisarvasthānebhyaḥ sūryātmakatvena [sūryātmakamahāprakāśasthānatvataḥ—so Ck] praśastatayā svavaibhavād yugapad vaseyam—so Ct; Ck similarly.) Cg understands similarly, that through his power, Nimi will be able to dwell in more than one place (sarvabhūtānāṃ netreṣu sarvabhūtavartinetreṣu vaibhavād vaseyaṃ na tv ekasminn ity arthaḥ).

15. "The wise gods" vibudhāḥ: Literally, "the wise [ones]." This is a common kenning for the gods.

"Having become as the wind" vāyubhūtaḥ: Literally, "having become wind."

This expression has occurred several times in this passage, but with slightly different meanings. At 7.51-2*.7 (= line 62), it appears to mean "disappeared or vanished from a place." At 7.51-4*.4 (= lines 130–131), it appears to refer to beings that exist in a disembodied or ethereal spiritual form (see also notes to these verses). Here commentators differ somewhat in their understanding. Ct takes the term somewhat in the second sense mentioned above, to mean "resorting to a light and subtle body like air or the wind (vāyusadṛśalaghubhūtaliṅgadehāśrita ity arthaḥ)." Ck and Cg take the term more literally, understanding that Nimi will become one of the lesser bodily winds, such as the one called nāga, the breath responsible for belching (nāgādyupavāyubhūtaḥ). The five winds of the body are nāga, kūrma, kṛkara, devadatta, and dhanañjaya, which are alternatively called prāṇa, apāna, samāna, udāna, and vyāna.

16. "will blink" nimiṣyanti: Literally, "they will blink." This legend of the origin of the blinking of the eyes is evidently inspired by the name of the king, Nimi, which also means "the closing or blinking of the eyes." Ct understands that henceforth creatures will need to blink their eyes in order to alleviate the fatigue produced by their connection with Nimi, who is always moving about within them in his airlike form (vāyubhūtena caratā tvayā karaṇena viśrāmārthaṃ tvatsaṃbandhena jāyamānasya khedasyāpanodārtham ity arthaḥ). Cr understands similarly. Ck and Cg also similarly understand that the law of blinking will be instituted for eyes because of Nimi's presence in them, but they vary slightly in saying that the blinking will be in order to remove or alleviate the fatigue of keeping the eyes open (tvatkṛte tvadavasthānanimittaṃ nimiṣyanti nimeṣadharmaṃ prāpsyanti. viśramārtha iti. unmīlanakhedāpanodanārtham ity arthaḥ).

17. "the wise gods" vibudhāḥ: See notes to verse 15 above.

18. "But as for those great seers, so rich in austerities, they placed on Nimi's body a fire stick. And those great seers then spun it back and forth vigorously to the accompaniment of mantras and oblations in order to produce a son for Nimi." ṛṣayo 'pi mahātmāno nimer dehaṃ tapodhanāḥ [205] / araṇiṃ tatra nikṣipya mathanaṃ cakrur ojasā [206] / mantrahomair mahātmānaḥ putrahetor nimes tadā [207] /: Literally, "And the great seers, whose wealth was asceticism, Nimi's body.[205] And on it [i.e., the body], having placed a fire stick, those great ones made a churning with strength with mantras and oblations for the sake of a son of Nimi then.[206–207]" The critical reading lacks any verb to provide a syntactic relation for the noun deham, "body," in pāda b (line 205). This lack is remedied in a number of manuscripts and printed editions, which supply a verb. Ñ1,V1,3,D,3,6,7,9–11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samāharan, "they brought," for tapodhanāḥ, lending the line the sense "And as for the great seers, they brought Nimi's body." Ck, Cg, and Cr all note that the mantras employed were specifically for the purpose of producing a son (putrīyamantraiḥ).

20. "he was born of someone who was bodiless [videha]" videhāt saṃbhūtaḥ: Our understanding is that since Mithi is the legitimate son and heir of the disembodied Nimi, the reference is to that condition of his father. The commentators, however, tend to focus more on his physical production from his father's corpse. This leads them to see the term videhāt as a madhyamapadalopin compound. Thus Ck and Ct gloss, "from a body from which the animating spirit or consciousness had departed (videhād vigatacetodehāt)." Cr similarly glosses, "born from a body separated from its life breaths (videhāt prāṇaviyuktadehāt saṃbhūtaḥ)." Cg interprets somewhat more literally, understanding, "born from a body that is gone (vigatadehād vigato deho videhas tasmāt saṃbhūtaḥ)." The passage plays on the name of the region, Videha, of which Janaka was the ruler.

21. "his lineage is known as Maithila" asau maithilo 'bhavat: Literally, "that became Maithila." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous ayam. We follow Ct and Cr, who take this to be an elliptical reference to the lineage of the kings descended from Mithi. Thus Ct understands, "the lineage of Janaka (ayaṃ janakavaṃśaḥ)," while Cr glosses, "the lineage of Mithi (ayaṃ mithivaṃśaḥ)." The wordplay is based on the name of the capital city of Videha, Mithilā.

Following 21cd (= line 212), Ś2,3,Ñ,V2,B,D3,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (KK and VSP in brackets, numbered as 7.57.21) insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [70*]: "Thus, gentle brother,[1] I have narrated in its entirety the cause of their births, leaving nothing out: The one that came about in the case of the twice-born brahman Vasiṣṭha[2] because of the curse of that bull among kings[3] and the other extraordinary one[4] of the king[5] [Nimi] that came about because of the curse of the twice-born brahman Vasiṣṭha[6] (iti sarvam aśeṣato mayā kathitaṃ saṃbhavakāraṇaṃ tu saumya / nṛpapuṃgavaśāpajaṃ dvijasya dvijaśāpāc ca yad adbhutaṃ nṛpasya //)."

[1] "gentle brother" saumya: Literally, "gentle [one]."
[2] "of the twice-born brahman Vasiṣṭha: dvijasya: Literally, "of the twice-born [one]."
[3] "of that bull among kings" nṛpapuṃgava-: The reference is to Nimi.
[4] "the other extraordinary one" yad adbhutam: Literally, "which was extraordinary."
[5] "of the king" nṛpasya: The referent is to Nimi.
[6] "of the twice-born brahman Vasiṣṭha" dvija-: Literally, "of the twice-born [one]."

The meter appears to be a defective upodgatā.

Sarga 51-6 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 213–258*

App. I, No. 8, lines 213–258 = Lahore 7.59; Gorresio 7.60; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.58.

1. "the great man" mahātmānam: Literally, "the great [one]."

2. "that happened long ago to disembodied Vasiṣṭha, along with Nimi" videhasya . . . /. . . nirvṛttam . . . vasiṣṭhasya nimeḥ saha: Literally, "what happened in the case of the bodiless one (videha) . . . Vasiṣṭha together with Nimi." The syntax of the verse is scattered and difficult to construe. We have taken the term videhasya, "of the bodiless [one]," to refer specifically to Vasiṣṭha, despite the fact that it was Nimi who was most recently described in this way (7.51-5*.20 = line 210). We can then read nimeḥ as an ablative construing with saha, which is an unusual but possible construction (see MW s.v. saha). D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read muneś ca ha, "and indeed the sage [Vasiṣṭha]" for nimeḥ saha, "with Nimi." The elimination of the name Nimi opens the verse to two different interpretations. In the first, which we believe is contextually more compelling, videhasya becomes a reference to Nimi, and so the verse yields a meaning very similar to that of the critical edition's reading. Cr appears to interpret in this way, glossing, "wonderful is that which happened to, that is to say, the adventures of the disembodied [one] (videhasya) and Vasiṣṭha. The verb "is" should be added. (āścaryaṃ videhasya vasiṣṭhasya ca nirvṛttaṃ caritam astīti śeṣaḥ.)" Ct suggests that we add the word "association (prasaṅgaḥ)," thus yielding the sense that what was extraordinary was the connection between Vasiṣṭha and the disembodied [one] (i.e., Nimi) (muneḥ saha prasaṅga iti śeṣaḥ). Ck and Cg, both of whom read nimeḥ, also suggest adding the word "association or connection (prasaṅga iti śeṣaḥ)." Ś1,2,D3–6,T1,4,G2,M3,4, and KK and VSP read the rather awkward nivṛttam, "completed or turned back" for nirvṛttam, "occurred."

3. "even though . . . forbearance" viśeṣeṇa . . . /. . . kṣamām: Literally, "especially forbearance." We have departed somewhat from the literal meaning here to convey the sense more accurately in English. D6,7,10,11,M2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the adverb kṣamam for kṣamām, "forbearance." The idea, as noted by Cr, is that by stating that Nimi, who was in a state of consecration, still did not show forbearance to Vasiṣṭha it is suggested that he should have done so. Cr reads the variant kṣamam adverbially, in the sense of "forbearingly or patiently." (dīkṣito nimir vasiṣṭhasya kṣamaṃ kṣamā yathā bhavati tathā na kṛtavān etena niminā kṣantavyam it sūcitam.) Ck and Ct simply note that in not showing forbearance Nimi has acted improperly. (na kṣamaṃ kṛtavān. anucitam eva kṛtavān ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.)

4. "As Lakṣmaṇa was speaking in this fashion, Rāma, the foremost of those who give delight, spoke once more to his heroic brother of brightly blazing energy:" evaṃ bruvati vīre tu lakṣmaṇaṃ punar abravīt [219] / rāmo ramayatāṃ śreṣṭho bhrātaraṃ dīptatejasam

[220] //: Literally, "As the hero was speaking in this fashion, Rāma, foremost of those who delight, once again said to his brother Lakṣmaṇa of radiant blazing energy."

For verse 4 [= lines 219–220], Ñ2,V2,B1–3,D5,M6 substitute, while D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute for line 219, a passage of two lines [71*]: "And addressed in this fashion by Lakṣmaṇa,[1] Rāma,[2] foremost among the victorious, then[3] spoke these words to Lakṣmaṇa, who was learned in all the śāstras (lakṣmaṇenaivam uktas tu rāmo 'tha jayatāṃ varaḥ / uvāca lakṣmaṇaṃ vākyaṃ sarvaśāstraviśāradam //)."

[1] "And addressed in this fashion by Lakṣmaṇa" lakṣmaṇenaivam uktas tu: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evaṃ uktas tu tenāyam, "and addressed in this fashion by him, he."

[2] "Rāma" rāmaḥ: KK and VSP read instead śrīmān, "the majestic [one]."

[3] "foremost among the victorious, then" [a]tha jayatāṃ varaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṣatriyapuṅgavaḥ, "the bull among kshatriyas."

Following 4cd (= line 220), B4,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [72*, line 1]: "Forbearance is not to be found in all men, hero (na sarvatra kṣamā vīra puruṣeṣu pradṛśyate /)."

5. "borne patiently . . . hard to endure" duḥsahaḥ . . . kṣāntaḥ: Literally, "hard to bear . . . endured or pardoned."

"this" tat: Literally, "that." T3 and KK and VSP read instead tam, lending the phrase the sense "hear about him [i.e., Yayāti] or that [i.e., anger]."

6. The tale of Yāyati, one of the ancestors of the Pāṇḍavas, is narrated at great length at MBh 1.70–88.

"gentle brother" saumya: Literally, "gentle [one]."

7. "The one that was held in higher esteem" puraskṛtā: Literally, "the esteemed [one]."

8. "the daughter of Uśanas" sutā tūśanasaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read anyā, "the other," for sutā, "daughter." This forces the commentators who share this reading to add a word meaning "daughter." Thus Ck and Ct add sutā, while Cr supplies kanyā. As Cg notes, the reference is to Uśanas Kāvya, also known as Śukra, who was the purohita of the asuras. The story is also found at MBh 1.75–78 and the MatsyaP 27. See, too, R. Goldman 1977, pp. 26–34, passim, Sutherland 1979, and also Introduction, "Structure," pp. 143–44.

"but she was not beloved by the king" na tu sā dayitā rājñaḥ: Cs argues that Yayāti's lack of affection for Devayānī derives from the harsh and disapproving words she had uttered with regard to his liaison with Śarmiṣṭhā (tasyāḥ śarmiṣṭhāsaṃgasyānabhimatatvena tatkaraṇānantaraṃ taduktadurvacanaśravaṇena rājño vaimanasyād iti bhāvaḥ). In the Mahābhārata's account Śarmiṣṭhā is forced to serve as Devayānī's maid, and Yayāti carries on an illicit relationship with her, because of which Devayānī denounces him to her father, Uśanas (MBh 1.75–78).

9. "Then they had two sons" tayoḥ putrau tu saṃbhūtau: Literally, "And two sons of them were born." In the Mahābhārata's version of the story, Devayānī gives birth to two sons, Yadu and Turvasu (v.l. Turvaśu), while Śarmiṣṭhā, who is not married to Yayāti in that version, has three: Druhyu, Anu, and Pūru (v.l. Puru). Yadu is the eldest, and Pūru is the youngest (MBh 1.77–78). The abridged narrative here omits the middle three sons. Cs notes that the other three sons, Turvasu, etc., are not mentioned because [unlike Yadu and Pūru, the progenitors, respectively, of the Yādava and Paurava lineages] they are not the dynasts of principal lineages (turvasvādīnāṃ trayāṇāṃ mukhyavaṃśakartṛtvābhāvād anuktiḥ).

11. "of godlike Bhārgava" bhārgavasya . . . devasya: Literally, "of the god Bhārgava."

12. "the fire, the eater of oblations" hutāśanam: Literally, "the one who has oblations for food."

14. "in a towering rage" susaṃkruddhā: Ñ2,B3,D6,7,10,11,T4,M9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu saṃkruddhā, "and [she] was angry."

"she called to mind her father" sasmāra pitaraṃ tadā: Literally, "then she remembered [her] father." Cs reminds us that Devayānī's father is Śukra and understands that, having gone to his ashram, she recalls that he has gone somewhere else. He supports this position by quoting MBh 1.78.23cd–24ab and 1.78.25cd, where Devayānī sets out for Śukra's ashram followed by Yayāti, who is trying to placate her. (pitaraṃ śukram. tadāśramaṃ gatvānyatra gataṃ sasmāra. yathoktam ādiparvaṇi tvaritaṃ sakāśaṃ kāvyasya prasthitāṃ vyathitas tadā / anuvavrāja saṃbhrāntaḥ prṣṭhataḥ sāntvayan nṛpaḥ / acirād eva saṃprāptā kāvyasyośanaso 'ntikam // ityādi.)

15. "Realizing" sa tu vijñāya: Literally, "and he, having realized." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tad abhijñāya, "having recognized that."

"intention" iṅgitam: We follow Cr, who glosses, "intention or purpose (abhiprāyam)." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "her feelings of despondency and anger (sakhedaroṣabhāvam)." Cs glosses, "thought or desire (manogatam)."

"came . . . to where Devayānī was" agamat . . . tatra devayānī sma yatra: Literally, "he went there where Devayānī [was]." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read āgataḥ, "he came," for agamat, "he went." Ñ1,B2–4, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read tu, "but or and," for the emphatic particle sma. Cs understands the relative adverb yatra, "where," to refer to Śukra's own ashram and the phrase tatrāgataḥ to mean that he had returned from the place where he had been performing austerities. (yatra svāśrame. tatrāgataḥ svatapaḥsthalāt.)

16. "was not her usual self" aprakṛtisthām: Literally, "was not situated in [her] natural state." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "uneasy or not in good health (asvasthām)." Cr understands, "not fixed in [lit., 'by'] her own nature (svabhāvenānavasthitām)."

"despondent" aprahṛṣṭām: Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "devoid of joy or happiness (harṣarahitām)."

"distracted" acetanām: Literally, "unconscious or nonsentient." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "her thoughts scattered or agitated (kṣubhitacittām)." Cs glosses, "having lost her memory or [being] absentminded" and notes that this condition is a sign of unhappiness. (acetanāṃ smṛtihīnām. etad duḥkhacihnam.) Evidently Cs is referring to his understanding that Devayānī has initially forgotten that her father was temporarily away from his ashram.

17. "In a towering rage" susaṃkruddhā: Ś,Ṇ2,B3,D5–8,10–12,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu saṃkruddhā, "and [she] was angry."

"of brightly blazing energy" dīptatejasam: Ñ1,V2,D2,10,11,T1–3, and GPP and NSP read instead the odd dīptacetasam, "of blazing mind," which here must be taken to have the sense "of agitated mind." Benoît (1999, p. 1355) renders, "le coeur brûlant de colère" but forces the syntax to make the adjective refer to Devayānī rather than to Uśanas Kāvya.

18. "I shall enter . . . or" pravekṣe vā: KK and VSP read instead pravekṣyāmi, "I shall enter."

19. "You do not understand how . . . I am" na māṃ tvam avajānīṣe: Literally, "you do not despise me." As the commentators point out, the upasarga ava must be read here as pleonastic, so that the verb must be understood in the sense of only the verbal root √jñā in its primary sense of "to know or understand" (avopasargo dhātvārthamātre vartate—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly).

"For when one mistreats a tree, those things that depend on the tree are destroyed as well." vṛkṣaṃ hi samavajñāya vadhyante vṛkṣacāriṇaḥ: Literally, "Having mistreated a tree, those things that live or move in the tree are destroyed."

D7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute, while G1,M5 insert after 20ab (= line 249), a passage of one line [78*]: "Through contempt for the tree, daddy,[1] the things that live on the tree are cut off [2] (vṛkṣasyāvajñayā tāta chidyante vṛkṣajīvinaḥ)."

[1] "daddy" tāta: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead brahman, "O brahman."

[2] "are cut off" chidyante: Literally, "they are cut off." KK and VSP read instead khidyante, "they are depressed or pained."

Several of the commentators point out, looking ahead to the following verse, that what Devayānī is saying through her arboreal analogy is that just as the parts of a tree, such as flowers, leaves, etc., are destroyed through the mistreatment of the tree—such as breaking or tearing it—on which they grow, in the same way she is being insulted through Yayāti's disrespect of Uśanas. (vṛkṣasyāvajñayā troṭanādilakṣaṇayā vṛkṣajīvino vṛkṣāśritapuṣpapatrādayaś chidyante nāśyante. prakṛte kiṃ tatrāha—he bhārgava! rājarṣis tvayy avajñayā hetubhūtayā māṃ paribhūya mayy avajñāṃ prayuñkte—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Cr interprets somewhat differently, understanding Devayānī to be asking how Uśanas's sons, etc., [i.e., his grandsons,] can be happy when he himself is insulted. Therefore, she says that through the mistreatment of a tree, such as cutting it, etc., those things that live on the tree, i.e., its limbs, are also cut off. By this she is suggesting that through her being disrespected, her sons, etc., are being similarly disrespected. (nanu tava putrādīnāṃ sukhitve kiṃ tavāpamānenety ata āha vṛkṣasyāvajñayā tatpūrvakacchedena vṛkṣajīvinas tadavayavā api chidyanta etena madavamānenaiva putrādayo 'py avamānitā iti sūcitam.) See verse 23 (= lines 253–254) and notes below.

20. "a Bhārgava" bhārgavam: D10,11,D2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative bhārgava, "O Bhārgava."

"nor does he treat me with respect" na ca māṃ bahu manyate: Literally, "and he does not esteem me." See Ct's comments above at notes to verse 19.

Cr continues his analysis (see verse 19 = lines 249–250 and notes above) by arguing that Devayānī is indicating that through his contempt for those belonging to her, Yayāti shows his lack of respect for her and that through his lack of respect for her, he is, in the end, disrespecting Uśanas (rājarṣir avajñayā paribhūyāsmadīyān anādṛtya mayy avajñāṃ prayuñkta ata eva māṃ na bahu manyata etenāsmadanādareṇa tavāpy anādaro jāta eveti sūcitam).

21. "Uśanas" uśanāḥ: Ñ2,V1,3,D1–7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhārgavaḥ, "the Bhārgava."

"he was overcome with anger" krodhenābhipariplutaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kopenābhiparivṛtaḥ, "he was encompassed by anger," while T4,G1, and KK and VSP read instead kopenābhipariplutaḥ, "he was overcome with anger."

"he began to say this concerning the son of Nahuṣa" vyāhartum upacakrāma . . . nahuṣātmajam: Literally, "he began to speak to or about the son of Nahuṣa." Since there is no indication that Yayāti is present during Uśanas's conversation with Devayānī and since in the critical edition the sage's curse is issued in the third person, we understand that he is speaking about Yayāti rather than to him directly. Note that in the first verse of the following sarga (7.51-7*), the text says that Nahuṣa had heard that Uśanas was angry, not that he heard Uśanas's words himself.

22. "Since, lacking self-control, the son of Nahuṣa has treated me with contempt, he shall attain decrepitude and become withered with extreme senescence." yasmān mām avajānīte nāhuṣas tu durātmavān / jarayā parayā jīrṇaḥ śaithilyam upayāsyati //: Literally, "Since the one having poor self-control, Nāhuṣa, disrespects me, he, aged by extreme old age, shall go to flaccidity." D5–7,10,11,T4,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read for the first line the second person verb avajānīṣe and the vocative nāhuṣa, so that the line reads: yasmān mām avajānīṣe nāhuṣa tvaṃ durātmavān. In this reading, the sense is "Since you, O son of Nahuṣa, treat me with contempt . . ." For the second line, these same manuscripts and printed editions read the second person singular verb upayāsyasi, "you shall go to," for upayāsyati, "he shall go to." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read a slight variation of the entire line: vayasā jarayā jīrṇaḥ śaithilyam upayāsyasi, which yields the sense "Worn out with old age and senescence, you will attain decrepitude." The verse appears to allude to the Mahābhārata's version in which Yayāti is cursed for his infidelity to Devayāṇī and is punished accordingly with the curse of impotence.

23. "and" ca: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saḥ, "he."

"his own abode" bhavanaṃ svam: See verse 15 above and notes.

Following 23cd (= line 258), Ś2,3,Ñ,V2,3,B2–4, D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [82*]: "When he had spoken in this fashion, that foremost of bulls among the twice-born brahmans,[1] whose blazing splendor was equal to that of the sun, departed once more after having consoled his daughter Devayānī and pronounced a curse on the son of Nahuṣa (sa evam uktvā dvijapuṃgavāgryaḥ sutāṃ samāśvāsya ca devayānīm / punar yayau sūryasamānatejā dattvā ca śāpaṃ nahuṣātmajāya //)."

[1] "among the twice-born brahmans" dvija-: Literally, "among the twice-born [ones]."

The meter is upajāti.

Sarga 51-7 = Appendix I, No. 8, lines 259–302*

App. I, No. 8, lines 259–302 = Lahore 7.60; Gorresio 7.61; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.59.

1. "he was afflicted by that curse" tadārtaḥ: Literally, "afflicted by that or by him." One could also dissolve the sandhi to read tadā ārtaḥ, "then, [he] afflicted."

"Then, having attained extreme old age" jarāṃ paramikāṃ prāptaḥ: Literally, "he attained extreme senescence." Ś,Ñ2,V,B2–4,D1–5,8–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the gerund prāpya, "having obtained or attained," for the participle prāptaḥ, "[he] attained."

"he said this to his son" sa putram idam abravīt: Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–4,9–11,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yaduṃ vacanam abravīt, "he spoke a speech to Yadu."

*2. "You are a knower of righteousness, Yadu." yado tvam asi dharmajña: The critical reading, yado tvam asi dharmajña, "O Yadu, knower of righteousness, you are," is well supported textually. However, it is all but impossible to construe properly, since the vocative dharmajña leaves the copula "you are (tvam asi)" without a predicate. Moreover, the context of the passage makes it clear that Yayāti is predicating his demand upon Yadu's being a "knower of dharma (dharmajña)," that is to say, in this case, someone willing to defer unconditionally to the wishes of one's elders. Cs understands, "Someone who knows dharma in the form of following one's father's orders (pitrājñāparipālanarūpadharmajñaḥ)." Ś,D5,8,10–12,T1,M1, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular dharmajñaḥ, which is clearly an attempt to address the problem. We follow this reading, as it is, perhaps, the simplest way to resolve the grammatical difficulty. Another solution, found in a few manuscripts and in Gorresio (7.61.2), is to substitute an alternative reading for the phrase tvam asi, "you are."

Thus Gorresio's text, along with Ñ1,V1,3,B4,D1–4,T3, reads instead jarā tvayeyaṃ dharmajña, "this old age, O knower of dharma, [is to be accepted] by you."

"while I enjoy the pleasures of sex" bhogai raṃsye: Literally, "I will delight with sexual pleasures." Cr glosses, "I will delight with sexual pleasures, that is to say, with women who are the means of that (ahaṃ bhogais tatsādhanaiḥ strībhī raṃsye)."

3. "For I have not thus far had my fill of sensual pleasures, bull among men. Once I have enjoyed them to my heart's content, then only will I take back this old age." na tāvat kṛtakṛtyo 'smi viṣayeṣu nararṣabha / anubhūya yathākāmaṃ tataḥ prāpsyāmy ahaṃ jarām /: Literally, "Thus far I have not accomplished what I had to accomplish with regard to the objects of sense, O bull among men. Then, having experienced according to desire, I will acquire old age." Ś2,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press and read tadā kāmam, "then willingly," for yathākāmam, "according to desire." KK and VSP read instead tathā kāmam, "thus willingly."

4. "But when Yadu had heard those words" yadus tu vacanaṃ śrutvā: D5,6,10,11,T2–4,G1,M2,3,4,6–9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tad, "that or his," for tu, "but."

5. "I have been excluded . . . with regard to objects of value and even from your presence" bahiṣkṛto 'ham artheṣu saṃnikarṣāc ca: Ck, Ct, and Cs understand that Yadu is lamenting his exclusion from those activities associated with being close to his father, activities such as fondling, etc. (samīpāvasthānopalālanādikṛtyāt—so Ct; Ck and Cs similarly). Cg understands similarly, but does not specify the activities.

"So let those others with whom you have been enjoying the objects of pleasure take on your old age, your majesty." pratigṛhṇātu te rājan yaiḥ sahāśnāsi bhojanam: Literally, "Let him take from you, O king, that with which or along with whom you consume or enjoy food or an object of enjoyment." While both the syntax and the grammar are awkward, the meaning is clear. Yadu is saying that since Yayāti has excluded him in favor of his younger brother, Pūru, it is the latter who should bear the effects of the sage's curse. The commentators are not terribly helpful in sorting out the syntax. Only Cr and Cs really try. The former explains, "I have been excluded; therefore let him accept from those together with whom you partake of enjoyment, that is to say, food (ahaṃ bahiṣkṛto 'to yaiḥ saha bhojanam annam aśnāsi tebhyaḥ pratigṛhṇātu—so Cr)." Cs argues that the term yaiḥ, "by whom," refers to Pūru, etc., the ones with whom Yayāti had been partaking of enjoyments, that is, taking food, etc. [Or, alternatively?] in singling out Pūru alone as the one to accept Yayāti's old age, we should understand that Yadu is using the plural form yaiḥ to refer to the many different types of fondling, etc., that Pūru has received. (yaiḥ pūrvādibhiḥ saha bhojanam. tadannādy aśnāsi. pūrumātraṃ lakṣīkṛtya gṛhṇātv iti vadatā yair ity uktis tallālanaprakārabāhuvidhyād iti mantavyam.)" Ś1,Ñ1,D7,10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the emphatic particle vai, "indeed," for te, "of or from you." KK (1905 and 1913) and VSP read kaḥ sahāśnāti" for yaiḥ sahāśnāsi, "with which or along with whom you consume or enjoy." This lends the line the sense "Who along with Pūru, etc., consumes or enjoys food or an object of enjoyment?" While this variant is not noted in the critical apparatus, a number of manuscripts (T1,2,G1,3, M1,3,5,8,10) closely aligned with the textual tradition of KK and VSP read instead the syntactically preferable relative pronoun yaḥ for interrogative kaḥ. This lends the line the sense "Let he who partakes of food or enjoyments with [Pūru, etc.,] accept it." It is possible that the interrogative kaḥ in KK is a typographical error copied in VSP.

6. "For my sake" madarthe: Ñ2,V,B2–4,D6,7,9–12,G1,2,M6,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous madartham.

"great-armed prince" mahābaho: Literally, "great-armed [one]."

8. "Acknowledging" ājñāya: Literally, "having noticed or understood."

"and he transferred his old age" jarāṃ saṃkrāmayac ca tām: Literally, "and he transferred that old age." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all claim that Yayāti was able to transfer his old age to Pūru through his yogic power (yogabalena). However, in the Mahābhārata version of the story from which this abbreviated episode is most likely derived, the power of transferring his old age to one of his sons is granted through a boon on the part of Uśanas. Cs gleefully notes this fact and quotes the Mahābhārata passage (1.823* and 1.78.40–41) as a demonstration that Nāgojibhaṭṭa (Ct) is ignorant of the Mahābhārata and other similar texts. (saṃkrāmayat samakrāmayat. varabalād iti śeṣaḥ. yogabalād iti śeṣa iti vadan nāgojibhaṭṭo bhāratādyanabhijña iti jñāyate. putro jyeṣṭhaḥ kaniṣṭho vā yo dadāti bhayād vayaḥ [= 823*] /saṃkrāmayiṣyasi jarāṃ yatheṣṭaṃ nahuṣātmaja / mām anudhyāya bhāvena na ca pāpam avāpsyasi [= 1.78.40] / vayo dāsyati te putro yaḥ sa rājā bhaviṣyati / āyuṣmān kīrtimāṃś caiva bahuputras [bahvapatyas] tathaiva ca [= 1.78.41with variant] / ity ādiparvokteḥ. pūrau jarāṃ saṃyojayāmāsa.)

9. "the king, once more young, performed thousands of sacrifices" sa rājā taruṇaḥ prāpya yajñān sahasraśaḥ: Literally, "the king young, having obtained sacrifices by the thousand." We agree with Cr, who glosses "having performed (kṛtvā)" for "having obtained (prāpya)."

10. "Give back" ānayasva: Literally, "return or bring back."

11. "I" aham: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jarām, "old age."

"Do not be concerned." mā vyathāṃ kṛthāḥ: Literally, "Do not make agitation or alarm." Apparently the idea is that Yayāti is telling Pūru not to be concerned for him now that he is about to recover his decrepit state. Cs understands that the concern anticipated by Yayāti is that Pūru will think that even though his father has not yet sated his senses, he has come to him now out of kindness to give [his youth back] (pitādhunātṛptendriyo maddākṣiṇyād dātum āyāta iti vyathām).

12. "Great-armed prince" mahābaho: Literally, "great-armed [one]."

13. "in anger" kruddhaḥ: Literally, "[he] enraged or angry."

14. "In you, I have given birth to an incorrigible rākṣasa in the form of a son." rākṣasas tvaṃ mayā jātaḥ putrarūpo durāsadaḥ: Literally, "You are an unassailable rākṣasa born by me in the form of a son." D6,7,10,11,T4,G,M1,2,5–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kṣatrarūpaḥ, "in the form of a kshatriya."

"you shall have no power over the people" tvaṃ prajārthe viphalo bhava: Literally, "you be useless or ineffectual on behalf of the subjects." Given the context, we agree with the commentators that this circumlocution means that Yadu will be deprived of succession to the throne. Ct understands that Yadu will be useless with respect to the purpose that is characterized by lordship of the people. The meaning, he continues, is that he will be deprived of the rulership of the kingdom. (prajārthe prajānām ādhipatyalakṣaṇe prayojane viphalo bhava. rājyādhipatyarahito bhavety arthaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly.) Ck and Cg take the term prajā in its sense of "offspring" and see it as referring specifically to a son. According to them, the expression means that Yadu will be ineffectual, that is to say, deprived of any purpose with respect to that thing, i.e., kingship, which is to be received from one's father by his son. (prajayā putreṇa pituḥ sakāśāt prāpyārtho rājyādilakṣaṇarūpas tasmin viphala uktaprayojanarahita ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly.) T1, G2,3,M1–3,7, and KK and VSP read yat, "since," for tvam "you."

15. "you shall father . . . rākṣasas who are yātudhānas" rākṣasān yātudhānāṃs tvaṃ janayiṣyasi: Literally, "you shall cause rākṣasas, yātudhānas, to be born." The term yātudhāna is used by Vālmīki as both a generic word for rākṣasa and a specific term for a subclass of rākṣasas. Cr here, as well as elsewhere, understands the latter. He explains, "You will father rākṣasas and yātudhānas, who are a subclass of them (rākṣasān yātudhānāṃs tadviśeṣāṃś ca janayiṣyasi)." See 5.3.26 and notes and 6.3.27 and notes.

16. "And . . . your lineage, arising from the Lunar Dynasty, will not endure" na tu somakulotpanno vaṃśaḥ sthāsyati: Ś1,3,D2,5–12,T3,4,G1,M3,6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita

Press, KK, and VSP read instead na tu somakulotpanne vaṃśe sthāsyati. Ck and Ct add the term saṃtānaḥ, "descendant(s)," to serve as a subject for the verb sthāsyati. This lends the line the sense "The line of descendants of you [who are evil-minded] will not be established in the lineage born of the race of the moon (soma)." According to Ct, the meaning of the verse is that those descendants of Yadu who are not rākṣasas will be merely kshatriyas but will not be consecrated to the position of kingship of the Lunar Dynasty (somavaṃśa). This, according to Ct, is because they will be as undisciplined as Yadu himself. (yo 'py arākṣasas tava saṃtānaḥ so 'py kṣatriyamātram eva na tu somavaṃśarājapadābhiṣiktaḥ. bhavattulyadurvinītatvād iti bhāvaḥ.) This explanation appears to conform to the Mahābhārata's version, in which Yayāti tells Yadu that his descendants will have no share in the kingship (MBh 1.79.7). Yadu, of course, will go on to be the progenitor of the Yādava lineage of Mathurā and Dvārakā. Cs, however, as usual, regards Ct's explanation as unworthy of consideration and cites some lines from the Harivaṃśa in which it is argued that Yadu's descendants will belong to the Ikṣvāku lineage, that is to say, the Solar Dynasty (HariVaṃ App. I.18, lines 67, 9*; App. I.18, lines 208–212). He then notes that Ct's comments on this line should be ignored, as the latter has failed to notice the Harivaṃśa passages (nāgojibhaṭṭo nedam avalokata ity upekṣaṇīyavāg ity avagantavyam). On the Harivaṃśa's mixing of the solar and lunar lineages, see Brodbeck 2011a and 2011b.

"evil-minded prince" durmate: Literally, "evil-minded one." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the genitive singular durmateḥ, which then, as Ck and Ct point out, implies the pronoun tava, "of you," and construes with "descendant(s) (saṃtānaḥ)," which they also supply, yielding the sense "the descendants of you, who are evil-minded" (durmates tava. saṃtāna iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly).

17. "Yadu" tam: Literally, "him." The proper name has been added for the sake of clarity.

"Pūru" pūru: The word as it appears in 17ab (= line 291) must be a misprint for pūrum. Not only is the form pūru not grammatically correct but also the correct form, pūrum, which is seen in all printed editions, is not noted as a variant in the critical apparatus.

"who would enhance the kingdom" rājyavivardhanaḥ: Literally, "increaser or augmenter of the kingdom."

18. "the . . . went" sa gataḥ: Literally, "he or that [one] went." KK and VSP read instead the somewhat awkward saṃgataḥ, "encountered," which here must be understood in the sense of "reached [heaven]." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

19. "in . . . Pratiṣṭhāna" pratiṣṭhāne: The city of Pratiṣṭhāna, situated at the confluence of the Ganges and the Yamunā, was an ancient capital of the kings of the Lunar Dynasty. This city was also known in antiquity as Prayāga and is the site of the modern city of Allahabad. See, too, insert passage 57*, following notes to 7.51-4*.24 (= App. I, No. 8, insert 57*, following line 171), and 7.81.21 and notes, where the references are likely to this same city. This city is not to be confused with the city of the same name on the Godāvarī, which served as the capital of the Sātavāhana kings and is known in modernity as Paithan. Cr, however, takes the term as an adjective in the sense of "very prosperous or very renowned (atipratiṣṭhite puravare)."

20. "as well as an enduring lineage of kings" rājavaṃśaṃ ca śāśvatam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rājavaṃśabahiṣkṛte, "in [the city] cut off from the royal lineage," while D6,7,T2,G1,2,M1, and KK and VSP read the nominative, rājavaṃśabahiṣkṛtaḥ, which then modifies Yadu himself, with the sense "excluded from the royal lineage."

"in the . . . city of Krauñcavana" krauñcavane: The city of Krauñcavana is apparently not known elsewhere in the literature.

21. "And thus, according to the code of the kshatriyas, Yayāti tolerated the curse unleashed by Uśanas, as Nimi did not." eṣa tūśanasā muktaḥ śāpotsargo yayātinā / dhāritaḥ kṣatradharmeṇa yan nimiś cakṣame na ca /: Literally, "This outpouring of a curse, which was released by Uśanas, was borne by Yayāti according to the dharma of the kshatriyas, as Nimi did not endure [the curse of Vasiṣṭha]." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and KK (1913) read the masculine accusative yam, "which," which refers back to the outpouring of the curse (śāpotsargaḥ). KK (1905) and VSP read yat with the critical edition. KK and VSP read nimiś ca na cakṣame for nimiś cakṣame na ca by transposition.

22. "I have now told you everything, gentle brother. Let us grant audiences to all those who have legitimate business so that there is no dereliction such as there was in the case of Nṛga." etat te sarvam ākhyātaṃ darśanaṃ sarvakāriṇām / anuvartāmahe saumya doṣo na syād yathā nṛge //: The verse is elliptical and difficult to construe. A literal translation would be: "All this has been told to you. Let us attend to the seeing of all who have business, gentle [one], so that there might not be a fault as in the case of Nṛga." Our translation generally follows the glosses of Ck, Cg, and Ct, who explain as follows: "All this, that is to say, the curse in reference to neglect of the people's business, as well as the patient endurance of it on the part of some people and the lack of patient endurance on the part of others, etc., all this has been told. Therefore, we should attend to, that is to say, accept, audience[s] with all those who have actions that need to be done, that is to say, all those who have the need for something to be done. Just as a dereliction arose in the case of Nṛga, so let there not be a dereliction in my case. This, that is to say, [this] matter. That is the meaning. (etat te sarvaṃ prajākāryānavalokane śāpaḥ keṣāṃcit tad akṣamā keṣāṃcit kṣametyādikaṃ sarvam ākhyātam. ataḥ kāraḥ kṛtyaṃ tad yeṣām asti te kāriṇas teṣāṃ kāryāpekṣiṇāṃ sarveṣāṃ darśanam anuvartāmahe 'ñgīkurmaḥ. yathā nṛge doṣo jātas tathā doṣo mama na syān na bhaved ity etad artham ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.)" We also follow Cr's gloss of sarvakāriṇām, "of all those who have business"; he glosses, "on the part of those whose purpose is something virtuous (sadvastu-prayojanavatām)."

Following 22cd (= line 302), Ś2,3,Ñ2,V2,B,D3,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [99*]: "And then, as Rāma, whose face was like the moon,[1] was speaking in this fashion, the stars began to vanish from the sky[2] and the east grew red with the rays of dawn, as if robed in a garment tinged with the essence of flowers[3] (iti kathayati rāme candratulyānane ca praviralataratāraṃ vyoma jajñe tadānīm / aruṇakiraṇaraktā dig babhau caiva pūrvā kusumarasavimuktaṃ vastram āguṇṭhiteva //)."

[1] "And . . . as Rāma, whose face was like the moon" rāme candratulyānane ca: GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rāme candratulyānanena, "as Rāma, with a face like the moon."

[2] "the stars began to vanish from the sky" praviralataratāraṃ vyoma jajñe: Literally, "the sky became one in which the stars were exceedingly sparse." This would, of course, be the natural condition of the sky at dawn. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 566) erroneously renders, "le ciel devint de plus en plus étoilé." In this mistake he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 548), who renders, "the heavens were spangled with stars," and Benoît (1999, p. 1356), who offers, "le firmament se remplit d'étoiles de toutes parts."

[3] "as if robed in a garment tinged with the essence of flowers" kusumarasavimuktaṃ vastram āguṇṭhiteva: Literally, "as if wearing a garment removed from the juice of flowers." We follow Cr in reading āguṇṭhitā, "[was] wrapped or enveloped," as transitive (kusumarasavimuktaṃ vastram āguṇṭhitā dhṛtavatīva babhau) and Ct's gloss of -vimuktam, "[was] released from," as -yuktam "[was] endowed with."

The meter is mālinī.

[Prakṣipta III follows sarga 51-7*; see pp. 1318–29]

Sarga 52

Before verse 1, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert four lines (= App. I, No. 8, lines 303–306). Lines 303–304 = 7.60.1 of GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP. Lines 305–306 occur for the second time here (= 7.60.2 of GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP); compare Prakṣipta III, sarga 1.1–2 (= App. I, No. 8, lines 303–306). For these verses and their variants, see translation and notes to Prakṣipta III, sarga 1.1–2 (= App. I, No. 8, lines 303–304).

1–2. "entered" āgamya: Literally, "having come."

"are being held at the gateway" nivāritāḥ . . . dvāri tiṣṭhanti: Literally, "they are standing, prevented, at the gate." D10,11,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the nearly synonymous pratihatāḥ, "obstructed or held back," for nivāritāḥ, "prevented or warded off." Cr, alone among the commentators, seems uncomfortable with the idea that these venerable sages should be held at the gate. Taking advantage of the sandhi, he understands the adjective to be apratihatāḥ, "unobstructed," and explains: "Even though they are not being held back, these great seers are standing at the gate (apratihatā anivāritā api . . . ete maharṣayo dvāri tiṣṭhanti)."

"Filled with affection" prīyamāṇāḥ: The exact sense of the adjective here is unclear. Presumably it refers to the ascetics' warm feelings toward Rāma. The commentators uniformly ignore the term. Dutt (1894, p. 1759) offers, "well pleased"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 566), "Ce sont des amis"; Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 855), "and rejoice among themselves"; and Benoît (1999, p. 1357), "qui te sont chers." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 558) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 550) appear to ignore the term.

"great king" mahārāja: G2,M9, and KK and VSP read instead the irregular compound mahārājñaḥ, "of the great king," which construes then with darśanam, "audience," lending the phrase the sense "they request an audience with [lit., 'of'] the great king."

3. "great" mahātmānaḥ: D6,7,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābhāgāḥ, "fortunate or illustrious [ones]."

"twice-born brahmans" dvijāḥ: Literally, "twice-born [ones]."

4. "at his head" mūrdhni: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the instrumental mūrdhnā, "with his head." The idea would be that the doorkeeper acknowledges Rāma's command with his head, i.e., bowing his head, and cups his hands in reverence.

"those many esteemed" saṃmatān bahūn: Literally, "many esteemed." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sudurāsadān, "highly unassailable."

6. "Bearing holy water from all the sacred sites and fruits and roots in full vessels, those twice-born brahmans offered them in abundance to Rāma." te dvijāḥ pūrṇakalaśaiḥ sarvatīrthāmbusatkṛtam / gṛhītvā phalamūlaṃ ca rāmasyābhyāharan bahu //: Literally, "those twice-born [ones] with full vessels, having held sanctified water from all holy sites and fruits and roots, offered much to Rāma." D7,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the instrumental plural sarvatīrthāmbusatkṛtaiḥ for the accusative singular sarvatīrthāmbusatkṛtam. The commentators and translators differ in their interpretations of this variant. Ct sees the sages as simply holding the pots and offering only the fruits and roots to Rāma. (pūrṇakalaśair upalakṣitāḥ. phalamūlaṃ gṛhītvā rāmasyābhyāharan.) Cr, on the other hand, breaks the sequence into two words, sarvatīrthāmbu satkṛtaiḥ, and understands the verse to mean that the brahmans are holding both fruits as well as water from the holy spots in vessels that are well fashioned. They offer both of these to Rāma. (dvijāḥ satkṛtaiḥ samīcīnatayā niṣpāditaiḥ pūrṇakalaśais tīrthāmbu bahuphalaṃ ca gṛhītvā rāmasya rāmāyābhyāharan.) Cs reads the compound as a bahuvrīhi modifying the pots and having the sense of "in which there were waters sanctified by all the holy sites." Cs, somewhat similarly to Ct, understands that the sages are accompanied by such pots. (sarvatīrthāmbusatkṛtaiḥ. sarvatīrthāmbūni satkṛtāni yeṣu taiḥ pūrṇakalaśaiḥ sahitāḥ.) Dutt (1894, pp. 1759–60) offers, "they presented Rāma with various fruits in profusion and vessels filled with sanctified waters of all holy spots." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 566) translates, "avec des vases pleins d'une eau sainte, puisée à tous les Tîrtha. Et chargés de fruits, de racine qu'ils apportaient au roi en quantité." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 558) renders, "with their loshtas filled with holy water drawn from sacred places, carried various kinds of fruit and roots as an offering to their king." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 550) understands, "taking with them pots full to the brim with sacred waters brought from many streams, which they offered to Rama, with fruits and roots." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 856) translates, "accompanied with pitchers full and sanctified with the waters of all the Tīrthas (pilgrimages), and with many fruits and roots offered them to Śrī Rāma," while Benoît (1999, p. 1357) understands, "les bras charges de cruches pleines d'une eau puisée à tous les gués sacrés, apportaient à Rāma des fruits et des racines en abondance."

7–8. "moved by affection" prītipuraskṛtaḥ: Literally, "possessed of affection." The syllable -taḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Cs remarks that the term suggests that Rāma accepts the offerings not because of their rarity but because of his affection for the ascetics (prītipuraskṛto 'nena na daurlabhyāj jagrāha rāmaḥ kiṃtu tāpasasnehavaśāt).

"that great-armed hero" mahābāhuḥ: Literally, "great-armed [one]."

9. "on . . . seats fit for ascetics" bṛsīṣu: A bṛṣī (v.l. briṣī, vṛsī, vṛṣī) is a seat or cushion of twisted grass or straw for the use of ascetics and students. Cr glosses, "on seats suitable for seers (ṛṣiyogyāsaneṣu)."

11. "O you whose wealth consists of asceticism" tapodhanāḥ: Ñ1,V1,D2,6,7,9–11, T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular samāhitaḥ, "composed," which would lend the line the sense "What shall I, composed, do?"

12. "the life residing in my breast" jīvitam . . . hṛdi sthitam: Literally, "the life situated in the heart." Ct glosses, "The meaning is 'Located in the region of the heart-lotus' (hṛtpuṇḍarīkapradeśe sthitam ity arthaḥ)."

13. "there was a great cry of approbation" sādhuvādo mahān abhūt: Literally, "there was a great a cry of 'Excellent!' " B2,3,D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1,3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sādhukāraḥ, "an utterance of 'Excellent!' " for sādhuvādaḥ, "a cry of 'Excellent!' "

14. "Filled with the greatest delight" harṣeṇa mahatānvitāḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP read the synonymous harṣeṇa mahatā vṛtāḥ, "filled with great joy," while KK reads the similar harṣeṇa mahatāvṛtāḥ.

"those . . . said" ūcuś ca te: Literally, "and those [sages] said." Ś,Ñ2,V1,3,B4,D2,5–12, T3,4,M6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ūcuś caiva, "And, indeed, they said."

"characteristic" upapannam: Literally, "befitting."

15. "whom we approached" atikrāntāḥ: Literally, "passed over or encountered." We follow Cr, who glosses, "encountered by us (asmābhiḥ prāptāḥ)." GPP alone reads nātikrāntaḥ, which is unattested elsewhere and likely a typographical error. Dutt (1894, p. 1760) oddly takes the term as "passed away." In this he appears to have been followed by Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 856), which translated "who have gone by." Gorresio (1870, p. 208) incorrectly renders, "fortissimi." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 567), perhaps influenced by Gorresio, also incorrectly renders the term as "très courageux." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 559), who renders, "supremely courageous," and Benoît (1999, p. 1358), who translates, "pleins de bravoure." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 550) translates as do we, "whom we have met."

"without even hearing about the importance of the undertaking" kāryagauravam aśrutvā: Literally, "not having heard the gravity of the undertaking or task." The contrast here is between the lesser kings, who will not commit to an undertaking without first weighing its feasibility, and Rāma, who gladly gives his word without even hearing what the task is. Ñ2,B,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāryasya gauravaṃ matvā, "having reflected upon the gravity of the undertaking," lending the verse the sense that the kings who were approached declined their assistance once they had learned of the daunting nature of the task. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 567) understands the term gauravam to mean "la difficulté." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 559), who renders, "the difficulties," and Benoît (1999, p. 1358), who translates, "les difficultés." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 550) understands similarly, rendering, "difficulty." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 856) translates, "greatness."

16. "You must do this" kuruṣva: Literally, "you must do or act." D10,11, and Gorresio GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataś ca, "and so."

"without a doubt" nātra saṃśayaḥ: Literally, "there is no doubt in regard to this."

"you are the one to do it" kartā hy asi: Literally, "for you are the agent or doer."

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha).

1. "Lauded by the seers who were speaking in this fashion" bruvadbhir evam ṛṣibhiḥ: Literally, "by the seers who were speaking thus." KK and VSP read evaṃ bruvadbhir ṛṣibhiḥ by transposition. The variant is not attested in the critical apparatus. The phrase is elliptical, and commentators suggest various participles to make it intelligible. Ct proposes adding, "urged (prerita iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr suggests, "implored (prārthitaḥ)," while Cs offers, "informed (bodhitaḥ)." In fact, the seers have not yet actually asked Rāma to do anything specifically, nor have they informed him of their problem. They have merely praised him for his willingness to help them (see 7.52.14–16). We therefore added the term "lauded."

"Tell me what needs to be done for you. I will banish your fear." kiṃ kāryaṃ brūta bhavatāṃ bhayaṃ nāśayitāsmi vaḥ: Literally, "Say what is to be done for you. I will destroy your fear." Ñ2,B4,D2,9–11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kiṃ kāryaṃ brūta munayo bhayaṃ tāvad apaitu vaḥ, lending the line the sense "Say what is to be done, sages. So just let your fear vanish."

2. "As . . . was speaking" tathā vadati: Ñ,V1,3,B,D2–4,6,7,9–11,T1,3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous tathā bruvati, "as [Kākutstha] was speaking."

"Listen . . . to the cause of our fear and that of our country" bhayaṃ naḥ śṛṇu yan mūlaṃ deśasya ca: Literally, "Hear that fear of ours and of the country, which is the cause." The syntax is somewhat awkward. D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhayānāṃ śṛṇu yan mūlaṃ deśasya ca, "and listen to the cause of the fears of the country." This reading omits a specific reference to the fear of the sages as opposed to their entire country. Ct understands the conjunction ca, "and," in pāda d to include the speakers. He explains that the expression "and of the country" includes the reference to the fears of "us" [i.e., the sages] through the use of the word "and" (deśasya ca cād asmākaṃ bhayānāṃ).

3. "Rāma" rāma: D1,5–7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the vocative rājan, "your majesty."

"extremely powerful" sumahābalaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4,G2,M9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sumahāmatiḥ, "of very great intellect."

4. "his friendship with the lofty gods was unequaled" suraiś ca . . . prītis tasyātulābhavat: Again the syntax is somewhat awkward. We follow Cr in taking the instrumental as one of accompaniment (suraiḥ saha tasya madhor atulā prītir abhavat).

5. "upon righteousness" dharme: GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the accusative singular dharmam, which must be construed similarly to the critical reading. The reading as found in these editions is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"Because of his high regard for him" bahumānāt: Literally, "because of high regard." The reference is ambiguous. Like most translators consulted, we understand that it is Rudra's high regard for Madhu that causes the former to give the latter a boon. Cr, on the other hand, appears to understand the term to refer to Madhu's high regard, that is to say, his extreme worship of Rudra (tasya madhor bahumānād rudrasyātipūjanāt).

Following 5ab, T1,2,M3, and KK and VSP insert, while GPP inserts, in brackets, following 6a, a passage of two lines [953*]: "Out of affection for Rudra, he performed austerities for many thousands of years. And Rudra, being pleased, went to give him a boon. (bahuvarṣasahasrāṇi rudraprītyākarot tapaḥ / rudraḥ prīto 'bhavat tasmai varaṃ dātuṃ yayau ca saḥ //)"

6. "extracting . . . lance from his own lance" śūlaṃ śūlād viniṣkṛṣya: Literally, "having drawn a lance from a lance." Cg glosses, "having drawn out, that is to say, having created, a javelin from his own lance (svaśūlāc chaktim ākṛṣya sṛṣṭvety arthaḥ)." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 559), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 551), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 857) understand Śiva's śūla, or lance, to be his characteristic trident (triśūla).

7. "performed . . . splendid . . . in order to propitiate me" matprasādāt kṛtaḥ śubhaḥ: Ś,Ñ,V1,B,D1–5,8–12,T3,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read matprasādakaraḥ, "producing propitiation of me," for matprasādāt kṛtaḥ, "performed . . . in order to propitiate me." This reading omits the verbal element kṛtaḥ, "performed." B3 and Gita Press, KK, and VSP resolve this by substituting kṛtaḥ, "performed," for śubhaḥ, "splendid," while Ct and Cr, who read matprasādakaraḥ śubhaḥ, note that we must add the participle kṛtaḥ (kṛta iti śeṣaḥ—so Cr; Ct similarly). Note that the critical text makes no mention of Madhu's having performed any specific act of righteousness (dharma), such as severe austerities, other than the general statement in verse 5 above that he was intent on righteousness (dharma), in order to propitiate Rudra. It is probably for this reason, as mentioned in the notes to verse 5 above, that a few manuscripts and editions insert 953*.

8. "it will vanish" nāśam āpnuyāt: Literally, "it would obtain destruction." We follow Ct, who glosses, "disappearance (adarśanam)" for "destruction (nāśam)." Ś,Ñ,V1,B2–4, D,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read eṣyati, "it will go [to destruction]," for āpnuyāt, "it would obtain."

9. "This lance" śūlam: Literally, "the lance." D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G2,M1,2,7,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the masculine śūlaḥ for the neuter.

"whoever might be so incautious to challenge you in battle" yaś ca tvām abhiyuñjīta yuddhāya vigatajvaraḥ: Literally, "and who, free from anxiety, might invite you for battle." GPP alone reads mām, "me [i.e., Śiva]," for tvām, "you," and notes the reading tvām as belonging to the texts of Cg and Cr. However, there is no other support for this peculiar reading in the critical apparatus or any other printed edition consulted. We believe it is a misprint. No translator renders this reading.

12. "Mahādeva" mahādevaḥ: T1,2,G2,3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead mahātejāḥ, "of immense blazing energy."

13. "prompted by my grace" matprasādakṛtā: Literally, "made by my grace."

"must not prove fruitless" mā bhūd viphalā: Literally, "Let [the words] not be fruitless."

"shall pass on to your son" putram . . . gamiṣyati: Literally, "it will go to [your] son." Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T,G2,3,M3,6,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bhaviṣyati [M3—bhaviṣyate], "it will be," for gamiṣyati, "it will go." This well-supported, but grammatically defective, reading is virtually impossible to construe with the accusative putram, "son." Ct and Cr gloss, "it will attain (prāpsyati)," for bhaviṣyati, "it will be," lending the line the meaning of the critical reading. Of the translators consulted who share this reading, only Gorresio (1870, p. 210) translates as if putram were in the nominative case, rendering, "Quest' arme sarà come un secondo tuo figliuolo." Other translators render the awkward line freely. Dutt (1894, p. 1762) offers, "that one of thy sons shall sway this dart," while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 568) translates, "ton fils seul héritera de cette pique." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 560), who offers, "thy son shall inherit this weapon," and Benoît (1999, p. 1359), who renders, "ton fils héritera donc lui seul de cette arme." KK and VSP read instead bhajiṣyate, "it will serve or resort to." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 551) appears to translate this variant, rendering, "This trident shall be available to your son alone."

15. "And . . . that foremost of the asuras" cāsuraśreṣṭhaḥ: Ś,D8,12,M1,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead so 'suraśreṣṭhaḥ, "that foremost of the asuras."

16. "His . . . wife was . . . Kumbhīnasī" tasya patnī . . . kumbhīnasī hi: Literally, "Indeed, his wife was Kumbhīnasī." B4,D7,10,11,T3,4,D1,3,M2–5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kumbhīnasīti for kumbhīnasī hi, "indeed Kumbhīnasī," lending the phrase the sense "his wife was [called] 'Kumbhīnasī.' " As is pointed out by Ck, Cg, and Ct, this is the younger of the two rākṣasa women of this name and the one whom Madhu married by abduction at 7.25.22–28. These commentators refer to her as the "daughter (sutā)" of Mālyavān and the "sister (svasā)" of Rāvaṇa, but we must keep in mind that these kinship terms are used loosely here. In this case, Kumbhīnasī is, in fact, the granddaughter of Mālyavān and the cousin of Rāvaṇa. See the discussions of the relevant genealogy at 7.5.35–36 and 7.25.23–25 and notes. Compare, too, 7.60.14 and note.

"she . . . by Analā" sā hy analāyām: Literally, "she, indeed, on Analā." D6,7,10,11,T4, G2,M1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sāpy analyāyām (D6,G2—analāyāḥ), "she [was] also [the child] . . . on Analā." See 7.5.32, where Analā is said to be the daughter of Sundarī by Mālyavān, and 7.25.23–25 and notes, where Analā is said to be the mother of Kumbhīnasī and the wife of Viśvāvasu.

"of Viśvāvasu" viśvāvasoḥ: The Viśvāvasu mentioned at 7.5.1–2 is probably not the husband of Analā referred to here. He has not been mentioned previously in the genealogical accounts of the rākṣasas. See 7.5.1–2 and notes.

18. "filled with sorrow" duḥkhasamanvitaḥ: D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead krodhasamanvitaḥ, "filled with anger."

19. "this" imam: B2,M10, and KK and VSP read instead tv imam, "but this." This reading avoids the hiatus of the critical edition.

"the ocean, the abode of Varuṇa" varuṇālayam: Literally, "the abode of Varuṇa." This is a common kenning for the ocean.

20. "and" tu: Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,5–7,9–11,T3,M1, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous particle ca, "and."

21. "Such is the power of Lavaṇa, and such is the nature of that lance." evaṃprabhāvo lavaṇaḥ śūlaṃ caiva tathāvidham: Literally, "Lavaṇa is one of such power, and the lance is one of such a type."

"you must be the one who decides" pramāṇam: Literally, "the authority." Ct suggests adding the words "with regard to what is appropriate to be done. (tvaṃ pramāṇam. yathocitakaraṇa iti śeṣaḥ.)" Cr reads the term adverbially, and, adding the verb bhava, "you must be," understands the line to mean "You must be our highest recourse in such a way that it is in accordance with the authority of the śāstras" (śāstraprāmāṇyaṃ yathā bhavet tathā tvaṃ naḥ paramā gatir bhaveti śeṣaḥ). He bases this reading on the maxim that when evildoers multiply or grow great, one should have recourse to the authority of the śāstras (pāpinām eva vṛddhau śāstraprāmāṇyaṃ nivarteteti tātparyam).

22. "Up until now" purā: Literally, "earlier."

"we seers . . . have begged many kings" bahavaḥ pārthivāḥ . . . ṛṣibhiḥ . . . /. . . yācitāḥ: Literally, "by the seers many kings are begged."

"but . . . we could find no one to protect us" trātāraṃ na ca vidmahe: Literally, "and we do not know a protector."

23. "we can find no other king . . . to protect us" trātāraṃ vidmahe . . . nānyaṃ narādhipam: Literally, "we do not know another overlord of men who is a protector."

"Rāma" rāma: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tāta, "dear boy."

"And so, afflicted by the fear of Lavaṇa, we seek protection." tat paritrātum icchāmo lavaṇād bhayapīḍitāḥ: Literally, "Therefore, afflicted with fear of Lavaṇa, we wish to be protected." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the awkward accusative plural bhayapīḍitān for the nominative plural bhayapīḍitāḥ of the critical edition. Cr, who shares this reading, struggles to construe it, taking the variant as the object of a causal, the sense of which is "We desire that you cause the protection of the seers who are afflicted with the fear of Rāvaṇa [sic] (rāvaṇād [sic for lavaṇād] bhayapīḍitān ṛṣīn paritrātuṃ tvayā paritrāṇaṃ kārayitum icchāmaḥ)."

Following verse 23, D7,10,11 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ2,B, and Gorresio substitute for 23ef, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [961*]: "Thus, Rāma, we have related to you that situation, generated by danger, that has arisen.[1] You, sir, are able to put an end to this.[2] Please grant our wish, you of extraordinary valor.[3] (iti rāma niveditaṃ tu te bhayajaṃ kāraṇam utthitaṃ ca yat / vinivārayituṃ bhavān kṣamaḥ kuru taṃ kāmam ahīnavikramaḥ //)"

[1] "Thus, we have related to you that situation, generated by danger, that has arisen" niveditaṃ tu te bhayajaṃ kāraṇam utthitaṃ ca yat: Literally, "And the cause has been related to you, [that cause] which, produced by fear, has arisen."

[2] "You, sir, are able to put and end to this." vinivārayituṃ bhavān kṣamaḥ: Literally, "you, sir, are able to prevent."

[3] "you of extraordinary valor" ahīnavikrama: Literally, "O you whose valor is not insufficient."

The meter is viyoginī (vaitālīyā/sundarī).

Sarga 54

2. "of how . . . had thrived" vavṛdhe yathā: Literally, "how he grew, increased, or prospered." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the verb to refer to the feeding habits, etc., of Lavaṇa, a position that is supported by the following verses, in which the seers dwell on the rākṣasa's diet (yathā vavṛdhe yādṛgāhārādinā vardhate sma—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

3. "His conduct is that of perpetual ferocity" ācāro raudratā nityam: Literally, "[his] conduct is always ferocity."

"always" sadā: Ñ2,V3,B,D3,6,7,10,11,M5, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tathā, "and."

"in Madhuvana" madhuvane: Literally, "in Madhu's woods." This wilderness tract on the banks of the Yamunā is named, no doubt, for the great asura described in the previous sarga and is not to be confused with Sugrīva's honey-wine grove (madhuvana), devastated by the monkeys of Aṅgada's southern search party at 5.59.8–5.62.22. On this matter, see Benoît's note (1999, p. 1728).

4. "tens of thousands" daśasahasrāṇi: D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bahusahasrāṇi, "many thousands."

"lions, tigers, deer, and elephants" siṃhavyāghramṛgadvipān: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read -aṇḍajān, "egg-born," i.e., "birds and/or reptiles," for -dvipān, "elephants."

5. "that immensely powerful creature" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "that immensely powerful one."

"like Yama, himself, the ender of all things" ivāntakaḥ: Literally, "like Antaka."

"still other creatures" aparāṇi sattvāni: Literally, "other creatures." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the similar antarāṇi sattvāni, "other creatures." According to Cr, these are creatures, such as boar, that Lavaṇa devours at night, in contrast to his daily fare mentioned in verse 4 (lavaṇas tato 'ntarāṇi bhinnāni varāhādīny api sattvāni khādate khādati rātrāv iti śeṣaḥ).

6. "rākṣasa" rakṣaḥ: Apparently the rākṣasa nature of Lavaṇa is inherited from his mother, Kumbhīnasī (see 7.25.23–25 and notes). Thus he is not identified, as was his father, Madhu, as a daiteya and an asura in the previous sarga (7.53.3,10,15). See Introduction, "Rākṣasas," pp. 47–48.

"Let your fear be gone." vyapagacchatu vo bhayam: KK and VSP read instead hy apagacchatu vo bhayam, "Indeed, let your fear be gone."

7. "When he had thus made this promise" tathā teṣāṃ pratijñāya: Literally, "having promised those thus." Ñ2,B1,3,4, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead pratijñāya tathā teṣām by transposition, while Ś,Ñ1,B2,D,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, and NSP read pratijñāya tadā teṣām, "having promised those then."

8. "heroes" vīrāḥ: Ś1,3,Ñ2,V1,3,B1,4,D6–11,M9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular masculine vīraḥ. This lends pāda a the sense "Which hero will kill Lavaṇa?"

"which one . . . should deal with him" kasyāṃśaḥ saḥ: Literally, "of whom is he the share?"

"Bharata . . . Śatrughna" bharatasya . . . śatrughnasya: Ct rationalizes Rāma's restriction of the choice to these two brothers on the grounds that since he and Lakṣmaṇa dispatched Rāvaṇa, Bharata and Śatrughna should now take care of Lavaṇa (lakṣmaṇena mayā ca rāvaṇavadhaval lavaṇavadho bharataśatrughnābhyāṃ kārya iti bhāvaḥ). Cs more elaborately argues that Rāma names Bharata and Śatrughna for a number of reasons. First of all, because of his own preeminence, he would not take on so trivial an opponent [as Lavaṇa]. Secondly, he excludes Lakṣmaṇa because the latter has already achieved great fame by killing Indrajit, etc., and is, in any case, exhausted. Finally, he names both the other brothers as he does not wish to provoke any rivalry between them. (svasya mukhyatvāt tanmātravadhavyāpārāyogāl lakṣmaṇasyendrajidādimāraṇodārakīrtitvād āyastatvāc ca bhrātṛdvandvasyāpratidvandvatāṃ kāmayāno nāma nirdeśena pṛcchati bharatasyeti.)

"or, on the other hand" athavā punaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T,G2,M2,4,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca dhīmataḥ for [śatrughnasy]āthavā punaḥ. This lends the phrase the sense "or wise Śatrughna."

9. "Please let me deal with him." mamāṃśaḥ sa vidhīyatām: Literally, "Let him be determined as my share."

10. "so expressive of heroism and valor" śauryavīryasamanvitam: Literally, "endowed with heroism and valor." D7,10,11,T1,2,4,G3,M1–3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dhairyaśauryasamanvitam, "endowed with fortitude and valor."

11. "the middlemost delight of the Raghus" madhyamo raghunandanaḥ: Śatrughna uses this indirect reference to Bharata, no doubt, because, as a younger brother, he is hesitant to refer to him by name. D2,8,10,11,G3,M1,2,4,6,7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the vocative raghunandana for the nominative raghunandanaḥ, lending the phrase the sense "the middlemost, O delight of the Raghus." The vocative would, of course, refer to Rāma.

"has . . . done his duty" kṛtakarmā: Literally, "he is one by whom [his] work has been done." Cs glosses, "he has completed his service (kṛtasevaḥ)."

12. "revered elder brother . . . revered elder brother" āryeṇa . . . āryasya: Literally, "by the respected [one] . . . of the respected [one]."

"guarded the deserted city of Ayodhyā" śūnyā ayodhyā rakṣitā purī: Literally, "the deserted city of Ayodhyā was guarded." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śūnyā tv ayodhyā paripālitā, "but deserted Ayodhyā was protected." The tu, "but or and," has, in all likelihood, been inserted to avoid the hiatus.

"until the return" āgamanaṃ prati: We follow Ct in taking the postposition to stand for a limit. He glosses, "up until then (tāvatparyantam)."

13. "The great prince experienced many hardships . . . as he lay" duḥkhāni ca bahūnīha anubhūtāni . . . / śayānaḥ . . . mahātmanā: Literally, "and by the great one [who was] lying . . . many hardships were experienced here." The syntax of the verse is strained. Pādas ab and the final word, mahātmanā, form a simple karmaṇi prayoga construction, with the subject, mahātmanā, in the instrumental. Yet emboxed within it is a kartari prayoga participial clause that has no clear subordinating structure to support the active participle. Ñ2,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M9,10, and GPP and NSP imperfectly resolve the issue by reading the nominative mahāyaśāḥ, "the greatly illustrious one," for the instrumental mahātmanā. T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP substitute an active finite verb, avasat purā, "he dwelt earlier." Both of these variants leave pādas ab without an expressed subject.

"on his painful beds" duḥkhaśayyāsu: On the basis of the reference at Araṇyakāṇḍa 15.26, our understanding is that this is a circumlocution to express the fact that the ascetic Bharata has been sleeping on the cold ground. Compare also the comments of Cg in the notes to 6.112.4, where he explains Bharata's mud-daubed condition by alluding to the fact that he has been sleeping on the bare ground. This position is shared by Cs, who glosses, "beds, which cause pain, such as the bare ground (duḥkhajanakakevalasthalādiśayyāsu)." Other translators render variously. Thus Gorresio (1870, p. 212) renders, "su duri letti." Dutt (1894, p. 1764) offers, "on a bed of sorrow," while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 570) translates, "sur la dure." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 561) offers, "lying on a hard couch," and Benoît (1999, p. 1360) translates, "sur un lit de souffrances." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 553) translates, "on his bed of sorrows," while Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, page 859) renders, "on uncomfortable bed."

14. "matted locks" jaṭā: D1,2,7,9–11,T3,4,G1,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous jaṭī. For a description of Bharata at Nandigrāma, where he is wearing matted locks, see 6.112.4; 6.113.26–30; and notes.

"barkcloth garments" cīra-: At Nandigrāma, Bharata wore the barkcloth garments of an ascetic (see 6.113.26–30 and notes), as did Rāma when he was exiled in the forest (see 2.33.6–13; 2.97.20; 6.23.5; 6.112.5–7; and notes). On barkcloth garments, see Emeneau 1962.

"the delight of the Rāghavas" rāghavanandanaḥ: The nominative singular masculine ending, -aḥ, is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

16. "Let Bharata stay here" niveśaya . . . bharatam: Literally, "cause Bharata to settle down." The phrase is awkward and ambiguous, and the commentators seem uncertain as to how to understand it. Ck and Ct understand, as we do, that the expression means that Śatrughna should establish, that is, leave, Bharata in Ayodhyā. Ct glosses: "Then establish Bharata. The meaning is 'Have him stay right here.' (tadā bharataṃ niveśaya. atraiva sthāpayety arthaḥ.)" Ck understands similarly. Cg gives this as his first explanation but also suggests, as an alternative, that the verb niveśaya may simply be an injunction to Śatrughna to remain there, i.e., in Madhu's city (niveśayātraiva nagara iti śeṣaḥ. athavā tatraiva tiṣṭheti bhāvaḥ). Cr, somewhat similarly to Cg, first understands that Bharata is to stay in Ayodhyā but then offers his own alternative in the form of an injunction for Śatrughna to establish a population [in Madhu's city] (tadā nagare 'yodhyāyām eva niveśaya saṃsthāpaya prajāḥ sthāpayety artho vā).

"great-armed hero" mahābāho: Literally, "great-armed [one]."

"if you are concerned about him" yady avekṣase: Literally, "if you care or have regard for." The commentators understand this to be a reference to Śatrughna's previously expressed concern that Bharata should experience no further hardship. Ck, Cg, and Ct add the phrase "because he is not to be pained (akleśanīyatveneti śeṣaḥ)." Cr adds, "because he is worn out (śrāntatveneti śeṣaḥ)."

17. "You are . . . capable of resettling that city, which was so beloved of Madhu, as well as its splendid countryside" tvam . . . samarthaḥ saṃniveśane / nagaraṃ madhunā juṣṭaṃ tathā janapadāñ śubhān //: Literally, "You are capable in regard to the settlement [with respect to] the city beloved of Madhu as well as the beautiful countryside." The syntax is awkward because it is hard to see a clear grammatical connection between the accusatives in pādas cd (nagaram and janapadān) and the locative saṃniveśane in pāda c. We understand the term saṃniveśane, "in the settlement," here as "in resettlement," since Śatrughna is being instructed to establish his rule in the city already founded by Madhu. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,T4,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for the virtually pleonastic upasarga, sam. GPP, Gita Press, and VSP read pādas cd as pādas ab of the following verse, although this does nothing to improve the syntax. VSP omits, while KK admits in brackets (numbered as 7.62.18ab), 17cd (nagaraṃ yamunājuṣṭaṃ tathā janapadāñ śubhān). GPP notes that these pādas are omitted from the text of Cg. D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and KK read yamunā for madhunā, yielding the phrase yamunājuṣṭam, "served by (i.e., washed or watered by) the Yamunā." Cs understands, "situated on its banks (tattīravarti)."

"well trained" kṛtavidyaḥ: Literally, "one by whom knowledge has been acquired."

18. "For whoever uproots" yo hi . . . samutpāṭya: Literally, "for who having uprooted." Ś1,3,Ñ,V1,3,D,G1,2,M2,5–7,9,10, and Gorresio, GPP, and NSP read samutpādya, "having created or brought into being," for samutpāṭya, "having uprooted."

"a lineage" vaṃśam: D6,T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead śatrum, "an enemy."

"then, upon the destruction" punaḥ kṣaye: D6,7,10,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead niveśane, "in the settlement." This is glossed by Ct as "in the city (nagare)." Ck and Cg, on the other hand, gloss, "in the kingdom of a king whose lineage has been uprooted (utpāṭitavaṃśanṛparājya ity arthaḥ)."

"fails to install another king" na vidhatte nṛpam: Literally, "he [who] does not ordain a king."

"descends to hell" narakaṃ sa nigacchati: Literally, "he descends to hell." D6,10,11, T3,4,M3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read narakaṃ sa hi gacchati, "indeed he goes to hell."

20. "you must not raise any objection" uttaram . . . na vaktavyam: Literally, "a reply is not to be uttered." Ct understands the objection that Rāma anticipates to be Śatrughna's request to return to dwell in Rāma's presence after killing Lavaṇa (lavaṇaṃ hatvā tvatsamīpa eva mayā stheyam ityādi na vācyam ity arthaḥ). Ck and Cg understand similarly. Cr understands that Rāma makes this prohibition because he realizes that, because of his fear of separation, Śatrughna does not wish to rule (viyogabhīrutvena rājyecchārahitaṃ vijñāyāhottaram iti). Compare the passage at sarga 63, where Śatrughna, wishing to remain with Rāma, returns to Ayodhyā but is told by Rāma to go back to Madhurā.

"A younger brother . . . of his elder brother" bālena pūrvajasya: Literally, "by a child or young person . . . of one born earlier."

21. "I have undertaken" mayodyatam: Ś1,B4,D5–7,10,11,G3,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the virtually synonymous mamodyatam. Cr glosses, "commanded [by me] (ājñāpitam)."

"one that is accompanied by rites and mantras performed by the brahmans headed by Vasiṣṭha" vasiṣṭhapramukhair viprair vidhimantrapuraskṛtam: Literally, "accompanied with rites and mantras by brahmans among whom Vasiṣṭha is the foremost." The verse lacks a specific participle indicating that the abhiṣeka rite is to be performed by Vasiṣṭha, etc. Thus we have added the word "performed" to complete the syntax.

Sarga 55

1. "was extremely embarrassed" parāṃ vrīḍām upāgataḥ: Literally, "[he] approached the highest embarrassment." B2,3,D6,7,10,11,G1,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous finite variant upāgamat, "he approached." Ct and Cs note that Śatrughna is embarrassed or ashamed because of what he takes to be an improper royal consecration. Cs elaborates that he is embarrassed because, aside from Rāma, who is the ruler of the entire earth, he has two other older brothers who should have had precedence in regard to royal consecration. (parāṃ vrīḍām anucitarājyābhiṣekoktiśravaṇajāṃ lajjām—so Ct; akhaṇḍabhūmaṇḍalādhipatipuratas tvāṃ vinā jyeṣṭhayoḥ satoś ca purāntare 'bhiṣecanaṃ mama katham iti vrīḍām upāgamat—so Cs.)

"he spoke hesitantly" mandaṃ mandam uvāca ha: Literally, "he spoke slowly, slowly or softly, softly." Ct notes that Śatrughna's hesitation derives from his embarrassment (lajjām ata eva mandaṃ mandam uvāca).

971*. Following verse 1, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,S, insert a passage of two lines [971*]: (adharmaṃ vidma kākutstha asminn arthe nareśvara / kathaṃ tiṣṭhatsu jyeṣṭheṣu kanīyān abhiṣicyate //). It is not clear on what grounds these lines have been relegated to the critical apparatus. According to the critical apparatus, only one of the manuscripts (V2) collated for the critical edition omits this line. Perhaps the editors were uncomfortable with the passage's ascription of wrongful behavior to both Rāma and Śatrughna in the violation of precedence. Given the overwhelming textual support for 971*, 973*, and 977*, we have emended the critical text accordingly.

"in this affair" asminn arthe: KK and VSP read instead hy asminn arthe, "indeed, in this matter," to avoid the hiatus. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"when there are elder brothers living" tiṣṭhatsu jyeṣṭheṣu: Literally, "while elders are standing or existing."

2[a–d]. "It is true . . . that an order . . . And your command" śāsanam . . . tava caiva . . . śāsanam: Literally, "an order . . . and even your order." As we understand the verse, Śatrughna is trying to rationalize the dilemma in which he has been placed by what he sees as two conflicting imperatives. The first of these is the general rule of primogeniture, according to which he should not be consecrated as a king before his elder brothers. The second is the inviolability of an elder brother's specific command. Our interpretation is consonant with that of Cs, who understands that the first śāsana, or ordinance, refers to a vedic ordinance to the effect that there should be no consecration of juniors when there are seniors living, an ordinance that must be followed by discriminating people. The second śāsana refers to Rāma's specific command regarding the consecration. This command may not be violated because of the impropriety of disregarding the orders of an elder. Thus the idea is that Śatrughna is caught in a double bind. (śāsanaṃ śrutikṛtaṃ jyeṣṭheṣu satsu kanīyasāṃ nābhiśeko vivekibhiḥ kārya iti lakṣaṇam. avaśyaṃ karaṇīyaṃ tava ca śāsanaṃ rājyābhiṣekasaṃpādanarūpaṃ duratikramam. jyeṣṭhājñāvajñānasyānaucityād ity ubhayataḥ pāśārajjur jāteti bhāvaḥ.) Ct, who believes that both occurrences of the term śāsana refer to Rāma's orders, notes that the second is not to be violated any more than an ordinance of the vedas. He thus, like Cs, sees Śatrughna as placed in some sort of double bind. Perhaps he, too, is implicitly making a distinction between some prior discussion on Rāma's part regarding primogeniture and his current command, which violates that rule. (tava śāsanaṃ cāvaśyaṃ karaṇīyaṃ yatas tava śāsanaṃ vedaśāsanavad duratikramam atikramitum aśakyam. evaṃ cobhayataḥ pāśārajjur iyaṃ me jātety arthaḥ.) Other commentators and all translators consulted understand both occurrences of the term śāsana, "command," to refer to Rāma's command, which, in our opinion, makes the verse improperly redundant.

Following 2cd, D6,7,10,11,T4,M (after the second occurrence),5,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, Ñ2,B1,3,4,T2,M2,4,6,7 insert after 2ab,, while B2 substitutes for 2cd, and M3 continues following 971*, a passage of one line [976*]: "I have heard from you, hero, and I have heard from the vedas[1] (tvatto mayā śrutaṃ vīra śrutibhyaś ca mayā śrutam)."

[1] "I have heard from you . . . and I have heard from the vedas" tvatto mayā śrutaṃ . . . śrutibhyaś ca mayā śrutam: Here again the text appears to posit a conflict between the supposedly vedic doctrine of ceding precedence to the elder and Rāma's order that contravenes this doctrine. This is certainly the opinion of a number of the commentators. Ct, for example, prefaces his remarks to this line and 973* (see below) by saying, "How do you understand it since it is both unrighteous to consecrate a junior when there is an elder brother and also to fail to carry out the instructions of one's elder? (jyeṣṭhe vidyamāne kaniṣṭhābhiṣeko 'dharmas tathā jyeṣṭhavākyākaraṇaṃ cādharma iti tvayā katham avagataṃ tatrāha tvatta iti.)" Ck, Cr, and Cs all understand somewhat similarly.

973*. Following 976*, B2,D6,7,10,11,T4,M5,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert; while Ś,Ñ1,V(1 after 2ab)3,D1–5,8,9,12 insert following 972*; Ñ2,B1,3,4,T2,M1 (after 2cd—repeat),2,4,6,7 continue lines 1–5 following 976* and insert line 6 after 2cd; T1,G3,M3 insert following 2cd; T3,4 insert lines 4,6 only following 2ab—repeat; G1,2, M8,10 insert lines 1–5 and line 6 following 2cd; a passage of six lines [973*]. Note that despite the somewhat confusing textual evidence, as in the case of 971* discussed above, all manuscripts, with the exception of V2, admit the passage. Thus the reasons for its being relegated to the critical apparatus are unclear. Given the overwhelming textual support for this passage, we have emended the critical text accordingly. See notes to 971* above.

973*1–2. "Since our middle brother had already made his vow, I should not have spoken after that. I spoke improperly in saying that I would slay the fearsome Lavaṇa in battle. (nottaraṃ hi mayā vācyaṃ madhyame pratijānati / vyāhṛtaṃ durvaco ghoraṃ hantāsmi lavaṇaṃ mṛdhe //)."

"Since our middle brother had already made his vow . . . I spoke improperly in saying that I would slay the fearsome Lavaṇa in battle" madhyame pratijānati / vyāhṛtaṃ durvaco ghoraṃ hantāsmi lavaṇaṃ mṛdhe //: Literally, "when the middle one is promising, a bad speech [was] spoken: 'I will slay the fearsome Lavaṇa in battle.'" The provenance of the vow here, that is, whether it was spoken by Bharata or Śatrughna, is ambiguous. On the one hand, thus far, only Bharata has explicitly made such a vow, although his words at 7.54.9 (aham enaṃ vadhiṣyāmi) are not quoted verbatim here. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs clearly see the words here as belonging to the vow of Bharata (madhyame bhrātari bharata ity arthaḥ ghoraṃ lavaṇaṃ hantāsmīti pratijānati sati—so Cg; Ck, Ct, and Cs similarly). In this they are followed only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, pp. 553–54)

among the translators consulted, who renders, "When our middle brother said that he would slay Lavaṇa." On the other hand, the phrase "I spoke improperly (vyāhṛtaṃ durvacaḥ)" intervenes between the reference to Bharata's vow and the actual promise, suggesting, as we see it, that Śatrughna has implicitly undertaken such a vow in putting himself forward, even though his elder, Bharata, had already spoken. Among the commentators, Cv and Cr explicitly ascribe the words of the vow here to Śatrughna, and, as we do, the majority of translators follow this interpretation (madhyame bharate pratijānaty uttaraṃ paraṃ vākyaṃ mayā na vācyaṃ hi tathāpi lavaṇaṃ hantāsmīti durvaco vyāhṛtam—so Cv; Cs similarly). It should be noted, however, that in their glosses to the following lines, most of the commentators who had ascribed the words to Bharata see them as also representing the ill-spoken and improper vow of Śatrughna and thus understand that both brothers have made the same vow.

973*3–4. "And, bull among men, this wrongful speech of mine will have dire consequences, for one should not speak further once an elder has spoken. (tasyeyaṃ me duruktasya durgatiḥ puruṣarṣabhaḥ / uttaraṃ hi na vaktavyaṃ jyeṣṭhenābhihite sati //)"

"this" iyam: V1,3,D1–4,7,9–11,T4,G1,M2,3,7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead evam, "thus."

"dire consequences" durgatiḥ: Literally, "distress or misfortune." Ct and Cr understand the dire consequences to be Śatrughna's consignment to hell for having opposed an elder brother and thus having received a wrongful consecration (tasyaiva duruktasya phalam iti śeṣo durgatir jyeṣṭhātikramahetukanirayaprāptikāraṇībhūtābhiṣekaprāptir me jātā—so Cr; Ct similarly). Ck and Cg understand the term to refer to Śatrughna's acquisition of a wrongful mission (duṣṭakāryasya prāptiḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly). Cv takes it to refer specifically to the evil consequence, which was the consecration of oneself while passing over an elder (durgatir duṣphalaṃ tac ca jyeṣṭhātikrameṇātmābhiṣecanam).

"once an elder has spoken" jyeṣṭhābhihite sati: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jyeṣṭhābhihite punaḥ, "when an elder has spoken, moreover."

973*5–6. "It was filled with unrighteousness and would exclude one from heaven. I shall not speak after you a second time, Kākutstha. (adharmasahitaṃ caiva paralokavivarjitam / so 'haṃ dvitīyaṃ kākutstha na vakṣyāmi tavottaram //)"

"exclude one from heaven" paralokavivarjitam: Literally, "excluded from the next world."

"I shall not speak after you" na vakṣyāmi tavottaram: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead na vakṣyāmīti cottaram, "and I shall not speak in this fashion after [you]." We follow Cv, Ck, and Cg (Cm—according to the critical apparatus), who understand the term uttaram here to mean "subsequent" (atrāpy uttaraśabdaḥ paravacanaḥ—so Cv; Ck and Cg similarly).

Following 973*, Ñ2,B1,3,D6,7,9–11,S insert a passage of one line [975*]: "Let a second punishment[1] not fall upon me, Rāghava[2] (mā dvitīyo hi daṇḍo vai nipaten mayi rāghava /)."

[1] "a second punishment" dvitīyaḥ . . . daṇḍaḥ: The commentators differ somewhat in their understanding of what this phrase means. Cv, Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand the first punishment to be the one in the form of the consecration of Śatrughna for having said he would go after Bharata had first expressed his intention to do so. Śatrughna now seeks to avoid a second punishment, which he would incur by refusing to accept Rāma's instruction that he be consecrated. (bharate jigamiṣaty ahaṃ gamiṣyāmīty uttareṇa prathamena rājyābhiṣekāpattirūpo daṇḍaḥ patitaḥ. tvayābhiṣekaṃ pratīcchety ukteḥ tadanaṅgīkāreṇottareṇa dvitīyena mayi daṇḍo mā nipated iti bhāvaḥ—so Cg; Cv, Ct, and Cr similarly; Ck more or less similarly.)

[2] "Rāghava" rāghava: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mānada, "humbler of pride." On the term mānada, see 3309*, note 1, following note to 6.108.5.

977*. "Kākutstha, delight of the Raghus, please exonerate me from any wrongdoing with regard to what I have done (adharmaṃ jahi kākustha matkṛte raghunandana /)." Following verse 2, Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B,D,S (except M1) insert a passage of one line [977*]. Since the line is known to all recensions and all but two manuscripts, the reasons for its relegation to the critical apparatus are unclear, and we have emended the critical text accordingly. See notes to 971* above.

"please exonerate me from any wrongdoing with regard to what I have done" adharmaṃ jahi . . . matkṛte: Literally, "destroy unrighteousness with regard to what I have done." Ct understands this phrase to mean that with respect to what Śatrughna has done in accepting the royal consecration, Rāma should destroy all wrongdoing, that is to say, he should make it so that any association with wrongdoing should be as if it never happened. In other words, he sees Śatrughna as asking Rāma to do away with the notion that he has acted improperly in the minds of everyone in this world and the next. (matkṛte madanuṣṭhite rājyābhiṣekasvīkāre 'dharmaṃ jahi mamādharmasaṃbandho yathā na bhavet tathā kuru. ihāmutra sarvalokasya mayy anyāyyakāritvabuddhiṃ parihara.) Ck and Cg understand similarly. Cr understands similarly and concludes by saying that this expression suggests Śatrughna's determination (niścayaḥ) that Rāma is capable of accomplishing something that is unprecedented (etena rāmo 'ghaṭitaghaṭanāpaṭīyān iti śatrughnaniścayaḥ sūcitaḥ).

3. "delighted" saṃhṛṣṭaḥ: Ck understands that Rāma is delighted because [Śatrughna] has accepted the order for the consecration (aṅgīkṛtābhiṣekaniyogatvāt). Cg argues similarly that Rāma is delighted because [Śatrughna] has undertaken the order for the consecration (kṛtābhiṣekaniyogatvād iti bhāvaḥ).

"Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata" lakṣmaṇaṃ bharataṃ tathā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bharataṃ lakṣmaṇam by transposition. Cv and Cg note that although only the princes are named because of their preeminence, we must understand that Rāma's instructions in the following verse are actually directed also to Sumantra, etc. For otherwise, as these commentators note, there would be a contradiction with the plural imperative in that verse. (lakṣmaṇaṃ bharataṃ tatheti prādhānyāt sumantrādīn apy ity arthaḥ. anyathānayadhvam iti bahuvacanaṃ virudhyeta—so Cg; Cv similarly.)

4. "invincible" durjayam: Ñ2,B,D6,7,10,11,T4,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāghavam, "Rāghava."

5. "You two Kākutsthas" kākutsthau: The reference is, of course, to Bharata and Lakṣmaṇa, and here, as in verse 3, the plural is used despite the dual subject, presumably on the grounds adduced by Cv and Cg at verse 3 above. D6,7,10,11,G,M1,3,8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the vocative singular, kākutstha, "O Kākutstha." It is hard to say to whom the singular vocative would refer. KK and VSP read instead the even more difficult accusative singular, kākutstham. This can only make sense if we take it as an adjective in the sense of "belonging to the Kākutsthas," that modifies purodhasam, lending the phrase the sense "the purohita of the Kākutsthas, i.e., Vasiṣṭha." This reading is unattested in the critical apparatus. M2,7, and the text of Cv read instead the vocative plural, kākutsthāḥ. Of this reading, Cv says that because of the preeminence of the Kākutsthas, the non-Kākutsthas as well are being addressed. He further claims that other, unnamed commentators hold that it is the intention of the Lord [Rāma] that the plural is to be used even for two individuals because of the rule that everything other than the singular is plural (kākutsthā iti kākutsthaprādhānyād akākutsthā api tathā saṃbodhyante. ekasmād anyat sarvam anekam. ato dvayor api bahuvacanaṃ prayoktavyam iti bhagavato 'bhiprāya iti kecit). The critical apparatus reads anekam, but our manuscript of Cv from the BORI reads ekam, with the an marked in the margins as a correction (p. 193; the Adyar Library version of the manuscript reads aneka, p. 846).

"the purohita" purodhasam: The referent here is Vasiṣṭha. B2,3,M6, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous purohitam. See notes to 7.51-2*.7.

"the vedic brahmans" naigamān: This term is ambiguous, as it refers sometimes to vaidika scholars and sometimes to the merchant class or even the general population. In each case, one must judge the probable meaning from the context. Here, in the context of the ritual performance of the rājyābhiṣeka and without specific mention of other classes of society, we believe the term is taken in its restrictive sense of vaidika brahmans. All translations consulted, however, understand the term here to refer to the merchant class or the citizenry in general. See 7.34.17; 7.51-2*.5–6; 7.65.2; and notes. See, too, Prakṣipta III, sarga 1.2–3 (= App. I, No. 8, line 307), and Prakṣipta III, sarga 2.33–35 (= App. I, No. 8, line 426). As Pollock (1986, p. 425) has mentioned in his note to 2.53.16, Cm, Cr, and Cs understand the term here as "those who know the vedas and śāstras." Cf. 2.1.14; 6.116.57–58; and notes, where the term is translated as "merchants," and 7.82.17–19; 7.97.1; and notes, where the term is translated as "townsfolk" or "people of the city."

"my" me: D7,10,11,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tān, "[all] those."

6. "the purohita with all the requisites for the consecration" abhiṣekasamārambham . . . purodhasam: Literally, "the purodhas [and] the undertaking or commencement of the consecration." The syntax is awkward. We follow Ct, who takes abhiṣekasamārambham as a possessive adjective in the sense of "a purohita who had the requisites for the consecration (abhiṣekopakaraṇavantaṃ purodhasam)." Cr understands samārambham to refer to the requisites for the consecration and takes the term as a separate object of the gerund puraskṛtya (abhiṣekasya samārambhaṃ sāmagrīṃ purodhasaṃ ca puraskṛtya).

"which was like the mansion of Indra, smasher of citadels" puraṃdaragṛhopamam: Literally, "comparable to the house of Puraṃdara." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājāno brāhmaṇās tathā, "the kings and brahmans as well [entered]."

7. "And then" tataḥ: Literally, "then." KK and VSP read instead tathā, "thus."

"commenced" vavṛdhe: Literally, "it grew or prospered." We follow Cr, who glosses, "it commenced or proceeded (pravavṛdhe)." Following verse 7, Ś,Ñ2,V3,B,D3,6–8,10–12,T1,2,4,G,M, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of eight lines [981*]: "Once Śatrughna[1] had been consecrated, he resembled the sun.[2] And he was just like Skanda when he was consecrated long ago by the hosts of the Maruts[3] together with Indra[1–2]. When Śatrughna had been consecrated by Rāma, tireless in action, the townsfolk and the deeply learned brahmans were extremely delighted. [3–4] And Kausalyā, Sumitrā, Kaikeyī, and the other consorts of the king performed auspicious rites[4] in the king's palace.[5–6] On the basis of Śatrughna's consecration, the great seers who dwelt on the banks of the Yamunā considered Lavaṇa as good as dead.[5][7–8]"

While the passage has broad and strong manuscript representation, it does not have the virtually universal textual support that would lead us to emend the critical text. See notes to 971* above.

[1] "Śatrughna" śatrughnaḥ: Ñ2,B,D6,10,11,M1, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kākutsthaḥ, "Kākutstha," which would still, of course, refer to Śatrughna.

[2] "he resembled the sun" babhūvādityasaṃnibhaḥ: Literally, "he became similar to Āditya." D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead babhau cādityasaṃnibhaḥ, "and he shone like Āditya."

[3] "by the hosts of the Maruts" marudgaṇaiḥ: Ś,Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D3,6–8,10–12,T4,M6,8–10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead divaukasaiḥ, "by the denizens of heaven," i.e., the gods.

[4] "And Kausalyā, Sumitrā, Kaikeyī, and the other consorts of the king performed auspicious rites" kausalyā ca sumitrā ca mañgalaṃ kaikayī tathā / cakrus tāḥ . . . yāś cānyā rājayoṣitaḥ: It is interesting to note that the three principal widows of the late King Daśaratha are able to perform auspicious rites (mañgalam). Here, as elsewhere in the poem, there seems to be no hint of any inauspiciousness attached to widowhood or any practice of the seclusion or exclusion of widows. The other women mentioned here would be the consorts of Daśaratha, three hundred fifty of whom are mentioned at 2.31.7–11.

[5] "considered Lavaṇa as good as dead" hataṃ lavaṇam āśaṃsuḥ: Literally, "they expected Lavaṇa [to be] slain." Ct, whom we more or less follow, gives the correct form of the verb and then glosses, "determined or resolved" (āśaṃsur āśasaṃsur niścitavantaḥ)."

8. "inciting his blazing martial energy" tejas tasyābhipūrayan: Literally, "filling up his blazing energy." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand tejaḥ, "energy," to be the strength and valor suitable for killing one's enemy (śatrusaṃhārocitabalavīryam).

9. "Here is a . . . arrow for you" ayaṃ śaraḥ . . . te: Literally, "this arrow . . . for you." Cg, Ct, and Cr all suggest adding the phrase "is being given to you by me" (te tubhyaṃ mayā dīyata iti śeṣaḥ—so Cr; Cg and Ct similarly).

10. "when the self-existent and invincible God" svayaṃbhūr ajito devaḥ: Literally, "the self-existent [and] unconquered God." The reference is, of course, to Viṣṇu Nārāyaṇa, who is said to rest or sleep on the primordial waters during the periods of universal destruction. And, indeed, both Ck and Ct refer to this period by its proper term pralaya. Ck, however, although he acknowledges that the epithet "unconquered (ajitaḥ)" refers to Viṣṇu, argues, in keeping with his Brahmaite theology, that the term "self-existent (svayaṃbhūḥ)," which is, in any case, a very common epithet of Brahmā, refers here to Viṣṇu's taking another form as Virāṭ, or Prajāpati. Prajāpati, according to Taittirīyasaṃhitā (MGOL) 7.1.5.1, which Ck quotes, moves in the form of wind across the primordial waters at the time of universal destruction (pralaya). (ajito viṣṇuḥ. viṣṇvaparamūrtir bhagavān svayaṃbhūr virāṭ prajāpatir āpo vā idam agre salilam āsīt. tasmin prajāpatir vāyur bhūtvācarad ityādeḥ.) Ct, who also understands that Viṣṇu is in the form of wind, notes Ck's adduction of the vedic passage (mahārṇave śayanaṃ ca vāyurūpeṇa. prajāpatir vāyur bhūtvācarad iti śruter iti katakaḥ). D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read divyaḥ, "divine," for devaḥ, "god," lending the phrase the sense "the divine self-existent [one]."

"whom even the gods and asuras could not perceive" yaṃ nāpaśyan surāsurāḥ: Literally, "whom the gods and asuras did not see." Ck and Ct note that by the maxim of "how much more or how much less," this phrase implies that Viṣṇu was invisible to all beings (kaimutikanyāyena sarvabhūtādṛśyaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly). It is no doubt this phrase that reminds Ck and Ct of the Taittirīya passage (7.1.5.1) in which the creator was said to have become wind or air (see above).

11. "For" hi: KK and VSP read instead tu, "and or but." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"imperceptible to all beings, he" adṛśyaḥ sarvabhūtāṇāṃ tena: The syntax of the verse is somewhat confusing. Strictly speaking, grammatically the adjective adṛśyaḥ, "invisible or imperceptible," should construe with śarottamaḥ, "greatest of arrows," and, indeed, this is the way that Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 861) has understood the passage. But this makes little sense contextually, especially since later, at 7.61.17ff., the arrow's appearance is richly described. We, therefore, like most of the other translators consulted, understand the adjective adṛśyaḥ to modify devaḥ, "God," in 10c above and understand that the syntax has shifted from active to passive between pādas 11a and 11b. Ck and Ct apparently read the syntax in this way. See notes to verse 10 above.

"who constituted an obstacle" vighāte vartamānayoḥ: Literally, "[those two] existing with regard to impediment." The idea is, according to Cg, that the two demons were intent upon the obstruction of creation (vighāte sṛṣṭīvighne vartamānayos tatparayor ity arthaḥ). D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read sarvarakṣasām for vartamānayoḥ. This presents a somewhat awkward reading. A literal rendering of the passage would be "there being an obstacle on the part of all the rākṣasas [as well as Madhu and Kaiṭabha]." Ck and Ct understand that when the Lord in the form of the golden embryo, Hiraṇyagarbha, was desirous of creating the three worlds, an obstacle was created on the part of the two demons—Madhu and Kaiṭabha—as well as all the rākṣasas (trīṃl lokān sraṣṭukāmena bhagavatā hiraṇyagarbheṇa tasyāḥ sṛṣṭer madhukaiṭabhayoḥ sarvarakṣasāṃ ca sakāśād vighāte vighne prāpte—so Ct; Ck similarly). The translators who share this variant seem to struggle with it. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 572) understands the verse to mean that Viṣṇu, who desired to create the three worlds in spite of all the rākṣasas, killed Madhu and Kaiṭabha in battle. He renders, "Madhu et Kaitabha, qu'en dépit de tous les Rakshas, lui qui désirait émettre les trois mondes, il tua dans un combat." In this odd interpretation he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 563), who translates, "That god . . . in order to slay those two perverse beings Madhu and Kaitabha . . . when he desired to create the Three Worlds despite all the Rakshasas," and Benoît (1999, p. 1362), who offers, "Il s'agissait . . . des démons Madhu et Kaiṭabha, que le dieu désireux de créer le Triple Monde parvint à tuer au combat, malgré l'intervention de tous les rākṣasa." As noted by Benoît (1999, p. 1728), the creation myth in this passage is rather confused because it appears that the demons Madhu and Kaiṭabha, as well as perhaps all the rākṣasas, were already in existence prior to the creation, which they then attempt to impede. On the identity of Madhu and Kaiṭabha, see notes to 7.4.14.

12. "killed . . . with this foremost of arrows" hatau . . . / anena śaramukhyena: This account is starkly at variance with the account of the destruction of Madhu and Kaiṭabha at App. I, No. 10, lines 91–108. There, it is with his discus that Viṣṇu kills the two demons (104–105), who were born from the earwax (of Viṣṇu?) (lines 98–99). For details on these two demons, see 7.4.14; 7.94.4,5–6; and notes.

Following 12ab, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [985*]: "Once he had slain those two—Madhu and Kaiṭabha—for the sake of the world[1] (tau hatvā jagato hy arthe kaiṭabhaṃ ca madhuṃ tathā /)."

[1] "for the sake of the world" jagato hy arthe: D6,7,10,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead janabhogārthe [-thaṃ—KK, VSP], "for the sake of the pleasure or enjoyment of the people."

13. "when I wanted to kill" vadhārthinā: Literally, "by [me] seeking or wishing to slay."

"fearing that there might be a great panic" mahāṃs trāso bhaved iti: Literally, "[thinking] 'there might be great fear.'" D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read hrāsaḥ, "diminution or decimation," for trāsaḥ, "fear." The commentators naturally feel obligated to explain why Rāma's use of the arrow against Rāvaṇa would have been so disastrous. Their explanation basically is that the energy of this arrow is far greater than that required to kill a relatively minor foe like Rāvaṇa, and so its excess energy would destroy many, if not all, beings. Therefore, in his compassion for creatures, Rāma withheld it. This implies, of course, that Lavaṇa is a far more powerful enemy than Rāvaṇa and is one who could thus consume all of the energy of the arrow. (alpakṣaye mahāstraprayogena tanmātrahanane na śāmyati. kiṃtu bhūtānī saṃharati. ato bhūtadayayā na kṣipta iti bhāvaḥ. anena rāvaṇād api lavaṇasya mahābalatvena divyaśaraparyāptaviṣayatvam uktam—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Ck then illustrates and elaborates the situation with an example drawn from the Mahābhārata. He says that if the weapon were to fail to reach the one it was intended to kill, it would kill [many] creatures and that if it missed its target, it would even kill the one who released it. It is for this reason that Arjuna did not use the divine weapon-spell of Paśupati during the Bhārata War (MBh 3.41.13–16). (saṃhāryālābhe bhūtāny eva saṃharati. tasyāpy alābhe moktāram eva nāśayatīti sthitiḥ. ata evārjunena bhāratayuddhe pāśupatāstraṃ na prayuktam.) This interpretation, which may, indeed, be the correct one, highlights the revisionist nature of much of the Uttarakāṇḍa because it would seem to undermine the power of the epic's central tale of Rāma's cosmic mission to destroy Rāvaṇa, the most powerful enemy of righteousness, by now positing in this minor epilogue a still greater demon, Lavaṇa. Cs evidently is concerned at this interpretation and especially at the idea that Lavaṇa could be more powerful than Rāvaṇa and yet be defeated by a warrior inferior to Rāma, i.e., Śatrughna. He offers two explanations of the verse and then articulates a critique of Ct's commentary on it. His first interpretation seems to be based on the idea that, like several weapons mentioned in the epic, such as the spear given to Karṇa by Indra in the Mahābhārata (3.294.23–28), the arrow could only be used once. Thus, he understands that Rāma did not loose the arrow on Rāvaṇa because he feared that were it to have been used [up] at that time, then there might have been a massive destruction of people at the hands of Lavaṇa, who needed to be killed but would still continue to live. Alternatively, Cs suggests that Rāma did not release the arrow at Rāvaṇa because he, the shooter [as opposed to the arrow], was so much more powerful than Rāvaṇa that, in the absence of any equivalence between them, there might have been a great destruction of beings [in the form of collateral damage]. However, since Śatrughna is less powerful, his strength would be commensurate with and appropriate to that of Lavaṇa. Cs then quotes Ct's comment at length and dismisses it on two grounds. First, he argues that if it were true that Lavaṇa were more powerful than Rāvaṇa, it would have been inappropriate for Rāma, who was an authority on dharma, to dispatch a younger brother, born of a different womb, and, moreover, his own dependent, on such a mission. Thus, Cs argues, it would have been appropriate for Rāma to go himself. Moreover, Cs argues that such an interpretation would contradict the earlier story in which Madhu (Lavaṇa's mighty father) had fled in fear of Rāvaṇa, being spared only through the intercession of his wife, and then had served as a mere follower of the rākṣasa lord on his campaign of conquest (7.25.20–49). Cs concludes that Ct has failed to state the underlying issue here, which ought to have been stated. By this we understand him to be implying that Lavaṇa would have been still less powerful than his great father, Madhu, who, in turn, was no match for Rāvaṇa. (rāvaṇasya vadhārthinā mayāyaṃ śaraḥ pūrvaṃ na muktaḥ. etasya tatra viniyoga etadvadhyasya lavaṇasya tathaivāvasthāne lokānāṃ lavaṇamukhena mahān hrāso bhaved ato 'yaṃ na mukta iti bhāvaḥ. yadvā rāvaṇasya vadhārthinā mayā pūrvaṃ nāyaṃ śaro muktaḥ. moktur mama balādhikyena rāvaṇamātraparyāptiṃ vinā bhūtānāṃ mahān hrāso bhaved ity arthaḥ. tava nyūnabalatvena lavaṇamātraparyāptatvam upapannam iti bhāvaḥ. nāgojibhaṭṭena . . . iti vyākhyātam. tatra lavaṇasya rāvaṇāpekṣayādhikye rāmeṇaitādṛśe karmaṇi bhinnodarajasyānujasya svānuvartino dharmādhyakṣeṇa preṣaṇaṃ na yujyate. svayam eva gantum aucityāt. pūrvaṃ rāvaṇabhīter madhor dūragamanasya bhāryāmukhato dattābhītes tena saha digvijayānugatikathanasyaitad arthavirodhitvāt. etad arthamūlasyāvaśyavaktavyasyānuktatvāc ca.)

14. "three-eyed Śiva" tryambakena: Literally, "by the three-eyed one." This is a common epithet of Śiva, although it occurs only five times in the critical edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa (1.7412; 6.33.6; 6.81.34; 7.45.18; and here). See notes to 7.45.18.

15. "Leaving it in his palace" tat saṃnikṣipya bhavane: Literally, "Having set that down in the palace." Ñ2,M10, and KK and VSP read instead sa taṃ nikṣipya bhavane, "He, having put that down in the palace," where śūla is understood to be a masculine noun.

"he searches" samālokya: Literally, "having surveyed or inspected." D6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samāsādya, "having roamed or reached."

"his food" āhāram ātmanaḥ: Literally, "his own food." D6,7,10,11,T4,M1,3,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āhāram uttamam, "excellent food."

16. "anyone . . . him" kaścid enam: Literally, "someone . . . him." D6,7,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead yadi kaścit, "if someone."

"that rākṣasa" rakṣaḥ: Literally, "the rākṣasa." See notes to 7.54.6 on Lavaṇa's rākṣasa nature.

"that lance" śūlam . . . tat: Ś,Ñ1,V1,B4,D1–4,6–12,T3,G3,M5,6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tu, "and or but," for tat, "that." T1,2,4,G1,2,M3,8–10, and KK and VSP read instead tam," "him or that."

"him" tam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hi, "indeed."

17. "you . . . must stand outside the gateway before he enters the city" apraviṣṭapuraṃ pūrvaṃ dvāri tiṣṭha: Literally, "stand in front at the gate [in reference to] him by whom the city has not been entered." Once again the syntax is opaque and elliptical. The construction of the compound apraviṣṭapuram is particularly difficult. Like all the commentators and almost all the translators, we have taken it as an accusative of a bahuvrīhi compound modifying Lavana, despite the fact that there is no transitive verb of which it can be the object. Ct makes an attempt to flesh out the syntax by supplying the participle pratīkṣan, "awaiting," while Cr offers the gerund uddiśya, "having reference to." Similarly, Cv and Cg propose adding the gerund upalakṣya, "having regarded." It is also arguably possible to read the compound adverbially with tiṣṭha, yielding the sense "you [i.e., Śatrughna] must stand such that you have not entered the city." Among the translators consulted, only Dutt (1894, p. 1766) interprets in this way, rendering, "Therefore, O foremost of men, thou shouldst, before entering the city, stand at the gate obstructing his course." Also problematic is the construction of the adverb pūrvam, "earlier, before, in front." We read it with the locative dvāri, "at the door," in the sense of "in front of," i.e., "outside," the gate. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 862) takes pūrva in its sense of "eastern," rendering, "So you . . . stay at the eastern gate." But this is hardly persuasive. Ck, Cg, and Ct see the strategy proposed by Rāma for the defeat of Lavaṇa as similar to that adopted by Lakṣmaṇa, at the advice of Vibhīṣaṇa, in the Yuddhakāṇḍa to defeat Indrajit (6.71.13ff.). For, in both cases, the demonic enemy must be prevented from carrying out an action that would make him invincible. In the case of Indrajit, of course, Lakṣmaṇa interrupts Indrajit's sacrifice in the Nikumbhilā grove, while here Śatrughna must prevent Lavaṇa from reaching his palace and thus regaining possession of his infallible lance. Thus Ct comments: "Now he [Rāma] instructs him [Śatrughna] to obstruct his [Lavaṇa's] entrance into the city because of his [Lavaṇa's] invincibility once he [Lavaṇa] has seized his lance, just as there was an obstruction of the Nikumbhilā grove with reference to Indrajit, who [might have] completed his sacrifice in the Nikumbhilā grove (atha nikumbhilāyāṃ samāptayāgasyendrajita iva gṛhītaśūlasya tasya durjayatvān nikumbhilā nirodham iva purapraveśanirodham upadiśati)."

18. "that rākṣasa" rākṣasam: Literally, "the rākṣasa." See notes to 7.54.6 on Lavaṇa's rākṣasa nature.

19. "if you act in any other way" anyathā kriyamāṇe: Literally, "while it is being done otherwise."

"If, however, you act in this fashion" yadi tv evaṃ kṛte: Literally, "but if when it is done thus." The collocation of the absolutive kṛte with yadi is awkward. B2,D7,10,11,T1, and

GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, perhaps in an attempt to correct this, read instead kṛtam. Ct understands, then, "however, if it is done in the manner specified . . . (yadi tv evam uktarītyā kṛtam anuṣṭhitaṃ bhavati)." Ck and Cg, although they read with the critical edition and understand the phrase to be an absolute construction, interpret similarly. Cr fills out the elliptical phrase, glossing, "[Should be] done in this fashion [by you]. The words 'should be by you' should be added (yady evaṃ kṛtaṃ tyayā bhaved iti śeṣaḥ)."

"he will be destroyed" vināśam upayāsyati: Literally, "he will go to destruction."

20. "the means of evading that lance" śūlasya paryayam: Literally, "the reversal of the lance." D10,11,T2,M1, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the nominative masculine paryayaḥ for the critical edition's nominative neuter. This lends the line the sense "I have now told you everything, and this is the means for evading the lance."

"For the decree of majestic black-throated Śiva is impossible to violate." śrīmataḥ śitikaṇṭhasya kṛtyaṃ hi duratikramam //: Literally, "For the purpose of the black-throated [one] is impossible to transgress." Several of the Vaiṣṇava commentators seem disturbed at the thought that a weapon of Viṣṇu's, that is, the divine arrow, should not be able to defeat the weapon of Śiva. Their explanation here, as at other points in the epic, is that even someone who is able to escape a divine weapon should not do so out of respect for the divinity who animates it. Compare Hanumān's submission to the weapons of Brahmā at 5.46.34–41, especially verse 40. Ct says, "As far as the avoidance of the lance goes, what is the point of this insistence? I will cut down his lance with an arrow and then kill him. In response we have the passage beginning with śrīmataḥ, etc. The word 'purpose [kṛtyam]' refers to the greatness of the lance, which is impossible to overcome. And even if it were possible, it would not be proper. That is the meaning. The real meaning is that this is so because the purpose of my [Rāma's] incarnation is the preservation of the boundaries set by the great gods. (viparyayaḥ parihāraḥ kim anena nu nirbandhena? bāṇena śūlaṃ chi[t]tvā tam api haniṣyāmi tatrāha—śrīmata iti. kṛtyaṃ śūlamāhātmyaṃ duratikramam atikramitum aśakyam. śaktāv apy anucitaṃ cety arthaḥ. īśvarakṛtamaryādāpālanārtham evāsmadavatārād iti bhāvaḥ.)" Cg understands: "'kṛtyam,' that is to say, a decree. Now here someone might foolishly argue [lit., 'prattle'] that, in this case, Rāma has posited the invincibility of the lance as if Rudra were greater than Viṣṇu, which is not the case. Because of the limits of the avatāra, it is possible to speak in such a way, just as in the case of bondage by the brahmāstra, the greatness of Brahmā is impossible to transgress, and so forth. Or the meaning is that the command is impossible to transgress even by the Lord because of the fact that it is to be held in high esteem. That is the meaning. (kṛtyam ājñāpanam. atra kaścij jalpati. atra rāmeṇa duratikramatvaṃ śūlina uktam iti viṣṇor apy adhiko rudra iti tan na. avatāramaryādayā tādṛśoktisaṃbhavād yathā brahmāstrabandhane duratikramo brahmaṇo mahimetyādi. yadvā duratikramaṃ kṛtyaṃ bhagavataiva tasya bahumantavyatvād iti bhāvaḥ.)"

1. "When . . . had spoken" uktvā tu: Literally, "But, having spoken." V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead uktvā ca, "And, having spoken."

"to Śatrughna Kākutstha" kākutstham: Literally, "to Kākutstha."

"once more . . . excellent words" punaḥ . . . aparaṃ vākyam: We take aparam in its sense of "superior or having no rival." It could also mean "further or additional." However, this seems redundant here in light of the adverb punaḥ, which precedes it.

2–3. "Let . . . accompany you, Śatrughna" anugacchantu śatrughna: Literally, "let them follow or accompany, O Śatrughna." Ś,V1,3,D1–8,10,T3,4,M3,6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP,

Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative kākutstham for śatrughna, lending the phrase the sense "Let them follow Kākutstha."

"these four thousand cavalry, two thousand chariots, and a hundred war-elephants" imāny aśvasahasrāṇi catvāri . . . / rathānāṃ ca sahasre dve gajānāṃ śatam eva ca //: Literally, "these four thousands of horses and two thousands of chariots, and indeed one hundred of elephants." The categories mentioned are representative of the first three of the four divisions of the traditional ancient Indian army. Compare notes to 7.25.33, where a description of the composition of the traditional army is given. Ñ2,V1,B,D2,6,7,9–11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca . . . dve, "and . . . two," for dve . . . ca, by transposition. Ñ2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11,T4,M3,6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read uttama for eva ca, lending the phrase the sense "a splendid hundred of elephants."

"actors and dancers" naṭanartakāḥ: Both terms are fairly broad in their semantic range, covering a variety of performing artists. Ct and Cs attempt to distinguish the two terms. Ct claims that the former refers to those who act out vākyārtha, literally, "the meanings of utterances," i.e., performers of speaking parts, while the latter are those who act out the things or persons, i.e., dramatic dancers or mimes (naṭā vākyārthābhinayakartāraḥ. nartakāḥ padārthābhinayakartāraḥ). Cs obscurely glosses the first as those who dance on veṇīs, etc., and the latter as those who dance on bhūmi (naṭā veṇyādyuparinaṭanakartāraḥ. nartakā bhūmyuparinaṭanakartāraḥ). The exact meanings of the terms veṇī and bhūmi in this context are uncertain. The sense of veṇī that seems most apposite in this context is a "bridge or dam," perhaps a reference to a raised stage or platform, while the term bhūmi would refer to the "ground or floor."

"town shopkeepers carrying their various wares" antarāpaṇavīthyaś ca nānāpaṇyopaśobhitāḥ: Literally, "rows of interior shops adorned with various merchandise." We follow Ck and Ct, who understand the reference to be to the merchants from the center of the city, who are accompanied by the various goods that are to be bought and sold (antarā nagaramadhyavartinyo yā āpannavīthyo vīthyo vīthisthā vaṇijo nānāvidhaiḥ paṇyaiḥ krayavikrayārhadravyair upaśobhitā yuktāḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly).

4. "take . . . and . . . go" gṛhītvā gaccha: Literally, "having taken, go." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B4, D1–5,7–12, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ādāya, "having taken," for gṛhītvā, "having taken."

"ten thousand gold and silver pieces" hiraṇyasya suvarṇasya ayutam: Note the hiatus. Literally, "ten thousand of silver of gold." The term hiraṇya is ambiguous, as it can mean both gold and silver. Ck, Ct, and Cr understand hiraṇya in its sense of "gold" and then take suvarṇa, normally also "gold," adjectivally in its literal sense "of excellent color or quality" (utkṛṣṭavarṇasya—Ct; Ck and Cr similarly). This interpretation is, no doubt, the basis for the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 555), who offers, "pure bullion," and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 862), which renders, "pure gold-coins." Cr further understands the reference to be to stamped coins made of such gold (tanmayamūdrāyāḥ). D1–5,7,9–11,T3,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read niyutam, "a million," for ayutam, "ten thousand." The exact sense of the term niyutam is, according to Ct, disputed. He notes: "Some people take the number to stand for one hundred thousand, while others believe that it stands for a million (niyutaṃ lakṣam ity eke daśalakṣam ity anye)." Cr goes with the higher figure (daśalakṣam). The edition of GPP that we have consulted reads niyatam, "restrained or restricted," which is known to one manuscript (V1) rather than niyutam. However, since all commentators, translators, and other editions of the text of Ct consulted read niyutam, we feel that the reading found in GPP (at 7.64.4) is a typographical error.

"with wagons sufficient for that treasure" paryāptadhanavāhanaḥ: Literally, "possessing sufficient wealth-wagons." Ct glosses, "possessing wealth sufficient to live on" and notes: "The sense is 'with vehicles sufficient for combat.' (jīvanaparyāptadhanaḥ. yuddhaparyāptavāhana ity arthaḥ.)" Cg notes that the term "wealth (-dhana-)" in this compound refers to livestock, etc. (atra dhanaṃ paśvādayaḥ).

5. "you must win over" rañjayasva: Literally, "you must delight or charm."

"unsurpassed" uttamam: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,D1–4,7,9–11,T4,G2,3,M2,4,5,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead anuddhatam, "loyal or not disaffected."

"well fed" -puṣṭam: D1,6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead -tuṣṭam, "satisfied."

6. "For, Rāghava, where your troop of retainers, who must be kept happy, will be stationed, they will be without provisions, wives, and kinsmen." na hy arthās tatra tiṣṭhanti na dārā na ca bāndhavāḥ / suprīto bhṛtyavargas tu yatra tiṣṭhati rāghava //: Literally, "But where a very pleased troop of servants is, Rāghava, there indeed are not objects of value, wives, and kinsmen." Once again the syntax of the verse is somewhat murky. The idea, as we understand it, is that since Śatrughna's troops will be deprived of their normal creature comforts when posted to the front lines in the Madhuvana, he should make every effort to keep them as happy as possible, as indicated in the previous verse. This is also the understanding of Ct, who says, " 'What is the point of thus caring for the army?' He [the author] now explains with the verse beginning, 'na hy arthāḥ.' The meaning is that they should all be treated with respect, realizing that where those servants will be, that is, in a place swarming with enemies, there will not be any provisions, etc. (kim evaṃ balādareṇa tatrāha na hy arthā iti. yatra ripusaṃkaṭe bhṛtyās tiṣṭhanti tatrārthādayo na tiṣṭhantīty ete sarva ādartavyā ity arthaḥ.)" Ck and Cg understand that since the named articles will be unavailable in the forest region where they will be going, Śatrughna must be sure to bring everything [that the troops will require] with them. Both commentators, along with D7, read the second person tiṣṭhasi, "you are located," for tiṣṭhati, "it is located." Cg thus understands, "Where, that is, in which region, you are located, that is, you will be located there, in that forest region, provisions do not exist. Therefore you should go, having taken everything. This is the meaning. (yatra pradeśe tiṣṭhasi sthāsyasi tatra vanapradeśe 'rthā na santy ataḥ sarvaṃ gṛhītvā gantavyam ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly.)" Ś,V1,B1,4,D6,8,12,T1,2,G1,3,M1,3,5,6,8, and KK and VSP read ca, "and," for tu, "but."

7. "you . . . must then proceed . . . to Madhu's woods" tad gaccha tvaṃ madhor vanam: Literally, "Then you go to the forest of Madhu." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gaccha tvaṃ madhuno vanam, "You go to the forest of Madhu." The inappropriate neuter, madhuno, is glossed with the correct masculine by Ck and Ct. Cv, Cg, and Ct all look ahead to 7.57.1 (see notes to 7.57.1), where Śatrughna is said to remain in Ayodhyā for a month after sending out his troops before departing himself. Cv, Cg, and Ct offer fairly elaborate explanations of why Śatrughna is advised to set out a full month after the departure of his troops. Cv, followed by Cg, argues that Śatrughna does this on the advice of his elder brother to avoid the [negative] comments to the effect that he had to take an army with him in order to kill Lavaṇa. Therefore, Cv continues, he has his army alone proceed ahead slowly during the remainder of the hot season and has them make camp together with the brahmans on the farther bank of the Ganges. Once Śatrughna is confident that his now distant army is ready for battle, he is to leave Ayodhyā by himself and, taking only the brahmans with him from that army, he is to proceed covertly and kill [Lavaṇa]. (prasthāpyeti māsamātroṣito 'yodhyāyāṃ grīṣmaśeṣam uṣitaḥ pathy eka eva jagāma. evaṃ hi pūrvaṃ pūrvajena mantritam artharūpaṃ lavaṇavadhārthaṃ senayā saha śatrughno yātīti vārttāparihārārthaṃ kevalaṃ balam evāgre [munibhiḥ saha—Adyar] gacchantu tac ca grīṣmāvaśeṣena [v.l. grīṣmeṇa—Adyar] śanaiḥ śanair gaṅgāyāḥ paratīre niviśatāṃ brāhmaṇaiḥ samudyojitaṃ balaṃ śrutvā vidūrastham iti viśvasya vartate. tatrāntare tvam asmān nagarād eka eva nirgatya tasmād balād kevalaṃ brāhmaṇān gṛhītvājñātaṃ gatvā jahīti.) Cg's comment (on verse 8) is almost verbatim. Ct sees this and the following verses as Rāma's response to an implicit question on the part of Śatrughna to the effect "What is the need for an army, since I am able to fight Lavaṇa on my own?" Ct understands the response to be as follows: "You [Śatrughna], having sent your vast host out of Ayodhyā, are to depart alone for Madhu's woods. Here is the meaning behind this. Having sent your troops off in the hot season so that they might easily cross the Ganges, you should then have them encamp for some time on the other side, and then, having proceeded alone to Madhu's woods at the start of the rainy season, you should kill Lavaṇa. (nanu kiṃ senayā tad dhi lavaṇena yotsyāmi. nety āha. ata iti. ato 'yodhyāyā idānīm eva mahatīṃ camūṃ prasthāpyaika eva tvaṃ madhuno vanaṃ madhor vanaṃ gaccha. ayaṃ bhāvaḥ. sukhena jāhnavītaraṇāya grīṣmakāla eva prasthāya jāhnavīm uttīrya kiṃcit kālaṃ tatra sthitvā tad balaṃ tatraiva saṃsthāpya svayam eka eva madhuvanaṃ prāpya varṣāprādurbhāve lavaṇaṃ jahīti.)"

8. "unsuspected" aśaṅkitaḥ: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead aśaṅkitam. Ck, Cg, and Ct all explain aśaṅkitam adverbially so that the phrase means "in such a way that there is no suspicion of your arrival (aśaṅkitaṃ tvadāgatiśaṅkārahitaṃ yathā bhavati tathā—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)." The term aśaṅkita can also mean "fearless," and Dutt (1894, p. 1767—"so fearlessly") and Benoît (1999, p. 1363—"sans crainte") translate in this way. But this is not contextually likely.

9. "There is no other way for him to be killed." na tasya mṛtyur anyo 'sti kaścit: Literally, "there is no other death at all of him." We follow Cr, who glosses "the means to that (tadupāyaḥ)" for "death (mṛtyuḥ)." Ck and Cg gloss, "killer (mārakaḥ)." We agree with the commentators in understanding the phrase to refer to the necessity of Śatrughna's approaching unsuspected. They bring in the previous condition, set down by Rāma, noting that there is no way of killing Lavaṇa other than to blockade him in such a way that he does not suspect (anyo 'śaṅkitatayā taduparodhakavyatirikto nāsti—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

"whoever comes within the range of Lavaṇa's sight will inevitably be slain by him" darśanaṃ yo 'bhigaccheta sa vadhyo lavaṇena: Literally, "who approaches the sight, he is to be slain by Lavaṇa." Cr, observing that a new condition appears to have been added, explains: " 'Whoever goes to the sight' means 'Whoever should enter the range of vision of Lavaṇa when he has the lance with him' (yo darśanaṃ śūlasahitalavaṇasya dṛṣṭipatham abhigaccheta)."

10. "are at hand" upasthite: Literally, "has approached." Ñ2,B2,3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous upāgate.

"gentle brother" saumya: Literally, "O gentle [one]."

"For that is the proper time to deal with that evil-minded creature." sa hi kālo 'sya durmateḥ: Literally, "For that is the time of that evil-minded one." The commentators explain why the rainy season, which is traditionally the time when no expeditions are undertaken, is the proper time to engage Lavaṇa. They generally argue that even though Śatrughna and his army may have set out in the spring, it would be best to wait for the monsoon because, since kings generally do not undertake military campaigns during the rains, Lavaṇa will be unsuspecting of an attack and, for that reason, will not be carrying his dreaded lance. (vasante prasthitasyāpi yuddhakālo nāyam ity āha—sa iti. varṣārātre varṣākāle varṣāsu ke 'pi yuddhārthaṃ na yatanta iti nirbhayo niḥśūla eva carati. ataḥ sa evāsya vadhakāla iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly.)

11. The commentators see this verse as Rāma's response to an anticipated question as to why, given what Rāma has just said, Śatrughna and his troops should set forth now, in the springtime, rather than wait until the monsoon. Ck and Ct also add the suggestion that Śatrughna remains behind after his troops have set out because he has some other business to attend to in Ayodhyā. (tarhi nedānīṃ gantavyam ity āśaṅkya svadeśe kāryāntarasādhanārtham eva prathamataḥ śanaiḥ senāmātragamanaṃ kāryam ity āha—maharṣīn iti.) Ck adds that the earlier slow deployment of the army is part of a planned strategy of deception (pracāraṇam iti vyājasiddhyarthaṃ śanaiḥ senāmātrasya gamanam). See notes to verse 7 above.

12. "Then" tataḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,7–12,T2,3,M6,7,9, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatra, "there."

"swift-striding warrior" laghuvikrama: Literally, "O swift-striding one." V1,B2,4,D1, 4,5,7, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular laghuvikramaḥ. Although grammatically awkward, this would still refer to Śatrughna.

"determinedly" samāhitaḥ: Literally, "of composed mind or determined."

13. "the . . . captains of his army" senāmukhyān: Literally, "the leaders or chiefs of the army." The term here may be a specific reference to the officers in command of the senāmukhas, a technical term for a small unit of the traditional army of ancient India. This unit would consist of fifteen foot soldiers, nine cavalry, three chariots, and three elephants (Apte s.v.). See notes to verses 2–3 above and 6.84.6 and notes.

14. "The various places at which" yatra yatra: Literally, "where, where or in whichever." Ś,B1,D1,6–8,10,11,T4,M9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yatra tatra, "in whichever [place]."

"well known" gaṇitāḥ: Literally, "reckoned, counted, or calculated." We follow Cr, who glosses, "extremely well known or familiar (atiśayena jñātāḥ)."

"peacefully" avirodhena: Literally, "without strife or quarrel." Ct argues that this instruction is made directly to the troops [as opposed to the officers, whom Śatrughna initially addresses]. (yatheti. idaṃ sainikān prati vākyam.)

"in such a way that no one suffers any hardship" yathā bādhā na kasyacit: Literally, "in such a way that there is oppression of no one."

15. "had . . . sent forth" niryāpya: Literally, "having caused to go forth." D6,7,10,11, T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous prasthāpya.

16–17. Verses 16 and 17 constitute a single sentence. We have broken it up into two sentences for the sake of style and readability.

"After reverentially circumambulating" pradakṣiṇaṃ kṛtvā: Ś,V3,B4,D6–8,10–12,T4,G1, M5,6,9,10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous pradakṣiṇīkṛtya.

"Śatrughna, scorcher of his foes, granted leave by Rāma, bowed with hands . . . self-controlled Śatrughna . . . the purohita Vasiṣṭha" rāmeṇa cābhyanujñātaḥ śatrughnaḥ śatrutāpanaḥ [16cd] . . . / purodhasaṃ vasiṣṭhaṃ ca śatrughnaḥ praytātmavān [17cd] //: Note the echoing epithet śatrutāpanaḥ, "scorcher of his foes," for Śatrughna [lit., "slayer of his foes"]. See 7.60.11; 7.61.4; 7.63.lines 50–51; and notes. D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read 16cd following 17cd. Ñ2,V3,D3,6–8,10–12,G1,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous purohitam for purodhasam. See notes to 7.51-2*.6.

"set forth" nirjagāma: Literally, "he went forth." It is not entirely clear what is happening here. As the preceding verses and the initial verse of the following sarga tell us, a month's time is supposed to have elapsed between Śatrughna's dispatching of his troops and his own departure from Ayodhyā. Therefore, we must understand either that the month has been passed over silently or that the verb here merely refers to Śatrughna's exit from Rāma's chambers. One could also, perhaps, read the verb inceptively to indicate that Śatrughna began his preparations to depart.

Following verse 17, Ñ2,B,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [999*]: "Then once he had sent out[1] before him his army that was filled with hosts of lordly war-elephants and splendid horses, Śatrughna, increaser of the lineage of the Raghus,[2] being honored alongside the lord of men, set forth[3] himself[4] (niryāpya senām atha so 'gratas tadā gajendravājipravaraughasaṃkulām / upāsyamānaḥ sa narendrapārśvataḥ pratiprayāto raghuvaṃśavardhanaḥ //)."

[1] "had sent out" niryāpya: Literally, "having caused to go forth." KK and VSP read instead the synonymous prasthāpya. This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[2] "Śatrughna, increaser of the lineage of the Raghus" raghuvaṃśavardhanaḥ: Literally, "the increaser of the lineage of the Raghus."

[3] "set forth" pratiprayātaḥ: KK and VSP read instead tv atha prayātaḥ, "and then set forth."

[4] "being honored . . . himself" upāsyamānaḥ saḥ: It is not made clear in the verse as to who exactly is honoring Śatrughna. According to normal protocol, it would not be his elder brothers. Cr, the only commentator to remark on this verse, adds, "by the generals of the army (senāpatibhir iti śeṣaḥ)." This intervention maintains the proper protocol but presents a temporal problem, since we have just learned that Śatrughna had sent his entire army out of Ayodhyā. Perhaps the idea is that Śatrughna, along with Rāma, is being honored by the general population. KK and VSP read instead uvāsa māsaṃ tu, "and he dwelt there for a month." This is apparently an attempt to address the temporal problem noted above at verse 17.

The meter of pādas b–d is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha); the meter of pāda a is indravaṃśa.

1. "his entire army" tad balaṃ sarvam: Literally, "that entire army." B4,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read ca, "and," for tad, "that." KK and VSP read tu, "but or and," for tad, "that." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"stayed behind for a month . . . on the road" māsamātroṣitaḥ pathi: Literally, "[he] dwelt for the measure of a month . . . on the road." The universal understanding of the commentators is that, as discussed in the notes to 7.56.7, Śatrughna remains behind in Ayodhyā for a month before setting out on his own. Given this understanding, the term pathi, "on the road," is read by enjambment with the verb jagāma, "he went," across the half-line boundary. Thus, for example, Cv glosses, "He dwelt in Ayodhyā for the remainder of the hot season and set out on the road all alone. (māsamātroṣito 'yodhyāyāṃ grīṣmaśeṣam uṣitaḥ. pathy eka eva jagāma.)" Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 574) reads -uṣitaḥ in the sense of "camping" and construes it with pathi, "on the road." He thus understands the verse to mean that Śatrughna made his army stop at the end of a month of marching and only then advanced on his own. He translates, "Çatrughna fit faire halte à toute son armée, au bout d'un mois de marche, puis il s'avança seul d'un pas rapide." This interpretation is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 565), who renders, "Having caused his army to halt after a month's march, Shatrughna started out alone with a rapid step," and Benoît (1999, p. 1364), who offers, "Après un mois de voyage, Śatrughna établit le campement de son armée puis il s'avança seul, d'un pas rapide à vive allure, en direction du Madhuvana." This interpretation is far from satisfactory. It seems to imply that it takes Śatrughna's army one month to reach either Vālmīki's ashram, which we know, from the account of Sītā's and Lakṣmaṇa's journey at 7.45.17–21 and from the following verse, to be no more than a two-day journey by chariot from Ayodhyā, or to some other point on the banks of the Ganges. But compare 7.98.1–2, where it takes the messengers only three days and three nights without rest to reach Madhurā from Ayodhyā. However, the text provides no explicit indication as to where the army has encamped. The first two members (māsamātra-) of the compound māsamātroṣitaḥ are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. While GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all read with the critical edition, a number of manuscripts, primarily northern (Ñ1,V1,B3,4,D2,3,5,9,T3), and the editions of Lahore and Gorresio read saptarātram, "for seven nights," for māsamātra-. Given this reading and the following verse, it would appear that Śatrughna spends only a week in Ayodhyā after sending forth his army and then travels at a somewhat leisurely pace over three days to Vālmīki's ashram. Gorresio's translation seems confused as to the timeline. He appears to first put Śatrughna on the road for seven days and then, in his rendering of verse two, puts him in transit for three days (two nights). Gorresio (1870, pp. 217–18) translates, "Messa in via tutte quell' oste e rimaso sette giorni in cammino,[1] Satrughna andò poscia innanzi sollecito e solo; e stato tre giorni in via, il forte e saggio Raghuide entrò nel puro romitaggio di Vâlmîki.[2]" Cf. 7.58.13 and notes, where Śatrughna spends seven nights on the road in traveling from Vālmīki's ashram to the banks of the Yamunā.

2. "on the way" antare: Literally, "in the interval." Cr glosses, "in the middle of the way (mārgamadhye)," while Cs offers, "between Ayodhyā and Vālmīki's ashram (ayodhyā-vālmīkyāśramayor madhye)."

"holy" puṇyam: The syllable pu- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. However, the textual evidence found in the apparatus does not support this.

"an excellent place to stay" vāsam uttamam: Literally, "a supreme dwelling." Cr glosses, "suitable for habitation (vāsayogyam)," while Cs more specifically offers, "fit for staying in the evening (sāyaṃkāle nivāsayogyam)."

4. "at the behest of my elder brother" guroḥ kṛtyāt: Literally, "from the assignment of an elder."

"the west, the direction guarded by Varuṇa" pratīcīṃ vāruṇīṃ diśam: Literally, "the western direction, which belongs to Varuṇa." D10 and GPP and NSP read dāruṇām, "fearsome," for vāruṇīm, "belonging to Varuṇa." Ct and Cg (who notes dāruṇām as a variant) explain that the west is fearsome because it is under the authority of Lavaṇa (lavaṇādhiṣṭhitatvāt).

5. "he smiled" prahasya: Literally, "having smiled." Cg and Cs attribute Vālmīki's smile to the fact that, as an omniscient sage, he would have already known the reason for Śatrughna's visit without being told. Thus Cg explains: "Even though the reason for Śatrughna's arrival had not been intimated to him, he would already have known it. That is the intention (aniveditam api śatrughnāgamananimittaṃ jñātavyam ity abhiprāyaḥ)." Cs is more specific. He says, "The smile is caused by the sage's knowledge that Śatrughna, who is on his way to kill Lavaṇa, is going out alone in order to deceive him (lavaṇavadhāya tadvañcanārtham ekākī gacchatīti muneḥ parijñānāt prahāsaḥ)."

"that great man" mahātmānam: Literally, "the great [one]."

"illustrious prince" mahāyaśaḥ: Literally, "O you of great glory."

6. "Truly" ha: The particle is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11,T1,2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous emphatic particle vai, while D6,G,M3, and KK, and VSP read the synonymous emphatic particle hi.

"gentle prince" saumya: Literally, "gentle [one]."

"you should have no hesitation in accepting" nirviśaṅkaḥ pratīccha: Literally, "free from doubt or hesitation, accept."

"the guest-offering" arghyam: For a listing of the various articles of food and drink traditionally offered to a respected or venerable visitor, see 16*, note 1, following notes to 7.1.10.

7. "Then" tataḥ: Literally, "after that." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then or at that time."

8. "When he had eaten, the great-armed prince" sa tu bhuktvā mahābāhuḥ: Literally, "and having eaten, the great-armed one." D6,7,10,11,T2,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa bhuktvā phalamūlaṃ ca, "and having eaten the fruits and roots."

"To whom" kasya: Literally, "of whom." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, Śatrughna is asking about the patron of the sacrifice as opposed to the sacrificial priest (kasya yajamānasya).

"all these sacrificial implements . . . once" pūrvaṃ yajñavibhūtīyam: Literally, "previously this wealth of sacrifice." According to Cg, the term yajñavibhūtiḥ refers to the prosperity or material wealth of a sacrifice. Ct is more specific, arguing that such wealth consists of all the sacrificial implements, such as the sacrificial posts, etc. (yūpādiyajñopakaraṇasaṃṛddhiḥ). Ñ2,B4,D6,7,10,11,T4,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and KK (1905) read purvā for pūrvam. Ck and Ct take the adjective purvā to mean "eastern" and gloss, "visible in the eastern area (pūrvapradeśe dṛśyamānā)." Ct adds, "and also ancient (purātanī ca)," which is Cr's sole gloss. All translators consulted who share this variant understand the term to refer to the area to the east of the ashram. Ś,V1,3,D1–5,8,9,12,T3,M1, and KK (1913) and VSP read iyaṃ, "this," for pūrvam. In this variant, neither the location nor the relative date of the sacrificial implements is specified. KK (1913) and VSP additionally read yajñavibhūtis te for yajñavibhūtīyam, lending the line the sense "to whom do your sacrificial implements belong?" This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

9. "that . . . of his" tasya tat: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tat tasya by transposition.

"to whom . . . once belonged" yasya . . . babhūva . . . purā: Literally, "of whom it was long ago."

10. "Mitrasaha" mitrasahaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead vīryasahaḥ, "Vīryasaha." Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vīrasahaḥ, "Vīrasaha." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"of great Sudāsa" sudāsasya mahātmanaḥ: D10,11,T3, and GPP and NSP read instead saudāsas tasya bhūpateḥ, lending the line the sense "King Saudāsa is your ancestor; the son of that lord of the earth was named . . . ," while D6,7,T4, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the slight variant sudāsas tasya bhūpateḥ.

11. "Mitrasaha Saudāsa" saudāsaḥ: Literally, "Saudāsa."

"who were constantly roaming about" cañcūryamāṇam: As Ck and Cg, citing Pā 7.4.88, point out, the form is a present participle of the intensive of the stem of the root √car. They, as well as Ct, gloss, "moving about again and again." (cañcūryamāṇaṃ muhur muhuś carantam. carater yaṅantāc chānac. utparasyāta ity uttvam—so Cg; Ck similarly.) Cr, however, glosses, "excessively slaughtering creatures (atiśayena jantūn hiṃsantam)."

12. "devouring" bhakṣayānau: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the slight variant bhakṣamāṇau, "devouring."

"and could not get enough" paryāptiṃ ca na jagmatuḥ: Literally, "and those two did not go to sufficiency or completion." Ś,Ñ,V3,B1–3,D7,8,10–12,T3,4,M6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read naiva, "by no means," for ca na, "and . . . not."

13. "And when he saw those two rākṣasas and saw that the forest had been stripped of game" sa tu tau rākṣasau dṛṣṭvā nirmṛgaṃ ca vanaṃ kṛtam: Literally, "And having seen the two rākṣasas and the forest made devoid of deer or game."

"one of them" ekam: Literally, "one."

14. "he was freed from his distress and anger" vijvaro vigatāmarṣaḥ: Literally, "free from anguish, one from whom indignation had departed."

"he gazed at" [a]bhyavaikṣata: D7,10,11,T1,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hy udaikṣata, "indeed, he stared at."

15. "When the companion of that rākṣasa saw him staring" nirīkṣamāṇaṃ taṃ dṛṣṭvā sahāyas tasya rakṣasaḥ: V2,D10,11,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative singular sahāyam, "companion." This reading is somewhat ambiguous, and the commentators who share it differ as to who is the subject and who is the object of the participle nirīkṣamāṇam, "staring." Basically these commentators articulate two positions. Ct believes that [the surviving rākṣasa] is looking at (dṛṣṭvā) Saudāsa. Meanwhile, Saudāsa himself is staring at the surviving rākṣasa, who had been the companion of the one that was slain. (tasya hatasya rakṣasaḥ sahāyaṃ sahāyabhūtam ātmānaṃ nirīkṣamāṇaṃ taṃ rājānaṃ dṛṣṭvā.) Cg, on the other hand, understands that the first rākṣasa, i.e., the surviving rākṣasa, having seen (dṛṣṭvā) [the king], is staring at the second rākṣasa, i.e., the dead rākṣasa, who had been his own companion (nirīkṣamāṇaṃ svasahāyabhūtaṃ dvitīyarakṣo nirīkṣamānaṃ prathamarakṣo dṛṣṭvā). On the strength of the information given in verse 14 above, we believe that this is the intended meaning. Ck appears to be in agreement with Cg, although the version of his commentary consulted is ambiguous here. Cr is indecisive and proposes two options. He notes: "He [i.e., the surviving rākṣasa] saw [lit., 'having seen'] Saudāsa, who was staring at the companion either of his own [previously] mentioned rākṣasa [i.e., the slain rākṣasa] or of rākṣasas in general (tasya prasiddhasya rakṣasaḥ svasya rakṣomātrasya vā sahāyaṃ nirīkṣamāṇaṃ saudāsaṃ dṛṣṭvā)."

"he was filled with a terrible anguish" saṃtāpam akarod ghoram: Literally, "he made terrible anguish or pain." According to Cr, we are to supply the words "[for] the other rākṣasa (rākṣasāntaram iti śeṣaḥ)." Presumably, he understands the expression to mean that the surviving rākṣasa felt terrible grief for his slain companion.

16. "you" tvam: V3,D2,3,6,7,10–12,T1–3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the accusative masculine singular pronoun tam, "that [companion]."

"I will pay you back" tavāpi . . . pradāsyāmi pratikriyām: Literally, "I will give you retaliation."

"you evil wretch" pāpiṣṭha: Literally, "O most evil [one]."

17. "him" tam: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1–3,D,T3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the nominative neuter singular tat, "that," which would then modify rakṣaḥ, lending the phrase the sense "having spoken, that rākṣasa, or having said that, the rākṣasa."

"Now, in the course of time" kālaparyāyayogena: Literally, "by means of the revolution of time."

18. "Now as king" rājāpi: Literally, "As for the king." T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead rājā tu, "and the king."

"just near this ashram" tasyāśramasamīpataḥ: Literally, "of that near the ashram." V2,D6,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read asya, "this," for tasya. The idea, no doubt, is to make clearer the fact that Vālmīki is referring to his own ashram (see verse 8 above). As Ck, Cg, and Ct all note, we are to understand that the appropriate genitive ending of āsrama- has been lost (asyāśrameti luptaṣaṣṭhīkam. asyāśramasya samīpataḥ).

"oversaw" abhyapālayat: Literally, "he protected or supervised." D10,11,M8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead apy apālayat, "and [Vasiṣṭha] supervised."

19. "for many tens of thousands of years" bahuvarṣagaṇāyutān: Literally, "for ten thousand [times] many multitudes of years." Compare 7.51-2*.17 and notes. D7,10,11,T4, G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the adjective bahuvarṣagaṇāyutaḥ, "[a sacrifice] that had (i.e., lasted) ten thousand [times] many multitudes of years."

"equal to a sacrifice of the gods themselves" devayajñasamaḥ: Literally, "equal to a sacrifice of the gods."

20. "took the form of Vasiṣṭha" vasiṣṭharūpī: Literally, "having Vasiṣṭha's form."

21. "Today, when the final rites are over" adya yajñāvasānānte: Literally, "today, at the end of the completion of the sacrifice." The compound seems redundant. With his characteristic ingenuity, Cs proposes an alternative reading, no doubt to avoid the redundancy. He breaks the sequence yajñāvasānānte into two words. The first, yajñāvasāna, he takes to be a vocative, referring to the king and having the sense "O you who have completed the soma sacrifice!" and the second, ante, he takes to mean "in your very presence" and not through some remote agent. He supports this latter interpretation with a quotation from the Viśvakośa. (he yajñāvasāna! yajñāvasānaṃ yasya yena vā tatsaṃbuddhiḥ. samāpitasavana rājan. ante tava samīpa eva na tu pārokṣeṇa. antaḥ prānte 'ntika iti viśvaḥ.) KK and VSP read instead asya yajñasya jāto 'ntaḥ, "the conclusion of this sacrifice has now come."

"food, including meat" sāmiṣaṃ bhojanam: Cs notes that the understanding here is that the meat should be pure (sāmiṣaṃ bhojanaṃ śuddhamāṃsasahitam). The idea is that the meat would be acceptable as a sacrificial offering. See notes below and verse 23 and notes.

"You must not hesitate in this regard." nātra kāryā vicāraṇā: Literally, "no hesitation or reflection is to be made here or in this." The sequence nātra, "not . . . here," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Cr understands the adverb atra, normally "here or in this," to mean "at this time (atrāsmin samaye)." He further notes that the hesitation would take the form of the question "Why is he asking for something that is forbidden to eat?" (kim artham ayam abhakṣyaṃ yācata iti vicāro na kāryaḥ.) Unlike Cs, Cr appears to feel that it is impermissible for the sage to eat meat in general.

22. "by the rākṣasa, who could take on any form at will" rakṣasā kāmarūpiṇā: The adjective kāmarūpin, "whose form is according to desire," is commonly used in the epic for rākṣasas, who, like other supernatural beings, are able to take on any form that they choose. Here, we must understand the term to be a reminder of the fact that the rākṣasa has currently taken on the form of Vasiṣṭha. A number of manuscripts make this more explicit. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,D,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rakṣasā brahmarūpiṇā, "by the rākṣasa, who had the form of the brahman." B4,G2, and Gorresio read the genitive rakṣaso brahmarūpiṇaḥ, which must be read here as a tṛtīyā.

"one who was skilled in the preparation of food" bhakṣasaṃskārakuśalam: The first member of the compound, bhakṣa-, "food," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ,V1,B2–4,D1,4,8,9,12,T2,M1,3,5, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous bhakṣya-. In addition, Ŝ,Ñ,V1,3,B,D1–5,9,12, and Lahore and Gorresio read the plural bhakṣasaṃskārakuśalān, "those who were skilled in the preparation of food." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read sūdān saṃskārakuśalān, "cooks who were skilled in preparation [of food]."

23. "You must . . . prepare" kuruṣva: Literally, "you must make." Ñ2,V2,3,B,D5–7, 10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the madhyama bahuvacana verbal form kuruta, "you [all] must prepare," in keeping with their plural in the previous verse (sūdān).

"fit for the sacrificial offering" haviṣyam: Literally, "fit for ritual offering." Clearly the author understands that the vedic offerings here, which can then be shared by the gods and officiants alike, may be nonvegetarian. But compare the notes to verse 21 above, where Cr, writing many centuries later than the text, seems to regard flesh foods as forbidden. A number of the translators understand this term to refer to foods cooked or prepared with clarified butter. Gorresio (1870, p. 219) renders the term here (7.71.24) as "dolce burro chiarificato e carni." He understands similarly at verse 26 below (7.71.24). Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 575) incorrectly understands the adjective to be the noun haviḥ and translates it as an element in the food separate from the meat. He renders, "Avec du Havis et de la chair." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 567), who closely follows Roussel, offers, "Speedily prepare Havis and such savoury dishes of flesh." Shastri provides a footnote to the term haviḥ, "Havis—Anything offered that has been cooked in ghee." Benoît (1999, p. 1366), apparently also following in this tradition, renders, "Les plats de viande au beurre clarifié sont les plus savoureux."

24. "Because of that order . . . the cook's mind was in a flurry of agitation" śāsanāt . . . sūdaḥ saṃbhrāntamānasaḥ: Literally, "because of the order, the cook was one whose thoughts were whirling." Ct and Cr differ as to the reason for the chef's agitation. The former, who has expressed no concern at the idea of a brahman's eating meat, attributes the cook's state to the fact that the king has ordered him to prepare the food so quickly. Thus he suggests adding the phrase "because of the haste of the cooking (pākatvarayeti śeṣaḥ)." Compare the use of a similar term (saṃbhrāntamanasaḥ) at Bālakāṇḍa 17.25, where Daśaratha's doorkeepers are thrown into a flurry of agitation by the unexpected arrival of Viśvāmitra (see 1.17.25 and note). Cr, on the other hand, who has all along been uncomfortable with the idea of nonvegetarian food being offered to a brahman, understands that the cook's mind is agitated at hearing about the desire to eat forbidden food on the part the guru (gurukartṛkābhakṣyabhakṣaṇecchāśravaṇenodvignacittaḥ). The cook's perplexity has inspired Benoît (1999, p. 1728) to provide a note in which he argues that the concern of the cook is to be explained by the fact that a brahman is asking to eat meat. Although, Benoît continues, there is nothing in the epic to indicate that the dietary regimen of brahmans has to be strictly vegetarian, the brahmanical ideal is, nonetheless, an ascetic mode of life, which, in principle, excludes both flesh foods and alcoholic beverages.

"and so the rākṣasa" sa ca rakṣaḥ: Note the liṅgabheda in this construction. Ś,Ñ,V1, 3,B3,4,D, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tac ca rakṣaḥ, "and that rākṣasa," while KK and VSP read sa rākṣasaḥ, "that rākṣasa." Both variants correct the gender disagreement between the pronoun and the noun.

"took on the guise of a cook" sūdaveṣam . . . akarot: Literally, "he made the guise of a cook." Ck and Ct understand that the rākṣasa takes on the guise of a different cook and, while the chief cook is busy cooking, introduces human flesh [into the food]. (sūdāntaraveṣaṃ gṛhītvā mukhyasūdena pākasamaye mānuṣaṃ māṃsaṃ prācikṣipad iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.)

"then and there" tatra . . . atha: Literally, "there . . . then." Ck and Ct gloss "in the kitchen (mahānase)" for tatra, "there."

25. "saying": We follow Cr, who suggests adding the phrase "having said" (uktveti śeṣaḥ).

"fit for the sacrificial offering" haviṣyam: See notes to verse 23 above.

26. "the king" saḥ: Literally, "he." As Ck and Ct note, the subject has now shifted from the rākṣasa in the form of a cook to King Saudāsa himself. Ck and Ct are concerned that we understand that the king has offered his guru human flesh unknowingly, as he believes the food to be appropriate sacrificial food. (rājāpi sāmiṣaṃ mānuṣam api amānuṣaṃ tad dhaviṣyam ity eva vijñāya . . . vasiṣṭhāyopāharat—so Ct; Ck similarly.)

27. "realizing" jñātvā: Literally, "having realized." Ck and Ct believe that Vasiṣṭha has actually tasted the food. They gloss: "The meaning is that [he knew] through the force of the taste of the food (bhojanarasavaśeneti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly)."

"brought as his food" bhojanāhṛtam: The final member of the compound -āhṛtam, "brought," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ1,D1,7,8,10–12,T,G2,3,M,3,5,6, and Lahore, GPP, and NSP read instead bhojanāgatam, "[has] come as food." Gita Press KK, and VSP read instead bhājanaṃ gatam, "gone to a plate or vessel." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 558), the only translator to render this variant, offers: "The Brahmana saw that the food in the vessel contained human flesh." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 865) shares the reading but translates, "to have been brought as food," as if it were reading bhojanāgatam.

28. Following verse 28, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ2,V2,3,B,D3,6,8,12, and Lahore and Gorresio insert following verse 32, whereas Ñ1,V1,D1,2,4,5,9,T3 insert following 32ab, a passage of nine lines [1006*]: "Then, angered, Saudāsa took water in his hand[1] and wanted to curse[2] Vasiṣṭha. But his wife stopped him [saying]:[1–2] 'Your majesty, the blessed seer Vasiṣṭha is our lord and master.[3] You cannot in return curse your godlike purohita.[4]'[3–4] Then that righteous king[5] dropped that water, which was infused with his anger[6] and invested with the power of his blazing energy,[7] so that he sprinkled his feet.[5–6] By virtue of that both of the king's feet were burned[8] and became mottled (kalmāṣa). And from that time onward, the very illustrious king Saudāsa became one whose feet were mottled (kalmāṣapāda), and that is how the king became known as Kalmāṣapāda.[9][7–9]"

Apart from this insert, there is nothing in the critical text to explain how Mitrasaha Saudāsa comes to be known as Kalmāṣapāda in verse 34. See notes to verse 34 below.

[1] "took water in his hand" toyaṃ jagrāha pāṇinā: Literally, "he grasped water with a hand." See 7.26.41 and notes.

[2] "wanted to curse" śaptukāmaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śaptum ārebhe, "he began to curse."

[3] "is our lord and master" prabhavate 'smākam: Literally, "he rules over [lit., 'of'] us." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prabhur yato 'smākam, "since he is our lord."

[4] "purohita" purodhasam: Literally, "purodhasa." See notes to 7.51-2*.6.

[5] "that righteous king" dharmātmā: Literally, "the righteous [one]."

[6] "infused with his anger" krodhamayam: Literally, "made of anger."

[7] "invested with the power of his blazing energy" tejobalasamanvitam: Literally, "accompanied by the power of blazing energy."

[8] "burned" dagdhau: V1,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

[9] "became one whose feet were mottled (kalmāṣapādaḥ), and that is how the king became known as Kalmāṣapāda" kalmāṣapādaḥ saṃvṛttaḥ khyātaś caiva tathā nṛpaḥ: Literally, "He became one of mottled feet, and the king was known thus." The idea here is that the sprinkled water, blazing with the king's anger and energy, randomly scars his feet so that they remain speckled or mottled, thus giving him the name Kalmāṣapāda. Cr and Cs both understand that the king's feet are darkened or blackened (śyāmatvaṃ gatau—so Cr; Cs similarly). For some reason, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 558) translates, "And his feet were turned into stone. From that time on . . . came to have stone feet." We can find no plausible sense of the word kalmāṣa that justifies this translation. See Cg's comments in notes to verse 34 below.

29. "the king and his wife" sa rājā saha patnyā: Literally, "the king together with the wife."

"Vasiṣṭha" vasiṣṭham: To avoid confusion in this context of shape-shifting, Ck and Ct gloss, "the real [lit., 'pure'] Vasiṣṭha (śuddhavasiṣṭham—so Ct; Ck similarly)."

"the rākṣasa in the form of a brahman" brahmarūpiṇā: Literally, "the one having a brahman's form." Ck and Ct gloss, "by the illusory Vasiṣṭha (māyāvasiṣṭhena)."

30. "the abominable thing" vikṛtam: The term is rather polysemic and quite ambiguous in the present context. We follow Ct, who takes the term in its nominal sense of "evil or bad action" and adds the phrase "that was done" (vikṛtaṃ kṛtam iti śeṣaḥ). In this, Ct is, no doubt, following Ck, who glosses similarly but more specifically identifies the evil act as the cooking of human flesh (rakṣasā [vi]kṛtam iti mānuṣamāṃsapākaṃ cety arthaḥ). Cg appears to have the same view. Cv understands the term to be an adjectival participle modifying an unexpressed noun vākyam, "words or speech," lending the passage the sense "words twisted or perverted by the rākṣasa (rakṣasā vikṛtaṃ vākyam)." Cr takes the term as an adjective modifying the food that Vasiṣṭha was offered, thus giving the phrase the sense "having heard that the food had been tainted or contaminated by the rākṣasa alone (rakṣasaiva vikṛtaṃ tad bhojanam iti . . . śrutvā)." Cs glosses, "forbidden or odious thing (viruddham)." A number of northern and devanāgarī manuscripts (Ś1,V1,3,B4, D1–5,8,9,12) and Gorresio's edition appear to gloss the reading, substituting for rakṣasā vikṛtam the phrase upādhinā kṛtam (hṛtam—v.l.), "done (taken—v.l.) by means of disguise or deceit." Like us, most of the translators consulted understand the term as do Ck, Cg, and Ct. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 866), however, follows Cr, translating, "and (knowing) the (food being) contaminated by the Rākṣasa."

32. Cs, alone among the commentators consulted, makes reference to the tale of Kalmāṣapāda's career as a man-eater as it is told at some length and with many complications at MBh 1.166–1.168.9. The story there is quite different from the one here. In the Mahābhārata's heavily overdetermined account of Kalmāṣapāda's troubles, the king is cursed to become a man-eating rākṣasa not once, but twice, first by Śaktin, Vasiṣṭha's son, and then by a hungry brahman who begs food from him. Kalmāṣapāda is also possessed by a rākṣasa at the instigation of Vasiṣṭha's archrival Viśvāmitra. Eventually, the king is freed from his curse by Vasiṣṭha. In both episodes the duration of the curse is twelve years. One of the many noteworthy differences between the two accounts is that, in the Mahābhārata, the king knowingly offers human flesh to the hungry brahman. Cs highlights some of these differences. He remarks: "With regard to this, one should consult the previously mentioned story found in the Ādiparvan (= MBh 1.166–1.168.9), which concerns the curses of Śaktin and the brahman. In this version [i.e., the Rāmāyaṇa's] the rākṣasa in the form of a cook gives Vasiṣṭha human flesh without any such instruction on the part of the king. But in the Mahābhārata, in the passage beginning 'tasthau ca dvijasattamaḥ' ('and that foremost of brahmans waited [= MBh 1.166.22]'), that brahman was born of Brahmā. Moreover, then waking at midnight, the king, remembering his promise to the brahman, quickly summoned the cook, saying: 'Go, long-lived one. A brahman is waiting for me in the forest, eager for food. You must offer him food, including meat.' Then, addressed in this fashion, the cook, not finding meat anywhere, was greatly agitated and informed him, saying: '[There is] no [meat].' But the king, as he was possessed by a rākṣasa, calmly said to the cook over and over again: 'Then feed him with human flesh.' Because it was stated that the offering of human flesh was done only on the orders of the king [in the Mahābhārata] and because of the impropriety of giving such a curse to someone who had not given that [order] [here in the Rāmāyaṇa], the difference in the [two] cases must be thought of as resulting from the difference in the cosmic eras [in which these stories unfolded]. Thus we have the curse with multiple [manifestations] with respect to the same state of being a rākṣasa. (atraivādiparvoktā śaktiśāpabrāhmaṇaśāpādikathānusaṃdheyā. atra rājājñāṃ vinā sūdarūpiṇā rakṣasā mānuṣāmiṣaṃ vasiṣṭhāya dattam iti. bhārate tu tasthau ca dvijasattama iti. sa dvijo brahmajānyaḥ. tathaiva tato 'rdharātra utthāya sūdam ānāyya satvaram. uvāca rājā saṃsmṛtya brāhmaṇasya pratiśrutam. gacchāyuṣman vanoddeśe brāhmaṇo māṃ pratīkṣate. annārthī tvaṃ tam annena samāṃsenopapādaya. evam uktas tataḥ sūdaḥ so 'nāsādyāmiṣaṃ kvacit. nivedayāmāsa tadā neti tasmai vyathānvitaḥ. rājā tu rakṣasāviṣṭaḥ sūdam āha gatavyathaḥ. apy enaṃ naramāṃsena bhojayeti punaḥ punar iti. rājña ājñayaiva mānuṣamāṃsadānokter ataddāna etādṛśaśāpadānānaucityāc ca kalpabhedenārthavyavasthā kalpanīyā. ekarakṣastvaviṣaya eva bahuśāpaḥ.)"

"The duration of this curse shall be twelve years." kālo dvādaśavarṣāṇi śāpasyāsya bhaviṣyati: Literally, "The time of this curse will be twelve years." Ñ2,V2,3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read śāpasyāntaḥ (antam—G2), "the end of the curse," for śāpasyāsya, "of this curse." This leaves the syntax somewhat defective. Ct and Cr add one or another form of the participle vyatīta, "passed away," to flesh out the line. As Cr puts it, "Once twelve years have passed, the end, that is, the destruction of the curse, will occur (dvādaśavarṣāṇi vyatītāni ced iti śeṣaḥ śāpasyānto vināśo bhaviṣyati)." Cs explains, "Once the twelve-year period with reference to that curse [is over], then the conclusion of the curse will be the status quo ante (dvādaśavarṣāṇi kālas tadātmagataś cec chāpasyāntaḥ pūrvavadavasthānaṃ bhaviṣyati)."

"what will have transpired" atītam: Literally, "[what] is past." Vasiṣṭha uses this innocuous term to refer indirectly to the unpleasant twelve-year period of cannibalism to which he has cursed the king in verse 28 above. KK and VSP read instead the synonymous vyatītam to avoid the hiatus between the vocative rājendra and atītam that is seen in the critical reading. Ct understands that the king will not remember his own kingship and all that he has done during the period in which he will experience the curse (atītaṃ svakaṃ rājatvaṃ ca na śāpabhogakāle smariṣyasi). Ck understands similarly but inserts the adjective duḥkhāvaham, "causing misery," understanding that the king will not remember all those painful things he will have experienced and his kingship (atītaṃ duḥkhāvahaṃ svakaṃ rājatvaṃ ca tasmin kāle [na] smariṣyasi). Cr is more explicit. He understands the term atītam to refer specifically to the eating of forbidden foods, etc., during the period of the curse, and it is these things that the king will not remember (atītaṃ śāpakālikābhakṣyabhakṣaṇādi na smariṣyasi). Cg understands that the king must not keep in mind how he was cursed so rashly by Vasiṣṭha (mayā haṭhāc chaptaṃ na manasi kurv ity arthaḥ). Cs explains: " 'You will not remember the past,' means that you will not remember what took place when you were in the condition of a rākṣasa, as well as your kingship, and then, after you have once again become a king, you will not remember that you were a rākṣasa (atītaṃ na smariṣyasi rākṣasatvāvasthāyām atītaṃ rājatvaṃ punā rājatvaprāptyanantaraṃ rakṣastvaṃ ca na smariṣyasi)."

33. "that crusher of his foes" arimardanaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead arisūdanaḥ, "the slayer of foes."

34. "And this area near the ashram about which you were inquiring" āśramasya samīpe 'smin yasmin pṛcchasi: Literally, "with respect to which you are inquiring in the vicinity of the ashram." D6,10,11,T4,G1,M1–3,5,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yan mām, "concerning which [you asked] me," for yasmin. M3 and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read asya, "of this [ashram]," for asmin, "in the [vicinity]."

"belonged to Mitrasaha Kalmāṣapāda" kalmāṣapādasya: Literally, "of Kalmāṣapāda." The introduction of the name Kalmāṣapāda presents a narrative difficulty, since the critical text has not previously mentioned this epithet, nor does it provided any explanation for it. The explanation is found in 1006*. Although 1006* is known to all northern and devanāgarī manuscripts, it is virtually unknown in the manuscripts aligned with the south (excepting devanāgarī manuscripts aligned with the south and T3). The passage appears in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP. However, Ck, Cg, and Ct do not comment on these lines, and as a result, they feel obliged to explain the occurrence of the name Kalmāṣapāda here, while Cg gives a brief recapitulation of the episode narrated in 1006*, suggesting that they do not know the passage. Cr and Cs both appear to know the insert as part of their text, as they comment on it. See 1006*, following notes to verse 28 above. Ck and Ct note that this is another name for Mitrasaha (kalmāṣapāḍa iti mitrasahasyaiva nāmāntaram—so Ct; Ck similarly). Cg takes the mention of the name here as an opportunity to recount the episode of the king's abortive attempt to curse Vasiṣṭha, his wife's intervention, and the darkening of his feet through contact with the water that bore the energy of his anger.

35. "Śatrughna . . . then entered" viveśa: Literally, "he entered."

"of that best of kings Kalmāṣapāda" parthivendrasya: Literally, "of the best of kings."

"the great seer Vālmīki" maharṣim: Literally, "the great seer."

Sarga 58

1. "entered" samāviśat: Literally, "he entered." Ñ2,V3,B,M2,5,7, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead upāviśat, "he entered."

"two sons" dārakadvayam: Literally, "a pair of sons or boys."

2. "auspicious childbirth" prasavaṃ śubham: Here we understand the term śubham to refer to the blessedness or auspiciousness of giving birth to twin boys. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 559) alone renders, "safe confinement." See verses 9–10 and notes below.

"O sage of great blazing energy" mahātejaḥ: Literally, "O one of great blazing energy."

"a protective amulet . . . that will ward off malignant spirits" rakṣām . . . bhūtavināśinīm: Literally, "the protection or amulet that destroys or renders ineffective malignant spirits [bhūtas]." The term rakṣā normally refers to a protective amulet or a silk thread placed on the wrist to ward off evil influences. Given the context and verse 8 below, it is apparent that the reference is to a physical object. Compare Kausalyā's presentation of such an amulet to Rāma as he prepares to depart for the wilderness at Ayodhyākāṇḍa 22.15. There, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr all note that the rakṣā fashioned out of the viśalyā herb is affixed to Rāma's wrist (rakṣāṃ cakāra rakṣāhetutvena haste babandhety arthaḥ—so Cg and Cm; Ct and Cr similarly). Compare, there, the largely northern variant (582*, in the note to 2.22.15), where it is specified that Kausalyā fastens the rakṣā to Rāma's right wrist. The idea may well be similar, if not identical, to the common modern practice of rakṣābandhana, in which a protective thread or rākhi is bound on the wrist of a brother by his sister, especially on Śravaṇā, the full-moon day of the monsoon month of Śrāvaṇa. It is interesting to note that this is also, as we learn from verse 11 below, the month in which the birth of the twins and their investiture with the amulet take place. Despite the fact that this appears to be a physical object, translators consulted have generally taken the term to refer either to a spell (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 559) or a rite (Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 568; Gita Press 1998, vol. 2, p. 866; and Benoît 1999, p. 1367). Gorresio (1870, p. 221) and Dutt (1894, p. 1771) take the term generally as something protective without specifying its nature. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 576) leaves the term untranslated. Ck, Ct, and Cs all understand the bhūtas to be the sixty-four malignant spirits that seize children (catuḥṣaṣṭibālagrahavināśinī). Cg is similar, although he omits the number (bālagrahavināśinī).

"for them" tasya: Literally, "of that [pair]." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tataḥ, "therefore."

Following 2cd, Ñ,V1,2,B2,4,D2,5–7,9–11,S, and Gorresio, insert a passage of one line [1013*]: "Blessed one, Rāma's wife has given birth to a pair of sons (bhagavan rāmapatnī sā prasūtā dārakadvayam /)."

3. "the sage . . . he was delighted" munir harṣam upāgamat: Literally, "the sage went to delight." The words munir harṣam are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead maharṣiḥ samupāgamat, "the great seer approached."

"and he fashioned for each infant a protective amulet that would destroy malignant spirits and ward off rākṣasas" bhūtaghnīṃ cākarot tābhyāṃ rakṣāṃ rakṣovināśinīm: Literally, "and he made a protective amulet for both of them which was destructive of malignant spirits [bhūtas] and warded off rākṣasas." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 568) appears to collapse and confuse the term rakṣā, "protective amulet," with its two qualifiers. He renders, "and he performed the Rakshasa rite." Shastri adds a footnote here, which reads, "To avert evil." On the term rakṣā, see notes to verse 2 above.

Following 3ab, D7,10,11,T4,M3,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D6,T1,2,G,M1,2,4,5,8–10 insert line 2 following 3ab, a passage of two lines [1016*]: "Delighted at heart, he went there and saw the two boys, who were immensely vigorous, like the sons of gods,[1] and who shone like the waxing moon[2] (bālacandrapratīkāśau devaputrau mahaujasau / jagāma tatra hṛṣṭātmā dadarśa ca kumārakau //)."

[1] "like the sons of gods" devaputrau: Literally, "the two sons of the god or gods." Ct and Cr understand the term to be an implicit simile, glossing, "resembling them (tatsadṛśau)." Cs takes the term in two senses, noting that the boys are sons of Rāma, who is God, and that they are born from portions of the two divinities Agni and Indra, respectively. (devaputrau devasya rāmadevasya putrau. devayor vahnīndrayoḥ putrāv aṃśasaṃbhūtau.) Since the word deva is frequently used for a king or prince, the compound could also be read as "the two sons of the god [on earth] [i.e., the king]." No translator consulted renders in this latter fashion.

[2] "who shone like the waxing moon" bālacandrapratīkāśau: Literally, "who resembled the young moon." Translators have interpreted this variously and, in some cases, incorrectly. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 576) renders, "Qui brillaient comme la nouvelle lune." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 568), who offers, "who were as effulgent as the new moon." But this interpretation seems hardly appropriate, as the new moon has no luster whatsoever, because it is invisible. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 866) ignores the term bāla- and renders only, "effulgent as the moon." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 559) and Benoît (1999, p. 1367) render literally, offering, respectively, "who shone like the young moon" and "qui brillaient d'un éclat pareil à ce lui de la jeune lune." Dutt (1894, p. 1772), evidently confusing the term bālacandra with the common bālārka, incorrectly renders, "resembling the newly risen sun."

4. "Taking up the cut tips of kuśa grass as well as the remaining stalks, called lava" kuśamuṣṭim upādāya lavaṃ caiva: Literally, "having taken a fistful of kuśa and lava as well." Kuśa grass is Poa cynosuroides. The grass is considered highly purificatory and is used for ritual purposes. The word lava literally means "fragment, section, or that which is cut off." According to the commentators, kuśamuṣṭi is the name for tips of cut kuśa grass, while lava refers to the bottom portion of the stalks left behind when the cut kuśa grass is then further cut in half. The idea, as put forth by Ct, is that the seer has the two severed sections of the cut clump of grass used to cleanse the two newborns, respectively. He hands these over to the elderly women who are attending the birth. (kuśamuṣṭiṃ lavaṃ copādāya rakṣāṃ pradadau. lūnakuśānām agrabhāgaḥ kuśamuṣṭir ity ucyate. teṣām adhobhāgo lava iti. tatra katipayasāgrakuśān gṛhītvā madhye dvidhā chittvā tadagrādhobhāgābhyāṃ kramāj jyeṣṭhakaniṣṭhayoḥ pramārjanaphalakaṃ tadrūpaṃ rakṣādānaṃ vṛddhānāṃ strīṇāṃ hasta iti bodhyam—so Ct.) The point of this passage and its somewhat tortuous commentaries is to provide an auspicious rationale for the names of Sītā's twins, as shown in the following passages. The elder, who will be cleaned or rubbed with the upper "kuśa" section of the grass, will be known as Kuśa, while the younger, who will be cleaned with the lower "lava" portion of the grass, will be known as Lava. In all likelihood, the names were originally derived from the term kuśīlava, literally, "of dubious character," a somewhat pejorative term applied to a class of bards or performers. See notes to verse 5 below. See 7.97.6 and notes.

"handed over for each infant" pradadau tābhyām: Literally, "he gave to or for both of them." Note that Vālmīki, who would not enter the actual birth chamber (see notes to verse 6 below), must be understood to give the amulets to the elderly women of the ashram, who will actually affix them to the infants (see verse 8 below and notes to verse 2 above).

"a protective amulet" rakṣāṃ: See notes to verse 2 above.

"saying": Verses 5, 6, and 7 are Vālmīki's words. The text provides no verb of speaking, so we have provided one.

5. "The one who was born first of the two" yas tayoḥ pūrvajo jātaḥ saḥ: Literally, "he, who of the two was born as previously born." According to most commentators and the general tradition, Kuśa is the firstborn, and therefore eldest of the twins. Cs is more specific. He understands that Kuśa is born first, in the sense that he is conceived first [lit., 'born first'] from Rāma's body (tayor jātayor madhye yaḥ pūrvajo rāmadehād iti śeṣaḥ). Cs offers a complex understanding of the situation, which he derives from the medical literature on conception and gestation. Referring to a text he identifies as the Piṇḍasiddhismṛti, he argues that when, at the time of conception, the semen enters the womb in such a way that it is divided in two, with one part entering before the other, it produces twins. He then argues that the order in which the two fetuses are conceived, that is, the order of the entrance of the two portions of the father's semen, is reversed in the order of the birth from the mother. In this case, Sītā's firstborn is therefore Lava, and Kuśa is then born later but is, nonetheless, by order of conception, the elder. (atredaṃ bodhyam. yadā garbhādhānasamaye yonipuṣpaṃ viśadvīryaṃ dvidhāvibhaktam ādipaścādbhāvena praviśati tadā yamau bhavataḥ. tayoś ca pitṛtaḥ praveśakramaviparyayeṇa mātṛtaḥ prasavaḥ. tathā coktaṃ piṇḍasiddhismṛtau yadāviśed dvidhābhūtaṃ yonipuṣpaṃ parikṣarat / dvau tadā bhavato garbhau sūtir veśaviparyayād iti. tathā cātra sītāyāḥ prathamato jāto lava eva. anantaraṃ kuśo jāta iti sa evāgraja iti.) Śrīdharasvāmin uses a similar argument citing this same source, which he identifies as the Piṇḍasiddhismaraṇa, in connection with the birth of the twin demons Hiraṇyākṣa and Hirāṇyakaśipu. See Śrīdharasvāmin's comments on BhāgP 3.17.18.

"the cut tips of kuśa grass" kuśaiḥ: See notes to verse 4 above on kuśamuṣṭiḥ.

"sanctified with mantras" mantrasaṃskṛtaiḥ: D2,4,6,7,9–11,T,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mantrasatkṛtaiḥ, "worshiped or honored with mantras."

"he shall thus be known by the name Kuśa" bhavet kuśa ity asya nāmataḥ: Literally, "of him by name it would be, 'Kuśa.' " The construction is quite awkward, although the intent is quite clear. Ck, who reads with the critical text, glosses, "he made him 'Kuśa' by name (kuśa ity eva nāmato 'karod iti śeṣaḥ)." The verb bhavet might possibly be construed with the gerundive nirmārjanīyaḥ, "to be cleansed," but this, too, would be awkward. D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tadā, "then," for bhavet, while D6,7,10,11,T1,2,M2,3,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (except Ck) read nāma tat for nāmataḥ. These changes lend the line the sense "then . . . and that name of him [would be] 'Kuśa.' " Cr glosses, "then, i.e., at the time of the naming ceremony (tadā nāmakaraṇasamaye)."

6. "this very quiet one" susamāhitaḥ: Literally, "composed or attentive." T1,M3, and KK and VSP read instead saḥ samāhitaḥ, "the quiet one." The exact sense of this common adjective when applied to a newborn infant is unclear. Taking a hint from Cr, who understands the term to suggest that the younger child's spirit was hidden at the time of his birth, we tentatively understand that Vālmīki is making a distinction between the twins based on their level of activity or vocalization at birth. (susamāhitaś ca . . . etena prādurbhāvakāle kaniṣṭhas tirohitacaitanyo 'bhavad iti sūcitam—so Cr.) Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 576) takes the term as an adverb modifying nirmārjanīyaḥ, "to be cleansed," rendering, "très soigneusement nettoyé." Such an interpretation forces the syntax to an extreme degree. Nonetheless, it has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 568—"will be carefully dried"), Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 866—"should be cleansed carefully"), and Benoît (1999, p. 1367—"les matrones le nettoieront soigneusement"). Other translators who share this term ignore it.

"born second of the two" yaś cāparo bhavet tābhyām: Literally, "and who would be the latter from or out of the two." The commentators gloss the expected genitive or locative tayoḥ, "between the two," for the instrumental, dative, ablative ābhyām. D6,7,10,11,T3,M3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read avaraḥ, "younger or later," for aparaḥ, "second or other." Cs, in keeping with his earlier interpretation, glosses, "the meaning is 'the one who entered the womb last from Rāma at the time of conception' (avaro rāmād garbhādhānasamaye paścād garbhaṃ praviṣṭa ity arthaḥ)." See notes to verse 5 above.

"is to be cleansed by the elderly women" nirmārjanīyo vṛddhābhiḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the cleansing is to be done by the elderly women in the birth chamber, given that the seer Vālmīki will not enter it (sūtikāgṛhamadhya ṛṣipraveśābhāvāt—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly).

"with the remaining stalks, called lava" lavena: Literally, "with lava." See notes to verse 4 above.

"and so he shall be Lava by name" lavaś ceti sa nāmataḥ: Literally, "and he by name 'Lava.'" V3,D6,7,10,11,M4,5,8,9,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead (with double sandhi) laveti ca, "and 'Lava,'" while KK and VSP read instead (with correct sandhi) lava ity eva, "just 'Lava.'" Ct adds the words "he will be" and notes that although the birth ceremony must be performed on that day, that is not the case for the naming ceremony, and therefore the future form, "he will be," needs to be added. (sa laveti nāmato bhaviṣyatīti śeṣaḥ. jātakarmaṇa evādya divase kartavyatā na tu nāmakaraṇasyāpīti bhaviṣyatīti śeṣapūraṇam.) Ck and Cg understand similarly. See Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 228–37 (jātakarma) and pp. 238–54 (nāmakaraṇa). Ck provides the derivation of the word lava according to Pā 3.3.57 (ṛdor ap). He derives the word from the verbal root √lū, "to cut" with the ap suffix. See notes to verse 4 above.

7. "will be renowned" khyātiyuktau bhaviṣyataḥ: Literally, "the two will be conjoined with fame." The compound khyātiyuktau is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"by the two names that I have given them" matkṛtābhyāṃ ca nāmabhyām: Literally, "and by the two names made by me." Cr notes that the fact that Vālmīki has given the twins these etymological names right at the moment of their birth [as opposed to waiting until the formal naming ceremony] suggests the intensity of the seer's delight (janmakāla eva nāmaniruktyarṣer harṣātiśayaś ca sūcitaḥ).

8. "Taking the amulets . . . affixed them to the two infants" rakṣāṃ jagṛhus tām . . . akurvaṃś ca tato rakṣāṃ tayoḥ: Literally, "they took that amulet and then applied the amulet on the two." T1,M3, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tāḥ, "those [women]," for tām, "that [amulet]." See notes to verse 2 above.

"those women, free from impurity" te . . . vigatakalmaṣāḥ: Literally, "those . . . ones from whom stain or sin was gone." In this context, the more or less conventional adjective may refer specifically to the impurity associated with childbirth, the so-called sūtaka period. If the women were subject to sūtaka, Vālmīki would not be able to interact with them as he does here. The grammar here seems irredeemably defective in that the pronoun te must be understood as nominative masculine plural and must be construed with the two feminine plural adjectives samāhitāḥ and vigatakalmaṣāḥ through liṅgabheda. The context of the passage, however, seems to make it clear that it is the elderly women of the ashram, those who are attending Sītā's childbirth, who actually enter the birth chamber (sūtigṛha) to affix the amulets. The only possibility for a masculine subject would be the young boys of the ashram, who were last mentioned in verses 1–3, where they had, no doubt on the instructions of the matrons, reported the births to Vālmīki and requested that he prepare the amulets. But again, it is unlikely that they would be permitted to enter the birth chamber and apply the amulets, nor would they be likely to be characterized as vigatakalmaṣa. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand that the subject must be the elderly women (vṛddhā iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg; Ck, Ct, and Cr similarly). However, none of these commentators reads with the critical edition. Ś,V,B,D1–5,8–12,T,G3,M1,3,5, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tām, "that [amulet]," for te, "those." This leaves many manuscripts, as well as GPP and NSP, with the extremely awkward repetition of the pronoun tām in pāda a. On the other hand, Gita Press, KK, and VSP clearly attempt to correct the gender discrepancy by reading tāṃ rakṣāṃ jagṛhus tāś ca, "and those [women] took that amulet." Lahore and Gorresio avoid the problem by substituting the adverbs āśu, "quickly," and atha, "then," respectively, for the critical edition's tām and supply a nominative feminine plural noun tāpasyaḥ, "ascetic women," as the subject.

9–10. The syntax and precise meaning of the two verses are far from clear, and they are subject to textual variations and multiple interpretations on the part of the commentators. Verse 9 is particularly problematic, as it consists entirely of a list, and it is not clear whether the things listed are to be seen as the objects of akurvan, "they [the elderly women] performed or announced," in verse 8, as Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 577) has understood, or, as the other translators consulted have done, as the objects of śuśrāva, "he [Śatrughna] heard." The commentators also understand this latter syntax. In either case, the syntax is awkward.

"Śatrughna heard . . . the announcement of the children's names and dynastic name . . . amulets" rakṣāṃ gotraṃ ca nāma ca . . . / . . . / . . . śatrughnaḥ śuśrāva: Literally, "Śatrughna heard [about] the amulet [that was being applied], the dynastic name, and the name." We understand the term gotra here in its sense of "dynastic or lineage name," as it would be applied to kshatriya princes. Here the gotra name would be something like Aikṣvāka, Rāghava, or Kākutstha. The term is used only one other time in the critical edition of the Rāmāyaṇa, at 3.45.20. There, Sītā asks Rāvaṇa, who had assumed the guise of a brahman ascetic, for his gotra. There the term would refer to one of the forty-nine vedic brahmanical lineages named for their respective founders. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK (1905), and VSP read vṛddhābhir gotranāma ca, "[the amulet that was being applied] by the elderly women, and the name of the gotra or the names and the gotra." Cg and KK (1913) read instead vṛddhābhir janma nāma ca, "by the elderly women . . . the birth and name." This last variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Both Ck and Ct understand the compound gotranāma to be a dvandva (gotraṃ ca nāma ca—so Ck and Ct). Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Śatrughna hears the different items mentioned at different times and from different sources. Thus they argue that since the birth ceremonies are to be performed on the day of the birth of a son, but the naming ceremony is not, we are to understand that Śatrughna hears about the future naming of the twins directly from the words of the seer himself as he pronounced them in verse 7 above. On the other hand, they believe that he hears the praise of Rāma and the announcement of Rāma's wife's having given birth from the words of the sons of the sages. (yady api jātakarma putrajanmadivase kartavyaṃ na tu nāmakaraṇaṃ tathāpy evaṃ nāmakau bhaviṣyata ity ṛṣivacanāt tacchravaṇamātram iti mantavyam. saṃkīrtanaṃ ca rāmasyeti rāmapatnīprasūteti munidārakavacaḥśravaṇāt—so Cg; Ck similarly.)

"the auspicious birth of twins to Sītā" sītāyāḥ prasavau śubhau: Literally, "Sītā's two auspicious childbirths." See notes to verse 1 above.

"as well as the praise of Rāma" saṃkīrtanaṃ ca rāmasya: Cr reads the passage to mean "the praise of Rāma and Sītā with reference to the two auspicious childbirths (śubhau prasavāv uddiśya rāmasya sītāyāḥ saṃkīrtanam)." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the praise of Rāma to be in the form of the statement "O blessed one, Rāma's wife has given birth (bhagavan rāmapatnī sā prasūteti—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly)."

"Then, returning to his leaf hut that night, he cried, 'Thank heavens! Thank heavens!' " parṇaśālāṃ gato rātrau diṣṭyā diṣṭyeti cābravīt: Literally, "He went to the leaf hut at night and said, 'Fortunate! Fortunate!' " Our understanding of the situation is that, after having retired for the night to his leaf hut, Śatrughna is awakened at midnight by the commotion surrounding the birth of the children. He steps outside to ascertain what has happened and then returns to his hut. D7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,3,5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead parṇaśālāṃ tato gatvā, "then having gone to the leaf hut," for parṇaśālāṃ gato rātrau, "he went to the leaf hut at night." In addition, D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mātar diṣṭyeti cābravīt, "and he said, 'O mother! Thank heavens!' " for diṣṭyā diṣṭyeti cābravīt, "and said, 'Fortunate! Fortunate!' " The commentators, however, differ as to which hut Śatrughna goes to and to whom he addresses his words. Cm, who is quoted at length by Ct, knows and comments on both the critical reading and the variant reading. He understands, in the critical reading, which for him is a variant, that Śatrughna, having heard all [the news and commotion], while remaining in his own leaf hut, says to himself, "It is fortunate! It is fortunate!" Cm goes on to note that even in the principal reading (i.e., the variant of the southern commentators), Śatrughna, having first gone to the leaf hut that was assigned to him by Vālmīki, stays there. Then, after he hears all the fuss, he says, "O mother! The birth of your sons is fortunate," only to himself. That is the only meaning that is possible to put forward, for without Rāma's permission, it would have been inappropriate for him to speak directly to someone [i.e., Sītā] whom Rāma had rejected. (parṇaśālāṃ gato rātrau diṣṭyā diṣṭyeti cābravīd iti pāṭhe svaparṇaśālāsthaḥ sarvam idaṃ śrutvā svātmany eva bhāgyaṃ bhāgyam ity abravīd ity arthaḥ. ādyapāṭhe 'pi vālmīkidattaparṇaśālāṃ pūrvam eva dattvā sthitaḥ. tataḥ śravaṇānantaraṃ mātar bhāgyenedaṃ tava putrajanmeti svātmany evābravīd ity artho vaktuṃ śakyaḥ. rāmānujñāṃ vinā rāmatyaktasaṃbhāṣaṇasyānaucityād iti tīrthaḥ.) The critical apparatus only quotes Cm as mentioning the two variant readings. Ck understands that Śatrughna, after hearing the good news, proceeds to the leaf hut where Sītā has delivered her sons and says to Sītā directly, "It is only by chance that I have found you." In this way, Ck concludes, we know that Sītā's having been abandoned in this place was not known to [the brothers] Śatrughna, etc. (tataḥ parṇaśālāṃ sītāyāḥ prasavaparṇaśālāṃ gatvā mātar diṣṭyā daivayogena dṛṣṭeti sītām abravīt. evaṃ ca śatrughnādibhir iha sītāvisarjanaṃ na vijñātam—so Ck; Ct quotes Ck on this). Ct, however, quotes Ck as having Śatrughna say to Sītā, "Mother, it is through good fortune that you have borne sons" (mātar diṣṭyā daivayogena te putrajanmeti śeṣa ity abravīd ity artha iti katakaḥ). Cg, on the on the other hand, thinks that Śatrughna has gone to Vālmīki's leaf hut, where he speaks joyfully to the sage, suggesting that he has been fortunate in general to have found Sītā. All of this, Cg concludes, in a manner similar to Ck, suggests that the fact that Sītā had been abandoned was unknown to anyone other than the three brothers, starting with Rāma. (vālmīkeḥ pārṇaśālāṃ gatvā sāmānyato diṣṭyā dṛṣṭeti sūcayan muniṃ prati harṣeṇāha . . . anena sītā visṛṣṭeti rāmāditrayavyatiriktair na jñātam iti sūcitam.) The reference is presumably to Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, and Bharata. This would appear to indicate that, according to Cg at least, Śatrughna was unaware of the location of Sītā and just happened to stumble across her while staying at the ashram of Vālmīki. Finally, Cs understands that Śatrughna has proceeded from the sage's residence to the leaf hut in which he was staying (parṇaśālāṃ svāvāsoṭajaṃ gatvā muninilayāt).

11. "Thus" tathā: D6,7,10,11,T2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tadā, "then."

"in the month of Śrāvaṇa" śrāvaṇī: Literally, "belonging to Śrāvaṇa." Śrāvaṇa corresponds to July–August. Ck and Cg gloss, "taking place in the month of Śrāvaṇa (śrāvaṇamāsavartinī)." Ct understands similarly. Cr glosses, "conjoined with the nakṣatra, or constellation, Śravaṇa (śravaṇayuktā)." This may also refer to Śravaṇā, the full-moon night of Śrāvaṇa. See notes to verse 2 above, concerning the association of this date with the practice of rakṣābandhana.

"passed quickly" vyatītā . . . laghuvikramā: Literally, "having swift paces, it passed." Ct notes that although this night [being near midsummer] was relatively long, it still passed quickly (dīrghatarāpi laghuvikramā śīghragamanā vyatītā).

12. "And . . . mighty Śatrughna" tu mahāvīryaḥ: Literally, "and that one of great strength." Ñ2,V2,D5,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sumahāvīryaḥ, "the one of very great strength."

"his sequence of morning activities" paurvāhṇikaṃ kramam: Literally, "the sequence belonging to the morning." This would, presumably, include Śatrughna's religious and personal activities. Ś1,V2,3,B1–3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read paurvāhṇikīṃ kriyām. This can refer to either one's general morning activities or, more specifically, to one's morning religious rites. See 7.41.19 and 7.63.*3ab, lines 46–47 and notes, where Sītā is said to perform her morning obligations to the gods (paurvāhṇikāni devakāryāṇi).

"set out" prāyāt: D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yayau, "he went."

"heading west" paścānmukhaḥ: Literally, "having [his] face toward the west."

13. "for seven nights" saptarātra-: See notes to 7.57.1.

"he took up residence" vāsam abhyayāt: Literally, "he approached a dwelling or residence."

14. "that . . . king" saḥ . . . nṛpaḥ: The reader will recall that Rāma consecrated Śatrughna as king of the region at 7.55.4–8.

"stayed with the sages" munibhiḥ sārdham . . . / . . . vāsaṃ cakre: Literally, "he made a dwelling together with the sages." As Ck and Cg note, this phrase suggests that Śatrughna's army remains encamped back on the banks of the Ganges (munibhiḥ sārdham ity anena senā gaṅgātīra eva sthāpiteti sūcitam—so Cg; Ck similarly). Ct, oddly, seems to understand Ck to think that Śatrughna himself is staying on the banks of the Ganges, which Ct notes is in complete contradiction to the coherence of the narrative both before and after [this juncture] (yat tu gaṅgātīra iti katakas tat pūrvāparasaṃdarbhaviruddham).

"whose leader was the Bhārgava Cyavana" bhārgavapramukhaiḥ: Literally, "with [the sages] who had Bhārgava for their chief."

"in many kinds of discourse" kathābhir bahurūpābhiḥ: Literally, "with tales of many forms." D7,10,11,T1,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read abhirūpābhiḥ, "with pleasant or suitable [stories]," for bahurūpābhiḥ.

Following verse 14, Ñ2,V2,B1,2 (lines 3 and 4 only),3,4,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1022*]: "And that great hero of the Raghus, son of the lord among kings, then passed the night[1] in many types of conversation with the assembled[2] sages, of whom Kāñcana[3] was the foremost (sa kāñcanādyair munibhiḥ sametai raghupravīro rajanīṃ tadānīm / kathāprakārair bahubhir mahātmā virāmayāmāsa narendrasūnuḥ //)."

[1] "passed the night" rajanīm . . . / . . . virāmayāmāsa: Literally, "he caused the night to come to an end."

[2] "assembled" sametaiḥ: KK and VSP read instead the nominative singular sametaḥ, which would then modify "the great hero" and have the sense "accompanied [by the sages]."

[3] "Kāñcana" kāñcana-: According to Ct, Cr, and Cs, this is another name for Cyavana (kāñcaneti cyavanasya nāmāntaram—so Ct; Cr and Cs similarly). See 7.98.7–9 and notes, where Kāñcana is named as Śatrughna's purohita.

The meter is upendravajrā.

1–2. "as the night came on" rātryāṃ pravṛttāyām: Literally, "when the night had proceeded or come on." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct. Ck and Cg understand that the night has just come on (pravṛttāyām āgatāyām). Ct understands similarly, glossing, "came about (jātāyām)." It is also possible to understand the phrase in the sense of "as the night proceeded or wore on," referring specifically to the first night of Śatrughna's arrival. See 1022*, following notes to 7.58.14, where the night is explicitly said to have been brought to a close.

"strengths and weaknesses" balābalam: Literally, "strength and weakness." B1,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yathābalam (yathā balam = KK 1913 and VSP), "in accordance with [his] strength."

"by him with that greatest of lances" anena śūlamukhyena: Literally, "by him with that greatest of lances or by that greatest of lances." We follow Cv and Cg in taking the pronoun anena to refer to Lavaṇa himself rather than to the lance (aneneti lavaṇaḥ parāmṛśyate).

"when they approached him for single combat" dvandvayuddham upāgatāḥ: Literally, "who had come for a duel or for a battle of a pair."

3. "that speech" tad bhāṣitam: The sequence is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. B2,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous tad vacanam, "that speech or those words."

4. "The feats that he performed" karmāṇi yāny asya: Literally, "which deeds of him or it." The commentators differ as to whether the pronoun asya, "of him or of it," refers to Lavaṇa or his lance. Cr is of the former opinion, while Ck and Cg prefer the latter. Ct straddles the issue by taking it to refer to both (asya śūlasya lavaṇasya ca). Both Ck and Cg explain that the deeds in question are those of the slaughter of his enemies (śatrusaṃhārakarmāṇi).

"bull among men" puruṣarṣabha: Ñ1,V1,B3,D1–7,9–11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead raghunandana, "delight of the Raghus."

"what befell one scion of the Ikṣvāku lineage" ikṣvākuvaṃśaprabhave yad vṛttam: Literally, "what took place or occurred in reference to one who rose from the Ikṣvāku lineage." Ck and Cg gloss "occupation or activity (vyāpāraḥ)" for vṛttam, "what occurred."

5. "was famed . . . as Māndhātṛ" māndhātā iti vikhyātaḥ: KK and VSP read instead mandhāteti sa vikhyātaḥ, "he [was] famed as Mandhātṛ. This reading is not attested in the critical apparatus.

6. "then" atho: D6,7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead itaḥ, "from here or there." Cr understands itaḥ to be "from Ayodhyā (ayodhyātaḥ)."

7. "Indra and the . . . gods were acutely afraid" indrasya tu bhayaṃ tīvraṃ surāṇāṃ ca: Literally, "but of Indra and the gods there was intense fear." Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D2,5–7,9–11,T1,2,4,G,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for tu, "but."

8. "Honored by the hosts of the gods with half of Śakra's throne and half of his kingdom, the king gave his word and then ascended." ardhāsanena śakrasya rājyārdhena ca pārthivaḥ / vandyamānaḥ suragaṇaiḥ pratijñām adhyarohata //: Literally, "With half a seat of Śakra and half a kingdom, the king, being praised or honored by the hosts of the gods, ascended to a vow." KK (1913) reads śaktasya for śakrasya, "of Śakra," which is clearly the result of a typographical error. The verse is highly elliptical and essentially impossible to construe without fleshing it out in one way or another. The problem is that it is not clear exactly what the author is trying to say. This particular story of Māndhātṛ, a figure otherwise well known to the Mahābhārata and purāṇic literature, seems to be largely unknown elsewhere. It appears, perhaps, to have been thrown together sketchily to provide an Ikṣvāku-related anecdote involving the demon Lavaṇa. The commentators and translators struggle to make sense of the verse. Basically they offer two interpretations. The first one, with which we agree more or less, as it seems to be in keeping with the events that follow, is articulated by Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct. According to this interpretation, Māndhātṛ is granted half of Indra's kingdom, and, having thus become [co-]king in heaven, is praised by the hosts of the gods. He then promises to stop [his preparations for war] and ascends to heaven. (śakrasyārdhāsanenārdharājyena ca yuktaḥ pārthivo rājā bhūtvā suragaṇair vandyamānaḥ sthāsya iti pratijñāṃ kṛtvā divam adhyarohata—so Cg and Ct; Ck and Cm similarly.) Cv and Cr, on the other hand, understand that although King Māndhātṛ has been endowed with half of Indra's throne and kingdom, he nonetheless makes a promise, that is, a vow, that he shall have it all (śakrasyārdhāsanena rājyārdhena ca yukto 'pi pārthivo māndhātā pratijñāṃ sarvaṃ gṛhītuṃ saṃkalpam adhyarohatākarot—so Cr; Cv similarly). The translators struggle, rendering variations on these interpretations as well as other, more far-fetched, interpretations of their own. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 560) appears to be influenced by the interpretation of Ck et al. He renders, "The gods sought to appease the King by allowing him to sit with Śakra on his throne and to share the kingdom. And he, apparently agreeing, rose to heaven." Dutt (1894, p. 1773), on the other hand, seems to understand the passage uniquely and translates, "With this promise, the king Māndhāta [sic] went up into the celestial region that he would occupy the half of Indra's throne and kingdom and the celestials would adore him." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 578), in a different vein, translates, "Résolu de partager le trône et le royaume de Çakra en se faisant proclamer roi par les troupes des Suras, il escalada (le ciel)." Benoît (1999, p. 1368) is somewhat similar to Roussel, offering, "Celui-ci s'était en effet promis de partager le trône et le royaume de Śakra, après s'être fait reconnaître comme roi par les cohortes divines." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 868), too, offers a unique reading of the verse, rendering, "Propitiated by the hosts of gods (Māndhātā), the king having vowed to take one half of Indra's kingdom and the other half of earthly sovereignty went up to heaven." In what may be seen, perhaps, as an attempt to gloss this, several northern manuscripts and Gorresio read chandyamānaḥ, "[the king] being appeased or gratified," and nābhicakrame, "he did not undertake," lending the verse the sense "Although the king was being gratified by the hosts of the gods with half of Śakra's throne and kingdom, he would not make a promise [to desist from conquest]." The upasarga adhy[a] is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

9. "malicious intention" pāpam abhiprayam: Cs glosses, "the intention to take over heaven (svarapaharaṇābhiprayam)."

"Indra, the chastiser of Pāka" pākaśāsanaḥ: Literally, "the chastiser of Pāka."

10. "not yet the king of the world of men" rājā tvaṃ mānuṣe loke na tāvat: Literally, "up to this point, you [are] not king in the human world." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand tāvat, "up to this point," in its sense of "firstly (prathamataḥ—so Ck and Cg; prathamam—so Ct)."

11. "entire . . . completely" samagrā . . . nikhilā: Literally, "entire . . . entire." The adjectives are basically synonymous and therefore redundant. Like several of the translators, we have taken the adjective nikhilā adverbially to avoid redundancy. Cr attempts to differentiate the two terms, glossing, "together with its foremost portions (agrabhāgasahitā)" for samagrā. Cs understands the word nikhilā to mean "having no gaps, that is to say, having no spaces (nikhilā khilā na bhavatīti nikhilā niśchidrā)."

12. "But" tu: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11,T1,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tam, "him," which would then agree with indram, "Indra."

"my rule contested" me . . . pratihataṃ śāsanam: Literally, "my rule obstructed."

13. "Thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣaḥ: Literally, "The thousand-eyed [one]."

"does not obey your command" nājñāṃ te kurute: The phrase nājñāṃ te is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. V3,D10,11,M2,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na te 'jñāṃ kurute by transposition and the irregular loss of the ā of ājñām, "command." Several of the commentators note the irregular sandhi (sandhir ārṣaḥ—so Cg and Ct; Ck similarly).

"blameless king" anagha: Literally, "O blameless [one]."

14. "those . . . words spoken by thousand-eyed Indra" tat . . . sahasrākṣeṇa bhāṣitam: Literally, "that which was spoken by the thousand-eyed [one]."

"he hung his head in shame" vrīḍito 'vāṅmukhaḥ: Literally, "he, ashamed, having [his] head or face downward." See notes to 7.46.10.

15. "of thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣasya: Literally, "of the thousand-eyed [one]."

"still hanging his head somewhat in shame" hriyā kiṃcid avāṅmukhaḥ: Literally, "having [his] head or face somewhat downward through shame." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read prāyāt, "he departed," for hriyā, "with shame."

16. "Cherishing indignation in his heart" sa kṛtvā hṛdaye 'marṣam: Literally, "he, having made indignation in the heart."

"the blameless king" aninditaḥ: Literally, "the blameless [one]." V2,3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G 1,M2,3,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ariṃdamaḥ, "the tamer of foes."

17. "Eager to fight Lavaṇa . . . him" kāṅkṣamāṇo lavaṇaṃ yuddhāya . . . /. . . sakāśaṃ lavaṇasya: Literally, "desiring Lavaṇa for battle . . . to the vicinity of Lavaṇa." The construction is awkward.

"that" saḥ . . . saḥ: Literally, "he . . . he." Ñ1,V2,M3, and KK and VSP read the emphatic particle hi for the second and redundant saḥ, "he."

18. "When he had gone there" gatvā: Literally, "having gone."

"the messenger . . . him" saḥ . . . taṃ dūtam: Literally, "he . . . that messenger."

"said many unpleasant words" vipriyāṇy āha bahūni: Literally, "he spoke many unpleasant things."

19. "When the messenger had not returned after some time" cirāyamāne dūte: Literally, "When the messenger was taking a long time or delaying." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr gloss, "delaying (vilambaṃ kurvati or kurvāṇe)."

20. "Lavaṇa" lavaṇaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tad rakṣaḥ, "that rākṣasa."

"for the destruction of the king, along with his entire retinue" vadhāya sānubandhasya: Literally, "for the killing of [him], together with his followers." The line is elliptical. Cr and Cs add "of Māndhātṛ (māndhātuḥ)," and Cr glosses, "of Māndhātṛ, along with his entourage (saparikarasya māndhātuḥ)."

21. "reduced . . . to ashes . . . and then returned" bhasmīkṛtvā . . . bhūyaḥ . . . agamat: Literally, "having reduced to ashes, it went once more." The gerund bhasmīkṛtvā, "having reduced to ashes," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11,T2,G3,M1, and GPP and NSP read bhūmau, "on the ground," for bhūyaḥ, "once again." This would lend the verse the sense "Having reduced the king to ashes on the ground, the lance went to Lavaṇa's hand."

22. "For" tu: Literally, "and or but." Ñ2,V1,2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"hero" vīra: Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saumya, "O gentle [one]."

23. "before he can take up his weapon" agṛhītāyudham: Literally, "by whom a weapon is not grasped."

Following verse 23, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M (except M6), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1030*]: "And once you have thus[1] accomplished this feat, it will be a boon for all the worlds[2] (lokānāṃ svasti caivaṃ syāt kṛte karmaṇi ca tvayā)."

[1] "thus" evam: T2,G1,2,M1–3,5,7–10, and KK and VSP read instead the emphatic particle eva, "indeed."

[2] "it will be a boon for all the worlds" lokānāṃ svasti . . . syāt: Literally, "it would be welfare of the worlds or people."

Following 1030*, D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with, while Ś2,3,Ñ2,V3,B,D3,8,12,M6 insert following verse 21, V2 inserts line 1 and 3 following verses 21 and 22, respectively, and M3 inserts following verse 22, a passage of three lines [1027*]: "I have now told you about all of this: the great strength of Lavaṇa[1] and the fearsome and immeasurable power of that lance, bull among men,[1–2] as well as the destruction of Māndhātṛ. Now, king, you must exert yourself.[2][3]"

[1] "the great strength of Lavaṇa" lavaṇasya balaṃ mahat: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read durātmanaḥ, "of the evil-minded [one]," for balaṃ mahat, "the great strength." In this case, one must understand the phrase to mean "the fearsome and immeasurable power of evil-minded Lavaṇa and of that lance" or "the fearsome and immeasurable power of evil-minded Lavaṇa's lance."

[2] "as well as the destruction of Māndhātṛ. Now, king, you must exert yourself." vināśaś caiva māndhātur yatnavān bhava pārthiva: Literally, "as well as the destruction of Māndhātṛ. You must be one possessing effort, O king." Ś2,V2,D10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yatnenābhūc ca for yatnavān bhava. This lends the line the sense "as well as the destruction of Māndhātṛ, [which] occurred through effort, O king." Cr understands the effort involved to be that of Indra [who had engineered Māndhātṛ's destruction] (yatnenendraprayatnenābhūt). Cs understands that the effort was that either of Māndhātṛ himself or of Indra (māndhātur yatnena svaprayatnenendraprayatnena vā). D7 and KK and VSP read this variant but substitute yattena or yat tena, for yatnena, "with effort." This would lend the phrase the sense of either "which [yat] occurred by means of that [tena, i.e., the lance]" or "[which] occurred by means of one who was prepared [yattena]." The former interpretation would suffer the fault of liṅgabheda.

Following 1027*, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with, while B substitutes for verse 23, and Ñ2,V2 insert after verse 23, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1029*]: "Tomorrow morning, great lord of men, you shall slay Lavaṇa, when, without his lance, he goes forth in search of flesh. I have no doubt in this regard. Indeed,[1] your victory will be certain. (tvaṃ śvaḥ prabhāte lavaṇaṃ mahātman vadhiṣyase nātra tu saṃśayo me / śūlaṃ vinā nirgatam āmiṣārthe dhruvo jayas te bhavitā narendra //)"

[1] "Indeed": The word has been added.

The meter is upajāti.

Sarga 60

1. "As they were carrying on this conversation" kathāṃ kathayatāṃ teṣām: Literally, "as they were telling the tale." Ś,V1,3,D1–5,8–10,12,T3,M6, and GPP and NSP read the singular kathayataḥ for the plural kathayatām, thus lending the line the sense "As he [Cyavana] was telling this story and they [the ṛṣis] were anticipating an auspicious victory."

2. "heroic" vīraḥ: KK and VSP read instead dhīraḥ, "steadfast, resolute, or courageous." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"intent on gathering food" bhakṣāhārapracoditaḥ: Literally, "impelled by the fetching of food." D6,7,10,11,M1,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the more or less synonymous bhakṣya-, "food or what is to be eaten," for bhakṣa-, "food." Cv, Ck, Cg, and Ct understand āhāra in its sense of āharaṇa, "bringing or fetching." Cr similarly glosses, "bringing (ānayanena)." Cr understands the phrase to mean "whose mind was focused on bringing food (bhakṣyānayanamanā ity arthaḥ)."

3. "heroic" śūraḥ: Ñ,V1,3,B,D2,6,7,9–11,T,G3,M2,3,6,7,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous vīraḥ, "heroic."

"Śatrughna" śatrughnaḥ: D6–8,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead the somewhat redundant uttīrya, "having descended to or crossed." This would lend the line the sense "having descended to the Yamunā River and having crossed."

"took up his position" atiṣṭhata: Literally, "he stood."

4. "bearing the weight" udvahan bharam: Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B2,3,4,D1–5,8,9,12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read, by transposition, bhāram udvahan, substituting the virtually synonymous bhāram for bharam (D9 reads bharam).

6. "of armed men such as you" īdṛśānām . . . sāyudhānām: Literally, "of such ones with weapons."

"Are you eager to die?" kālam ākāṅkṣase nu kim: Literally, "Are you eager for Kāla?" The term kāla can refer either to "time, one's time of death, or Kāla (the god of death)." Ś,Ñ1,V1,D1–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kālenānugato hy asi, "for you are followed or accompanied by kāla." Cr glosses, "you are accompanied by [your] time, that is, [your] final moments (kālenāntasamayenānugato 'si)." Cs understands, "by death (kālena mṛtyunā)."

7. "not enough" asaṃpūrṇaḥ: Literally, "not full." Cr glosses, "not able to bring about complete satiation (paripūrṇatṛptikārako na)."

"How is it" nu . . . katham: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read [a]dya, "today," for nu.

8. "shed tears of rage" roṣād aśrūṇy avartayat: Literally, "out of anger he caused tears to roll down." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read avāsṛjat, "he released or let down," for avartayat, "he caused to roll down." Cr glosses, "he shed or released (atyajat)." Ck and Cg note that tears can be produced from anger just as they are from sorrow and joy (duḥkhānandābhyām iva roṣād apy aśru jāyate—so Cg; Ck similarly). This explanation only highlights the unusual nature of such a phenomenon. It is not common in the epic to see heroes shed tears of anger. See notes to verse 9 below.

9. "blazing sparks flew from his every limb" tejomayā marīcyaḥ . . . sarvagātrair viniṣpatan: Literally, "sparks or rays consisting of fire or light flew out by all [his] limbs." The two symptoms of Śatrughna's fury described in this and the preceding verse are quite unusual in the case of epic warriors. We have not seen such phenomena described in a similar context in the Rāmāyaṇa. However, in the Mahābhārata a few characters are said to shed tears of rage, normally when this anger is associated with grief. But it is very uncommon for a warrior to shed such tears simply when challenged by an enemy. Examples of characters shedding tears of rage in the Mahābhārata include Śaktin's wife (MBh 1.173.16), Draupadī (MBh 3.111.2), and Asvatthāman (MBh 7.166.16–18). On the other hand, these two phenomena commonly occur in the case of horses, where they are regarded as ill omens for the horse's master. See 6.94.26 and notes.

10. "that" tam: V3,D6,7,10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saḥ, "he [Śatrughna]."

"night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaram: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"evil-minded wretch" durbuddhe: Literally, "O evil-minded [one]."

11. "Śatrughna, 'Slayer of Enemies' by name" śatrughno nāma śatrughnaḥ: The name Śatrughna means "slayer (-ghna) of enemies (śatru)." T1,2,G2,M3, and KK and VSP read nityaśatrughnaḥ, "constant slayer of enemies," for nāma śatrughnaḥ, "'slayer of enemies by name.'" Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 562), the only translator to render this variant reading, offers, "My name is Śatrughna, destroyer of man's constant foes." For other examples of such plays on the name Śatrughna, see 7.56.16–17; 7.61.4; 7.63 [App. I, No. 9, lines 50–51]; and notes.

12. "of all living things" sarvajīvānām: Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D,T3,4,M1,3,5,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sarvabhūtānām, "of all beings."

"you shall not escape me with your life" na me jīvan gamiṣyasi: Literally, "living, you will not go from me." For some reason, both Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 563) and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 870) have misread the nominative participle jīvan as referring to Śatrughna, yielding, in the translation of Raghunathan, "you shall not escape while I live" and, in that of Gita Press, "with me alive here you shall not escape." Compare notes to verse 18 below.

13. "But even as that foremost of men was speaking . . . replied to him" tasmin . . . bruvāṇe . . . / pratyuvāca naraśreṣṭham: Literally, "As he [Śatrughna] was speaking, he [Lavaṇa] replied to the foremost of men [Śatrughna]."

"chuckling" prahasann iva: Literally, "laughing softly."

"it is my good fortune" diṣṭyā: Literally, "by good fortune or fate."

14. "it was Rāma who . . . killed" hato rāmeṇa: Literally, "[he, i.e., Rāvaṇa] was killed by Rāma."

"the brother of my mother's cousin" mama mātṛṣvasur bhrātā: Literally, "the brother of the sister of my mother." Lavaṇa's mother, the wife of Madhu, as noted by Ck and Ct, was Kumbhīnasī. Her cousin, who in the Indian kinship system is considered to be a sister (i.e., cousin sister), was Rāvaṇa's actual sister, Śūrpaṇakhā. The connection is noted here by Ct, who glosses, "Because of her relationship with Kumbhīnasī, Śūrpaṇakhā was my mother's 'sister (i.e., cousin sister).' Her brother was Rāvaṇa. (kumbhīnasī-sambandhataḥ śūrpaṇakhāsya mātṛṣvasā tadbhrātā rāvaṇaḥ.)" See the discussions of the relevant genealogy at 7.5.35–36, 7.25.23–25, and 7.53.16 and notes.

15. "because I held you in such contempt" avajñāṃ puratas kṛtvā: Literally, "having placed contempt foremost."

"I let the complete destruction of Rāvaṇa's lineage . . . pass" tat . . . sarvaṃ mayā kṣāntam . . . rāvaṇasya kulakṣayam: Literally, "that entire destruction of the lineage of Rāvaṇa was endured or borne patiently by me." Cr, citing Pā 5.2.127, notes the irregular neuter gender of kṣaya, "destruction" (liṅgaviparināmenātrāpy anvayaḥ kṣaya-śabdo "arśa ādy" ajantaḥ), while Cs merely corrects the gender (kulakṣayaṃ kulasya kṣayaḥ).

"I . . . spared all of you" mayā yūyam: Literally, "you [pl.], by me." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct in carrying over the adjective kṣānta, "endured or borne patiently," with appropriate adjustment for number and gender, to modify yūyam, which we understand here to refer to the men of the Ikṣvāku lineage in general (yūyam . . . kṣāntā ity anukarṣaḥ—so Ck, Ct, and Cs; Cg and Cr similarly).

16. "Thus I did not kill all you lowest of men since I regarded you—your ancestors, your descendants, and you yourselves—as too insignificant." na hatāś ca hi me sarve paribhūtās tṛṇaṃ yathā / bhūtāś caiva bhaviṣyāś ca yūyaṃ ca puruṣādhamāḥ //: Literally, "For all you lowest of men—those who were, those who will be, and you—being despised like straw, were not killed by me." D10,11,T2,4,G1,M8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read nihatāḥ, "were slain," for na hatāḥ, "were not slain," while D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read te, "those," referring to Śatrughna's kinsmen, for me, "of [by] me." In this reading, as noted by Ck and Cg, the verse would have the sense "[I] have either slain or regarded as too insignificant all of you lowest of men." Ck and Cg explain: "I killed all those men—past, present, and future. But, a few, I treated as insignificant and, therefore, held them in disdain. That is to say, I took no notice of them. (bhūtāś ca bhaviṣyāś ca vartamānāś ca puruṣāḥ sarve 'pi me mayā nihatāḥ. kecit pare tṛṇaṃ yathā bhavati tathā paribhūtāś ca. alakṣīkṛtāś ca—so Cg; Ck similarly.)" Compare, however, Dutt's translation, given below. We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand yūyam, "you [all]," to refer to the current generation of Ikṣvākus or "contemporary [Ikṣvākus] (vartamānāḥ)." And we follow Ck, Cg, Cr, and Cs in taking the term paribhūtāḥ in its sense of "disregarded or treated with contempt (alakṣīkṛtāḥ—so Ck and Cg; alakṣīkaraṇīyam—so Cs; anādṛtāḥ—so Cr)." Ct and Cs note that Lavaṇa's contempt for the martial skills of the current generation of the Ikṣvāku lineage derives from the fact that it would be easier for him who killed Māndhātṛ, the founding father of their lineage, to kill them (yuṣmanmūlapuruṣamāndhātṛghātakasya yuṣmadvadhaḥ sukara eva—so Cs; Ct similarly). Dutt (1894, p. 1776), however, takes the term paribhūtāḥ in its sense of "destroyed or defeated." He thus renders, "[I have slain] and defeated all of you." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 580), taking the Sanskrit idiom literally, if not quite correctly, extends the metaphor to one of sweeping away straw. He translates, "je vous balaierai tous comme des fétus." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, pp. 571–72), Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 870), and Benoît (1999, p. 1370). See 5.19.2–3 and notes for the idiom of regarding someone as straw or grass.

17. "I will give you battle of whatever kind you wish. I will just make ready a weapon to deal with you." yuddhaṃ dāsyāmi . . . / īpsitaṃ yādṛśaṃ tubhyaṃ sajjaye yāvad āyudham //: The verse is ambiguous because it is not clear whether the phrase īpsitaṃ yādṛśaṃ tubhyam, "of such a sort that is desired for you," is meant to refer to yuddham, "battle," in pāda b, or āyudham, "weapon," in pāda d. The particular focus of the ambiguity is the dative pronoun tubhyam, "for you." The question becomes whether Lavaṇa is referring to the type of battle that is desired by Śatrughna or to his own personal weapon, which he is going to make ready. Our translation, "to deal with you," reflects the latter choice. Commentators differ in this respect, although, as we shall note below, the opinion of some of them is clearly influenced by a line interpolated between pādas b and c. Our translation follows the reading of Cg, who takes the phrase to refer to yuddham, "battle." He glosses, "Whatever sort is desired for you, I will give that sort [of battle]. As for the phrase 'While I make ready a weapon,' the meaning is 'Just wait while I, having seized that weapon, will make it ready.' (yādṛśaṃ tubhyam īpsitaṃ tādṛśaṃ tubhyaṃ dāsyāmi. sajjaye yāvad āyudham iti. āyudhaṃ gṛhītvā sajjayiṣye tāvat tiṣṭhety arthaḥ.)" All the other commentators consulted understand the phrase to refer to the weapon, which is desired by Lavaṇa himself for the sake of killing Śatrughna. Cv, who appears not to read 1036* (see below), interprets, "Of the sort that is desired for you, that is, desired for your sake, while I get that ready, that is, while I take it up, after so long I will battle. The meaning is 'Give me an opportunity to take up my lance.' (yādṛśaṃ tubhyam īpsitaṃ tvadartham īpsitaṃ tad yāvat sajjaye samuddhariṣyāmi tāvad eva yuddhaṃ dāsyāmi. śūlagrahaṇārtham avakāśaṃ dehīty arthaḥ.)" The other commentators who deal with this phrase agree with Cv and are even more specific. Ct, for example, glosses, "For you, that is, to kill you, whichever sort of weapon is desired by me, I will now make that sort ready. The words 'you should wait that long' are to be added. (tubhyaṃ tvāṃ hantuṃ yādṛśam āyudhaṃ mamepsitaṃ tādṛśaṃ yāvat sajjaye sajjaṃ karomi. tvaṃ tāvat tiṣṭheti śeṣaḥ.)" All translators consulted read with Cv, etc., with the exception of Gorresio (1870, p. 225), who understands īpsitam, "desired," to refer to the battle, but takes the phrase in a very different sense than does Cg. He translates, "la battaglia che tu chiedi; la desidero io pure al par di te."

Following 17ab, D5–7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ2,V2,B2–4,M3 insert following verse 17, and M6 inserts following 16 owing to omission, a passage of one line [1036*]: "Just wait a moment while I bring a weapon (tiṣṭha tvaṃ ca muhūrtaṃ tu yāvad āyudham ānaye /)."

18. "Then" atha: V1,D6,7,10,11,G2,M1,4,5,8,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead āśu, "quickly or immediately."

"him" tam: Ck and Cg gloss, "who desired to get [lit., 'grasp'] his weapon (tam āyudhaṃ jighṛkṣum ity arthaḥ)."

"How will you escape from me with your life?" kva me jīvan gamiṣyasi: Literally, "Where will you, living, go from me?" Compare notes to verse 12 above.

"For an accomplished warrior must not permit even a feeble enemy who has encountered him to escape." durbalo 'py āgataḥ śatrur na moktavyaḥ kṛtātmanā: Literally, "Even a weak enemy who has come is not to be released by an accomplished one." D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G2,M9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read svayam evāgataḥ śatruḥ, "an enemy who has come of his own volition," for durbalo 'py āgataḥ śatrur, "even a weak enemy who has come," while T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read śatrur yadṛcchayā dṛṣṭaḥ, "an enemy who is seen by chance."

19. "of irresolute mind" viklavayā buddhyā: Cr glosses, "with a mind devoid of deliberation or reflection (viklavayā vicārarahitayā buddhyā)."

"who gives an enemy an opportunity to escape" yaḥ . . . prasaraṃ śatrave dadau: Literally, "who gave passage to an enemy." Cv, Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr gloss, "room, space, or opportunity (avakāśam)," for prasaram. Cg adds, "For the sake of seizing the lance, that is the meaning (śūlagrahaṇārtham ity arthaḥ)." D7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read diśet, "he [who] would point out, " for dadau, "he [who] gave." Cr glosses dadyāt, "he [who] would give."

"through his dim-wittedness" mandabuddhitvāt: Ñ2,V2,B,D7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mandabuddhiḥ syāt, "he of dim wit would be [slain]."

Following verse 19, Ñ2,B1,2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while V2,B3,4 continue following 1039*, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1038*]: "Therefore, take a good, long look at the world of the living.[1] For, with various kinds of sharp arrows, I will lead you, the evil enemy of the three worlds and of Rāghava, to the entrance of Yama's abode[2] (tasmāt sudṛṣṭaṃ kuru jīvalokaṃ śaraiḥ śitais tvāṃ vividhair nayāmi / yamasya gehābhimukhaṃ hi pāpaṃ ripuṃ trilokasya ca rāghavasya //)."

[1] "take a good, long look at the world of the living" sudṛṣṭaṃ kuru jīvalokam: Literally, "make the world of the living well-viewed." Cr notes that the intention is to say that Lavaṇa will see it no more (punar na drakṣyasīti tātparyam). For another instance of this idiom, compare 6.31.61 and note.

[2] "to the entrance of Yama's abode" yamasya gehābhimukham: Literally, "facing or in front of Yama's house." Cr understands gehābhimukham as an adjective modifying Lavaṇa in the sense of "you who are facing or heading toward Yama's house." He thus suggests adding the phrase "to Yama's house," giving the line the sense "I will lead you who are facing Yama's house to Yama's house. (yamasya gehābhimukhaṃ tvām . . . nayāmi yamasya geham iti śeṣaḥ.)"

The meter is upajāti.

1. "When Lavaṇa had heard . . . he cried" śrutvā . . . abravīt: Literally, "having heard . . . he said."

"he manifested the most violent rage" krodham āhārayat tīvram: Literally, "he showed or exhibited violent anger." Cr glosses simply, "he obtained (prāpa)," while Cs understands, somewhat more literally, "he took on or accepted (svīkṛtavān)."

"Stay right where you are! Stay right where you are!" tiṣṭha tiṣṭha: Literally, "Stay! Stay!" The imperative used either singly, or twice, as here, is a typical expression used by combatants in a duel, urging their opponents to stand their ground, somewhat like the phrase "en garde!" Compare 6.47.121 and note.

2. "Pounding his fist in his hand" pāṇau pāṇiṃ viniṣpiṣya: Literally, "having pounded or pressed a hand in a hand." The exact gesture intended is not clear. The commentators are silent, while translators offer a spectrum of renditions, such as "pressing" (Gorresio 1870, p. 226), "clashing" (Dutt 1894, p. 1776), "striking his hands together" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 581; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 572; and Benoît 1999, p. 1371), "clasping" (Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 563), and "rubbing" (Gita Press 1998, vol. 2, p. 871). In any case, the gesture is one of anger. Compare MBh 7.51.19, where the same gesture is shown to indicate anger on the part of Arjuna. B4,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the more or less synonymous sa niṣpiṣya, "he having pressed," for viniṣpiṣya, "having pressed."

"loudly grinding his teeth" dantān kaṭakaṭāyya: Literally, "having made the teeth produce the sound 'kaṭakaṭā.'" The gerund is based on a denominative stem derived from the onomatopoetic word kaṭakaṭā, i.e., a sound of clashing or grinding. Ck and Ct gloss, "having made [teeth] to have the sound 'kaṭakaṭā' (kaṭakaṭāśabdavataḥ kṛtvā)."

3. "of fearsome valor" ghoravikramam: The word ghora- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ1,D6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ghoradarśanam, "of fearsome appearance."

"was speaking these words in this fashion" tam bruvāṇaṃ tathā vākyam: Literally, "to him speaking words in this fashion." M3 and KK and VSP read instead tam āhvayantaṃ saumitriḥ, "Saumitri . . . to him [Lavaṇa], who was challenging."

"slayer of the enemies of the gods" devaśatrughnaḥ: This is yet another etymological play on Śatrughna's name. See 7.60.11 and note.

4. "Śatrughna had not been born when you vanquished those others." śatrughno na tadā jāto yadānye nirjitās tvayā: See 7.60.6, where Lavaṇa tells Śatrughna of the thousands just like him he had devoured earlier. KK and VSP read na śatrughnas tathā . . . yathā for śatrughno na tadā . . . yadā, lending the line the sense "Śatrughna is not born [lit., 'was not born'] like those others you vanquished." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus and is rendered only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 563). One could perhaps understand the verse to be yet another play on the etymology of Śatrughna's name, so that the hero is saying that no real slayer of enemies (śatrughna) had been around at the time of Lavaṇa's earlier conquest and now he must face a true warrior.

"struck down by my arrow" bāṇābhihataḥ: Literally, "struck down by an arrow." Recall that Rāma gave Śatrughna an infallible arrow at 7.55.9–13.

5. "And, evil-minded wretch, may the seers and learned brahmans see you struck down by me in battle this very day, just as the thirty gods saw Rāvaṇa struck down." ṛṣayo 'py adya pāpātman mayā tvāṃ nihataṃ raṇe / paśyantu viprā vidvāṃsas tridaśā iva rāvaṇam //: Literally, "And today, evil-minded one, may the seers see you struck down by me in battle [and] the learned brahmans, just as the thirty [did] Rāvaṇa." The syntax is slightly loose in that, with the absence of conjunctions, it is not perfectly clear whether the terms ṛṣayaḥ (seers), viprāḥ (brahmans), and vidvāṃsaḥ (learned [ones]) indicate one, two, or three groups. Translators have offered all three options. In addition, it is not perfectly clear whether the phrase viprā vidvāṃsaḥ, "wise [ones], brahmans," is to be grouped with the word ṛṣayaḥ, "seers," who witness the fall of Lavaṇa, or with the word tridaśāḥ, "the thirty [gods]," who witnessed that of Rāvaṇa. We follow Cr, the only commentator to remark on this verse, who puts all three terms in the first clause and supplies a second participle, "struck down (hatam)," to flesh out the elliptical simile (ṛṣayo vidvāṃso viprā mayā hataṃ tvāṃ hataṃ rāvaṇaṃ tridaśā devā iva paśyantu). This interpretation is further supported in that the Yuddhakāṇḍa appears not to include any earthly brahmans in its lists of those who view the battle between Rāma and Rāvaṇa. See, for example, 6.90.25, where the list of those who watch the battle includes numerous divine and semidivine creatures but no earthly brahmans.

6. "night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācara: Literally, "O night-roaming [one]." B (1 missing ending),D3,6,7,10,11,G1,M5, and GPP and NSP read instead the locative singular, niśācare. This lends the line the sense "once you, a night-roaming one . . ."

"the city and the countryside will be safe" puraṃ janapadaṃ cāpi kṣemam etad bhaviṣyati: We understand the adjective kṣemam, "safe," to agree, by attraction, with janapadam, "countryside," but to modify both janapadam and puram, "city." Ś,V3,D3,6, 10,11,M, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the syntactically more lucid pure janapade cāpi for puraṃ janapadaṃ cāpi, taking kṣemam in its nominal sense of "safety," thus lending the line the sense "there will be safety in the city and countryside."

7. "my arrow, its head like the vajra itself" śaro vajranibhānanaḥ: Literally, "an arrow, whose face is like the vajra." We follow Ct in taking the term vajra in its sense of [Indra's] weapon. He glosses, "Whose tip-portion is equal to the vajra-weapon (vajrāyudhasamāgrabhāgaḥ)." Equally plausible renderings would be "whose head is like a lightning bolt" or "whose head is like adamant."

"loosed by my arm" madbāhuniṣkrāntaḥ: Literally, "gone forth or departed from my arm." The use of the term niṣkrānta is slightly unusual in this context.

8. "that hero . . . it" taṃ śūraḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa ca tam, lending the line the sense "and he [i.e., Śatrughna] [shattered] it."

9. "Seeing his feat foiled" tad dṛṣṭvā viphalaṃ karma: Literally, "having seen that the action was fruitless."

"loosed them upon Śatrughna" śatrughne vyasṛjat: Literally, "he released at Śatrughna." V2,B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the dative singular śatrughnāyāsṛjat, "he released at Śatrughna," for the locative.

10. "he cut down . . . one after the other, with three or four straight arrows" tribhiś caturbhir ekaikaṃ ciccheda nataparvabhiḥ: Literally, "he cut each one with three, with four ones whose joints were depressed." As to the number of arrows, we follow Cr in understanding that Śatrughna shoots down each of the trees with three or four arrows (ekaikaṃ vṛkṣaṃ tribhiś caturbhir vā . . . śaraiś ciccheda). The translators interpret the phrase variously. Dutt (1894, p. 1779) renders, "with three or four hundred bent arrows cut them all, one by one, into pieces," while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 581) understands, "rompit chacun de ces arbres . . . de trois de quatre flèches." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 572–73) renders, "severed those . . . trees, one by one, with three or four . . . arrows," and Benoît (1999, p. 1371) offers, "au moyen de trois ou quatre flèches . . . chacun de ces arbres." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 563) understands, "some with three, four, or one arrow apiece." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 871) translates, "tore asunder each one coming upon him, by three and four arrows of flatterend [sic] ends." The term nataparvabhiḥ, "whose joints were depressed," and its seemingly opposite but actually synonymous variant anataparvan, "with nondepressed joints," are used occasionally in the epic to describe smooth or straight arrows. On these terms and their commentarial glosses, see notes to 6.59.71.

11. "Mighty" vīryasaṃpannaḥ: Literally, "endowed with heroism or might."

"a hail of arrows" bāṇamayaṃ varṣam: Literally, "a hail or shower consisting of arrows."

"on the rākṣasa's chest" rākṣasorasi: Ñ1,V1,B4,D1–7,9–12,T3,4,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rākṣasopari, "upon the rākṣasa."

"did not falter" vivyathe na: Literally, "he did not waver or tremble."

12. "easily tore up" utpāṭya līlayā: Literally, "having torn up with play." D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead udyamya vīryavān, "the mighty [Lavaṇa] having lifted up."

"The latter, his limbs gone slack" srastāṅgaḥ saḥ: Literally, "he, having slack limbs." The commentators understand the compound somewhat differently. Ct and Cs gloss, "whose limbs were drooping (galitāṅgaḥ)," while Cr understands, "whose limbs were shaking or trembling (prakampitam aṅgaṃ yasya saḥ)."

13. "as well" api: Ñ1,V1,3,D2,3,5–7,9–11,T3,4,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous tathā, "also, as well."

14. "who had fallen, stricken, to the ground" hatam . . . bhuvi pātitam: Literally, "struck, caused to fall on the ground."

"although he now had an opportunity to do so" labdhāntaram api: Literally, "even though he [the rākṣasa] was one by whom an opportunity had been obtained."

15. "fallen to the ground" bhuvi pātitam: Literally, "caused to fall on the ground."

"thinking him dead" hata iti jñātvā: Literally, "having known or perceived, 'He is dead.' "

16. "at the rākṣasa's gate" rākṣasadvāri: D6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vai puradvāri, "indeed at the city gate."

17–19. The following description of Śatrughna's arrow is reminiscent of the much more elaborate description of the divine arrow with which Rāma kills Rāvaṇa at 6.97.3–13.

"it glowed with blazing energy with which it filled the ten directions" jvalantaṃ tejasā . . . pūrayantaṃ diśo daśa: Literally, "glowing with blazing energy . . . filling the ten directions." Once again, the syntax seems slightly defective in that the instrumental tejasā must be read with both participles. Ct proposes adding "with its own blazing energy" to complete the clause governed by pūrayantam (pūrayantaṃ diśo daśa. svatejaseti śeṣaḥ). Cr, who similarly takes tejasā with jvalantam, allows the ellipsis of pāda d to stand but sees the two as linked causally (tejasā jvalantam ata eva daśa diśaḥ pūrayantam).

"Its tip was the vajra, and its impact was that of the vajra." vajrānanaṃ vajravegam: See note to verse 7 above.

"Its weight was that of Mount Meru and Mount Mandara." merumandaragauravam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead merumandarasaṃnibham, "it was like Mount Meru and Mount Mandara."

"It was smooth at every joint" nataṃ parvasu sarveṣu: Literally, "depressed [i.e., not protuberant] at all junctures." See note to verse 10 above.

"Its shaft was smeared with blood and sandalwood paste." asṛkcandanadigdhāṅgam: Literally, "having a body smeared with blood and sandalwood paste." Ck, Cg, and Ct seem uncomfortable with the idea of the arrow's being smeared with gore, although such descriptions are not uncommon. Compare the similar description of Rāma's arrow at 6.97.3–13, where it is said to have its shaft "drenched with the blood of many different creatures and smeared with their marrow." Here these commentators understand the term blood, asṛk, to refer merely to the reddish color of the sandalwood paste (asṛgrūpaiś candanair liptāṅgam—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

"terrifying" dāruṇam: D7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M2,3,5,8, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead dāraṇam, "piercing or rending."

"to the dānava lords and the lords of the mountains" dānavendrācalendrāṇām: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the reference here to be to lords of the mountains in the form of dānavas (dānavendrarūpāṇām acalendrāṇām—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

20. "Seeing that arrow" tam . . . dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seeing that."

"like the fire at the end of time" iva kālāgnim: Literally, "like the fire of kāla."

"when the end of a cosmic era is at hand" yugānte samupasthite: Literally, "when the end of the yuga has approached." Ñ2,V2,B2,3,D7,10,11,T4, and Gorresio, GPP, and NSP read instead the accusative singular, samupasthitam. This reading lends the line the sense "which was blazing like the fire of kāla, which draws near at the end of a yuga."

21. "including . . . sages" samunim: Literally, "together with the sages." D6,7,10,11,T2,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead munibhiḥ, "with the munis." Ct and Cr add the adjective sahitam, "along with (sahitam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly)."

"Grandfather Brahmā" pitāmaham: Literally, "the grandfather." Ct understands, "four-faced Brahmā (caturmukhaṃ brahmāṇam)." Cs glosses, "the creator (vidhātāram)."

22. D5,10,11, and GPP and NSP omit 22cd–23ab. GPP includes the verse in brackets, unnumbered, but incorrectly places it following 23cd, noting that the verse is additional in the text of Cg.

"And they said" ūcuś ca: D1–5,9,T3,M6, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead uvāca, "he or it said," using the collective singular of which the subject is jagat, "the world," from verse 21 above.

"Great-Grandfather Brahmā" prapitāmaham: Literally, "great-grandfather." The term here does not appear to differ in its referent from pitāmaha, "grandfather," as it is used in verse 21 above. As Ck and Cr note, the referent remains Brahmā. Ck elaborates, "the universal emperor, four-faced Brahmā (saṃrājaṃ caturmukhaṃ brahmāṇam)."

"Or has the end of the cosmic era come?" prāpto vā yugasaṃkṣayaḥ: Literally, "Or has the destruction or waning of the yuga come?" Cv glosses, "Has the time of the ending of the yuga come (prāptaḥ kiṃ yugāntakālaḥ)?" T1,2,G3,M1,3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous saṃprāpto vā yugakṣayaḥ.

23. D5,10,11, and GPP and NSP omit 22cd–23ab. GPP includes the verse in brackets, unnumbered, but incorrectly places it following 23cd, noting that the verse is an addition in the text of Cg.

"never . . . or heard" na śrutaṃ vā: Literally, "or not heard." T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous ca na śrutam, "and not heard."

"O Lord, the gods are dazed with terror at the thought of the destruction of the worlds." devānāṃ bhayasaṃmoho lokānāṃ saṃkṣayaḥ prabho: The line as it appears in the critical text is elliptical. A literal translation would be: "A confusion of fear on the part of the gods, the destruction of the worlds, O lord." D6,7,10,11,T4,M1–4,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read saṃkṣayaṃ prati, "with reference to the destruction of the worlds," for saṃkṣayaḥ prabho, "the destruction of the worlds, O Lord." This variant, of course, is a lectio facilior, the sense of which is "There is a confusion of fear on the part of the gods with reference to the destruction of the worlds." Ct glosses: "There is a confusion of fear in the form of the thought: 'Is there going to be a destruction of the world?' (lokakṣayo bhavet kim iti bhayasaṃmohaḥ)." Cr understands similarly.

24. "he explained" ācaṣṭe: Literally, "he tells." D8,10–12,T1,G2,M2,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the imperfect ācaṣṭa, "he told."

"soothing the fear of the gods" devānām abhayaṃkaraḥ: Literally, "[he] the maker or causer of fearlessness of the gods." KK and VSP read lokānām, "of the worlds," for devānām, "of the gods." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

Following verse 24, D6,7,10,11,T4,G1,3,M2,4,5,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1048*]: "He spoke pleasing words: 'Listen, all you divinities' (uvāca madhurāṃ vāṇīṃ śṛṇudhvaṃ sarvadevatāḥ /)."

25. "Foremost among the gods, it is just the arrow that has been taken up by Śatrughna for the destruction of Lavaṇa in battle. You have all been stupefied by its blazing energy." vadhāya lavaṇasyājau śaraḥ śatrughnadhāritaḥ / tejasā yasya sarve sma saṃmūḍhāḥ surasattamāḥ //: Literally, "It is the arrow held by Śatrughna for the killing of Lavaṇa in battle by the blazing splendor of which all, indeed, have been stupefied, foremost of the gods or by the blazing splendor of which all the foremost of the gods, indeed, have been stupefied." V1,2,B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tasya, "of that," for yasya, "of which." B1,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read samūḍhāḥ sarve sma by transposition. However, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read saṃmūḍhāḥ sarve smaḥ, "we are all stupefied," for sarve sma saṃmūḍhāḥ, a reading not noted in the critical apparatus. This is not a happy reading, however, as it seems unlikely that Brahmā, who understands what is going on, would include himself among those that are "stupefied" by the arrow. Translations vary in their interpretations. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 874), which reads "smaḥ," translates as if it were sma, rendering, "All the great gods are bewildered at the power of that (arrow)," while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 564), who usually follows the text of Cg, which here reads sma, "indeed," translates as if it were smaḥ, "we are," rendering, "that we have all been stunned." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 582) and Benoît (1999, p. 1372) apparently read the verbal form smaḥ, "we are," with Roussel translating, "Tous . . . nous sommes," and Benoît understanding, "nous effraie tous," while Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 573) renders, "all are." Gorresio (1870, p. 228), whose text reads sma, translates, "voi foste tutti sconturbati, o eccelsi Devi." See notes to 7.62.3. The compound surasattamāḥ, "foremost among the gods," can be read either as a nominative or as a vocative. Gorresio (1870, p. 228), Dutt (1894, p. 1780), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 582), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 573), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 564), and Benoît (1999, p. 1372) all render it as a vocative, as do we, while Gita Press alone (1998, vol. 2, p. 872) renders it as a nominative plural, translating, "All the great gods are bewildered . . ." The participle -dhāritam, "held," is actually derived from the causal stem of √dhṛ, "to hold." Cs, although silent on the form here, sees the causative as significant in its use at verse 31 below. See notes to verse 31 below.

26. "For . . . belonged of old to the God" eṣo hi pūrvaṃ devasya: Note the irregular sandhi of eṣo hi for eṣa hi. D10,11, and GPP similarly read the irregular sandhi eṣo pūrvasya devasya, while NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read eṣa pūrvasya devasya, a variant not noted in the critical apparatus. This would lend the line the sense "This is the eternal arrow of the ancient god." Ck identifies the god as Prajāpati, the creative male principle (virājaḥ prajāpateḥ). Cr identifies the god as Viṣṇu. See 7.55.9–13 and notes. Ck and Ct note the irregular sandhi (eṣo pūrvasyeti chāndasaḥ sandhiḥ—so Ck; Ct similarly). The reading of NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP appears to be an attempt to correct the sandhi. Cs understands the sequence to be eṣo 'pūrvasya devasya, taking the adjective to mean "he to whom nothing is prior," that is to say, he who is beginningless. That amounts to saying that the god is ancient, i.e., eternal. Cs takes strong objection to Ct's claim that the sandhi is irregular and argues that his explanation should be ignored on the grounds that his (Cs's) interpretation is quite possible without having to resort to such problematic and unreliable arguments as archaisms. (eṣa iti. apūrvasya na vidyate pūrvo yasya so 'pūrvo 'nādiḥ. tasya devasya pūrvasyeti yāvat. sanātanaḥ . . . ārṣaḥ sandhir iti nāgojibhaṭṭavyākhyānaṃ tv āsmākīnagamanikāyām anirvāhāśrayaṇīyārṣatvaṃ vinākliṣṭāyāṃ saṃbhavantyām upekṣaṇīyam.)

"because of which" yena: KK (1905) alone reads instead tena, "because of that."

"my children" vatsāḥ: Literally, "O children." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. KK and VSP read instead the vocative singular vatsa, "O child."

27. "by that great Lord" mahātmanā tena: Literally, "by that great [one]." Again Ck and Cr differ as to the exact identification of the arrow's creator. Cr glosses, "by Viṣṇu (viṣṇunā)," while Ck glosses, "by the Lord Prajāpati (teneti bhagavatā prajāpatinety arthaḥ)." Cg and Ct both gloss merely, "by the lord (tena bhagavatety arthaḥ)."

"on account of Kaiṭabha and Madhu" kaiṭabhasyārthe madhunaś ca: Literally, "for the sake of Kaiṭabha and of Madhu." Cr understands the term -arthe, "for the sake of," to refer specifically to destruction, as in the expression "smoke for the sake of mosquitoes." (maśakārtho dhūma ityādāv ivārthaśabdo nivṛttiparaḥ.) On the identity of these two demons, see notes to 7.4.14.

28. "Thus, you should know that this arrow consists of the blazing energy of Viṣṇu." evam etaṃ prajānīdhvaṃ viṣṇos tejomayaṃ śaram: B2,D10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead eka eva prajānāti viṣṇus tejomayaṃ śaram, "Viṣṇu alone knows that arrow, which consists of [his] blazing energy." Ck and Ct note that Viṣṇu alone knows this arrow because of its being another one of his forms (tadaparamūrtitvāt—so Ct; Ck similarly). Cs explains the following line as a response to a question as to how Rāma would have given such an extraordinary and destructive weapon to Śatrughna for the killing of his enemies if he had not known [its true nature as his own body]. (yadi rāmo 'jānānas tarhy ahitaṃ śatruhatyai śatrughnāyetarāsusādhāraṇaṃ bāṇaṃ kathaṃ dattavān ity ata āha—eṣā eveti.) Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs all note the absence of sandhi between eṣā and eva (eṣā evety asandhir ārṣaḥ—so Cg, Ct, and Cs; Ck similarly).

"And it is indeed the primordial body of great Viṣṇu." eṣā caiva tanuḥ pūrvā viṣṇos tasya mahātmanaḥ: B3,D10,11,G2,M1,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the emphatic particle eva, "indeed," for caiva, "And . . . indeed." The idea that the arrow is the primordial body of Lord Viṣṇu excites a certain degree of theological interest on the part of the commentators. Ck understands that the arrow is a body consisting of a portion of great Viṣṇu, that is to say, that it was his ancient or primal form (mahātmanaḥ tasya viṣṇor evāṃśamayī tanur eva pūrvā prācīnamūrtiḥ). Cg and Ct content themselves with glossing pūrvā, "prior or earlier," with prācīnā, "ancient or primordial." Cv and Cr, harking back to Viṣṇu's multiple simultaneous incarnations as the four sons of Daśaratha (see Bālakāṇḍa 15 and Bālakāṇḍa 17.6–9), argue that the body in question is not that of the arrow but that of Śatrughna himself, who belongs to the primordial body of Viṣṇu. And that is why, Cr continues, Brahmā will refer to Śatrughna as Rāmānuja, "the younger brother of Rāma" [in the next verse]. (nanu dāśarathau śatrughne kathaṃ viṣṇutvam ity ata āha—eṣeti. eṣā śatrughnatanur eva viṣṇoḥ pūrvā tanur ito heto rāmānujena vadhyamānaṃ lavaṇaṃ yūyaṃ paśyadhvaṃ paśyatāta eva gacchata.) Cs takes another approach. According to him, the primordial body of Viṣṇu in question is, in fact, the body of Rāma, and therefore it is possible for him both to know and give that which belongs to him. Anticipating the question as to how the relatively weak Śatrughna could have attained the ability to wield such an unparalleled weapon, Cs argues that the primordial body of Viṣṇu is internalized by Śatrughna. We should, he continues, understand that through Rāma's command and the interiorization [of that body], Śatrughna attains the ability to wield the weapon. Cs supports this view with a quotation from the Vaiṣṇava literature to the effect that Viṣṇu has entered into those three [i.e., his three brothers, who, together with Rāma, manifest the four emanations of Viṣṇu] through the three forms, beginning with Saṃkarṣaṇa. Cs continues, arguing that this body consisting of the arrow is just like the primordial body [of Viṣṇu]. Finally, Cs alternatively suggests that the arrow might be referred to as Viṣṇu's body because of its proximity to him. (tasya mahātmano viṣṇoḥ pūrvā yā tanuḥ saiṣā rāmatanuḥ. ato jñānaṃ dānaṃ rāmīyaṃ saṃbhavatīti bhāvaḥ. etādṛśāsadṛśaśaradhāraṇasāmarthyaṃ durbalasya śatrughnasya katham āyātam ity ato vāha—eṣeti pūrvā viṣṇos tanur eṣaitacchatrughnāntargatā. ājñayā tadāveśena caitad dhāraṇam iti mantavyam. saṃkarṣaṇādyais tribhir eva rūpair āviṣṭa āsīt triṣu teṣu viṣṇur ity ācāryokteḥ. pūrvā tanur yathā tathaiṣā bāṇamayī tanuḥ. tatsaṃnidhānāt tanutvavacanam iti vā.) The reference to Saṃkarṣaṇa, etc., indicates that Cs has in mind the Pāñcarātra tradition that Viṣṇu as Vāsudeva or Nārāyaṇa pervades the world through his vyūhas, "emanations," which, in addition to Vāsudeva, are the trio Saṃkarṣaṇa, Pradyumna, and Aniruddha. The purāṇic tradition associated with the Pāñcarātra theology equates Daśaratha's four sons with the caturvyūha, "four emanations," of Vāsudeva/Nārāyaṇa. In this, Rāma is Vāsudeva, Lakṣmaṇa is Saṃkarṣaṇa, Bharata is Pradyumna, and Śatrughna is Aniruddha. See Brockington 1984, p. 236, and 1998, pp. 296–302, 492). And see notes to 7.96.18.

29. "go forth from here" ito gacchata: Cs proposes that we understand the ablative pronoun itaḥ to refer either to the place where the gods' interview with Brahmā is taking place or to the disturbed mental state that the gods, etc., should now abandon on the basis of Brahmā's explanation. (ita etatsthānāt. matkṛtatanmūlopadeśataḥ [a]svasthamanaskatvād iti vā.)

30. "those pleasant words" madhurāṃ giram: Ñ2,V2 (marg.),3,B,D6,7,10,11,T,G2,3,M1, 3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vacanaṃ surāḥ, "the god [having heard] words."

"to the place where" yatra: Literally, "where."

31. "as it was held in Śatrughna's hand" śatrughnakaradhāritam: Cs, noting the causative participle -dhāritam, "caused to hold" [rather than the simplex dhṛtam, "held"], argues that this usage suggests that independent mastery, i.e., holding, of the arrow belongs to Rāma alone (dhāritam ity anena taddhāraṇasvātantryaṃ rāmasyaiveti sūcayati). See notes to verse 25 above.

"With its divine radiance" divyasaṃkāśam: Literally, "which possessed an appearance that was divine." Cr glosses, "shining because of its divine nature (divyatvena prakāśamānam)."

32. "First glancing" dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "having seen."

"repeatedly roared like a lion" siṃhanādaṃ muhuḥ kṛtvā: Literally, "having repeatedly made the roar of a lion." D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhṛśam, "strongly or vehemently," for muhuḥ, "repeatedly."

"and turned his gaze once more toward Lavaṇa" dadarśa lavaṇaṃ punaḥ: Literally, "he saw Lavana again."

33. "Then" tataḥ: Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead punaḥ, "once more or again."

34. "Drawing his bowstring back to his ear" ākarṇāt sa nikṛṣyātha tad dhanuḥ: Literally, "Then having drawn that bow as far as the ear." The reference to drawing the bow as far as the archer's ear is occasionally found in the epic literature. Technically the reference would be to the bowstring. See, for example, MBh 7.88.43; 7.105.5; 7.145.10. See also notes to 6.77.25–26.

"that" saḥ: M3 and KK and VSP read instead the accusative masculine singular tam, "that," which would then modify mahābāṇam, "that great arrow."

"Rasātala" rasātalam: See notes to 7.3.25.

35. "Worshiped by the wise gods" vibudhapūjitaḥ: Literally, "worshiped by the wise [ones]." The word vibudhaḥ, "the wise [one]," is a common kenning for the gods.

"penetrated . . . and returned" gatvā . . . punar eva āgamat: Literally, "having gone, it [the arrow] came again."

"swiftly" tūrṇam: KK and VSP read instead tūṇam, "quiver," lending the line the sense "it returned to the quiver." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

36. "night-roaming rākṣasa" niśācaraḥ: Literally, "the night-roaming [one]."

"collapsed" papāta: Literally, "he fell."

"struck by a thunderbolt" vajrāhataḥ: Literally, "struck by a vajra." The term vajra can refer either to a thunderbolt or to the powerful weapon of Indra called the vajra. See 6.55.43; 6.62.17; and notes.

37. "And as for that great divine lance" tac ca divyaṃ mahac chūlam: Ś,Ñ2,V,B1,2,4,D,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tac ca śūlaṃ mahad divyam by transposition. KK and VSP read instead tac ca śūlaṃ mahat tena, lending the line the sense "And as for that great lance, when the rākṣasa Lavaṇa had been slain by him or that."

"once the rākṣasa Lavaṇa had been slain" hate lavaṇarākṣase: Note the odd compound lavaṇarākṣasa, "the Lavaṇa-rākṣasa." This compound also occurs at 7.62.2.

"it returned to the control of Rudra" rudrasya vaśam anvagāt: As Cs reminds us, the reference is to the statement of Śiva that Lavaṇa will be the last [of his lineage] to hold that weapon (tadavadhikatvasyaiva śivokter iti bhāvaḥ). See 7.53.10–13.

"as all beings stood watching" paśyatāṃ sarvabhūtānām: Literally, "as all beings watched." V2,3,B4,D3,5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sarva-devānām, "as all the gods [watched]," for sarvabhūtānām, "as all beings [watched]."

38. "Having struck down that terror" bhayaṃ nihatya: Literally, "having struck down the fear." D6,7,10,11,T4,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the similar nipātya, "having felled," for nihatya, "having struck down." Cs takes bhayam to refer to both the source of the fear, that is, Lavaṇa, and the fear itself. (bhayaṃ bhayadam. bhayaṃ ca.) KK and VSP read bhṛśam, "forcefully," for bhayam, "the fear." In this reading, there is no explicit object of the gerund.

"raised" -udyata-: V2,D6,7,10,11,T3,M9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead -uttama-, "excellent or foremost."

"the thousand-rayed sun" sahasraraśmiḥ: Literally, "the thousand-rayed [one]."

The meter is upajāti.

Following verse 38, V2,B2 (line 4 only),D6,7,10,11,T4,G1,2,M2,4–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ2,B1,3,4 insert following verse 37, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1053*]: "Then the gods, the seers, the great serpents, and all the apsarases honored Śatrughna, saying: 'Thank heavens, Dāśarathi has gained the victory, banishing our fear; and the other, like a serpent, is dead[1] (tato hi devā ṛṣipannagāś ca prapūjire hy apsarasaś ca sarvāḥ / diṣṭyā jayo dāśarather avāptas tyaktvā bhayaṃ sarpa iva praśāntaḥ //)."

[1] "Then the gods, the seers, the great serpents, and all the apsarases honored Śatrughna, saying, 'Thank heavens, Dāśarathi has gained the victory, banishing our fear; and the other, like a serpent, is dead.'" tato hi devā ṛṣipannagāś ca prapūjire hy apsarasaś ca sarvāḥ / diṣṭyā jayo dāśarather avāptas tyaktvā bhayaṃ sarpa iva praśāntaḥ //: Literally, "For then the gods, seers, great serpents, and all the apsarases honored: 'By good fortune, victory has been obtained of Dāśarathi, having abandoned fear, like a snake extinguished or dead.'" The verse is exceedingly elliptical in that it lacks an object (Śatrughna) for the verb prapūjire ("they honored"), while its syntax, grammar (prapūjire for the expected pupūjire), and rhetoric are highly defective. Cr and Cs make valiant efforts to correct and fill out the ellipses.

The meter is upajāti.

1. "placing Agni at their head" sāgnipurogamāḥ: Literally, "together with Agni as their leader." Normally, delegations of the gods are led by their ruler, Indra. Cs argues that in this case we should understand that Agni is given precedence because Viṣṇu's great arrow was powered by his [Agni's] energy. For, as Cs reminds us, it was previously stated (7.61.28) that [Śatrughna's] arrow consisted of his [Viṣṇu's] blazing [i.e., fiery] energy. (punar agnipuraskaraṇaṃ bāṇasya lavaṇamārakasya tejomayatvādy uktam iti mantavyam. tejomayaṃ śaram iti pūrvam ukteḥ.)

"to Śatrughna, scorcher of his foes" śatrughnaṃ śatrutāpanam: On the use of etymological epithets for Śatrughna, see 7.60.11; 61.3, 4; and notes.

2. "you have been victorious" te vijayaḥ: Literally, "victory is yours."

"the rākṣasa Lavaṇa" lavaṇarākṣasaḥ: Note again the unusual compound; compare 7.61.37 and notes.

"Rāghava" rāghava: V3,D6,7,10,11,T4,G1,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead suvrata, "O [you] of good vows."

3. "The granters of boons" varadāḥ sma: We take the particle sma pleonastically here. It could also be understood as an emphatic particle. A number of northern and devanāgarī manuscripts (Ñ,V1,B1,3,4,D1–5,9) and Gorresio read the verbal form smaḥ, "we are." For a similar variation between smaḥ and sma, see notes to 7.61.25. V2,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varadās tu, "and the granters of boons."

"great-armed warrior" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]."

5. "May I . . . obtain for my residence this lovely and charming city of Madhupurī, which was crafted by the gods" imāṃ madhupurīṃ ramyāṃ madhurāṃ devanirmitāṃ / niveśaṃ prāpnuyām: The term madhupurīm literally means "the city of Madhu." On the founding of this city, see R. Goldman 1986, p. 475. Note the play on the terms madhura, "charming," and the name of the city madhupurī. Ś,Ñ2,V3,B1,3,4,D5,7 (mathurā),10–12, M2,4,6 (mathurām),7 (mathurā), and Lahore (mathurā), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead iyaṃ madhupurī ramyā madhurā devanirmitā, while Ś,Ñ,V,B2,4,D1,3, 4,7–12,T4,M2,4,6–8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read prāpnuyāt, "may it obtain," for prāpnuyām, "may I obtain." This somewhat awkward construction would then have the sense "May this city of Madhupurī become [lit., 'obtain'] [my] residence." Ck, Cm, and Ct gloss this variant as follows: "May this city become a residence, that is to say, may it attain the status of a great royal capital, which will be the residence of a great army as well as the people of the city and countryside. (niveśaṃ sapaurajānapadamahābalasenāniveśabhūtamahārājadhānītvaṃ prāpnuyāt.)" This comment, in whole or in part, has been worked into several of the translations. Cg glosses niveśam, "residence," as rājadhānītvam, "the status of being a great royal capital city." Cr offers a somewhat different interpretation: "Let it obtain an extremely astonishing entrance (niveśam aticamatkārapraveśaṃ prāpnuyāt)."

"which I cherish" mataḥ: Literally, "esteemed or desired." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1,3–8,10–12, G1,M2,4–7,10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead paraḥ, "highest or greatest."

6. "the . . . city of Śūrasenā, 'The City with a Heroic Army' " śūrasenā: Literally, "Śūrasenā or having an army of heroes." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss the compound as a bahuvrīhi with the sense of "in which there is a heroic army (śūrā senā yasyāṃ sā)." This term, whether taken as a proper noun or simply as an adjective, is intended to be explained in the following verses, in which Śatrughna will summon his army, which had been waiting on the banks of the Ganges (7.56.11–12), to come and settle. Clearly the name is intended to provide an etymology and an Ikṣvaku affiliation for the city and region of Mathurā as the homeland of the Śaurasena people. This is the understanding of Cr, who glosses, "The city of Mathurā will be Śūrasenā, that is to say, it will be the homeland of the Śūrasena people (purī mathurā śūrasenā śūrasenajanapadajananivāsabhūtā bhaviṣyati)." On the legend of the founding and naming of the city of Mathurā/Śūrasenā, see R. Goldman 1986.

7. "sent for his army" senāṃ samupānayat: Literally, "he brought the army." As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr remind us, this is Śatrughna's army, which had been encamped on the banks of the Ganges (gaṅgātīre sthāpitām). See 7.56.11–12. Cr glosses the verb as "he sent for them to come to Mathurā (samupānayan madhurām āyātuṃ prairayat)." Cs, however, understands the army to now be encamped on the banks of the Yamunā (tāṃ yamunātīre sthāpitām). This interpretation, which has informed the translation of Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 874), assumes that the army has shifted its encampment from the banks of the Ganges to the region of Mathurā.

8. "came" āgacchat: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"through his command" śāsanena: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śrāvaṇena, "through Śrāvaṇa," i.e., "in the month of Śrāvaṇa." The commentators identify this as a reference to the month of Śrāvaṇa (śrāvaṇamāsī—so Cr).

9. "And in the twelfth year, that lovely city, with its divine radiance, was fully established, as was the realm of the Śūrasenas, which was free from any threat." sā purī divyasaṃkāśā varṣe dvādaśame śubhā / niviṣṭā śūrasenānāṃ viṣayaś cākutobhayaḥ //: V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa purā divyasaṃkāśo varṣe dvādaśame śubhe / niviṣṭaḥ śūrasenānāṃ viṣayaś cākutobhayaḥ //. This lends the verse the sense "Long ago, in the auspicious twelfth year, the realm of the Śūrasenas, with its divine radiance, was fully established and was free from any threat." KK and VSP read with the critical text, substituting sā purā for sā purī, a reading not noted in the critical apparatus, and śubhe for śubhā. This lends the verse the sense "Long ago, in the auspicious twelfth year, the city, with its divine radiance, was fully established, as was the realm of the Śūrasenas, which was free from any threat." The genitive plural ending of śūrasenānām is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

10. "Vāsava sent the rains at the proper season" kāle varṣati vāsavaḥ: Literally, "Vāsava rains in time."

"and so . . . were": The words have been added to show the connection between the two statements and to provide a verb, following the suggestion of Cr, who notes: "Vāsava rained at the proper time, and therefore the fields became filled with grain. The verb 'became [bhavanti]' is to be added. (vāsavaḥ kāla eva varṣaty ata eva kṣetrāṇi sasyayuktāni bhavanti iti śeṣaḥ)."

"And the city, under the protection of Śatrughna's arms, was free from disease and filled with heroic men." arogā vīrapuruṣā śatrughnabhujapālitā: Literally, "It was without disease; it had heroes for its men; it was protected by Śatrughna's arms." Ñ,V,B1,3,4, D1,4,5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the compound arogavīrapuruṣā, "it possessed heroic men, who were free from disease," for arogā vīrapuruṣā, "it was without disease; it had heroes for its men."

11. "adorned with squares and markets" śobhitā catvarāpaṇaiḥ: D5–7,10,11,T3,4, M2,4,5,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead catvarāpaṇavithikaiḥ, "[and] with squares, markets, and roads." This compound could optionally be read as "with squares and rows of shops."

Following verse 11, D6,7,10,11,G1,M2,4,5,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1061*]: "It was filled with members of the four social classes, and it was adorned with all kinds of merchants[1] (cāturvarṇyasamāyuktā nānāvaṇijaśobhitā)."

[1] "it was adorned with all kinds of merchants" nānāvaṇijaśobhitā: D10 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nānāvāṇijyaśobhitā, "[it was] adorned with all sorts of merchandise."

12. "And with a varied abundance of goods that hero adorned the great palace that had earlier been left bare by Lavaṇa." yac ca tena mahac chūnyaṃ lavaṇena kṛtaṃ purā / śobhayāmāsa tad vīro nānāpaṇyasamṛddhibhiḥ //: The verse is ambiguous and elliptical at best, both in the critical version and in the vulgate variant. For one thing, neither version specifies exactly what it is that Śatrughna is now ornamenting or filling up, that is, whether it is the palace, the city, or the region that Lavaṇa had left empty or desolate. We have tentatively followed the virtually unanimous opinion of the commentators, who read the rather different variant discussed below, in taking the reference specifically to be to Lavaṇa's palace. The syntax also leaves unclear whether Lavaṇa emptied or vacated the object in question or merely constructed it [or had it constructed] and it was now empty. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yac ca tena purā śubhraṃ lavaṇena kṛtaṃ mahat / tac chobhayati śatrughno nānāvarṇopaśobhitam //. A literal translation would be: "Śatrughna adorned that great [palace], which had been made white by Lavaṇa [and] which was adorned with various colors," or, "Śatrughna adorned that great white [palace], which had been made by Lavaṇa [and] which was adorned with various colors." This variant, as noted above, is ambiguous and elliptical in both interpretations. The commentators are of two minds as to what is happening in this verse. According to Ck, Cg, and Ct, Śatrughna, having first whitewashed the palace that Lavaṇa had built, now adorns it with colorful pictures or designs (tena lavaṇena yad gṛhaṃ purā pūrvaṃ kṛtaṃ tad eva śubhraṃ sudhādhavalaṃ kṛtvā nānāvarṇaiś citrair upaśobhitaṃ yathā bhavati tathā śobhayati smety arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Cr, on the other hand, understands that it was Lavaṇa who whitewashed the palace, while Śatrughna has it subsequently decorated with various colors. (yad gṛhaṃ lavaṇena śubhraṃ śvetaṃ kṛtaṃ tan nānāvarṇopaśobhitaṃ yathā bhavati tathā śatrughnaḥ śobhayaty aśobhayad akārayad.) GPP, NSP, and Gita Press all read the feminine nānāvarṇopaśobhitām, a reading not noted in the critical apparatus, for nānāvarṇopaśobhitam. This reading would additionally present a liṅgabheda. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 874) translates as if it were -upaśobhitam. No commentator reads or reports this variant. The feminine ending in these editions may well be a typographical error.

Following verse 12, Ñ1,V2,B4 (line 1 only),D1–7,9–11,S (Ñ1,D1–5,9 substitute line 3 only for 13ab) insert, while Ñ2 continues lines 1–2 following 1059*, and B2 continues lines 1–2 following 1060*, a passage of three lines [1062*]: "[The city was] adorned on every side with gardens, parks, and ponds[1] and with other splendid amenities both man-made and heavenly.[2] [Gazing upon[3]] that city, with its divine radiance, adorned with all kinds of merchandise . . ."

[1] "and ponds" taṭākaiś ca: V2,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP and NSP read instead śobhamānam, "[it, i.e., the palace,] being adorned [with]," while Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śobhamānām, "[it, i.e., the city,] being adorned."

[2] "and with other splendid amenities both man-made and heavenly" śobhanīyaiś ca yaiś cānyair divyamānuṣaiḥ: Literally, "and with other beautiful [things] which were heavenly and human." Ñ2,V2,D7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śobhanīyaiś ca tathānyair daivamānuṣaih, "and with other beautiful [things], heavenly and human."

[3] "[Gazing upon]" nirīkṣya: "having gazed upon." The verb is taken from verse 13 below.

Following 1062*, D7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of one line [1059*, line 4]: "[and which] was adorned with merchants who had come from various countries[1] (nānādeśāgataiś cāpi vaṇigbhir upaśobhitān /)."

[1] "who had come from various countries" nānādeśāgataiḥ: Ñ2,V2,B1,3,4,D7,8,10,11,G2,3,M1,2,4,8,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead nānādeśagataiḥ, "who had gone [i.e., traveled] to various countries."

13. "that prosperous city . . . his mission accomplished" tāṃ samṛddhāṃ samṛddhārthaḥ: Literally, "that prosperous one [city] . . . [he] having accomplished purpose." Note the playful repetition of the adjective samṛddha in its two senses of "wealthy" and "accomplished."

"was extremely pleased and experienced the greatest delight" paramaprītaḥ paraṃ harṣam upāgamat: Literally, "that one who had extreme pleasure approached the greatest delight."

14. "the city of Madhurā" madhurāṃ purīm: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 584) evidently takes the word madhura in its adjectival sense of "sweet or charming," rendering, "ce ravissant séjour." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 575), who offers, "in that enchanting abode," and Benoît (1999, p. 1374), who translates, "cette douce capitale." Dutt (1894, p. 1782) renders, "the beautiful city."

"I would gaze upon" nirīkṣeyam: Literally, "I would behold." Ś,Ñ2,V,B2,D8,9,11,12,T3, G1,M1,2,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nirīkṣe 'ham, "I [shall] behold."

"in this auspicious twelfth year" varṣe dvādaśame śubhe: Ñ,V1,3,D1–5,9–11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varṣe dvādaśa āgate, "when the twelfth year had come." In neither case is it clear whether, as we have done, the phrase is to be considered part of Śatrughna's thought or part of the narrative, i.e., "and when the twelfth year had come." Cr understands that the phrase is part of Śatrughna's thought. He glosses, "I should see Rāma's feet, now that the twelfth year has come (dvādaśe varṣa āgate saty ahaṃ rāmapādau nirīkṣa iti)." Cg understands that Śatrughna entertains this thought because it would be wrong of him to delay seeing his brother beyond the period of twelve years (dvādaśavarṣātikrame bhrātṛdarśanasya duṣtatvād iti bhāvaḥ).

Following verse 14, Ñ2,V2,B2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while B1,3,4 substitute for verse 14, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1063*]: "After founding that city, which was like the city of the gods and which was crowded with all sorts of people, the lord of men, increaser of the lineage of the Raghus, set his heart on seeing the feet of the lord of the Raghus (tataḥ sa tām amarapuropamāṃ purīṃ niveśya vai vividhajanābhisaṃvṛtān / narādhipo raghupatipādadarśane dadhe matiṃ raghukulavaṃśavardhanaḥ //)."

The meter is rucirā.

1. "with a small retinue of retainers and troops" alpabhṛtyabalānugaḥ: Literally, "who had a few dependents and troops as his retinue." Cs sees the small contingent as a product either of Śatrughna's fear of [a large host's] trampling crops during the journey or of the impropriety of bringing a large contingent with him without a direct order [from Rāma] (madhyemārgaṃ sasyādināśabhayād vināj̃ñāṃ sarvasenānayanasyānaucityād vālpety uktiḥ). Cs is probably thinking that for Śatrughna to approach Ayodhyā with his entire army could be seen as an act of arrogance if not aggression.

2. "Sending back his counselors, the leaders of the army, and his purohita" mantriṇo balamukhyāṃś ca nivartya ca purodhasam: Literally, "having turned back counselors, troop leaders, and the purohita." See notes to 7.51-2*.6. For 2ab, Ś,Ñ1,V1,2,D,T,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [1066*]: "Then having sent back his principal counselors[1] and leaders of the army (tato mantripradhānāṃś ca balamukhyān nivartya ca /)."

[1] "principal counselors" mantripradhānāṃś ca: D6,7,10,11,T1,4,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous mantripurogāṃś ca.

playful repetition of the adjective samṛddha in its two senses of "wealthy" and "accomplished."

"was extremely pleased and experienced the greatest delight" paramaprītaḥ paraṃ harṣam upāgamat: Literally, "that one who had extreme pleasure approached the greatest delight."

14. "the city of Madhurā" madhurāṃ purīm: Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 584) evidently takes the word madhura in its adjectival sense of "sweet or charming," rendering, "ce ravissant séjour." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 575), who offers, "in that enchanting abode," and Benoît (1999, p. 1374), who translates, "cette douce capitale." Dutt (1894, p. 1782) renders, "the beautiful city."

"I would gaze upon" nirīkṣeyam: Literally, "I would behold." Ś,Ñ2,V,B2,D8,9,11,12,T3, G1,M1,2,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nirīkṣe 'ham, "I [shall] behold."

"in this auspicious twelfth year" varṣe dvādaśame śubhe: Ñ,V1,3,D1–5,9–11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varṣe dvādaśa āgate, "when the twelfth year had come." In neither case is it clear whether, as we have done, the phrase is to be considered part of Śatrughna's thought or part of the narrative, i.e., "and when the twelfth year had come." Cr understands that the phrase is part of Śatrughna's thought. He glosses, "I should see Rāma's feet, now that the twelfth year has come (dvādaśe varṣa āgate saty ahaṃ rāmapādau nirīkṣa iti)." Cg understands that Śatrughna entertains this thought because it would be wrong of him to delay seeing his brother beyond the period of twelve years (dvādaśavarṣātikrame bhrātṛdarśanasya duṣtatvād iti bhāvaḥ).

Following verse 14, Ñ2,V2,B2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while B1,3,4 substitute for verse 14, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1063*]: "After founding that city, which was like the city of the gods and which was crowded with all sorts of people, the lord of men, increaser of the lineage of the Raghus, set his heart on seeing the feet of the lord of the Raghus (tataḥ sa tām amarapuropamāṃ purīṃ niveśya vai vividhajanābhisaṃvṛtān / narādhipo raghupatipādadarśane dadhe matiṃ raghukulavaṃśavardhanaḥ //)."

The meter is rucirā.

1. "with a small retinue of retainers and troops" alpabhṛtyabalānugaḥ: Literally, "who had a few dependents and troops as his retinue." Cs sees the small contingent as a product either of Śatrughna's fear of [a large host's] trampling crops during the journey or of the impropriety of bringing a large contingent with him without a direct order [from Rāma] (madhyemārgaṃ sasyādināśabhayād vināj̃ñāṃ sarvasenānayanasyānaucityād vālpety uktiḥ). Cs is probably thinking that for Śatrughna to approach Ayodhyā with his entire army could be seen as an act of arrogance if not aggression.

2. "Sending back his counselors, the leaders of the army, and his purohita" mantriṇo balamukhyāṃś ca nivartya ca purodhasam: Literally, "having turned back counselors, troop leaders, and the purohita." See notes to 7.51-2*.6. For 2ab, Ś,Ñ1,V1,2,D,T,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a passage of one line [1066*]: "Then having sent back his principal counselors[1] and leaders of the army (tato mantripradhānāṃś ca balamukhyān nivartya ca /)."

[1] "principal counselors" mantripradhānāṃś ca: D6,7,10,11,T1,4,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous mantripurogāṃś ca.

"he went forth in an excellent chariot, which was radiant and yoked to horses" jagāma rathamukhyena hayayuktena bhāsvatā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead jagāma hayamukhyena rathānāṃ ca śatena saḥ, "He went with a hundred chariots and their splendid horses." KK and VSP read hayamukhyaiś ca for hayamukhyena, lending the line the sense "He went forth with a hundred chariots and excellent horses."

*3ab–App. I, No. 9, lines 1–52. Following 3ab, all manuscripts collated for the critical edition (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,S), and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a passage of fifty-two lines (App. I, No. 9, lines 1–52). Despite the overwhelming textual support for this passage, Shah has relegated it to an appendix on grounds that strike us as entirely specious. Shah (1975, introduction, pp. 26–27) offers two rationales for his exclusion of the passage from the reconstructed text. The first is what he considers its "obvious incongruity," while the second is based on what he regards to be later testimonia from Kālidāsa's Raghuvaṃśa. Shah believes that the passage is incongruous because it describes the soldiers of Śatrughna's escort hearing the beautiful singing of Vālmīki's poem as it is being performed by Rāma's young sons, the bards Lava and Kuśa. Shah (p. 27) reasons that if such a thing had taken place: "Human nature being the same everywhere, the soldiers would have communicated the information to their kith and kin, in confidence, soon after reaching Ayodhyā. But this does not seem to have happened and no one except the hermits of Vālmīki's Āśrama knew of [sic] either of the poem composed by the great sage or of the two princes singing it. The incongruity of the passage is obvious." This example of "higher criticism" based upon rather dubious speculation as to what these peripheral characters might or might not have done seems to be overwhelmed by the universal testimony of the passage. And one could easily find many incidents in the epic that could be subjected to this kind of quibbling. Faced with the solid manuscript evidence for the passage, Shah (p. 27) suggests that since both the north and the south include the passage, and yet it appears to be a later addition to the text, it must have been "a very early later addition. One hardly knows what to make of this concept. Finally Shah seeks to bolster his argument by citing RaghuVa 15.37, where Kālidāsa describes Śatrughna as avoiding a stopover at Vālmīki's ashram, where even the animals are motionless in thrall to the singing of Lava and Kuśa, so as not to create any further obstacles to the sages' penances. Shah (p. 27) argues that this verse suggests "that the poet probably wanted to make it clear that this passage (or incident) of the Rāmāyaṇa was not acceptable to him as a genuine one. He cleverly denied it." But this argument, too, is far from persuasive. For one thing, it appears to demonstrate that Kālidāsa was, in fact, aware of the juxtaposition of Śatrughna's approach to the ashram and the singing of the Rāmāyaṇa. Shah understands the reference to show that Kālidāsa knew the episode in which Śatrughna and his troops visit the ashram and listen to the singing, as it is related in the Uttarakāṇḍa, but denied it by having his Śatrughna bypass the hermitage. But this reasoning, too, is flawed on at least two accounts. First of all, there is no evidence to indicate that Kālidāsa was a textual critic of the epic poem and made judgments about the authenticity of any of its passages. Even if Shah's inferences were correct and Kālidāsa was making a silent text-critical judgment, there is no reason we should be bound by it. Moreover, the passage, in a way, anticipates Shah's objection that Śatrughna's troops would naturally have reported to their families the existence of Lava and Kuśa, as we see in lines 30–39, where the troops clearly do not understand what it is that they are hearing and are expressly forbidden by Śatrughna to inquire about it. Finally, it is, of course, a commonplace in the poems and plays based on the Sanskrit epics that form a substantial portion of the classical literature that their authors felt free to alter, eliminate, or invent incidents in keeping with their poetic vision. Well-known examples of this can be seen in Kālidāsa's Abhijñānaśākuntalam, Bhavabhūti's Uttararāmacaritam, and many others. See, too, Narasimha Moorty 1995, Brockington

1998 (pp. 392–93 and note 110), and S. Goldman 2015a. See also notes to lines 22–23 below. On the basis of the universal testimony of the manuscripts and editions and the weakness of Shah's arguments, we believe that it is appropriate to emend the critical text at this point by including the passage.

*3ab–App. I, No. 9, line 1. "Proceeding through seven or eight predetermined encampments" sa gatvā gaṇitān vāsān saptāṣṭau: Literally, "having gone to seven or eight reckoned dwelling places." The idea, apparently, is that Śatrughna spends seven or eight nights on the road, presumably at the same places at which he stayed during his seven-day journey from Vālmīki's ashram to the banks of the Yamunā, as described at 7.58.13 above. Ct, whom we tentatively follow, glosses, "Enumerated according to [Śatrughna's thought]: 'I will go to Vālmīki's ashram through the same number of encampments as before.' (gaṇitān vāsān. pūrvam evaitāvadbhir vāsair vālmīkyāśramaṃ yāsyāmīti saṃkhyātān.)" Cr glosses "known (jñātān)" for "reckoned (gaṇitān)." Cr further notes that these are the seven previously known camping sites and that, having reached Vālmīki's ashram, Śatrughna stays there for eight days plus one, that is, nine days, reading the sequence saptāṣṭau as sapta, "seven," and āṣṭau, "eight," plus an additional short "a," which represents the number one. By making such a word division, Cr argues the reference is in keeping with the rule for the recitation of the Rāmāyaṇa, which he says will be stated later on. (sa śatrughno gaṇitāñ jñātān sapta vāsān nivāsasthānāni gatvā vālmīkāśramam āgatyāṣṭāv akāreṇaikena yuktā aṣṭau nava dinānīty artho vāsaṃ cakre. akāracchedas tu vakṣyamāṇarāmāyaṇaśravaṇavidhyanurodhena.) Apparently Cr is referring to the standard method of reciting the entire Rāmāyaṇa over a period of nine days (Goldman and Goldman 1996, pp. 80–81). The recitation at the court of Rāma, described in sargas 84–86 below, is said to have gone on simply for "many days (bahūny ahāni 7.86.1)." According to the instructions given to Lava and Kuśa by Vālmīki, the boys are to recite twenty sargas of the poem per day (7.84.9). Additionally, the completed poem is described as consisting of five hundred sargas at 7.85.20. By this calculation, it would have taken the twins twenty-five days to recite the entire poem. Cv understands the number of encampments to be indeterminate, taking the phrase saptāṣṭau to mean "for a certain number of days (saptāṣṭau saptau [sic] vā aṣṭau vā vāsān gatvā gaṇitān katipayadivasān gatvety arthaḥ)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 585) understands the phrase saptāṣṭau [by addition] to mean "fifteen," rendering, "quinze étapes." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 576), who offers, "having covered fifteen stages (of the journey)."

"immensely powerful" mahābalaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāyaśāḥ, "greatly illustrious."

"reached" āsādya: Literally, "having reached." D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āgatya, "having come to."

"the ashram of Vālmīki" vālmīkāśramam: Ś,D2,6–9,12,T1,4,M1,3, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous variant vālmīkyāśramam.

*lines 2–3. "water for washing his feet, the guest-offering, and all that was fitting for a guest" pādyam arghyaṃ tathāthithyam: Literally, "the water for the feet, the guest-offering, and what was proper for a guest." See 16*, note 1, following notes to 7.1.10 on the arghya, or "guest-offering."

*lines 4–5. "thousands of extremely sweet and varied stories" bahurūpāḥ sumadhurāḥ kathāḥ . . . sahasraśaḥ: Literally, "very sweet stories of many forms by the thousand." The narration of numerous tales and other forms of discourse is not uncommon in the epic. Compare 7.58.14 above. In this instance, both the extraordinary number mentioned as well as the sweetness may suggest, especially given the context of this sarga, in which the Rāmāyaṇa will be sung, that, as argued by Cr, the reference is actually to verses concerning Rāma. He understands, "The sage recited to Śatrughna very sweet tales, that

*lines 6–7. "an extremely difficult task" suduṣkaram . . . karma: Literally, "an action, very difficult to do." Cs understands that the feat was difficult or impossible to accomplish without the compassion of Rāma (suduṣkaraṃ rāmakṛpāṃ vinā).

"which your ancestors could not accomplish" pūrvakair akṛtaṃ tava: Literally, "unaccomplished by your predecessors." Ck, who reads with the critical edition, and Ct, who notes the critical reading as a variant, understand, "by your ancestors, that is, by Māndhātṛ, etc. (tava pūrvakair māndhātrādibhiḥ.)" Ñ,V1,2,D2,3,6,7,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead lavaṇaṃ nighnatā tvayā. This lends the line the sense "An extremely difficult feat has been accomplished by you killing Lavaṇa."

*lines 8–9. "Gentle Śatrughna" saumya: Literally, "O gentle [one]."

"great" mahātmānaḥ: V2,D6,7,10,11,M8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābāho, "O great-armed [one]."

"evil-minded" durātmanā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābalāḥ, "immensely powerful [kings]."

*lines 10–11. "But you" tvayā tu: Literally, "But by you [he is slain]." B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa tvayā, "he . . . by you."

"easily" līlayā: Literally, "with play."

"your majesty" rājan: Literally, "O king." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatra, "there."

*lines 12–13. According to Ck and Ct, this verse indicates that the feat of killing Lavaṇa was greater and more difficult even than the slaying of Rāvaṇa, even though Śatrughna accomplished it without effort, that is to say, as if in play (rāvaṇavadhād api sumahad duṣkaram idaṃ tu lavaṇavadhakarma tvayā tv ayatnena līlayaiva kṛtam—so Ck; Ct similarly). This raises once again the awkward issue of the relative power of Rāvaṇa and Lavaṇa. See notes to 7.55.13. Cr, however, seems disturbed by the thought that Rāma's younger brother has accomplished a more difficult feat more easily than the one accomplished by his brother Rāma. He parses the verse differently to mean "By great Rāma Rāvaṇa's slaying was accomplished without effort, that is to say, with slight effort, while you, too, accomplished this very great feat, the killing of Lavaṇa, without effort (mahatā rāmeṇāyatneneṣadyatnato rāvaṇasya vadhaḥ kṛtaḥ tvayāpīdaṃ lavaṇahananaṃ sumahat karmāyatnataḥ kṛtam)."

"however" tu: D6,7,10,11,G1,M9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ca, "and."

*lines 14–15. "the gods experienced tremendous delight" prītiś ca mahatī jātā devānām: Literally, "great delight was born among or of the gods." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prītiś cāsmin parā jātā devānām, "among the gods the greatest delight was born in reference to that."

*lines 16–17. "as I was seated in the assembly of great Vāsava" mayā . . . / sabhāyām upaviṣṭena vāsavasya mahātmanaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mayā . . . / sabhāyāṃ vāsavasyātha upaviṣṭena rāghava, "as I was then seated in the assembly of Vāsava, O Rāghava." Note the hiatus. Several of the commentators are clearly concerned about how someone seated in the assembly of Indra, which is presumably located in Indra's heaven, would be able to witness a battle on earth. Ck and Ct suggest adding the phrase "with a divine eye (divyacakṣuṣeti śeṣaḥ)." As an alternative, Ct alone proposes that we understand the participle dṛṣṭam, "saw," from line 16, in the sense of "heard about" (dṛṣṭam ity asya śrutam ity artho vā). Cr understands that the reference suggests that Indra, too, had to come to watch the battle (etenendro 'pi yuddhadarśanārtham āgata iti sūcitam). Cg takes the expression "in the assembly (sabhāyām)" to be part of an elliptical sati saptamī construction, which he fleshes out by saying that we should supply the phrase "which had come to watch the battle," thus understanding that Indra's entire assembly had come down as spectators. (sabhāyām iti. yuddhaṃ draṣṭum āgatāyām iti śeṣaḥ.) In the Yuddhakāṇḍa it is stated several times that all the gods and other divine beings gathered in the sky to watch the final battle between Rāma and Rāvaṇa. Compare 6.91.5–7 and 6.100.1–3.

*lines 18–19. "you have increased my great joy as well" mamāpi paramā prītis tvayā . . . vardhitā: Literally, "by you supreme pleasure of me as well has increased." D6,7, 10,11,T,G,M1,3,8,9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hṛdi . . . vartate for tvayā . . . vardhitā, lending the line the sense "supreme pleasure of me as well exists in [my] heart."

"I shall kiss you on the head" upāghrāsyāmi te mūrdhni: See 6.36.42 and notes. See also 6.23.7; 1747*, following notes to 6.79.5; 6.79.6; and notes.

"for that is the highest expression of affection" snehasyaiṣā parā gatiḥ: Literally, "this [is] the highest refuge or recourse of affection." The expression is slightly unusual, and all the commentators who gloss it do so differently. Ck glosses gatiḥ, "recourse," as phalam, "result or fruit." Cg offers prayojanam, "purpose." Ct, on the other hand, suggests kāryam, "result or consequence," and Cr glosses kāṣṭhā, "limit or summit."

*lines 20–21. "the great sage" mahāmuniḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mahāmatiḥ, "the very wise one."

"to him and to those who were his followers" tasya ye ca tasya pādānugāḥ: Literally, "of him . . . and those who [were] his followers." The syntax is elliptical. Cr fleshes it out by inserting the genitive plural teṣām, thus creating a parallel relative correlative construction. He understands, "And those who were his followers, to [lit., 'of'] them he extended hospitality as well (ye ca tasya padānugās teṣāṃ cātithyam akarot)." Cs agrees, suggesting that we add teṣām (tasya teṣāṃ ca).

*lines 22–34. Lines 23–34 appear to partially imitate or be derived from the passages at Bālakāṇḍa sargas 2 and 4, where the performance of the Rāmāyaṇa is first described using several of the same technical terms used to refer to musical performance. See Bālakāṇḍa sargas 2 and 4 and notes.

*lines 22–23. "After that foremost of men had eaten" sa bhuktavān naraśreṣṭhaḥ: Literally, "and the foremost of men ate." Cr glosses, "[was] one by whom a meal is completed (kṛtabhojanaḥ)."

"he heard . . . the supreme tale of Rāma, in due order, just as it had occurred at the time" śuśrāva rāmacaritaṃ tasmin kāle yathākramam: Literally, "he heard the deeds of Rāma in due sequence at that time." D6,7,10,11,T1,3,4,G2,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read line 23 twice. These same manuscripts and printed editions insert following the first occurrence of line 23 a passage of two lines [3*]. See below. As a result of this, the textual evidence as it is provided in the critical apparatus is somewhat confusing, listing variants as first and second occurrences. In order to clarify the order as given in the various vulgate versions, we will disambiguate the two occurrences and their textual variations. Textual evidence for the first occurrence will occur here, while textual evidence for the second occurrence will occur following 3*. Ck, Cg, and Ct are at pains to indicate that Śatrughna overhears the singing of the Rāmāyaṇa at a distance. Ck and Cg want us to add the phrase "as Kuśa and Lava were singing in the interior of or in another part of the sage's ashram (muner āśramāntarapradeśe gāyatoḥ kuśalavayor iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck; Cg similarly)." Ct suggests adding a similar phrase, that is, "from the mouths of Kuśa and Lava as they were singing in some [other] part of the ashram (kvacid āśramapradeśe gāyatoḥ kuśalavayor mukhād iti śeṣaḥ)." It is most likely that these commentators wish to indicate that Śatrughna does not actually meet or see Rāma's sons during his visit to Vālmīki's ashram. For, had he done so, he could not have failed to note their uncanny likeness to his elder brother (7.85.6–8). D10,11, and GPP and NSP (first occurrence) read yathā kṛtam, "as it was done or occurred," instead of yathākramam, "in due sequence." Ct inserts the phrase "by Rāma (rāmeṇa)," lending the passage the sense "as it was enacted by Rāma." Ct elaborates on the phrase "at that time (tasmin kāle)," indicating, correctly we believe, that the reference is to the earlier time (pūrvakāle) during which Rāma's adventures took place rather than to the time at which Śatrughna hears of them. Ct further understands that Śatrughna is hearing the history of Rāma in that earlier time, which has now been rendered into poetic form (tādṛśam eva kāvyanibaddhaṃ śuśrāva). Cr, on the other hand, understands the phrase "the history of Rāma (rāmacaritam)" to refer to the actual poem as it was composed by Vālmīki. Cr understands that Śatrughna is hearing Lava and Kuśa sweetly singing the Rāmāyaṇa as composed by Vālmīki, which encompasses the history both of Rāma and of himself (śatrughnarāmayoś caritāni yasminn ata evottamaṃ gītamādhuryaṃ gītena lavakuśagānena mādhuryam atimadhuratvaṃ yasmiṃs tad rāmāyaṇaṃ yathā kṛtaṃ vālmīkikṛtam anatikramya śuśrāva).

"sweetly rendered in song" gītamādhuryam: Literally, "the sweetness of singing." It is difficult to subordinate this compound grammatically to rāmacaritam, "the history of Rāma." Ct explains, "such a history of Rāma in which there was the sweetness of singing (gītasya mādhuryaṃ yatra tādṛśaṃ rāmacaritam)." Compare 1.4.16, where the sages celebrate the sweetness of Lava's and Kuśa's singing of the Rāmāyaṇa (aho gītasya mādhuryam).

Following line 23 (first occurrence), D6,7,D10,11,T1,3,4,G2,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T2,G1,M1,2,4,5,7–10 insert following line 23 (only time), a passage of two lines [3*]: "It was accompanied by stringed and percussion instruments,[1] articulated at the three points of vocalization,[2] well performed,[3] endowed with the proper technique,[4] and performed at a steady tempo[5][1–2] (tantrīlayasamāyuktaṃ tristhānakaraṇānvitam / satkṛtaṃ lakṣaṇopetaṃ samatālasamanvitam //)."

[1] "It was accompanied by stringed and percussion instruments" tantrīlayasamāyuktam: Literally, "conjoined with stringed instruments [tantrī] and tempi." Ck and Ct understand the compound to mean "conforming to the divisions of time of the sound arising from the stringed instrument, the vīṇā (tantryā vīṇātantryutthadhvaner layasya tālaparicchedasya samanuruddham—so Ct; Ck, damaged, but apparently similar)." Ct understands, as do we, that the compound incorporates a dvandva. He takes tantrī to mean "vīṇā" and laya to mean "the measure of musical time" (tantrī vīṇā layas tālamānam). Cr understands tantrī to refer to a string of the vīṇā and, by secondary denotation, to the sound of the string, while he takes laya to refer to the divisions of rhythm, etc., and so understands the compound much as we do (tantrī vīṇājyā lakṣaṇayā taddhvanir layas tālādiparicchedas tābhyāṃ yuktam). Compare 1.2.17; 1.4.7; 7.84.14; 7.85.3; and notes, where the variant tantrīlayasamanvitam is used.

[2] "articulated at the three points of vocalization" tristhānakaraṇānvitam: Literally, "accompanied by articulation at the three places." All the commentators who remark on this term agree that the three sthānas are the organs of sound production, viz., the chest, the throat, and the head (trīṇi sthānāny uraḥkaṇṭhaśirāṃsi—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly). Ct and Cr explain karaṇa as "vocalization in the low, middle, and high registers (mandramadhyatārabhedenoccāraṇam)." Ck understands the term to mean "with quavering and the various positions of the vocal apparatus, open, etc. (taraṅgena vivṛtādikaraṇena ca)." See 1.4.9; 5.3.24; and notes.

[3] "well performed" satkṛtam: D6,10,11,T2,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃskṛtam, "refined or polished." The commentators who share this reading understand the term to refer specifically to the language of the recitation of the poem, either in the term's sense of "refined" or, more specifically, "Sanskrit." Ck and Cg gloss, "having the form of perfected or Sanskrit words (saṃskṛtaśabdarūpam)." Ct glosses,

"composed in Sanskrit or refined sentences (saṃskṛtavākyabaddham)." Cr is more technical. He glosses, "characterized by words and sentences that are characterized by grammar and correctness or by the refinement of grammar (vyākaraṇasaṃskāraviśiṣṭapadavākyaviśiṣṭam)."

[4] "endowed with the proper technique" lakṣaṇopetam: Literally, "endowed with attributes or qualities." The commentators take the term lakṣaṇam, "attribute," to refer to the technical strictures recorded in the various śāstras that prescribe the rules for linguistic and musical performance. Ck and Cg simply understand that the term lakṣaṇam refers to the rules of grammar (vyākaraṇalakṣaṇam). Ct extends the list to include the rules not only of grammar but also of metrics, poetics, and musical theory (vyākaraṇalakṣaṇair vṛttalakṣaṇaiḥ kāvyalakṣanaiḥ saṃgītaśāstralakṣaṇaiś copetam). Cr restricts his list to poetics and musical theory (kāvyasaṃgītaśāstroktalakṣmabhir upetam).

[5] "performed at a steady tempo" samatālasamanvitam: Literally, "endowed with even tempo." Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand, "accompanied by the rhythmic sounds appropriate for singing (gānocitatālaśabdena ca samanvitam—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly)." Cs offers "accompanied by the sound of brass cymbals (samatālena kāṃsyatālaśabdena samanvitam)."

Following 3*, D6,7,D10,11,T1,3,4,G2,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert line 23 (second occurrence), with D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP reading purā kṛtam for yathākramam, "in proper sequence." This lends the line the sense "He heard the great history of Rāma, just as it had happened at the time long ago."

Ck and Ct gloss the line as follows: "The history of Rāma, that is to say, the song about the history of Rāma; at that time, that is to say, the time long ago; just as Rāma enacted it, that is to say, experienced it himself—that is how he [Śatrughna] heard it. (rāmacaritaṃ rāmacaritagītam. tasmin kāle purā pūrvaṃ rāmeṇa yathā kṛtaṃ svānubhūtaṃ ca tathaiva śuśrāva)."

*lines 24–25. "those words" tāny akṣarāṇi: Literally, "those syllables." Ck and Cg gloss, "the syllables of the singing (gītākṣarāṇi)." Ct and Cs gloss, "those utterances consisting of syllables (akṣaraghaṭitavākyāni)." Cr offers, "those syllables or sounds that occurred in those words and sentences (padavākyaghaṭitavarṇāni)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 585) understands, mistakenly in our opinion, the term akṣara in its adjectival sense of "imperishable" and so renders, "ses exploits impérissables." In this he has been followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 577), who renders, "his imperishable exploits," and Benoît (1999, p. 1375), who translates, "avec les actes impérissables."

"so consonant with truth" satyāni: Literally, "true." Ck and Ct understand, "whose meaning or content was true (satyārthāni)." Cr glosses, "free from any contact with falsehood (mṛṣāsaṃsargaśūnyāni)." Cs offers, "words consisting of syllables whose meaning was true (satyabhūtārthakākṣaraghaṭitavākyāni)."

"in accordance with what had happened long ago" yathāvṛttāni pūrvaśaḥ: Our translation follows the gloss of Ct, "pūrvaśaḥ, that is to say, at an earlier time; yathāvṛttāni, that is to say, just as those things transpired (pūrvaśaḥ pūrvakāle yathāvṛttāni yathāvṛttārthakāni)." Ct, however, offers an alternative reading of the phrase in which yathāvṛttāni means "composed without transgressing the rules of metrics," and pūrvaśaḥ then means "in due sequence." (yadvā yathāvṛttāni vṛttalakṣaṇam anatikramya nibaddhāni. pūrvaśa ānupūrvyeṇa.) Ck and Cg's interpretation is similar to the first interpretation of Ct. They explain: "pūrvaśaḥ, that is to say, in an earlier time; yathāvṛttāni, that is to say, just as things took place and were proven by direct experience. (pūrvaśaḥ pūrvasmin kāle. yathāvṛttāni yathāpravṛttāny anubhavasiddhāni.)" Cs takes yathāvṛttāni to mean "closely following the history of Rāma" and pūrvaśah to mean "in the proper sequence." (yathāvṛttāni rāmacaritānusārīṇi. pūrvaśa ānupūrvyeṇa.)

"his eyes filled with tears" bāṣpalocanah: Literally, "teary-eyed or having eyes [filled] with tears."

"lost consciousness" visaṃjñaḥ: Ct glosses, "He became devoid of the power of discrimination because of joy (harṣād vivekaśūnyo 'bhūd iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr offers, "He became devoid of correct knowledge or perception (samyagjñānarahito 'bhavad iti śeṣaḥ)."

*lines 26–27. "After remaining unconscious for a short while" muhūrtam ivāsaṃjñaḥ: Literally, "unconscious for almost a muhūrta." A muhūrta is, technically speaking, a period of forty-eight minutes, but the term, especially used in conjunction with the word iva, is frequently used indefinitely for "a short period or a while."

"while the poem was being sung" tasmin gīte: Literally, "while it was sung."

"that tale of the past as if it were happening right then" yathāvṛttaṃ vartamānam iva: Literally, "as it occurred, as if occurring." On this idea of the power of the recitation to make past events seem as if they were happening in the present, compare 1.4.15–16, where the sages, delighted at hearing Lava and Kuśa perform the Rāmāyaṇa, note that even though the events described took place long ago, they seem to be happening right before their very eyes. Ct explains that they are saying: "Even though these things took place in the past, because of the power of the sentiment, they appear to be taking place right before our very eyes (rasāveśād atītā apy arthāḥ pratyakṣavad bhāntīti bhāvaḥ)."

*lines 28–29. "And as for those who were the king's followers" padānugāś ca ye rājñaḥ: Literally, "and those who were the followers of the king." The reference is to the members of Śatrughna's retinue, mentioned at line 21 above. Cr, like the other commentators (see below), no doubt influenced by the shame and depression these characters experience upon hearing the magnificent singing of Lava and Kuśa, believes that these must be the bards who sing the praise of Śatrughna's feet (rājñaḥ śatrughnasya ye padānugāḥ padānām atigāyakās te).

"they were despondent and hung their heads" avāṅmukhāś ca dīnāś ca: Literally, "having their faces lowered and despondent." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Śatrughna's followers are ashamed and despondent because they had never before seen any singer of the Rāmacarita like these (evaṃ rāmacaritagāyako 'smābhir na dṛśyata iti khedād avāṅmukhatvādiviśiṣṭāḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Ct also offers an alternative explanation. He says we might understand that the followers are abashed because, even though they are skilled singers, they do not possess such virtuosity (yadvā ye tu gītikuśalās te svasya tādṛśagītinaipuṇyābhāvād avāṅmukhā ity arthaḥ). Cr believes that they are despondent in the sense that they have lost their pride in their own singing and therefore hang their heads (dīnāś cyutagānagarvā ata evāvāṅmukhāḥ santaḥ).

"This is wonderful" āścaryam: Literally, "a miracle." D6–8,10,11,Ṭ3,4,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hy āścaryam, "indeed, a miracle," to avoid the hiatus.

*lines 30–31. "The soldiers there" te tatra sainikāḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ye tatra sainikāḥ, "the soldiers who were there." Cr glosses "at that time (tasmin samaye)" for "there (tatra)."

"What is this?" kim idam: Ck and Cg understand the question to be driven by the thought that such a thing [what they are witnessing and hearing] is unimaginable in an ashram (kiṃ nv idam āśramāsaṃbhāvitam ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly). Ct suggests that the idea is that this could not possibly have been composed by ashram dwellers because of their lack of experience (āśramavartibhir ananubhavenāśakyanibandhanatvād iti bhāvaḥ). Ck understands similarly. The idea behind these interpretations is that the secluded contemplative inhabitants of a hermitage could not possibly have experienced the matters of love and war that are dealt with in the Rāmāyaṇa. Cr glosses, "this matter that is being represented as a song, is this someone's illusion or is it real (kim itīdaṃ gānatvena pratīyamānaṃ kiṃ kasyacin māyā satyaṃ vety arthaḥ)?"

"Where are we?" kva vartāmaḥ: Ct understands the soldiers to be asking, "Are we in an ashram or somewhere else (āśrame 'nyatra vā)?" Cr understands them to be asking, "Are we on earth or in the next world (pṛthivyāṃ lokāntare vā)?" Cs corrects the verbal form vartāmaḥ to the ātmanepada vartāmahe and notes that the soldiers ask this because they have forgotten their own bodies. (vartāmo vartāmahe. aṅgasmaraṇābhāvāt.)

"Is this an illusion or a vision in a dream?" mayeyaṃ svapnadarśanam: D3,7,10,11, T1,2,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kim etat svapnadarśanam, "Is this a vision in a dream?"

*lines 32–33. "This history that we witnessed long ago, we are now once again hearing in an ashram! Is this magnificent musical composition taking place in a dream?" artho yo naḥ purā dṛṣṭas tam āśramapade punaḥ / śṛṇumaḥ kiṃ nv idaṃ svapne gītabaddham anuttamam //: Literally, "The matter that was seen earlier by us we now hear in the site of an ashram. Is it that this unsurpassed composition in song is in a dream?" D6,7,10,11,G3,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the virtually synonymous kim idam for kiṃ nv idam. D11,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the more or less synonymous gītabandhanam uttamam for gītabaddham anuttamam. D6,7,T1,2,G2,3,M3,6,9, and KK and VSP read svapnaḥ, "a dream," for svapne, "in a dream." Ck and Ct, according to their commentaries, appear to read kiṃ idaṃ svapne gītabandham āśrito bhavet, "What is this? Could it be that [this history], based on this musical composition, is in our dream?" Ck and Ct explain, "If this is the case and this history based on this musical composition is only in our dream, then that would be an instance of making something very difficult to accomplish, easy. That is what they said to one another, that is the syntactical construction. (yad evam ataḥ svapne 'smadīya eva gītabandham āśrito bhavet tatra durghaṭasyāpi sughaṭatvād iti saṃbabhāṣira iti saṃbandhaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.)" KK and VSP read svapno gītabandhaṃ śrito 'bhavet for gītabaddham anuttama. This lends the line the sense "What is this? Is it a dream based on this musical composition?" It is not entirely clear what the soldiers are referring to when they speak of having witnessed the adventures of Rāma earlier. Perhaps this is merely a reference to some earlier, dry account or composition of the court bards prior to the grand poetic work of Vālmīki.

*lines 34–35. "please . . . inquire" pṛccha: Literally, "ask." The text does not specify exactly what question the troops wish Śatrughna to pose to the sage. Ck and Ct propose adding the phrase "concerning the authorship of this song (kiṃ kartṛkaṃ gānam iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr believes they wish Śatrughna to ask, "How is it that we are experiencing such a miracle (katham evam āścaryam anubhūyata iti brūhīty arthaḥ)?"

Lines 36–37. "soldiers . . . It would be improper for us to ask such a thing" sainikān akṣamo 'smākam īdṛśaṃ paripṛcchitum: Cm, who reads with the critical edition, comments as follows: "It is not proper to inquire about such a thing as this—the meaning here is that he said, 'It is not proper to inquire about such a thing as he was in doubt as to whether the singing was that of Kuśa and Lava or some other two, and if it was indeed of the former, their very existence is secret.' (īdṛśam idaṃ praṣṭuṃ na kṣamam. kuśalavayor gānam anyayor veti saṃdihānas tayoś ced rahasyatvāt praṣṭuṃ na kṣamam ity uktavān iti bhāvaḥ.)" Cs understands: "It is not proper to ask about such a matter here in this situation. If there were just one miracle, then ask 'What is this?' But because of the power of the influence of their wishes, various miracles occur. Which one of them should one ask about? (īdṛśo 'rtha ihaitad daśāyāṃ paripraṣṭuṃ na kṣamo na yogyaḥ. ekam āścaryaṃ cet kim iti pṛcchecchāmahānubhāvaprabhāvād vividhāny āścaryāṇi bhavanti santi katamaṃ prati praśnaḥ kartavya iti bhāvaḥ.)" KK (1913) and VSP read the sequence as sainikā na kṣamaḥ, "Soldiers! It is not proper." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead paripraṣṭum ihedṛśaḥ, "such a thing here is [not] to be asked." Ct glosses, "such a matter is not proper to be inquired about (īdṛśo 'rthaḥ paripraṣṭuṃ na kṣamaḥ)."

*lines 38–39. "It would not be proper for me to ask about them simply out of curiosity." na tu kautūhalād yuktam anveṣṭum tāni vai mayā: Literally, "It would not be proper by me to search them out just out of curiosity." D7,10,11,T1,2,4,G2,3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read taṃ mahāmunim for tān vai mayā. This lends the line the sense "It would not be proper to seek out the great sage out of curiosity." Cr offers a characteristically idiosyncratic interpretation of the line. He explains, "It would not be proper to seek out the sage, that is to say, to make him [the sage] aware [of this] out of curiosity because of the fact that the miracle is not to be discussed. By this is suggested that Śatrughna has observed that Sītā is at that very time in the very presence of Rāma. (kautūhalād anirvacanīyāścaryād dhetor munim anveṣṭuṃ bodhayituṃ na yuktam etena sītā tadānīṃ rāmasamīpa eva sthiteti śatrughnenāvalokitam iti vyañjitam.)" See Introduction, "Controversial Episodes," pp. 95–96.

*lines 40–41: "And" tu: KK and VSP read instead ca, "and." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[Lahore sarga 72 = Gorresio sarga 78 = GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP sarga 72.]

*lines 42–43. "preoccupied, pondering" cintayānaṃ tam ekāgram: Literally, "to him who was brooding, intent." Ñ2,V2,B2,3,4,T1–2,M3, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read the synonymous cintayantam for cintayānam, "[he] pondering," while V2,3,B,D7,10,11,G1, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read anekartham, "of many meanings," for tam ekāgram, "intent," lending the line the sense "[He] pondering that [song of Rāma] with its many meanings or episodes." We believe artha is used here, as it has been throughout this passage, to refer to the substance or plot of the poem. Cr, the only commentator to elaborate on this variant, glosses, "Sleep did not approach, that is to say, reach, him, that is to say, Śatrughna, who lay there pondering that in which many episodes or meanings appear in their many and various forms; that is to say, to him who was characterized by the thought: 'What is its ultimate outcome?' (aneke 'nekavidhatvena pratibhāsamānā arthā yasmiṃs tac cintayānaṃ kaḥ siddhāntārtha iti cintāviśiṣṭaṃ śayānaṃ taṃ śatrughnaṃ nidrā nābhyagamat prāpnot.)" *lines 44–45. "once he had heard" śrutvā: Literally, "having heard." Cs attempts to smooth over the somewhat awkward syntax of the verse by inserting the genitive present participle cintayataḥ, "of [Śatrughna] who was pondering."

"words" śabdam: Literally, "word or sound." The reference must be to the singing of the story.

"accompanied by stringed and percussion instruments" tantrīlayasamanvitam: See note 1 to 3*, following line 23 above. See, too, notes to lines 22–23 above.

*lines 46–47. "the night" niśāyām: D6,7,10,11,G1,M2,4,5,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous rajanyām.

"his morning activities" paurvāhṇikīṃ kriyām: The phrase is, no doubt, meant to be inclusive of all of Śatrughna's matutinal activities, both ritual and hygienic. On this and its variants, see 7.58.12 and notes and compare 7.41.19 and notes. Ñ1,V1,D1–4,9–11,T1–3,G2,3,M1–4,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kramam, "sequence," for kriyām, "activity." Although they have not done so in connection with the previous occurrences of these terms, Ck, Ct, and Cr give more or less extensive lists of the sequence of Śatrughna's toilet and devotions. Ck's list is the most extensive, while Ct and Cr each have shortened versions of Ck's catalogue. Ck glosses, "That sequence of practices appropriate to the morning that has the form of purification [i.e., evacuation, etc.], bathing, water-offering (arghya), morning prayers (sandhyāvandana), yogic postures (āsana), the three bodily purifications (tridehaśuddhi), devotion (prapatti), expiation (niṣkṛti), recitation of primary sacred texts or mantras (mūlamantrānuṣṭhāna), householder sacrifice and/or vedic recitation [the brahma-yajña] (uṣasyaśaucasnānārghyasandhyāvandanāsanatridehaśuddhiprapattiniṣkṛtimūlamantrānuṣṭhānabrahmayajñarūpam ācārakramam ity arthaḥ)."

*lines 48–49. "Rāghava, the delight of the Raghus" rāghavaṃ raghunandanam: Ck, Cg, and Ct feel it necessary to distinguish the two terms. They take the first to mean "a descendant of the Raghu gotra or lineage" and the second to mean "who produces the delight of the House of Raghu" (raghugotrāpatyam . . . raghukulasyānandajanakam—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

"I wish to be given leave" anujñātum icchāmi: Cg glosses, "The meaning is '[I desire] your permission or leave' (tavānujñām ity arthaḥ)." Ñ2,B1,3,4,D3, and Gorresio, GPP, and NSP read instead anujñātam, "permitted," but here it must be understood nominally as "permission." Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cs all gloss this variant in the same way that Cg glosses the critical reading.

"by you and these sages of severe vows" tvayā . . . sahaibhiḥ saṃśitavrataiḥ: Literally, "by you, along with these ones of severe vows." Cg clarifies, adding "with the sages (munibhir iti śeṣaḥ)." Cr understands, "together with seers characterized by extremely severe vows (atitīkṣṇavrataviśiṣṭair ebhir ṛṣibhiḥ saha)."

*lines 50–51. "Śatrughna, destroyer of his foes" śatrughnaṃ śatrusūdanam: Note the play on the word śatru-, "enemy or foe," in the epithet śatrughnam, "slayer of his foes," and the adjective śatrusūdana, "destroyer of his foes." Ñ2,B1,3,T1–3,G2,3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read instead śatrutāpanam, "scorcher of his foes," for śatrusūdanam, "destroyer of his foes." For other examples of such plays on the name Śatrughna, see 7.56.16–17; 7.60.11; 7.61.4; and notes.

"the" saḥ: T1,2,G2,M1,3,7,8, and KK and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"gave him leave" visasarja: Literally, "he released or dismissed."

*line 52–3cd. "in his longing to see Rāghava" rāghavotsukadarśanaḥ: Cv, Cr, and Cs read the compound, as do we, as a paranipāta for rāghavadarśanotsukaḥ, "eager for the sight of Rāghava (rāghavasya darśanāyotsuko rāghavotsukadarśanaḥ—so Cr; Cv [first alternative] and Cs similarly)." Cs explains that the sage (i.e., Vālmīki) inverts the terms darśana and utsuka in order to illustrate Śatrughna's being at the point of loss of self-control in his longing for the sight of Rāma's lotus feet (śatrughnasya rāmapadatāmarasasaṃdarśanapāravaśyaṃ dyotayitum utsukadarśana iti vyatyasyābhyadhān muniḥ). Both Cv and Cs propose similar alternative interpretations in which darśanam, "vision or sight," is taken to mean "eye," thus lending the compound the sense "He who has an eye that is longing with regard to Rāma. (yadvā dṛśyate 'neneti darśanaṃ cakṣuḥ. rāme tadviṣaya utsukaṃ darśanaṃ yasya sa vā—so Cs; rāghavotsukadṛṣṭir vā—so Cv.)"

4. "Upon entering" sa praviśya: Literally, "having entered, he." The final syllable -śya is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. V3,D2,3,7,9–11,T3,G1,M2,4–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa praviṣṭaḥ, "he entered."

"entered the assembly hall where Rāma . . . sat" praviveśa yatra rāmaḥ: Literally, "he entered where Rāma [was]." We follow Cs in adding the word "assembly hall (sadaḥ)" (yatra . . . rāmas tat sado viveśa).

Following verse 4, Ñ2,V2,B,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [1071*]: "And gazing at Rāma, whose face was like the full moon, in the midst of his counselors, just like thousand-eye Indra[1] in the midst of the immortal gods[2] (sa rāmaṃ mantrimadhyasthaṃ pūrṇacandranibhānanam / paśyann amaramadhyasthaṃ sahasranayanaṃ yathā)."

[1] "thousand-eyed Indra" sahasranayanam: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

[2] "in the midst of the immortal gods" amaramadhyastham: Literally, "situated in the midst of the immortal [ones]."

5. "Having reverentially saluted . . . he" so 'bhivādya: Literally, "he, having reverentially saluted." Ñ2,V2,B1–3, and KK and VSP read instead abhivādya, "having reverentially saluted."

"cupped his hands in reverence" prāñjalir bhūtvā: Literally, "having become one whose hands were cupped in reverence." Ś,V1,D1,4,8,12,T1,2,M5,7, and KK, and VSP read vākyam, "speech or words," for bhūtvā, "having become," lending the line the sense "his hands cupped in reverence [he spoke] words."

6. "and that city" purī sā ca: D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead purī cāsya, "and his city."

7. "And the twelfth year has now gone by" dvādaśaṃ ca gataṃ varṣam: Literally, "and the twelfth year has gone." V1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dvādaśaitāni vārṣāni, "these twelve years [have passed]." Cr adds the missing verb "have passed (vyatītānīti śeṣaḥ)." Cs understands similarly that we must add "happened or took place (jātāni)." T1,2,G,M1,3,7–9, and KK and VSP read instead dvādaśaite gatā vārṣāḥ, "these twelve years have passed."

"I can no longer bear" notsaheyam aham: Literally, "I would not bear or endure."

8. "Please be gracious to me" sa me prasādam . . . kuruṣva: Literally, "Let this one, you, make grace for me." Cs, alone among the commentators, notes that we should read the third person pronoun saḥ in the sense of the second person pronoun, tvam (sa tvam). For a similar instance of the saḥ substituting for tvam, see notes to 7.64.9.

"For I cannot live apart from you any more than can a calf deprived of its mother." mātṛhīno yathā vatsas tvāṃ vinā pravasāmy aham: Literally, "just like a calf without a mother, I live abroad without you." Once again the rhetoric seems deficient. D6,7,10,11, T1,4,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read na ciram for tvāṃ vinā, lending the line the sense "Like a calf without a mother, I do not live abroad for long." This variant is perhaps a feeble attempt to improve the figure.

9. "As Śatrughna was speaking in this fashion, Rāma embraced him and said this" evaṃ bruvāṇaṃ śatrughnaṃ pariṣvajyedam abravīt: Literally, "having embraced Śatrughna, who was speaking in this fashion, he said this." D10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead evaṃ bruvāṇaṃ kākutsthaḥ pariṣvajyedam abravīt, "Having embraced [him], who was speaking thus, Kākutstha said this."

"hero" vīra: V1,3,D1–7,9–12,T,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous śūra, "O hero."

10. "Rāghava . . . Rāghava" rāghava . . . rāghava: Cs rationalizes the repetition by claiming that Rāma uses the vocative twice in keeping with the fact that he has instructed Śatrughna in two distinct areas of conduct: that of non-despondency and that of the obligation to protect his subjects (rāghava nāvasīdanti rāghava prajāḥ paripālyā ity anuśāsya vyāpāradvayānurūpyeṇa rāghaveti dvirabhidhānam).

"and . . . indeed" ca . . . hi: V3,D10,11,G1,M1,2,4–10, and GPP and NSP read instead hi . . . hi, "for . . . indeed." Cs distinguishes the two occurrences of the particle hi. He takes the first to mean "since (yataḥ)" and the second as a particle of argument or general knowledge (prasiddhiḥ). Ck and Ct understand similarly. KK and VSP read instead naḥ . . . hi, "of us . . . indeed."

11. Cs understands that this verse is intended to console Śatrughna. He remarks that, like the proverbial man who flees from fear of a scorpion only to fall into the mouth of a venomous serpent, Śatrughna, unable to bear his twelve years of separation, does not welcome Rāma's instructions to go back again into exile and to protect his subjects. Rāma's words, "from time to time," then, Cs continues, comfort him by not utterly cutting off what is the shared desire of both brothers. (vṛścikabhayāt palāyamānasyāśīviṣamukhe nipātanīyā dvādaśasaṃvatsarīvirahaṃ soḍhum anīśānasya punaḥ pravāsaṃ kuru kuru prajārakṣaṇam ity upadeśo na śobhata ity atas taṃ svābhimatatadabhimatānucchittyā samādhatte kāle kāle tv iti.)

"But" ca: Literally, "and." D1,2,4,6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "but."

"to visit" avalokitum: Literally, "to see."

"Ayodhyā" ayodhyām: M5,7,8, and KK and VSP read instead hy ayodhyām, with the pleonastic hi to avoid the hiatus.

12. "as dear to me as life itself" mamāpi tvaṃ sudayitaḥ prāṇaiḥ: Literally, "you are very beloved of me, even [compared] with breaths of life."

13. "Therefore, Kākutstha, you may stay with me for five nights." tasmāt tvaṃ vasa kākutstha pañcarātraṃ mayā saha: Literally, "Therefore, Kākutstha, you must dwell together with me for five nights." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read saptarātram, "for seven nights," for pañcarātram, "for five nights." KK and VSP read instead tasmāt tvaṃ vatsa kākutstha saptarātram ihāvasa, "Therefore, Kākutstha, my boy, you must dwell here for seven nights."

14. "heartfelt" manonugam: Literally, "following the heart or mind." Ś,D8,12,T1,2, and KK and VSP read instead manogatam, "what had gone to or was in his mind or heart."

"a voice filled with sorrow" dīnayā vācā: Literally, "with a dejected voice."

15. "for five nights" sa pañcarātram: Literally, "he, for five nights." B2,D6,7,10,11,T1,2, G2,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saptarātraṃ ca, "and for seven nights."

17. "a great distance" dūram: Literally, "far."

"by both" tābhyām: Literally, "by the two." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. KK and VSP read the synonymous ābhyām, "by those two." Ś,V3,D6–8,10–12,T4,G1,3,M2,4,6,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead padbhyām, "on foot."

"then . . . to his own city" purīṃ tadā: Literally, "then to the city." As Cr points out, the city in question is Madhurā. KK and VSP read instead puraṃ tataḥ, "then or thence to the city."

"proceeded swiftly" jagāmāśu: The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

Sarga 64

1. "along with his other two brothers" bhrātṛbhyāṃ saha: Literally, "together with [his] two brothers." As several of the commentators note, the reference is to Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata.

2. "after several days" katipayāhaḥsu: Ck, Ct, and Cr supply the participle gateṣu and thus read the expression as a sati saptamī, in the sense of "when some days had passed (katipayāhaḥsu gateṣv iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck, Ct, and Cr)."

"the dead body of a child" śavaṃ bālam: Literally, "a child corpse or young corpse." D6,7,10,11,M2,3,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mṛtaṃ bālam, "a dead child."

3. D10,11, and GPP and NSP read the order of verses 3 and 4 somewhat differently. Following verse 2, they read: 4ab [kiṃ nu me duṣkṛtaṃ karma pūrvaṃ (purā) dehāntare kṛtam]; 3ab [rudan bahuvidhā vācaḥ snehākṣara- (snehaduḥkha-) samanvitaḥ]; 3cd [asakṛt putraputreti vākyam etad uvāca ha]; 4ab [repeat]; 4cd [yad ahaṃ putram ekaṃ tvāṃ (tu) paśyāmi nidhanaṃ gatam]. The parentheses indicate variant forms found in GPP and NSP. GPP notes the order chosen by the critical edition and found in KK, placing 3ab in brackets, unnumbered, in the location where it is found in KK and the critical edition, i.e., following verse 2.

"Wailing various lamentations filled with loving words" rudan bahuvidhā vācaḥ snehākṣarasamanvitāḥ: Literally, "crying multifarious speeches accompanied by affectionate words or syllables." D10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3,8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read snehaduḥkhasamanvitaḥ, "filled with love and grief," for snehākṣarasamanvitāḥ, "filled with affectionate words or syllables." In this reading, the term refers to the brahman rather than to his lamentation. KK and VSP read snehaduḥkhasamanvitāḥ, "filled with love and grief," which, as in the critical edition, modifies vācaḥ, "words." This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

4. See notes to verse 3 above.

"must I have done" me . . . kṛtam: Literally, "was done by [lit., 'of'] me."

"in the past" pūrvam: Ñ2,B,D5–7,10,11 (D10,11 both times),M1,2,4,7, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous purā.

"in some previous birth" dehāntare: Literally, "in another body."

"you" tvām: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tu, normally, "but," but here either in its meaning of "now" or as an expletive.

"in the grip of death" nidhanaṃ gatam: Literally, "gone to death or destruction."

5. "For you, my little son, are a mere child but five years old and have not yet reached manhood. Yet, to my grief, you have come to an untimely death." aprāptayauvanaṃ bālaṃ pañcavarṣasamanvitam / akāle kālam āpannaṃ duḥkhāya mama putraka //: Literally, "[I see you], a child, who has not yet reached maturity, endowed with five years, [and] for my grief, [you] have come to death ['time' kāla] at the wrong time, my little son." As noted by Ct and Cr, the string of accusatives that constitutes the bulk of the verse must be construed as the additional objects of paśyāmi, "I see," in verse 4d. (tvām . . . mama duḥkhāya paśyāmīty anukṛṣyate—so Cr; Ct similarly.) B2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mama duḥkhāya by transposition.

"but five years old" pañcavarṣasamanvitam: Literally, "endowed with five years." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pañcavarṣasahasrakam, "five-thousand years old." This peculiar reading forces Ct, the only commentator to remark on this variant, to undertake some exegetical heroics. He argues that we must take the word varṣa, "year," to mean "day." He justifies this by citing the example of the injunction "one should perform a sacrificial session for a thousand years." Ct notes further that some authorities understand the reference here to mean that the child is sixteen years old, while others understand that he is slightly less than fourteen. [This last number would, of course, be reached by dividing 5,000 days by 365.] (pañcavarṣasahasrakaṃ varṣaśabdo 'tra dīnaparaḥ. sahasrasaṃvatsaraṃ sattram upāsītetivat. tena ṣoḍaśavarṣam ity artha ity eke. tena kiṃcin nyūnacaturdaśavarṣam ity artha ity anye.) Translators offer a variety of interpretations. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 588) understands, "il n'avait que cinq mille jours." Benoît's (1999, p. 1378) translation is similar to Roussel's, "Cet enfant n'avait . . . à peine cinq mille jours!" Dutt (1894, p. 1787) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 578) both understand that the child has not yet completed his fourteenth year. Thus Dutt translates, "hast not as yet completed fourteen years," while Shastri offers, "his fourteenth year not having been completed." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 569) opts for a younger age, rendering, "being only five years old." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 878) tries to combine the discrepant figures but seems to have some difficulty with its arithmetic, translating: "being a child of (merely) five thousand days (about five years)." On a similar equation of longer periods of time with days, see notes to 6.48.12, where the commentators argue that a month equates to a day. Compare, for example, the Jaiminīyabrāhmaṇa 1.3–4 and Bodewitz 1973, p. 25–26, where a long sacrifice, lasting a thousand years (sahasrasaṃvatsaraṃ sattra), is reduced to a shorter sacrifice, which only lasts for one day. The longer ones, it is argued, are suitable for gods, but men, by necessity, can only perform the shorter ones. See, too, Kātyāyanaśrautasūtra 1.6.17–27, where saṃvatsara is interpreted as ahan, "day," and 24.5.23–24, where the longer hundred- and thousand-year sacrifices are performed by Sādhyas and Viśvasṛjas. Śabara, commenting on Mī- māṃsāsūtra 6.7.13.31 (see also 6.7.13.40), allows saṃvatsara in sahasrasaṃvatsara to be taken as divasa, "day."

6. "your mother and I will . . . too be in the grip of death" nidhanaṃ gamiṣyāmi . . . ahaṃ jananī caiva: Literally, "I will go to death and the mother too."

7. "I do not recall any lie that I have uttered nor any harm that I have done." na smarāmy anṛtaṃ hy uktaṃ na ca hiṃsāṃ smarāmy aham: Literally, "For I do not remember an untruth that was spoken and I do not remember harm."

"For what evil deed of mine then has my son, a mere child . . . this day" kena me duṣkṛtenādya bāla eva mamātmajaḥ: Literally, "by what evil action of mine . . . today [has] my son, a mere child . . ." V2,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kenādya duṣkṛtenāyaṃ bāla eva mamātmajaḥ, which lends the line the sense "By what evil deed today [has] this son of mine, a mere child . . ."

"has . . . been led" nītaḥ: Ñ2,V,D1–7,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gataḥ, "has gone."

"obsequial rites" pitṛkāryāṇi: Literally, "obligatory rites to or for the pitṛs (departed ancestors)." The idea here is that the child has predeceased his parents, for whom he, as their surviving son, would be required to perform the śrāddha rites.

Following 7ab, V2,3,D1–7,9–11,T3,4,G1 (repeats),M2–5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T1,2,G2,3,M1 insert following verse 5, a passage of one line [1080*]: "Nor do I remember any wrong committed[1] against any living thing[2] (sarveṣāṃ prāṇināṃ pāpaṃ kṛtaṃ naiva smarāmy aham /)."

[1] "Nor do I remember any wrong committed" pāpaṃ kṛtaṃ naiva smarāmy aham: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead pāpaṃ na smarāmi kadācana, lending the phrase the sense "I do not remember [doing] a wrong at any time."

[2] "against any living thing" sarveṣāṃ prāṇināṃ: Literally, "of all living things."

8. "a dreadful thing" ghoradarśanam: Literally, "something dreadful looking."

"as" yathā: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hy ayam, "for this [death]."

"an untimely death" mṛtyur aprāptakālānām: Literally, "the death of those whose time had not come."

9. "you" tvam: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D7,10,11,T4,M2,4,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saḥ, "he or that one." See notes to 7.63.8.

Following 9ab, Ñ2,V3,B,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1082*]. D10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read 1082* twice with variants: "For children in other realms have no fear of death (na hy anyaviṣayasthānāṃ bālānāṃ mṛtyuto bhayam).[1]"

[1] V3,D6,7,10,11,T4,M2,4,6–8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead, while D10,11,T4 read as their first line: "Since death has come to the children of his [i.e., Rāma's] realm (yathā hi viṣayasthānāṃ bālānāṃ mṛtyur āgataḥ)."

According to the editors of the critical edition, D10,11,T4,M3 (with variation), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read 1082* twice, while it would be perhaps more accurate to understand that they insert a passage of two lines:

yathā hi viṣayasthānāṃ bālānāṃ mṛtyur āgataḥ /
na hy anyaviṣayasthānāṃ bālānāṃ mṛtyuto bhayam //

Following verse 9, Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [1085*]: "Like a man without a protector, I will die[1] here at the royal gate together with my wife. Now, Rāma, I hope you are happy,[2] since you have incurred the sin of killing a brahman (rājadvāri mariṣye 'haṃ patnyā sārdham anāthavat / brahmahatyāṃ tato rāma samupetya sukhī bhava //)!"

[1] "I will die" mariṣye 'ham: D6,7,10,11,T4,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the parasmaipada form mariṣyāmi, "I will die."

[2] "I hope you are happy" sukhī bhava: Literally, "be happy." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the expression is ironic (vyaṅgyoktiḥ). Cr similarly understands that the meaning is "You will be completely miserable (duḥkhī eva bhaviṣyasīty arthaḥ)." Cs understands that this is an expression of the brahman's grief, that is to say, that the "happiness" will be that of grief alone (duḥkhasyaiva sukham iti saṃtāpoktiḥ).

10. "May you attain long life" dirgham āyur avāpnuhi: B4,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read avāpsyasi, "you will attain," for avāpnuhi, "may you attain." Cr understands that this expression, too, is ironic, since the brahman is saying that he and his wife are really unhappy, "and" so the real meaning of his supposed blessing is "you will not obtain a long life." (tava rājye vayaṃ sukham uṣitāḥ sma ato dīrgham āyur avāpsyasi. vyañjanapānasukham uṣitā ato dirgham āyur nāvapsyasīti bodhitam.)

"as we have always dwelt happily" uṣitāḥ sma sukham: We agree with Cr in understanding that the subject of the participle uṣitāḥ is "we," i.e., the brahman and his family. Cr, as quoted above, further appears to read or add the first person plural verbal form smaḥ in place of, or in addition to, the emphatic particle sma, "always or indeed." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs add the words "up until the present time (etāvat kālam iti śeṣaḥ—Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cs similarly)."

"immensely powerful prince" sumahābala: Literally, "immensely powerful [one]."

Following verse 10, Ś,V,D3,5–8 (Ś,D8 following 10cd [first occurrence]),10,11,S, and Gorresio insert a passage of two lines [1087*]: "But now, Rāma, since[1] this has befallen those who dwell[2] under your control, and we have thus come under the sway of death (kāla), we no longer have even the merest glimmer of happiness[3] (idaṃ tu patitaṃ yasmāt tava rāma vaśe sthitān / kālasya vaśam āpannāḥ svalpaṃ hi na hi naḥ sukham //)."

[1] "since" yasmāt: Ś1,D6,7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tasmāt, "therefore," while D10,11, and KK and VSP read hy asmāt, "for, because of that."

[2] "those who dwell" sthitān: Literally, "those situated." KK and VSP read the nominative plural sthitāḥ, lending the line the sense "we, who dwell, have thus come under the sway."

[3] "we no longer have even the merest glimmer of happiness" svalpaṃ hi na hi naḥ sukham: Literally, "for of us, indeed, there is not a little happiness."

11. "the realm of the . . . Ikṣvākus has no protector" anātho viṣaya ikṣvākūṇām: Most of the commentators consulted understand, as do we, that viṣaya is, through sandhi, the nominative masculine singular viṣayaḥ, "the realm." Cr, alone among the commentators, reads it as the locative viṣaye, "in the realm." This, then, leads him to understand the term anāthaḥ not as referring to viṣayaḥ (i.e., "a realm without a protector") but to the aggrieved brahman himself. He says: "In the realm, that is to say, in the country of the Ikṣvākus, having encountered, that is to say, having acquired a protector who causes the death of children, I find myself now without a protector. The words 'I am' should be supplied (ikṣvākūṇāṃ viṣaye deśe bālāntakaraṇaṃ nātham āsādya prāpya vidyamāno 'ham, saṃpraty anātho 'smīti śeṣaḥ)." None of the translators consulted follows Cr in this interpretation.

"a king" nṛpam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dhruvam, "surely or certainly."

12. "And" tu: Ś,Ñ,V,B3,4,D1–8,10–12,G1,M2,4,5,7,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hi, "for."

"before their time" akāle: Literally, "at the wrong time."

13. "when" yadā: Ś,V2,D6,7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yadvā, "or or on the other hand."

"act improperly" ayuktāni . . . kurvate: Literally, "they do improper [things]." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "improper actions (anucitakṛtyāni)."

"there is no one to prevent them" na ca rakṣāsti: Literally, "and there is no protection." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who all gloss, "and there is no protection, that is to say, [there is no] prevention of improper actions (na ca rakṣāsty anucitakṛtyanivāraṇam)."

"fear of death" kālakṛtaṃ bhayam: Literally, "fear caused by Kāla." Ct glosses, "fear caused by untimely death (akālamṛtyukṛtaṃ bhayam)."

14. "there must have been" bhaviṣyati: Literally, "there will be."

"some transgression on the part of the king" rājadoṣo 'yam: Literally, "this is a fault of the king." Ct defines the transgression as "having the form of the failure to punish a person engaging in inappropriate actions (anucitakṛtyapravṛttadaṇḍābhāvarūpo rājadoṣaḥ)." Ś,Ñ2,V,B4,D1,3–5,8,10–12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hi, "indeed, for" for [a]yam, here "this."

"thus" tadā: Literally, "then." V2,B,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G1,M4–9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tathā, "thus," while KK and VSP read tataḥ, "because of that."

15. "reviling" nindayānaḥ: Ñ2,V3,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G2,3,M1,3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read uparudhya, "having blockaded." Cr glosses this as "coming into his presence (tatsannidhiṃ prāpya)." Cs glosses, "having incited or instigated (pratodya)." We understand the variant to be an early reference to the well-known Indian practice of dharnā. See Hobson-Jobson s.v. dhurna, to sit. This is similar to the practice of prāyopaveśana, the sitting and fasting to death, in protest of something or someone. Compare, for example, 4.52.21 and notes, where the monkeys discuss fasting to death.

"embraced" upagūhati: The ending -ti is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

Following verse 15, M10 and KK (1913—in brackets) insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1091*]: "Thus reviling that foremost of kings, the twice-born brahman[1] was still inconsolable, although[2] he was surrounded by a host of his kinsmen.[3] Tightly embracing[4] his dead child, he wailed, 'Alas!' in his extremity of grief for his son.[5] (nṛpavaram iti nindayan dvijanmā svajanasamūhasamāvṛto 'py aśāntaḥ / mṛtaśiśum upagūhayan svamūrtyā vyalapad aho sutaśokam atyarūḍham //)"

The syntax and semantics of the verse are awkward and difficult to render with precision. The only other available attestation of this verse is found in KK (7.73.20); however, this version and its variants are not recorded in the critical apparatus. KK's version of the verse, as problematic as the one found in the critical edition, would yield the following meaning: "Thus reviling that foremost of kings, the twice-born brahman[1] was extremely inconsolable,[2] [and] he was surrounded by a host of virtuous people.[3] Tightly embracing[4] his dead child, he wailed, 'Alas!' and gave himself over to grief for his son.*[5] (nṛpavaram iti nindayan dvijātmā sujanasamūhasamāvṛto 'bhy aśāntaḥ / mṛtaśiśum upagūhayan svamūrtyā vyalapad aho sutaśokam abhyagacchat //)"

[1] "the twice-born brahman" dvijanmā: Literally, "the one having two births." KK reads instead dvijātmā, "whose essence or self was that of a twice-born [one]."

[2] "inconsolable, although" apy aśāntaḥ: Literally, "not pacified or appeased, although." KK reads instead the very awkward abhy aśāntaḥ, "to, inconsolable." One would be forced to take the adverb abhi, "to, toward, or against," to refer either retrospectively to the accusative nṛpavaram, "foremost of kings," in pāda a, or prospectively to the accusative mṛtaśiśum, "dead child" in pāda c.

[3] "surrounded by a host of his kinsmen" svajanasamūhasamāvṛtaḥ: KK reads instead sujanasamūhasamāvṛtaḥ, "surrounded by a host of virtuous people."

[4] "Tightly embracing" upagūhayan svamūrtyā: Literally, "Embracing with his own form or body."

*[5] "in his extremity of grief for his son" sutaśokam atyarūḍham: We read the phrase as an adverbial clause and have emended the seemingly meaningless atyarūḍham, "extremely not risen," to read atyārūḍham, "excessively elevated." KK reads the more lucid sutaśokam abhyagacchat, "he gave himself over to [lit., 'went to'] grief for his son."

The meter is puṣpitāgrā (aupacchandasika).

1. "that twice-born brahman's" dvijasya: Literally, "of the twice-born one."

"lamentation" paridevitam: D5–7,10,11,G1,M1,6,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous paridevanam.

"so filled with sorrow and grief" duḥkhaśokasamanvitam: The ending -am is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ct differentiates the two terms duḥkha and śoka, arguing that the former refers to the brahman's miseries, such as old age, etc., while the latter refers to the grief born of his bereavement over his son (duḥkham ātmano vārdhakādinimittaṃ śokaḥ putraviyogajas tābhyāṃ samanvitam). Cs understands that the poet uses both terms distributively, with the first, duḥkha (sorrow), referring to the emotions of the hearer (i.e., Rāma), and the second, śoka (grief), to those of the speaker (i.e., the brahman). He bases this argument on the clear meaning of the phrase "and he was consumed with sorrow" from verse 2 below, where the emotion of sorrow (duḥkham) is ascribed to Rāma. Cs then quotes Ct, observing that we are to understand that that commentator fails to grasp the clear meaning of the compound here. (duḥkhaśokasamanvitaṃ śrotur vaktuś cety ubhayavivakṣayā duḥkhaśokety uktiḥ. sa duḥkhena ca saṃtapta ity anuvāda svārasyāt. duḥkham ātmano vārdhakādinimittaṃ śokaḥ putraviyogajas tābhyāṃ samanvitam iti vyākhyānān nāgojibhaṭṭo na tatsvārasyagrāhīti jñātavyam.)

2. "Wholly consumed with sorrow" susaṃtaptaḥ: Ñ2,B2,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca saṃtaptaḥ, "And consumed with sorrow."

"and his brothers" bhrātṝṃś ca: Cv observes, "With regard to the determination of which brothers are intended, the dual should have been used in view of the fact that Śatrughna was living abroad. However, the plural has been used because [the word] 'brothers' implies by synecdoche that [Rāma's] friends are also to be included. However, according to some, the plural is appropriate even in the case of two, since anything over one is plural. (bhrātṛparyavasāne śatrughnavipravāsād dvivacanena bhavitavyaṃ prayuktaṃ bahuvacanam. ato bandhūpalakṣaṇam etat. ekavyatiriktaṃ sarvam anekaṃ tato dvayor api bahuvacanaṃ bhavatīti kecit.)" Ś,V,D1–5,8,12, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead the dual bhrātarau, "the two brothers," thus avoiding the problem.

"together with the vedic brahmans" sahanaigamān: Here, as elsewhere, the context determines which of the term's three senses—vaidika brahmans, merchants, or townsfolk in general—we must understand here. Ct, the only commentator to gloss the term here, understands paurāḥ, "townsfolk." All translations consulted interpret the term as does Ct. However, given the exclusive nature of the group invited and the esoteric subject to be discussed, we believe that the reference here is to brahmans. For a discussion of this term, see notes to 7.55.5.

3. "the eight twice-born brahmans" dvijāḥ . . . aṣṭau: Literally, "the eight twice-born [ones]." Cs stresses the fact that Vasiṣṭha is not included among the eight but constitutes the ninth. (vasiṣṭhena sahāṣṭau dvijāḥ. vasiṣṭho navama iti yāvat.)

4–5. "those bulls among the twice-born brahmans" ete dvijarṣabhāḥ: Literally, "these bulls among the twice-born [ones]."

"Mārkaṇḍeya, Maudgalya, Vāmadeva, Kāśyapa, Kātyāyana, Jābāli, Gautama, and Nārada" mārkaṇḍeyo 'tha maudgalyo vāmadevaś ca kāśyapaḥ / kātyāyano 'tha jābālir gautamo nāradas tathā //: It interesting to note that such a distinguished group of legendary seers appears to have arrived at Rāma's court unannounced. The list of the seers here is repeated, verbatim, or almost so, in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa (see 2.61.2), the Yuddhakāṇḍa (see 6.116.55), and the Uttarakāṇḍa (see 7.87.2–3). Under normal circumstances, in the previous books, Rāma, like his father, would have summoned his eight counselors (mantrins), who are mentioned here but not named. For a list of the names of Rāma's and Daśaratha's counselors, see 1.7.2 and 3565*, following notes to 6.115.8.

"were seated on cushions" āsaneṣūpaveśitāḥ: Literally, "were caused to sit on seats." Cr notes that it was Rāma himself who had them take their seats (rāmeṇeti śeṣaḥ).

"the vedic brahmans" naigamāḥ: See notes to verse 2 above.

"in the proper fashion" anukūlataḥ: D7,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead anukūlitaḥ. Apte (s.v.), citing this verse, glosses, "honored or well received." The term is not cited in either MW or PW. Ct glosses, "who practiced the behavior of the cultivated (kṛtaśiṣṭācārāḥ)."

Following 5ab, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1097*]: "And, his hands cupped in reverence,[1] having reverentially saluted those great seers, who had come (maharṣīn samanuprāptān abhivādya kṛtāñjaliḥ /)."

[1] "his hands cupped in reverence" kṛtāñjaliḥ: As noted by Cr, the adjective must modify Rāma (kṛtāñjalī rāmaḥ).

6. "those men of fiercely blazing energy . . . told them" teṣām . . . dīptatejasām /. . . ācaṣṭe: Literally, "he tells those ones of blazing energy." Technically we must take the genitives in pādas ab as objective. We have, however, rendered the verse with two clauses, as if we were dealing first with a genitive absolute construction.

"about why the twice-born brahman was wailing" dvijo yasmāt praroditi: Literally, "because of which the twice-born [one] is crying." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dvijo 'yam uparodhati [KK and VSP—uparodhate], "This twice-born one is blockading." Ct explains this variant as follows: "This twice-born one is blockading (uparodhati), that is, blockading (corrected to uparuṇaddhi). We must add the phrase 'the royal gate.' 'Everything,' means that he told them that he [i.e., the brahman] was saying that the child's death had its roots in the transgression[s] of the king, and so on, that is, he told them all of that. (ayaṃ dvija uprodhaty uparuṇaddhi. rājadvāram iti śeṣaḥ. sarvaṃ rājadoṣamūlam eva bālamaraṇaṃ vadatītyādikaṃ ca sarvam ācaṣṭe.)" Cr understands similarly. Ck appears to understand similarly, but our transcription of his commentary appears to be corrupt. He says, "He tells all, that is, everything, that is, he tells the counselors who participate in the discussion that [the brahman] ascribes the death of the child entirely to the transgression on the part of the king, etc. (sarvaṃ parivedanamantriṇaḥ sa rājadoṣamūla[m] eva bālamaraṇaṃ vada[n–sic]tīty ādikaṃ sarvam ācaṣṭe.)"

7. "to him" nṛpam: Literally, "to the king." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead svayam, "himself."

8. "your majesty" rājan: Literally, "O king." The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"this . . . death of a child has come about" prāpto 'yaṃ bālasaṃkṣayaḥ: D6,7,10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar prāpto bālasya saṃkṣayaḥ, "the death of a child has come about."

"heroic" vīra: Literally, "O hero." The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G2,3,M1,3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rājan, "O king."

9. "In the beginning . . . in the Kṛta Yuga" purā kṛtayuge: We take the term purā, frequently understood to mean "long ago," in its sense of "in the beginning" (Monier-Williams s.v.). It appears that Nārada is giving a general description of the conditions in the various yugas rather than a specific history of the practice of asceticism by the various social classes in a particular historical framework. According to the more or less standard model of the Vaiṣṇava purāṇas, which culminates in the popular tradition of the ten incarnations (daśāvatarāḥ) of Viṣṇu and places each incarnation in a particular cosmic era, Rāma lived in the Tretā Yuga, the second of the four eras. The epics, however, do not actually make this association of Rāma and the Rāmāyaṇa with the Tretā. As Dr. Luis González-Reimann points out in a personal communication, in the Nārāyaṇīya section of the Mahābhārata's Śāntiparvan, Viṣṇu foretells that he will be born as the Bhārgava Rāma Jāmadagnya in the Tretā Yuga but as Rāma Dāśarathi in the saṃdhi, or the junction, between the Tretā and Dvāpara Yugas (MBh 12.326.77–78). He also notes that earlier in the Mahābhārata (1.2.3–8), Bhārgava Rāma, who is universally said to have preceded Rāma Dāśarathi, is placed in that same saṃdhi, thus further indicating that the Mahābhārata's authors did not regard the hero of the Rāmāyaṇa as having lived in the Tretā. Outside of the present, rather confusing and obscure passage, Vālmīki's Rāmāyaṇa itself makes no effort to identify the yuga in which its central narrative unfolds. We are grateful to Luis González-Reimann for his insights concerning the placement of the Rāmāvatāra in the Tretā Yuga. For a learned discussion of the cycles of time, or yugas, in ancient India, see González-Reimann 2002.

10. "resplendent" prajvalite: Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "splendid through asceticism (tapasā dīpte)."

"unshrouded by darkness" anāvṛte: Literally, "not covered." The word is marked as an emendation by the editors of the critical edition, apparently on the basis of the reading given in the commentaries of Cv, Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct. GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all read tv anāvṛte. The majority of manuscripts read either hy anāvṛte or tv anāvṛte, thus avoiding the hiatus. Cv glosses, "unobscured, that is to say, illuminated (apracchādite a[sic]prakāśita iti yāvat)." Ck and Cg offer, "in that cosmic era that was devoid of the obscuration of ignorance (ajñānāvaraṇarahite yuge)." Ct glosses, "in that cosmic era in which the people were devoid of the obscuration of ignorance (ajñānāvaraṇarahitajane yuge)." See note to verse 14 below.

"in which brahmans were preeminent" brahmabhūte: Literally, "which consisted of brahmans." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "in which the brahman class was foremost (brahmavarṇapradhāne)." Cr understands similarly.

"were" jajñire: Literally, "they were born."

"immortal" amṛtyavaḥ: Literally, "deathless." Cg glosses, "devoid of death because of the absence of even a trace of unrighteousness, which is the cause of death (maraṇahetutvādharmaleśasyāpy abhāvān maraṇarahitāḥ)." Ck and Ct understand similarly. Cr, however, glosses, "devoid of untimely death (akālamṛtyurahitāḥ)."

"farsighted" dīrghadarśinaḥ: Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand that because of the fact that they were not shrouded in ignorance, people were possessed of universal knowledge even concerning matters that were past and were yet to come (anāvṛtajñānatvāc ca dīrghadarśino 'tītānāgatādisakalajñānavantaḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly).

11. "Next came the age called the Tretā Yuga, the age of men of powerful bodies. In that age kshatriyas became able to practice the asceticism of that previous age." tatas tretāyugaṃ nāma mānavānāṃ vapuṣmatām / kṣatriyā yatra jāyante pūrveṇa tapasānvitāḥ //: The verse is elliptical and its construction is awkward. A literal translation would be: "Then [there is] the one called the Tretā Yuga, which belongs to or embodies beautiful men and in which have arisen kshatriyas associated with the previous asceticism." The commentators struggle to make sense of the verse. Their explanations vary in length and detail but generally present more or less the same idea. A brief and useful example is the commentary of Cr, who glosses: "Then, after the Satya Yuga [Kṛta Yuga], the Tretā Yuga, which was connected with men of powerful [bodies], came about. The words 'came about' must be added. In which Tretā Yuga kshatriyas arose, that is, kshatriyas who were associated with the previous asceticism; the meaning is '[They were associated] with asceticism that was practiced exclusively by brahmans in the previous era.' (tataḥ satyayugānantaraṃ vapuṣmatāṃ dehināṃ sambandhi tretāyugam avartateti śeṣaḥ. yatra tretāyuge kṣatriyāḥ pūrveṇa pūrvayuge brāhmaṇamātrānuṣṭhitenety arthas tapasānvitāḥ kṣatriyā jāyante.)" In an effort, perhaps, to rationalize the passage's seemingly uncanonical and somewhat confused account of the yugas and the practices associated with them, Cg adds that the Tretā Yuga is connected with the kshatriyas in the sense that they predominated in that age [just as it is stated in verse 10 that the brahmans dominated in the Kṛta Yuga]. (mānavānāṃ manuvaṃśakṣatriyāṇāṃ sambandhi tretāyugaṃ nāma bhavati. tatpradhānatvāt tatsambandhitvam.)

12. "And compared to those great men in that age known as the Tretā Yuga, those in the preceding age were superior to them in both strength and asceticism." vīryeṇa tapasā caiva te 'dhikāḥ pūrvajanmani / mānavā ye mahātmānas tasmiṃs tretāyuge yuge //: This verse, too, is somewhat ambiguous. A literal translation would be: "Those in a previous birth were greater by strength and by asceticism, those great men who were in the age, the Tretā Yuga." The clausal structure is defective. The commentators offer two explanations. One put forth by Ct understands that those great men in the Kṛta Yuga who practiced asceticism [i.e., the brahmans] are superior in both power and asceticism to those great men, whether brahmans or kshatriyas, who practiced asceticism in the Tretā Yuga. (tatra tretāyuge tretākhye yuge mahātmānas tapoyuktā ye mānavā brāḥmaṇāḥ kṣatriyā vā santi tadapekṣayā pūrvasmin janmani pūrvajāte kṛtayuge tapobhājo ye mānavās te vīryeṇa prabhāvena tapasā tapo 'tiśayenādhikā utkṛṣṭāḥ.) Ck and Cg understand similarly, although they do not note that both brahmans and kshatriyas are practicing asceticism in the Tretā Yuga. Cg prefaces his comments by indicating that the verse is in response to an implicit question as to whether the ascetic kshatriyas of the Tretā Yuga were the equals of the ascetic brahmans of the Kṛta Yuga, the answer to which question is a resounding no. (tretāyuge tapasvino jātāḥ kṣatriyāḥ kṛtayuge tapasvibhir brāhmaṇaiḥ kiṃ tulyā nety āha—vīryeṇeti.) Cr understands that in the Kṛta Yuga, the brahmans are superior in strength and asceticism, but in the Tretā Yuga, kshatriyas are superior in strength and asceticism. (pūrvajanmani yuge satyayuga ity arthas te brāhmaṇā eva vīryeṇa tapasā cādhikāḥ. mānavāḥ kṣatriyās tu tretā yuga eva vīryeṇa tapasā cādhikāḥ.) V3,D6,10,11,T,G,M1–5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tatra, "there or in that," for tasmin, "in that." The second occurrence of the word yuge in pāda d is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

13. "The brahmans were superior and the kshatriyas were inferior in every respect. But over the course of the two yugas, they came to be equal in power." brahma kṣatraṃ tu tat sarvaṃ yat pūrvaṃ aparaṃ ca yat / yugayor ubhayor āsīt samavīryasamanvitam //: The syntax of this verse is particularly impenetrable and difficult to construe. A literal translation would be: "But all that pertained to the brahmans and to the kshatriyas was [respectively] superior (pūrvam) and inferior (aparam). In the two yugas, it became endowed with equal power." The commentators struggle to make sense of the verse, and our translation derives largely from them, with particular reference to Ct's most detailed analysis. The general idea is that although the kshatriyas and the brahmans were equally endowed with power in the Kṛta and Tretā Yugas, the brahmans were, nonetheless, superior in all respects, in that they alone possessed the authorization for, and the power derived from, asceticism. Ct explains as follows: "Now, the kshatriyas of the Tretā [Yuga] were inferior to the brahmans of the Kṛta [Yuga], but they are equal to the brahmans of the Tretā [Yuga]. Thus the author says: 'brahma kṣatram' iti. Between those two yugas, it was in the Kṛta Yuga that the brahmans had priority (pūrvam), that is to say, were superior (utkṛṣṭam), in both asceticism and power, while the kshatriyas were inferior (avaram) in those two things, that is to say, they were inferior (nyūnam) with respect to both asceticism and power. But in the Tretā [Yuga] all of them, that is, both the brahmans and the kshatriyas, are endowed with equal power. Since in the Kṛta [Yuga] the kshatriyas are not authorized to perform asceticism, they are inferior to the brahmans of the age of that yuga. In the Tretā [Yuga], however, since both [classes] are authorized to perform asceticism, they became equal in both asceticism and power. That is the meaning. In fact, what is being stated here is the inferiority of the brahmans of the Tretā Yuga to those of the Kṛta Yuga. (atha tretākālikakṣatriyāṇāṃ kṛtakālikabrāhmaṇebhyo nyūnatā tretākālikabrāhmaṇais tu samatety āha—brahma kṣatram iti. ubhayor yugayor madhye kṛtayuge brahmapūrvaṃ tapovīryābhyām utkṛṣṭaṃ kṣatraṃ cāvaraṃ ca tābhyāṃ tapovīryābhyāṃ nyūnam āsīt tat sarvaṃ brahmakṣatrarūpam ubhayaṃ tretāyāṃ samavīryasamanvitam āsīt. kṛte kṣatriyāṇāṃ tapasy anadhikārāt tadyugīyebhyo brāhmaṇebhyas teṣāṃ nyūnatā. tretāyāṃ tūbhayor api tapodhikārād ubhāv api tapovīryābhyāṃ samāv iti bhāvaḥ. arthāt kṛtayugabrāhmaṇebhyas tretāyugabrāhmaṇānām api nyūnatvam uktam.)" Ck is similar to Ct but more concise. Cr understands that previously the kṣatra, that is to say, the kshatriya class, was lesser, that is, deficient, in asceticism but equal in power [to the brahmans]. In other words, they were endowed with power that was equal to the power of those in the Satya Yuga [Kṛta Yuga], while the brahma, that is to say, the brahmans as a class, were [superior in asceticism] in both yugas because of their ability to control their senses. (pūrvam avaraṃ tapasā hīnam ity artho yat kṣatraṃ kṣatriyakulaṃ tat samavīryasamanvitam. satyayugīyavīryasadṛśavīryayuktam. brahma brāhmaṇakulaṃ ca tat sarvam ubhayor yugayor yad indriyanigrahavad ity artha āsīt.) Cg explains, "[With the verse beginning] brahma, etc., [the author] says that the brahmans of the Tretā Yuga are equal [to the kshatriyas]. Between the two yugas, that is, the Kṛta and the Tretā, it is in the Kṛta, in the beginning, that the brahmans have priority, that is to say, are superior, and in the Tretā the kshatriyas [remain] inferior, that is to say, are lesser. Nonetheless, in the Tretā, both attain equal prominence. (tretāyugabrāhmaṇās tulyā evety āha—brahmeti. ubhayoḥ kṛtatretāyugayoḥ kṛte yad brahma pūrvam utkṛṣṭaṃ yac ca tretāyām apakṛṣṭaṃ kṣatraṃ tad ubhayaṃ tretāyāṃ samapradhānam āsīt.)" Ñ2,V,B,D1,2,9–11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for the critical reading tu, "and or but." D5–7,11,T3,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read avaram, "inferior," for aparam, which in this context also means "inferior."

14. "Then, unable to perceive any great difference between the brahmans and kshatriyas, all the authorities instituted regulations that governed all four social classes to address this." apaśyantas tu te sarve viśeṣam adhikaṃ tataḥ / sthāpanaṃ cakrire tatra cāturvarṇyasya sarvataḥ //: Once again the verse is elliptical to the point of near incomprehensibility, and we have fleshed it out on the basis of the general consensus among the commentators. A literal translation would be: "Then or because of that, not seeing a great distinction, they all made a rule in every respect concerning that for [lit., 'of'] the group of four social classes." D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read saṃmatam, "accepted or agreed upon," for sarvataḥ, "in every way." KK and VSP read paśyaṃs tu na te sarve, "none of them perceiving," for apaśantas tu te sarve, "and they all, not seeing." The idea expressed here, according to the commentators, is that in the Tretā Yuga, the kshatriyas, having gained authorization to perform asceticism, were no longer clearly differentiated from the brahmans. Therefore, Manu and all the other authors of dharmaśāstra in their age (so Ck, Ct, and Cr) or all the people (so Cg) established new regulations to define and govern the specific, authorized activities of the four varṇas. Thus Ck and Ct, for example, explain: "Therefore, in the Tretā Yuga, since all of the authorized propounders of dharma of that age, Manu, etc., did not perceive any great difference from that (tataḥ), i.e., on the part of the kshatriyas from the brahmans, that is to say, any distinction with regard to the practice of asceticism . . . they made, at that time, that is to say, in the Tretā Yuga, a regulation approved by all people since time immemorial, that is to say, a regulation, i.e., a śāstra, to distinguish the rules of conduct of the four social classes, the brahmans, etc. The real meaning here is that in the Kṛta [Yuga], all of the social classes adhered respectively to their proper duties of their own accord without any regulation. (atas tretāyuge brāhmaṇakṣatriyayos tapoviśeṣeṇa tayor madhye brāhmaṇasya tataḥ kṣatrād adhikhaṃ viśeṣam apaśyanto manvādayaḥ sarve tatkālikā dharmapravartanādhikṛtāḥ . . . brāhmaṇādicaturvarṇānāṃ saṃmatam anāditaḥ sarvalokasaṃmataṃ sthāpanaṃ varṇānām ācārabhedakasthāpanaṃ śāstraṃ tatra tretāyuge cakrire. kṛte tu vinaiva sthāpanaṃ svayam eva sarve varṇāḥ svasvadharmaratā iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.)" Cr is generally similar, but adds that the institution of rules for the conduct of the four varṇas suggests that the kshatriyas could get no peace of mind in the absence of a servant class [lit., 'agents of service'] (etena sevākartṝn vinā kṣatriyāṇāṃ manaḥprasādo na jāta iti dhvanitam). Cg adds that the regulation of the differences among the varṇas that was made was already proclaimed in the vedas and that the failure of people to perceive any difference between the brahmans and the kshatriyas derives from the fact that the kshatriyas, who had been banned from the practice of asceticism in the Kṛta Yuga, could now engage in it in the Tretā. In the same way, those great men [of old] also established the regulations that are laid down in the vedas and purāṇas for the proper conduct of vaiśyas and śūdras. That is the meaning. (tat sthāpanam ācārabhedaṃ vedoditaṃ cakrire . . . kṛtayuge tapastadabhāvābhyām ubhayor vailakṣaṇyaṃ spaṣṭam. tretāyuga ubhayor api tapaḥsāmyād vailakṣaṇyakaram ācārabhedam akalpayann ity arthaḥ. evaṃ vaiśyaśūdrayor api vedapurāṇoktācāravyavasthāṃ mahānto 'kalpayann ity arthaḥ.) Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 589), apparently following Gorresio (1870, p. 237), and followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 581) and Benoît (1999, p. 1379), understands that the verse describes the establishment of the four social orders, but this is dubious. He translates: "c'est alors que l'on établit publiquement la quadruple couleur." The distinct varṇas are thought to have been in place since the creation as stated in the Puruṣasūkta of the Ṛgveda (10.90). Here, it is simply a question of defining their respective duties and occupations.

Following verse 14, D6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [= 7.65.10ab]: "In that resplendent age, unshrouded[1] by darkness, in which brahmans were preeminent[2] (tasmin yuge prajvalite brahmabhūte anāvṛte)."

[1] "unshrouded" anāvṛte: D6,7,10,11,T,G1,M1–5,7–10 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hy anāvṛte, "indeed, unshrouded." See note to verse 10 above.

[2] "in which brahmans were preeminent" brahmabhūte: D6,7,10,11,T2–4,G1,M2,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dharmabhūte, "in which dharma was preeminent."

15. "Nonetheless, unrighteousness set one foot on the earth" adharmaḥ pādam ekaṃ tu pātayat pṛthivītale: Literally, "But unrighteousness caused one foot to fall on the surface of the earth." Ct understands that adharma is four-footed in that it consists of four negative characteristics: 1) untruthfulness (anṛta), 2) violence (hiṃsā), 3) dissatisfaction (asaṃtoṣa), 4) and strife (vigraha). Compare BhāgP 12.3.20, where the same list of the four legs of adharma is given. Cr interprets similarly here. Ct continues, understanding that the term pāda, "foot," should be taken here in its sense of one quarter. He understands that by the phrase "set down one foot" we are to understand that adharma took hold or began. In this, he argues that the men of the Tretā Yuga were [originally] similar to those of the Kṛta Yuga, [but] because of an absence of the authorization for the knowledge of brahman, they now lacked pure knowledge or insight and so began the practice of sacrificing, such as the agnihotra, etc. Cg interprets similarly here. Ct continues, saying that the meaning is that adharma was set in motion through one quarter [of itself] precisely because of the absence of this knowledge. Thus those men became inferior to those of the Kṛta Yuga. (adharmo hiṃṣānṛtāsaṃtoṣavigraharūpacatuṣpāt pṛthivītale pādaṃ caturthāṃśaṃ pātayad apātayat. pravartayāmāsety arthaḥ. evaṃ ca tretāpuruṣāḥ kṛtayugapuruṣā iva nirmalajñānarāhityād brahmajñānādhikāraśūnyā agnihotrādidharma eva pravṛttāḥ. jñānābhāvād eva cādharmo 'pi pādena pravṛtta iti bhāvaḥ. ata eva te kṛtayugapuruṣebhyaḥ kṣīṇā ity āha.) The concept of some entity, i.e., the vedas, the primal Puruṣa, etc., existing through only one quarter of itself on earth is established in the vedas themselves, i.e., in the Puruṣasūkta. Compare ṚV 1.64.45 and 10.90.3. The specific reference here appears to be loosely derived from the purāṇic trope of dharma as a cow, which stands on all four feet in the Kṛta Yuga, lifting one foot in each of the successive ages until it totters precariously on a single foot in the Kali Yuga. See MBh 3.148.9–39, where Hanumān describes the four yugas in similar terms to Bhīmasena.

"so that, through association with that unrighteousness, the twice-born ones became diminished" adharmeṇa hi saṃyuktās tena mandābhavan dvijāḥ: The sequence mandābhavan appears to be the result either of a double sandhi for an original mandāḥ abhavan or from an augmentless imperfect (lañ), such as we find in pāda b (pātayat), i.e., mandāḥ bhavan. D10,11,G1,M2,3 (first time),4,5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead adharmeṇa hi saṃyuktas tejo mandaṃ bhaviṣyati. This version of the line is also elliptical, as it lacks a substantive to be modified by the adjective saṃyuktaḥ, "associated with." Ck and Ct supply the word lokaḥ, "world or people," and read the line to mean: "Since the people were associated with that [unrighteousness], they became authorized for the rules governing the social classes and life stages. Therefore, their blazing splendor will become dimmed. (yatas tena saṃyukto loko varṇāśramādhikṛto bhavati tatas tasya tejo mandaṃ bhaviṣyati—so Ct; Ck similarly.)" Ck adds that by "it will be (bhaviṣyati)," "it is (bhavati)" is meant (bhavatīti yāvat). Cr understands: "Associated with unrighteousness, that is to say, with unrighteous conduct (adharmacaraṇa), the people will be, that is to say, will obtain, diminished blazing energy (adharmeṇādharmacaraṇena saṃyukto jano mandaṃ tejo bhaviṣyati prāpsyati)." Cg interprets the future bhaviṣyati as the future form in reference to the past (bhaviṣyatīti bhūte lṛṭ).

Following verse 15, Ś,V (except V2),B4,D2–12,S insert, while Ñ2,B1,2 insert only line 3 after 15ab, and B3 inserts only line 3 after 14, a passage of three lines [1100*]: "And that mode of livelihood, which the men of the earlier age had held to be connected with the quality of passion and so highly impure,[1] the one known as 'agriculture [anṛta]'[2] now came about by reason of that one foot[3] on the surface of the earth. And having caused agriculture [anṛta] to descend through unrighteousness, that one foot . . . (āmiṣaṃ yac ca pūrveṣāṃ rājasaṃ hi malaṃ bhṛśam / anṛtaṃ nāma tadbhūtaṃ pādena pṛthivītale / anṛtaṃ pātayitvā tu pādam ekam adharmataḥ //)."

The passage, especially line 3 ("And having caused agriculture [anṛta] to descend through unrighteousness, that one foot [anṛtaṃ pātayitvā tu pādam ekam adharmataḥ]"), has very strong textual support. Its first two lines are in all versions reported in the critical edition with the exception of Ñ, while line 3, which contains the first mention of the ambiguous and contested term anṛta, is present in all versions and absent from only three manuscripts, Ñ1,V2, and D1.

[1] "And that mode of livelihood, which the men of the earlier age had held to be connected with the quality of passion and so highly impure" āmiṣaṃ yac ca pūrveṣāṃ rājasaṃ hi malaṃ bhṛśam: Literally, "and that mode of livelihood, which was connected with the [guṇa of] rajas and extremely tainted for those of long ago." B4,D10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for hi, "and." Ct glosses, "For those men of old, that is, those who lived in the Kṛta Yuga, that āmiṣa, that is to say, in the form of a means of livelihood, such as agriculture, etc., which was rājasa, that is to say, having as its foundation the guṇa of rajas [quality of passion], was extremely impure, that is, something that was possessed of impurity and so to be shunned. (pūrveṣāṃ kṛtayugasthānāṃ bhṛśam atyarthaṃ malaṃ malavat tyājyaṃ yad rājasaṃ rajoguṇamūlam āmiṣaṃ jīvanopāyarūpaṃ kṛṣyādy āsīt)." Cg and Ck (quoted by Ct) understand similarly. Cr, who more or less follows the same line of interpretation, differs in understanding the word āmiṣam, which the other commentators understand in the general sense of "mode of livelihood (jīvanopāya-)," to refer specifically to food and particularly to meat, which, he claims, was adopted as part of their diet by many of those living in the Tretā Yuga. (tad āmiṣaṃ tretāyugasthabahūnāṃ bhogyam abhavad iti śeṣaḥ. āmiṣaṃ tv astriyāṃ māṃse tathā syād bhogyavastunīti kośaḥ.) Dutt (1894, p. 1789) seems to understand āmiṣa to mean "houses and farms," rendering, "And for houses and farms that were the property of the former age, people of the Tretā Yuga were possessed by envy, the outcome of the quality of darkness." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 590) translates, "L'élément charnel." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 581) offers, "Flesh that had been formerly eaten" and notes in a footnote (no. 3): "Men lived on flesh by hunting before agriculture was known." Benoît (1999, p. 1380), following Roussel, renders, "La composante charnelle." See below for the translations of both Raghunathan and Gita Press.

[2] "the one known as 'agriculture [anṛta]' " anṛtaṃ nāma: Literally, "named anṛta." The word anṛta normally means "falsehood or unrighteousness" and shares considerable semantic space with the term adharma. It is perhaps for this reason that some of the commentators and the translators who follow them choose to take the term in its other sense, "agriculture," in order, one supposes, to avoid redundancy. This reading also depends on the interpretation of the word āmiṣa above. The identification of anṛta as agriculture may also be traced to the idea that in the paradisiacal era of the Kṛta Yuga crops appeared spontaneously without any human effort, so that it is only in the less idyllic era of the Tretā that people need to labor for their sustenance. Amarakośa 2.9.2, in fact, cites the term in the sense of agriculture. Given their understanding of the term āmiṣa as "mode of livelihood," Cg and Ct understand the term anṛta in the sense of agriculture and cite Amara in support of this. (sevā śvavṛttir anṛtaṃ kṛṣir uñchaśilaṃ tv ṛtam ity amaraḥ—so Cg; Ct similarly). Cr, however, understands the term in its more familiar sense of "unrighteousness or untruthfulness," claiming that it is the name of the first foot of adharma, "unrighteousness." The result of this, according to Cr, is the arising of desire and wrath in the world. This, in turn, leads to the diminution of the life span of people [in the Tretā Yuga] as compared to that of their predecessors in the Satya [Kṛta] Yuga. Cr concludes by noting that what is suggested here is that what becomes manifest [in the Tretā] is a diminution of [people's] power, etc. (kāmakrodhaprāptau doṣam āha— anṛtam iti. adharmato 'dharmeṇānṛtam ekaṃ pādaṃ pātayitvā tato 'nṛtakāryabhūtakāmakrodhād āyuṣaḥ pariniṣṭhitaṃ pariniṣṭhitatvaṃ satyayugāyuḥpramāṇāpekṣayālpapramāṇakatvam ity arthaḥ prāduṣkṛtam etena prabhāvādīnām alpatvaṃ sūcitam.) Translators resort to various strategies for the passage. Dutt (1894, pp. 1789–90) translates "the soiled sin of untruth." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 590) avoids interpreting the term, referring to it simply as "L'Anrîta." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 581) avoids translating these lines. Both Raghunathan and Gita Press follow Cg and Ct. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 571) renders, "eking out one's livelihood by tilling the soil." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 880), offers: "The Rājasika acts like agriculture was [sic] known to be anṛta." Benoît (1999, p. 1380) renders, "ce que l'on désigne du terme d'impiété." See verse 20 and notes below. Compare, too, 7.75.8 and notes.

[3] "by reason of that one foot" pādena: Literally, "by the foot or quarter." D10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead kṣiptena, "by that which was tossed or set down."

16. "Then there appeared for the first time a limit to the span of life, so that people performed only auspicious acts and were devoted to truth and righteousness." tataḥ prāduṣkṛtaṃ pūrvam āyuṣaḥ pariniṣṭhitam / śubhāny evācaraṃl lokāḥ satyadharmaparāyaṇāḥ //: Once again the verse is elliptical and awkward. A literal translation would be: "Then appeared a first limit of life span. People performed only auspicious things, being devoted to truth and dharma." The idea, as suggested in various ways by the commentators, is that the unlimited life span of men in the Kṛta Yuga was now, through the descent of one foot of unrighteousness (see verse 15 above), diminished. Therefore, in fear of that, the people strove to practice only pious or auspicious acts, such as sacrifice, charity, and austerities, which would enable them to avoid this diminution. (evam āyuṣaḥ kṣayo 'py abhūd ity āha— . . . tatas tenaiva pātite pūrvaṃ prathamaṃ pariniṣṭhitaṃ vināśaḥ prāduṣkṛtaṃ prādurbhūtam. kṛtayugapuruṣāpekṣayā tretāyugapuruṣā nyūnāyuṣo 'bhavann ity arthaḥ. evam anubhāvasyāyuṣaḥ kṣaye pravṛtte sati bhītāḥ santaḥ tretāyugapuruṣāḥ śubhācaraṇe niratā āsan—so Cg). Ck, Ct, and Cs further specify that the auspicious acts consist of sacrifice, charity, and austerities (yajñadānataporūpapuṇyakarmāṇy eva).

D10–12 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the singular lokaḥ, people, and satyadharmaparāyaṇaḥ for the critical edition's plural lokāḥ and satyadharmaparāyaṇāḥ. D8,10–12, and KK and VSP in addition read the singular lañ, acarat/ācarat, "[the world] practiced." GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read ācaran, which then must be read as the present participle, "[the world] practicing."

Following 16ab, Ś,V,D6–8,10–12,S insert a passage of one line [1101*]: "And when agriculture [anṛta] and unrighteousness had descended to earth[1] (patite tv anṛte tasminn adharme ca mahītale)."

[1] "And when agriculture and unrighteousness had descended to earth" patite tv anṛte tasminn adharme ca mahītale: Literally, "But when anṛta (falsehood/agriculture) and unrighteousness had fallen on the surface of the earth." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead pātite tv anṛte tasminn adharmeṇa mahītale, lending the line the sense "But when that anṛta had been made to fall on the surface of the earth through unrighteousness." On the term anṛta in this context, see 1100*, note 2, following notes to verse 15 above and notes to verse 20 below.

17. "But in the Tretā Yuga those who were" tretāyuge tv avartanta . . . ye: V3,D10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca vartante . . . ye, "and those who are" for tv avartanta . . . ye.

"while other people were engaged in serving them" śuśrūṣām apare janāḥ: Literally, "other people . . . service or obedience." As Cg, Ct, and Cr note, we must supplement the elliptical reference by adding a verb with the sense of "they did or performed" and note that the reference here is either to the vaiśyas and śūdras alone (vaiśyasūdrāḥ—so Cg) or to various secondary [classes produced] by the mixture [i.e., intermarriage] of vaiśyas and śūdras (vaiśyaśūdrasaṃkaraviśeṣāḥ—so Ck and Ct). Cg, Ct, and Cr note that the two lower varṇas are engaged in service to the brahmans and kshatriyas (brāhmaṇakṣatriyasevām evākurvann iti śeṣaḥ—so Cr; Cg and Ct similarly).

18. "And that, which was allotted to the vaiśyas and śūdras, came to be their highest righteous duty." sa dharmaḥ paramas teṣāṃ vaiśyaśūdram athāgamat: Literally, "That highest dharma of theirs came to the vaiśyas and śūdras." There is some unclarity as to the antecedent of the pronoun teṣām, "of them." Cr understands the reference to be to all the varṇas, starting with the brahmans. He says, "Among [all] the classes, starting with the brahmans, that is to say, service to the brahmans and kshatriyas, came to, that is to say, reached, the vaiśyas and śūdras (teṣāṃ brāhmaṇādīnāṃ madhye vaiśyaśūdram . . . tad brāhmaṇakṣatriyaśuśrūṣaṇam . . . āgamat prāpnot)." Cv, on the other hand, restricts the reference to only the vaiśyas and śūdras (teṣāṃ vaiśyaśūdrāṇāṃ madhye sa paramadharmo bhūtvā vaiśyāṃś ca śūdrāṃś cāgamat). Ck, Ct, and Cs only note "in the midst of or among them (teṣāṃ madhye)," leaving the pronoun teṣām without a gloss. Ś1,2,D3,10,11,T1,M6, and GPP, NSP (marked as a variant in KK), and Gita Press read instead svadharmaḥ, "their own dharma," for sa dharmaḥ, "that dharma."

"But it was the śūdras especially who revered all the other three classes." pūjāṃ ca sarvavarṇānāṃ śūdrāś cakrur viśeṣataḥ: Literally, "And the śūdras especially did reverence to all the social classes." Ck, Ct, and Cs gloss, "to those belonging to the three varṇas (traivarṇikānām)." Cr similarly glosses, "all the varṇas, up through the vaiśyas (sarvavarṇānāṃ vaiśyaparyantānām)." Cg notes that although service and agriculture were the highest duty of both the vaiśyas and the śūdras, in the case of the śūdras, service becomes a particular duty even with respect to agriculture. (vaiśyānāṃ hi śuśrūṣā. ato 'pi kṛṣyādikam eva paramo dharmo 'bhūt. śūdrāṇāṃ kṛṣyādibhyo 'pi śuśrūṣaiva viśiṣṭo dharmo 'bhūd ity arthaḥ.) Cs, citing a different opinion, quotes a verse from the Mahābhārata (6.40.44), which names agriculture, cattle-keeping, and trade as the natural activities of the vaiśyas, while the natural activity of the śūdras consists of service (vaiśyānāṃ tu kṛṣigorakṣavāṇijyaṃ vaiśyasyāpi svabhāvajam / paricaryātmakaṃ karma śūdrasyāpi svabhāvajam // iti mānāntarāvagamitakriyātrārthād ukteti bodhyam.)

Following verse 18, Ś,Ñ,V3,D6–8,10–12,S (except M5) insert, while V1,2,B1,D–5,9 continue after 1105*, B2,4 continue after 1106*, and B3 inserts after 17ab owing to omission, a passage of two lines [1107*]: "At that juncture,[1] because of the rise of unrighteousness and agriculture [anṛta] among them,[2] those men of old[3] once more[4] became terrified,[5] foremost of kings (etasminn antare teṣām adharme cānṛte ca ha / tataḥ pūrve punas trāsam ājagmur nṛpasattama //)."

As all manuscripts collated for the critical edition and printed editions consulted read this passage, its omission from the critical text is questionable.

[1] "at that juncture" etasminn antare: Ck takes the reference to be to the period at which, as noted in verse 18, the śūdras came to revere the three [higher] varṇas (etasminn antare traivarṇikapūjāparaśūdrakulayuktakāle). Cv glosses vaguely, "at that time (tasmin kāle)," presumably thinking along the same lines as Ck. Cg, Ct, and Cr are unanimous in understanding the reference to be to the end of the Tretā Yuga (tretāyugāvasānakāle—so Cg and Ct; Cr similarly).

[2] "because of the rise of unrighteousness and agriculture among them" teṣām adharme cānṛte ca ha: Literally, "when adharma and anṛta of them [took place]." The commentators, as do we, understand the phrase to be a sati saptamī. Ct understands, "when the foot of adharma in the form of anṛta had properly set in (anṛtarūpe 'dharmapāde samyakprāpte satīti śeṣaḥ)." Cr is similar, noting only that the term adharma refers to the first foot of adharma (adharme 'dharmaprathamapāde)." Cg understands adharma to refer to the diminution of life span that is caused by adharma and anṛta to refer to such means [of livelihood] as agriculture. (adharme 'dharmakārya āyuṣaḥ kṣaye. anṛte kṛṣyādyupāye ca.) Cv links the two terms by taking anṛta as the name of that particular form of adharma (anṛtasaṃjñe 'dharme vartamāne). On the term anṛta in this context, see 1100*, note 2, following notes to verse 15 above. Compare, too, 7.75.8 and notes.

[3] "those men of old" pūrve: Literally, "those of old or ancestors." Ct and Cr specify brahmans and kshatriyas (brāhmaṇakṣatriyāḥ). Cv explains, "brahmans, etc. (brāhmaṇādayaḥ)." Ck similarly understands, "the three [higher] varṇas (trayo varṇāḥ)." Cg glosses, "those who lived in the Tretā Yuga (tretāyugasthāḥ)."

[4] "once more" punaḥ: B1–3,D1,3,5,8,9,12,T4, and KK and VSP read instead bhṛśam, "extremely."

[5] "became terrified" trāsaṃ jagmuḥ: Literally, "they went to fear." Ck glosses, "Like the king, they became frightened of the flaws in the kingdom because of the fact that the flaws of the servants were now to be acquired by themselves (dāsadoṣasya svaprāpyatvād rāṣṭradoṣād rājeva bhītā babhūvuḥ)." Ct, glossing the critical reading, which he notes as a variant, similarly explains: "They were frightened of the flaws in the kingdom because of the fact that the flaws of the servants were now to be acquired by the master [i.e., the king]. (trāsam upāgamann iti pāṭhe. sevakadoṣasya svāmiprāpyatvād rāṣṭradoṣād bhītā babhūvuḥ.)" The fear here is for the inversion of the social order, where the sins of the servants will be visited upon the masters. T3 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead hrāsam agaman, "they [i.e., the brahmans] went to diminution." Cr glosses, "they came to the state of diminished blazing energy through such contact with servants (tādṛśasevakasaṃsargeṇālpatejaḥprabhṛtitvam agaman)." Cg glosses simply, "destruction (vināśam)," for hrāsam, "diminution." G2,M2,4,8,9, and the text of Cv read satyam, "truth," for trāsam, "fear."

19. "Then unrighteousness set down its second foot. And thus, that yuga came to be known as the Dvāpara." tataḥ pādam adharmasya dvitīyam avatārayat / tato dvāparasaṃkhyā sā yugasya samajāyata //: Once again the syntax is tortured. A literal translation would be: "Then it caused the second foot of adharma to descend. Thus that Dvāpara-name of the yuga came into being." Like Cs, one has little choice but to take the genitive adharmasya in the sense of the nominative (adharmasyādharmaḥ). G2,M2,8,9, and KK and the commentaries of Cg and Cm read adharmaḥ sa, "that unrighteousness," for adharmasya, "of unrighteousness," apparently in an effort to correct the awkward reading. The commentators differ as to the exact nature of adharma's second foot. Ck, Ct, and Cs understand it to consist of possessiveness or greed (mamatārūpam), while Cr takes it to be harm or injuriousness (hiṃsām). This verse is an attempt to provide an etymology of the word dvāpara from dvitīya, "second." The normal understanding of the term is that it refers to a particular throw of the dice in the ancient Indian dice game.

20. "both unrighteousness and agriculture" adharmaś cānṛtaṃ caiva: Here, as above, we hesitantly translate anṛta as "agriculture." According to Cv and Ct, adharma takes the form of transgression of the established rules of proper behavior (adharmo vihitātikramarūpaḥ—so Ct; Cv similarly). Ct further ascribes the rise of unrighteousness and agriculture to the excess of egotism and covetousness (ahaṃbhāvamamatayor ādhikyāt). Ct also quotes Cm, who identifies the increase of adharma as the diminution of life span and the increase in agriculture as the increase in the effort that it takes to produce a crop by farming (tīrthas tv adharmavṛddhir alpāyuṣṭvam anṛtavṛddhiḥ prayāsabāhulyena kṛṣisāphalyam ity āha). Cv and Cg share the view of Cm. Cr defines adharma as "the second foot of adharma, that is to say, violence (adharmo 'dharmadvitīyapādo hiṃsā)." As at 1100*, following notes to verse 15 above, translators interpret variously. Gorresio (1870, p. 238) renders, "la menzogna e l'ingiustizia." Dutt (1894, p. 1790) now translates "impiety and untruth." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 590) avoids interpreting either term, rendering simply, "à l'Adharma et à l'Anrĭta." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 581) here renders, "untruth and evil," while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 572) translates, "Adharma and Anṛta (untruth)." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 881) offers "unrighteousness and Anṛta," and Benoît (1999, p. 1380) translates, "l'impiété et les atteintes au devoir de chacun." Compare, too, 7.75.8 and notes.

"reckoned as the Dvāpara" dvāparasaṃkhye: Ś,Ñ2,V1,B1,3,4,D2–4,8,12,T3, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead dvāparasaṃjñe, "named the Dvāpara."

"which came to be their basis" vartamāne yugakṣaye: Literally, "in the current abode of the yuga." Once again the awkward syntax leaves little choice but to follow the commentators in taking kṣayaḥ, which elsewhere in the passage has been used in its sense of "diminution or destruction," here in its sense of "basis or support." Thus Ct explains, "in that abode, that is, the yuga, which had become a basis that was then current, unrighteousness having reached its basis in the form of that [i.e., that yuga] . . . (kṣaya āśrayabhūte yuge vartamāne tadrūpāśrayaṃ prāpyādharmaḥ)." Ck understands similarly. Cr agrees with this interpretation but also reads kṣaya in the sense of "waning or destruction," with reference to the waning of the Tretā Yuga as the Dvāpara came on (yugasyādharmapādadvayasya kṣaya āśrayabhūte kiṃca yugakṣaye tretāvasāne dvāparasaṃkhye dvāparākhye vartamāne sati).

21. "And in the yuga known as the Dvāpara" tasmin dvāparasaṃkhyāte: Literally, "in that [yuga] that is reckoned as Dvāpara." D6,7,10,11,T3,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read asmin, "in this [yuga]," for tasmin, "in that," while Ś,V3,B4,D8,12,T4,M2,4,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read -saṃkhyāne for -saṃkhyāte, lending the compound the sense "which has Dvāpara as its reckoning."

"the practice of asceticism was extended to the vaiśyas" tapo vaiśyān samāviśat: Literally, "asceticism entered the vaiśyas."

"But the śūdra did not gain access to that practice—that is, to the performance of severe austerities" na śūdro labhate dharmam ugraṃ taptum: Literally, "The śūdra does not obtain the dharma in order practice austerities fiercely." D7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yugatas tu, "and because of the yuga or yugas," for ugraṃ taptum, "in order to practice austerities fiercely." Ck, Ct, and Cr all understand, "in the [first] three yugas (yugatrayeṣu—so Cr)." Ck and Ct note that due to the nature of the yugas, the śūdra does not obtain that dharma or practice characterized by asceticism in any of the [first] three yugas. (dharmaṃ tapolakṣaṇaṃ śūdro yugato yugatraye 'pi na labhate—so Ct; Ck similarly.)

Following 21ab, D6,7,10,11,S (except M9) insert a passage of one line [110*], which D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read twice in succession with variations [1110* = GPP, NSP, and Gita Press 7.74.24cd–25ab; KK and VSP 7.74.25cd–26ab]:

"By virtue of the three yugas,[1] that righteous practice is fully extended with regard to the three social classes[2] (tribhyo yugebhyas trīn varṇān dharmaś ca pariniṣṭhitaḥ)." [First time—1110* = GPP, NSP, Gita Press 7.74.24cd; KK, VSP 7.74.25cd; second time—1110* = GPP, NSP, Gita Press 7.74.25ab; KK, VSP 7.74.26ab.]

[1] "By virtue of the three yugas" tribhyo yugebhyaḥ: Commentators differ as to how to construe the unexpected dative/ablative forms. Cg, whom we more or less follow, takes the forms to be ablatives of cause (hetau pañcamī). Ck, Ct, and Cr simply gloss the forms as locatives, "in the three yugas (triṣu yugeṣu)." Cs first takes them as ablatives, glossing,

"because of the three yugas," which is similar to Cg's interpretation. As an alternative, he suggests taking the forms as ablatives in the sense of the locative, that is, "in the three yugas," or even as a dative in the sense of a locative. (tribhyo yugebhyaḥ. pañcamī . . . yugatrikahetukam . . . pañcamī saptamyarthe vā. triṣu yugeṣu. caturthī saptamyarthe vā.)

[2] "righteous practice is extended" dharmaś ca pariniṣṭhitaḥ: Literally, "and dharma was extended." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kramād vai tapa āviśat, "asceticism entered . . . sequentially."

22. "But eventually a person of the lowest class, O best of kings, will be able to perform very great asceticism. Indeed, the practice of asceticism in the future, that is, in the Kali Yuga, will be extended to those of the śūdra class." hīnavarṇo naraśreṣṭha tapyate sumahat tapaḥ / bhaviṣyā śūdrayonyāṃ hi tapaścāryā kalau yuge //: Literally, "One of the lowest varṇa, best of kings, practices very great austerity. The future practice of austerities in the Kali Yuga [will be] in the śūdra class." Ñ2,V2,B2,D6–8,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read bhaviṣyacchūdrayonyām for bhaviṣyā śūdrayonyām, "it will be in the śūdra class," yielding the sense "in the śūdra class of the future." Cg, who shares this variant, is unhappy with it. He understands the form bhaviṣyat as the finite future (lṛt) bhaviṣyati, "it will be," which has irregularly lost its final i (bhaviṣyad iti. ikāralopaś chāndasaḥ). KK and VSP read vai, "indeed," for hi, "indeed," This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

23. "The practice of asceticism by a śūdra, even in the Dvāpara, Rāma, is a severe violation of righteousness." adharmaḥ paramo rāma dvāpare śūdradhāritaḥ: Literally, "Practiced by a śūdra in the Dvāpara Yuga [it is] a severe violation of dharma [adharmaḥ]." The line is elliptical, because there is no specification as to what the adharma consists of. Contextually it is clear that the reference is to the practice of asceticism by a śūdra. Ct and Cr supply a referent, specifying that the infraction is the practice of austerities (tapodhāraṇam—so Ct; Cr similarly). D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read śūdrajanmanaḥ, "on the part of one of śūdra birth," śūdradhāritaḥ, "practiced by a śūdra." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all note that the intention here in specifying the Dvāpara Yuga is to say that if the practice of asceticism is forbidden to śūdras in the Dvāpara [Yuga], how much more so would it be in the Tretā [Yuga], which they all understand to be the yuga in which the narrative takes place. (dvāpare 'pi śūdrajanmanas tapodhāraṇaṃ paramo 'dharmaḥ. kim utādya tretāyām—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly.) Cr understands that the poetic figure (alaṃkāra) known as kāvyārthāpatti is suggested here (yadi dvāpara evādharmas tarhy tretāyāṃ kiṃ vaktavyam iti kāvyārthāpat[t]yalaṃkāraḥ sūcitaḥ). Appayya Dīkṣita is the only ālaṃkārika to deal with the figure of [kāvya]arthāpatti (Kuvalayānanda 114) understood to be similar to a fortiori argument. See Gerow 1971, p. 333. Ś,D6–8,10–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read rājan, "O king, " for rāma, "Rāma."

"some wicked śūdra . . . is practicing austerities" śūdras tapyati durbuddhiḥ: Literally, "an evil-minded śūdra is practicing austerities." GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead adya tapyati durbuddhiḥ, "today or now an evil-minded one is practicing austerities." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"in some corner of your realm" viṣayaparyante: Literally, "at the edge of the realm." Ck and Ct gloss, "near the realm (deśasamīpe)," while Cr glosses, "at the edge or end of the realm (deśānte)."

24. "For" hi . . . hi: Literally, "For . . . indeed." The second hi is emphatic or pleonastic. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "but," for the second hi.

"commits" karoti: Literally, "he does or performs." The form is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"O tiger among kings" rājaśārdūla: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead cāśrīmūlaṃ tat, "and that, which is the cause of misfortune." This phrase would then modify either adharmam, "unrighteous act," or akāryam, "forbidden act."

"swiftly" kṣipraṃ hi: Literally, "very quickly." Ñ2,V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for the emphatic particle hi.

Following verse 24, D6,7,10,11,T1,3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T2,G,M1,2,4,5,7–10 insert only line 3, and M3 continues after 1111*, a passage of three lines [1112*]: "In protecting his subjects in accordance with righteousness, a king receives the benefit of one-sixth[1] of their learning, austerities, and good works. And how could one who enjoys this sixth portion fail to protect the people?"

[1] "a king receives the benefit of one-sixth" ṣaṣṭhaṃ bhajati bhāgam: Literally, "he shares the sixth share." According to the dharmaśāstras, a king is entitled to one-sixth of the material wealth of his subjects, which he takes in the form of taxation. Thus, for example, Ck and Ct observe: "How could one who, for the sake of protection, enjoys the income from a sixth share of wealth, grain, and merit fail to protect (rakṣārthaṃ dhana-dhānyapuṇyādiṣaḍbhāgavetanabhoktā kathaṃ na rakṣet—so Ct; Ck similarly)." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand these lines to explain how a king must suffer for the sins of his subjects. (katham anyeṣu pāpaṃ kurvāṇeṣu rājño narakaprāptis tatrāha—so Cg; Ck, Ct, and Cr similarly.) On the issue of what share of wealth, etc., belongs to the king, see Kauṭilīya Arthaśāstra 2.15.3, 2.28.3, etc.; Nāradasmṛti 18.45; ManuSm 7.130 (Acharya 1946, p. 270). See, too, Lingat 1973, pp. 213–14.

25. "you must take forceful action" yatnaṃ samācara: Literally, "you must make an effort." Ck, Ct, and Cr all gloss, "an effort to prevent or stop it (nivāraṇayatnam—so Ck and Ct; Cr similarly)." Cg similarly glosses, "an effort in remedying or undoing (nirākaraṇayatnam)." Cs more forcefully understands the effort to be directed first toward the search [for the evildoer] and then toward killing him (yatnaṃ tanmārgaṇe 'nantaraṃ māraṇe).

26. "In this way your" evaṃ te: D7,10,11,T,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evaṃ cet, "If this is thus or so."

"and so will the life span of men" nṛṇāṃ cāyurvivardhanam: Literally, "And [there will be] an increase of the life span of men."

"and this child will live once more" bālasyāsya ca jīvitam: Literally, "and of this child [there will be] life." The sequence asya ca jīvitam is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

Sarga 66

1. "When Rāma had heard" śrutvā: Literally, "having heard." As Cr notes, we need to supply the name Rāma here (rāma iti śeṣaḥ).

"which consisted, so it seemed, of the nectar of immortality" amṛtamayaṃ yathā: Literally, "as if made of amṛta." Ś,V3,D5,8,12,T3,M1,3, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read tadā, "then," for yathā, "as if or like." This lends the phrase the sense "then having heard the words . . . which consisted of the nectar of immortality."

2. "Lakṣmaṇa" lakṣmaṇa: D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead suvrata, "O you of excellent vows," while D7 and KK and VSP read the accusative suvratam, in which case the adjective would modify dvijaśreṣṭham, "foremost of twice-born ones."

"foremost of twice-born brahmans" dvijaśreṣṭham: Literally, "best of the twice-born [ones]."

"in a vat of oil" tailadroṇyām: The word taila, derived from the word tila, "sesame," can refer specifically either to sesame oil or to oil in general. See Ayodhyākāṇḍa 60.12,14; 70.4; and notes, where Daśaratha's body is placed in a vat of sesame oil (tailadroṇyām). The practice of embalming is rarely mentioned in the Sanskrit literature. See, Kane (1973, vol. 4, pp. 233–34).

3. "See to it, gentle brother" saumya vidhīyatām: Literally, "O gentle one, let it be arranged or ordered."

"that child's body" bālaḥ: Literally, "the child or boy." We follow Cr, who glosses, "the child, that is, his body (bālas taccharīram)." Cs similarly understands, "his body (tatkalevaram)."

"is placed there": The words have been added to provide the necessary syntactic link with the preceding verse.

"and highly aromatic oils" tailaiś ca susugandhibhiḥ: Literally, "and with very, very fragrant oils." Ś,V1,2,D1,2,4,8,9,12,T3,G2,M3, and KK and VSP read instead tailaiś cāpi sugandhibhiḥ, "and also with very fragrant oils."

"so that it does not decompose" yathā na kṣīyate: Literally, "in such a way that it does not waste away."

4. "that there will be no destruction or disintegration" vipattiḥ paribhedo vā bhaven na ca: Literally, "that there might not be destruction or damage." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand vipatti to refer to the destruction of the entire body (svarūpanāśaḥ śarīrasyeti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; svarūpanāśaḥ—so Cg), with Ck further glossing it as "destruction caused by flesh-eating creatures (vināśaḥ svarūpabhedaḥ piśitāśiprāṇibhiḥ)." The same commentators understand paribheda to refer to the disintegration of the body caused by the separation of hair, tissues of the joints, etc. (sandhibandhakeśādiviśleṣajo rūpabhedaś ca—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Cr understands the two terms to be adjectives that modify the nominative śarīraḥ of his reading (see below). He thus glosses the former, vipattiḥ, as "possessing destruction of its inherent form (svarūpanāśavān)," and the latter, paribhedaḥ, as "being characterized by the degeneration of appearance (rūpaviparyayaviśiṣṭaḥ)." Ś,Ñ2,V1,2,B,D,T3,4,M3,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read na bhavet for bhaven na by transposition.

"of this innocent child's body while it is being preserved" śarīre bālasya guptasyākliṣṭakarmaṇaḥ: Literally, "in the body of the protected child who is unwearied in action." The term akliṣṭakarmaṇaḥ is used frequently in the epic, particularly to describe Rāma himself, and we have taken it in those contexts to mean "tireless in action." (See, for example, 6.31.62,66; 6.49.8; etc.). In this case, it appears that the reference is to the innocence of the deceased child. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śarīro bālasya guptaḥ san kliṣṭakarmaṇaḥ (KK and VSP—śiṣṭakarmaṇaḥ; GPP—viklisṭakarmaṇaḥ), which lends the line the sense of "the preserved body of the child, whose actions are worn out." Ct glosses the somewhat unusual term kliṣṭakarmaṇaḥ as "of auspicious conduct (śubhācārasya)," an interpretation that Apte (s.v. kliṣita—kliṣṭa) regards as doubtful. Cr, taking the variant more literally, glosses, "whose actions have perished, that is to say, who is dead (vinaṣṭakriyasya mṛtasyety arthaḥ)." KK and VSP read instead śiṣṭakarmaṇaḥ, which here is probably intended to mean "of disciplined actions or whose deeds or karma alone remains." Gita Press alone reads viklisṭakarmaṇaḥ, "destroyed," for san kliṣṭakarmaṇaḥ, a reading not noted in the critical apparatus. Ck and Ct suggest connecting the entire phrase with the previous verse, yielding the sense "You must act in such a way that the body of the child, being preserved, does not decompose (bālasya śarīraḥ . . . guptaḥ san yathā na kṣīyate tathā vidhīyatām iti pūrveṇānvayaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly)." Cr addresses the problem, as noted above, by taking the nouns vipattiḥ and paribhedaḥ as adjectives (see above). Several of the commentators remark on the unusual masculine gender of the noun śarīra in this variant. Ck and Cg ascribe it to gender inversion (liṅgavyatyayaḥ), while Ct invokes Pā 2.4.31,which refers to a class of nouns that may be either masculine or neuter. (śarīraḥ. ardharcādiḥ.)

5. "When . . . had instructed . . . in this fashion" tathā saṃdiśya: Literally, "having instructed in this fashion." V1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evaṃ saṃdiśya, "having instructed thus." KK and VSP read the synonymous ādiśya for saṃdiśya, a variant not noted in the critical apparatus.

"Lakṣmaṇa of auspicious marks" lakṣmaṇaṃ śubhalakṣaṇam: This common alliterative epithet, typical of the sort of which the poet is so fond, is also found at 7.43.2. See notes to this verse for alliterative epithets of Lakṣmaṇa.

"he called to mind the Puṣpaka with the thought, 'Come!' " manasā puṣpakaṃ dadhyāv āgaccheti: Literally, "He recalled the Puṣpaka with his mind [thinking], 'Come.' " On the Puṣpaka, see notes to 6.110.23. For the Puṣpaka in the Uttarakāṇḍa, see notes to 7.3.18.

6. "When the Puṣpaka . . . perceived" vijñāya puṣpakaḥ: Literally, "having perceived, the Puṣpaka." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, the term puṣpaka refers to the vehicle's presiding intelligence (puṣpakas tadadhiṣṭhātṛcetanaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Compare notes to 6.110.23, where Cs refers to the Puṣpaka's inner presiding deity (tadvimānadeva), who directs its movement. It is this presiding spirit who speaks in the following verse.

"into his . . . presence" samīpam: Literally, "to his presence." V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the locative singular samīpe, "in his presence."

"very" vai: The emphatic particle is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

7. "Bowing humbly . . . It " praṇato bhūtvā ayam: Literally, "having become bowed, that [one]." Note the hiatus between bhūtvā and the following word, ayam.

8. "those welcome words" bhāṣitaṃ ruciram: Literally, "the pleasant or agreeable speech."

"those . . . he" tān . . . saḥ: The pronoun saḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read saḥ, "he," for tān. This creates an awkward repetition with the saḥ in pāda d.

"that flying palace" vimānam: Literally, "vehicle or mansion." As mentioned previously, it is clear that, contrary to popular imagination and many translations, the Puṣpakavimāna is not merely a flying chariot but an elaborate flying palace. For a description of the Puṣpakavimāna and Rāvaṇa's acquisition of it, see 7.15.29–31 and notes. See, too, 293*, note 5, following notes to 7.15.30, where its construction is also mentioned.

9–10. "his quiver" tūṇīm: Literally, " a quiver." D10,11,T,G1,3,M1–3,5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, KK, and VSP read instead the dual tūṇī, "two quivers."

"he entrusted the city to those two heroes, Saumitri and Bharata" nikṣipya nagare vīrau saumitribharatāv ubhau: Literally, "having appointed both heroes, Saumitri and Bharata, in the city." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read caitau, "and those two," for vīrau, "the two heroes." Cs observes that although the poet uses Lakṣmaṇa's common matronymic, Saumitri, his mind appears to shrink from or be embarrassed by the use of such a matronymic in the case of Bharata. Or he [i.e., the poet] uses the name Bharata as a reflection of Bharata's higher status. (saumitribharatau lakṣmaṇabharatau. bharatamātṛnāmagrahaṇe kavimanaḥ saṃcukoca lajjitam iti vā. bharatadvārā tadūrdhvagatir iti vā bharatety uktiḥ.) No doubt, Cs believes the poet is hesitant to associate Bharata with his infamous mother, Kaikeyī.

"he . . . proceeded to the west, searching the wastelands on every side" prāyāt pratīcīṃ sa marūn vicinvaṃś ca samantataḥ: The words sa marūn, "he . . . wastelands," are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prāyāt pratīcīṃ haritaṃ vicinvaṃś ca tatas tataḥ, "He proceeded to the western quarter, searching here and there." The polysemic term harit, as noted by Ck,

Cg, Ct, and Cr, has to be taken here in its sense of "quarter or direction" (haritaṃ diśam). Compare RaghuVa 3.30 and Mallinātha's comments ad loc.

"which is bounded by the Himalayas" himavatāvṛtam: Literally, "surrounded or enclosed by Himalaya."

11. "then" atha: GPP and NSP read instead the synonymous atho, "now or next." The reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

Following verse 11, Ś,V1,3,D,S, and Lahore insert a passage of one line [1120*], following which D6,7,10,11,T4,G1,M2–5,7–10 continue with a passage of one line [1121*]: "Then[1] the great-armed lord of men, mounted on the Puṣpaka, saw [= 1121*] that [quarter] was one in which there was pure conduct and which was like a spotless mirror[2][= 1120*]" praviśuddhasamācārām ādarśam iva nirmalām [1120*] / puṣpakastho mahābāhur athāpaśyan narādhipaḥ [1121*] //).

[1] "Then" atha: D6,7,10,11,T4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

[2] "which was like a spotless mirror" ādarśam iva nirmalām: Note the liṅgabheda. D6,7,10,11,M1,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ādarśatalanirmalām, "which was as spotless as the surface of a mirror." On this variant reading, Cs notes that the region is filled with people who were of such a nature, i.e., spotless (ādarśatalanirmalāṃ tādṛśajanopetām).

12. "where he spied" dadarśa: Literally, "he saw."

"on the northern slopes Mount Śaivala" śaivalasyottare pārśve: Literally, "on the northern side of Śaivala." Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr agree that this is the name of a mountain in the southern region near the Vindhya range (śaivalākhyasya vindhyasamīpavartidakṣiṇabhāgavartigireḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg, Cm, and Cr similarly). This mountain is also mentioned at 7.70.16,17.

13. "Close to the lake" tasmin sarasi: Literally, "in or on the lake." It is not entirely clear what we are supposed to visualize here: that is, whether the ascetic is actually in the water, hanging above the water, or simply hanging from a tree or something similar near the water. We agree with Dutt (1894, p. 1792), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 583), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 573), Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 882), and Benoît (1999, pp. 1381–82) that the asceticism is taking place near or on the banks of the lake. Gorresio (1870, p. 240) and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 592) place the ascetic in the lake.

"upside down" adhomukham: Literally, "with his face down."

14. "Approaching him" athainaṃ samupāgamya: Literally, "Then, having approached him." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāghavas tam upāgamya, "Rāghava, having approached him."

"performing supreme austerities" tapyantaṃ tapa uttamam: Literally, "engaging in asceticism [involving] extreme asceticism." The expression does not easily lend itself to a literal translation in English. The syllable -pya- in tapyantam is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"Rāghava" rāghavaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T4,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ca nṛpaḥ, "and the king," while M3 and KK and VSP read sa tadā, "he . . . then,"

15. "To which of the four classes do you belong" kasyāṃ yonyām . . . vartase: Literally, "in which yoni do you exist?" The term yoni here must be taken in its sense of "class, family, or caste." Given the tenor of the preceding sarga and what is to follow in verse 17 and the following sarga, it is clear that Rāma is referring to varṇa. Cs glosses, "in [which] class or caste (jātau)." Cr glosses "are you born (utpanno 'si)" for "you exist (vartase)."

"you who are . . . of firm resolve" dṛḍhavikrama: Literally, "O [you] whose valor is firm."

16. "Whether it be the attainment of heaven or the acquisition of a boon, I wish to hear, ascetic, about the goal in connection with which you have been practicing austerities." manīṣitas te ko nv arthaḥ svargalābho varāśrayaḥ / yam āśritya tapas taptaṃ śrotum icchāmi tāpasa //: Literally, "What purpose desired by you—the attainment of heaven or recourse to a boon—regarding which asceticism is practiced, I wish to hear, ascetic." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead a three-line passage in which, according to the critical apparatus, the second and third lines are variants of each other. This three-line passage reads: "What purpose is desired for you—whether it is the attainment of heaven or some other [purpose], which is dependent on a boon—for the sake of which you are practicing asceticism difficult to be accomplished by others: I wish to hear that with reference to which this asceticism is being practiced. (ko 'rtho manīṣitas tubhyaṃ svargalābho paro 'thavā / varāśrayo yad arthaṃ tvaṃ tapasy anyaiḥ suduścaram / yam āśritya tapas taptaṃ śrotum icchāmi tāpasa //)" M6,7, and KK and VSP read tapasyasi suduṣkaram, "you practice austerities that are very difficult to do," for tapasy anyaiḥ suduścaram, "you are practicing asceticism difficult to be accomplished by others."

17. "Pray" bhadraṃ te: On this expression, see 6.6.4 and notes. See, too, Tubb 2006.

"Or if you are a vaiśya or a śūdra, you must tell me that truthfully." vaiśyo vā yadi vā śūdraḥ satyam etad bravīhi me (= 17cd): For 17cd, V1,D1–7,9–11,T,G3,M1,3,5,7,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute a passage of one line [1123*]: "Are you a vaiśya, the third class,[1] or a śūdra? You must tell the truth.[2] (vaiśyas tṛtīyo varṇo vā śūdro vā satyavāg bhava /)"

[1] "the third class" tṛtīyo varṇaḥ: Literally, "the third varṇa." KK and VSP read the two terms as a compound, yielding either the synonymous variant tṛtīyavarṇaḥ, "the third varṇa," or, if read as a bahuvrīhi, "a person of the third class." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus, despite the fact that it cites KK.

[2] "You must tell the truth." satyavāg bhava: Literally, "You must be a speaker of truth." Ct glosses, "You must tell the truth (satyaṃ vada)." Ck and Cg gloss similarly.

Following verse 17, Ñ2,B2 insert, while D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue following 1123*, and V2,B3,4 continue after 1125*, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1126*]: "Addressed in this fashion by the lord of men, he, still upside down,[1] told Dāśaratha, that bull among kings, his class and the reason for his intense exertions in asceticism[2] (ity evam uktaḥ sa narādhipena avākśirā dāśarathāya tasmai / uvāca jātiṃ nṛpapuṃgavāya yat kāraṇaṃ caiva tapaḥ pratyatnaḥ //)."

[1] "by the lord of men . . . still upside down" narādhipena avākśirāḥ: Literally, "by the lord of men . . . [he] having a downward head." KK and VSP insert hi, "for or indeed," between the two words in order to avoid the hiatus. In addition, KK (1913) and VSP read avākchirāḥ, an unusual sandhi.

[2] "the reason for his intense exertions in ascetisicm" yat kāraṇaṃ caiva tapaḥprayatnaḥ: Literally, "and the reason for which [there was] effort of or at asceticism." Cr fleshes out the disjunctive syntax by inserting the gerund uddiśya, "with reference to." KK and VSP read instead the locative singular kāraṇe, "in reference to which reason."

The meter is upajāti.

Sarga 67

1. "still hanging upside down" avākśirās tathābhūtaḥ: Literally, "being in such a condition with downward head." B2,T1,2,G1,3,M1,3, and KK and VSP read tathā bhūtvā, "having become thus," for tathābhūtaḥ. KK and VSP read, as at 1126* (following notes to 7.66.17), avākchirāḥ. Cs notes, "being in such a condition with downward head, that is to say, still hanging (avākśirās tathābhūto lambamāna eva)."

2. "I was born" prasūto 'smi: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous prajāto 'smi, "I was born."

"into the śūdra class" śūdrayonyām: Literally, "in a śūdra womb or family." See notes to 7.66.15.

"I am engaged in severe austerities" tapa ugraṃ samāsthitaḥ (= 2d): T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP transpose pādas 2b and 3d (śambūkaṃ nāma nāmataḥ), reading the nominative śambuko (v.l. śambūko) nāma nāmataḥ for the accusative śambūkam. See notes to verse 3 below.

"I desire the status of a god in this very body" devatvaṃ prārthaye . . . saśarīraḥ: Literally, "I, along with [my] body, desire godhood." This enigmatic phrase must be understood in the context of the epic trope of a person's efforts to attain heaven in his or her earthly body. The classic example is the story of the Ikṣvāku king Triśaṅku, who seeks to rise to heaven in his earthly body, first as a king, and then, cursed by his guru's sons to become an untouchable caṇḍāla, as an outcaste. The story is told at length at Bālakāṇḍa sargas 56–59. Note in particular the references to his desire for ascension in his earthly body (1.56.11; 1.57.17; 1.58.4; 1.59.2,24,26). Compare, too, MBh 1.65.34, 2.11.52, and 2.11.52, 139*; VāyuP 88; BhāgP 9.7.5–6; etc. Cs understands that by the term devatvam ("the status of a god") is meant mahādevatvam ("the status of Mahādeva"). To support this he quotes the Mahābhāratatātparyanirṇaya's version of the episode, where it is indicated that this is the śūdra's goal, that is to say, "desiring the state or place of Maheśvara." (saśarīra eva devatvaṃ mahādevatvam. nirṇaya icchan māheśvarapadam ity ukteḥ.) See MBhTN 9.21.

3. "your majesty" rājan: Ñ1,B4,D1–7,9–11,T,G2,3,M1,3,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāma, "O Rāma."

"known by the name Śambūka" śambūkaṃ nāma nāmataḥ (= 3d): The redundant expression nāma nāmataḥ, "namely by name," is not uncommon in the poem. For its use elsewhere in the Rāmāyaṇa, see notes to 6.38.25. See, too, 7.9.3 and notes. T1,2,G3,M1,3, and KK and VSP transpose pādas 2b and 3d, reading the nominative śambukaḥ (v.l. śambūkaḥ) for the accusative śambūkam. See notes to verse 2 above. Ñ2,V,B1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the nominative singular śambūkaḥ. This lends the line the sense "Know me to be a śūdra. I am know by the name Śambūka."

4. "spotless" vimalam: Like most translators consulted, we take the term as an adjective modifying khaḍgam, "sword." Gorresio (1870, p. 241) alone reads it adverbially with the verb "he cut (ciccheda)," as "cleanly or unhesitatingly," rendering, "gli tagliò netto il capo." Cr, the only commentator to pay any attention to this verse, similarly reads the term adverbially and takes it as the starting point for a discourse on the eschatological implications of Rāma's execution of Śambūka. Cr, operating as he does in the universe of devotional discourse in which Rāma is regarded as the compassionate recourse of the lowly and afflicted and in which even demons slain by him attain instant liberation, must rationalize why such salvation does not appear to be available to Śambūka. He argues as follows: "Drawing his sword from its sheath, Rāghava cleanly cut off the head, that is to say, he did so in such a way that there was a complete absence of contact with impurity. Since ascetic practice on his [i.e., Śambūka's] part was forbidden, the vision of the Supreme Spirit as well as a killing, whose instrument was the weapon of Rāma, who brings one to the highest goal of man, is ruled out because of the fact that there is a prohibition on the fruits of forbidden conduct. That is what is to be expressed. There is no prohibition in his case concerning that which is dependent upon the virtuous action that would bring about the acquisition of the highest goal of man. Therefore, in order to attain the Supreme Spirit quickly, he [i.e., Śambūka] did this even though it was a forbidden action. This is what is to be understood. By this his [i.e., Rāma's] status as the recourse of the afflicted is made clear. By the fact of his [i.e., Śambūka's] failure to offer obeisance, etc., it is manifestly certain that, had he offered obeisance, etc., then extremely compassionate Rāma would not have killed [him]. (rāghavaḥ śūdrasya śiraḥ kośāt khaḍgaṃ niṣkṛṣya vimalaṃ malasaṃsargarāhityaṃ yathā bhavati tathā ciccheda na caitattapaścaryāyā viruddhatve paramātmadarśanaṃ paramapuruṣārthaprāpakarāmaśastrakaraṇakahananaṃ ca viruddhaṃ niṣiddhācaraṇasya niṣiddhaphalakatvād iti vācyam. tasya paramapuruṣārthaprāpakasatyāvalambitvena nirodhābhāvāt. etena śīghraṃ paramātmaprāptyartham eva viruddhācaraṇam apy anena kṛtam iti bodhyam. etena tasyārtaprapannatvaṃ vyaktaṃ tatpraṇāmādyakaraṇena praṇāmādikaraṇe 'tidayālū rāmo na haniṣyatīti tanniścayo vyaktaḥ.)" Compare UttaRāC 2.10–11, where in slaying Śambūka, Rāma liberates him from a curse and enables him thus to regain his heavenly state. Compare, also, RaghuVa 15.53, where Śambūka is said to attain the state of the virtuous through being executed by Rāma. See Introduction, "Controversial Episodes," pp. 104–13.

Following verse 4, Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D,S and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of twenty-one lines [App. I, No. 11]. Shah, in his introduction (1975, p. 27), rationalizes his relegation of this passage to an appendix, despite its all-but-universal textual support, on the grounds of its "narrative incongruity." Shah argues that the text has already made it clear, both in sarga 65 (7.65.26) and here at verse 5, that the very fact that Rāma has killed the offending śūdra is enough to restore the life of the brahman's child. Therefore, he argues, Rāma's request of a boon from the gods, which would have this same effect, is otiose. Nonetheless, despite this incongruity, the passage should have been included on the basis of its broad textual support and because this type of overdetermination is not uncommon in the epic. Moreover, the passage itself does serve to demonstrate the gods' gratitude to Rāma for his action as well as Rāma's selflessness in requesting that the boon be used for the sake of the brahman child. See, too, notes to verse 5 below, where 1127* has identical textual support and is also omitted from the critical text. Shah is silent on this passage, but one assumes he relegates it to the apparatus based on similar arguments. In light of this, we have, as elsewhere (see Introduction, "Text," pp. 216–18, 7.51-1*–7.51-7*, and notes), emended the text, reinserting Appendix I, No. 11, followed by 1127* into our translation.

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 1–2. "praised" praśaśaṃsuḥ: Literally, "they praised." V3,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous variant, te śaśaṃsuḥ, "they praised."

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 3–4. "And a great shower of flowers" puṣpavṛṣṭiś ca mahatī: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead puṣpavṛṣṭir mahaty āsīt, "There was a great shower of flowers."

"scattered by the wind" vāyumuktānam: Literally, "loosed by the wind."

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 5–6. "the gods . . . Rāma" devā rāmam: V1,2,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read rāmaṃ devāḥ by transposition.

"Wise and gentle Rāma" saumya . . . mahāmate: Literally, "O gentle one, O one of great intellect." D6,7,10,11,T4,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read deva, "king or god," for saumya, "gentle one."

"this deed on behalf of the gods" surakāryam idam: Literally, "this work or business of the gods."

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 7–8. "gentle Rāma" saumya: Literally, "O gentle [one]."

"whichever one" yam: D6 and KK and VSP read instead the neuter yat.

"because of you" tvatkṛte: Literally, "on your behalf or for your sake." Several of the commentators understand the term to refer to Rāma's interruption of the śūdra's ascetic practices (tvatkṛtataponivartanena—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly), while Cr glosses, "when the cutting off [of the head] had been done by you . . . (tvatkṛtakacchedane sati)." Cr further notes that the statement that Rāma's action was on behalf of the gods suggests that the carrying out of evil conduct is painful to the gods (etena duṣṭācaraṇapravṛttau devānāṃ duḥkhaṃ bhavatīti sūcitam).

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 9–10. "with great concentration . . . Rāghava" rāghavaḥ susamāhitaḥ: Literally, "fully focused Rāghava." D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rāmaḥ satyaparākramaḥ, "truly valorous Rāma."

"to thousand-eyed Indra, smasher of citadels" sahasrākṣaṃ puraṃdaram: Literally, "to the thousand-eyed smasher of citadels."

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 11–12. "the son of the twice-born brahman" dvijaputraḥ: Literally, "the son of the twice-born [one]."

"this boon" varam etat: D6,10,11,M1,2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the masculine accusative etam.

"my most cherished desire" īpsitaṃ paramaṃ mama: Literally, "the greatest desired [object] of mine."

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 13–14. "this child" bālo 'sau: KK and VSP read instead yāto 'sau, "he departed or passed away."

"was led by Kāla to the abode of Vaivasvata" kālena nīto vaivasvatakṣayam: The term kāla, "time," is used in the epic both for the god of death, Yama, who is also known as Vaivasvata, and for death itself, sometimes personified as Yama's agent. Here we understand with Cr, who glosses kāla in the sense of "death" (kālena mṛtyunā).

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 15–16. "I promised that twice-born brahman this" dvijasya saṃśruto 'rtho me: Literally, "by me [lit., 'of me'] this matter was promised to the twice-born [one]." Technically, there is no indication earlier in the text of such a promise on Rāma's part, although at 7.65.25–26 Nārada promises Rāma that the child will be restored to life if he does what is necessary with regard to the transgressor.

"I will restore your son to life" jīvayiṣyāmi te sutam: Literally, "I will cause your son to live."

"You ought not prove me false." nānṛtaṃ kartum arhatha: We follow Cr in understanding anṛtam, "false," as an adjective modifying an unexpressed pronoun mām, "me" (mām anṛtaṃ kartuṃ nārhatha).

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 17–18. "the foremost among the wise gods" vibudhasattamāḥ: Literally, "the foremost among the wise [ones]." The term vibudha, "wise one," is a common kenning for the gods.

"they were delighted with an abundance of delight, and they replied to that great hero" pratyūcus taṃ mahātmānaṃ prītāḥ prītisamādhinā: Literally, "They replied to that great one, being delighted with an aggregate of delight." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pratyūcū rāghavaṃ prītā devāḥ prītisamanvitam, "delighted, those gods replied to Rāghava, who was filled with delight."

*Appendix I, No. 11, lines 19–20. "Rest assured" nirvṛto bhava: Literally, "Be happy."

"this very day" asminn ahani: Literally, "on this day." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the child was restored to life even without the boon that the gods have offered Rāma at line 7 and which Rāma requests at lines 11–16 (asminn ahani śūdraśiraśchedadivase vināpi varaṃ jīvitaṃ prāptavān ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

"surrounded by his kinsmen" sametaś cāpi bandhubhiḥ: Literally, "and is joined by [his] kinsmen."

*Appendix I, No. 11, line 21–5ab. "At the very moment" yasmin muhūrte . . . tasmin muhūrte: Literally, "at which moment . . . at that moment." The sequence of the relative and correlative clauses further suggests that the excision of the appendix passage was a poor editorial choice.

"the child was restored to life" bālo 'sau jīvena samayujyata: Literally, "the child was joined with life."

Following verse 5, Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D,S insert a passage of fifteen lines [1127*]. See notes to verse 4 above for a discussion of the passage's relegation to the critical apparatus and for our decision to restore it to our translation of the critical text.

1127*, lines 1–2. "We have accomplished our purpose" sādhayāma: Literally, "We must be successful." D6,7,10,11,T1,M2,4,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sādhu yāma, "Very well, we must go or we must go straightaway." Ck, Cg, and Ct all note that we should take the form yāma as a loṭ; Cg specifies that it is a first person plural (yāmeti loḍuttamabahuvacanam—so Cg).

"We shall visit . . . illustrious prince" drakṣyāmas tan mahāyaśaḥ: Literally, "we shall see that, O one of great fame." Ñ2,V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead draṣṭum icchāma rāghava, "we would wish to see, O Rāghava."

1127*, lines 3–4. "The religious observances" dīkṣā: The term dīkṣā refers either to the period of consecration of one performing sacrifice or other religious observations or to those observations themselves.

"immensely illustrious" sumahādyuteḥ: D6,10,11,G2,M4, and GPP and NSP read instead the vocative, sumahādyute, "O immensely illustrious one," which would then refer to Rāma.

"while he was practicing devotions under water" jalaśayyām upāsataḥ: Literally, "of him who has been practicing 'lying in the water.' " D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nearly synonymous jalaśayyāṃ samāsataḥ.

1127*, lines 5–6. "to pay our respects to the sage" muniṃ tam abhivāditum: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead muniṃ samabhinanditum, "to congratulate or celebrate the sage."

"you, too, should go" cāpi gaccha: Literally, "And you, too, must go." T4,G2,M1, and KK and VSP read instead cāpy āgaccha, "And you, too, must come."

1127*, lines 9–10. "of the pot-born sage Agastya" kumbhayoneḥ: Literally, "of the one whose womb or origin was a pot." See notes to 7.2.1, 7.69.22, and 7.73.2. See, too, notes to verse 8 below.

1127*, lines 11–12. "without distinction" aviśeṣataḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "impartially (apakṣapātataḥ)."

1127*, lines 13–14. "had reverenced . . . in return" saṃpūjya: Literally, "having honored or worshiped."

"the thirty gods" tridaśāḥ: Literally, "the thirty."

"to the highest heaven" nākaprṣṭham: Literally, "to the top or surface of heaven or the sky."

1127*, line 15–1128*. "Once they had gone, Kākutstha descended from the Puṣpaka and then respectfully greeted Agastya, foremost of seers." gateṣu teṣu kākutsthaḥ puṣpakād avarūhya ca [= 1127*15] / tato 'bhivādayāmāsa agastyam ṛṣisattamam [1128*] //.

"When they had gone, Kākutstha, having descended from the Puṣpaka, then respectfully greeted Agastya, foremost of seers."

We have restored what must be the correct second half of the verse that begins with 1127*, line 15, that is to say, 1128*. This line, like Appendix I, No. 11 and 1127*, has all-but-universal attestation as do those passages (see notes to verses 4 and 5 above).

6. [elided] In keeping with his excision of passages, described above, Shah has substituted for 1127* and 1128* an extremely poorly attested verse, apparently known only to B1, which he admits as his verse 6:

> Then, when lotus-eyed Rāma had reached Agastya's ashram, he bowed to him humbly and, delighted, rejoiced.
>
> tato 'gastyāśramapadaṃ rāmaḥ kamalalocanaḥ /
> sa gatvā vinayenaiva taṃ natvā mumude sukhī // = 7.67.6

Shah provides no critical apparatus for verse 6 other than to note: "For 6, Ś Ñ V B2–4 D S subs. 1128*."

7. "that great sage" mahātmānam: Literally, "that great [one]."

8. "The pot-born sage" kumbhayoniḥ: Literally, "the one whose womb or origin was a pot." See notes to 1127*9–10, following verse 5 above.

"of great austerities" mahātapāḥ: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

9. "your majesty, you dwell in my heart" rājan hṛdi sthitaḥ: Literally, "O king, [you] stand in [my] heart." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,3,5,8,9,12,T3,M3,6, and Lahore, Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead nityaṃ hṛdi sthitaḥ, "you always dwell in my heart." The commentators understand the phrase in a theological sense. Ck understands, "Because you are the incarnate form of the divine power of Brahmā or Brahman, your memory always resides in me (brahmavibhūtimūrtitvāt tvatsmaraṇaṃ mama sadāvartata ity arthaḥ)." Cg glosses, "You are always lodged in my heart because of your being the supreme Brahman (parabrahmabhūtatvān mama hṛdaye sadā sthita ity arthaḥ)." Ct offers: "The real meaning is that [Rāma is lodged in the sage's heart] because he is the true form of the innermost spirit. Therefore he is lodged in the heart because of his being constantly the object of recollection, and therefore he is to be worshiped because he is the object of meditation. Or 'he is lodged in the heart' means that he [Rāma] is [Agastya's] own inherent nature (i.e., as Brahman). (mama hṛdi sthita iti. antaryāmisvarūpatvād iti bhāvaḥ. ata eva sadā smaraṇaviṣayatayāpi hṛdi sthitaḥ. ato dhyeyatvāc ca tvaṃ pūjyaḥ. yadvā hṛdi sthitaḥ. tena svasvarūpatvam apy uktam.)"

10. "For the gods had informed me" surā hi kathayanti: Literally, "For the gods tell."

"you had come to kill that śūdra" tvām āgataṃ śūdraghātinam: Literally, "you, the killer of a śūdra, had come."

"you" tvayā: Literally, "by you." Cg notes that some scholars regard the -yā as the twenty-third syllable of the Gāyatrīmantra (atra tvayety atra yā iti [yeti] gāyatryakṣaraṃ trayoviṃśam [caturviṃśam—so VSP] ity āhuḥ). For a discussion of the Gāyatrīmantra in the Rāmāyaṇa, see notes to 7.1.1 and Introduction, "Gāyatrīmantra," pp. 187–98.

11. "with me" sakāśe mama: Literally, "in my presence or vicinity."

"you will go . . . to your own city" tvaṃ gantā svapuram eva hi: Literally, "indeed you will go straight to your city." B4,T1,2,G1,3,M1,3, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead tvaṃ gantāsi puram [punar—G1,M1,Gorresio] eva hi, "You will go straight to the city [again—G1,M1,Gorresio]."

Following 11ab, B2,D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press insert, while Ñ2,V2,D7 insert following verse 10, and KK and VSP insert following verse 11, a passage of two lines [1131*]: "For you are majestic Nārāyaṇa[1] and all things are established in you. You are the Lord of all beings;[2] you are the eternal Puruṣa.[3] (tvaṃ hi nārāyaṇaḥ śrīmāṃs tvayi sarvaṃ pratiṣṭhitam / tvaṃ prabhuḥ sarvabhūtānāṃ puruṣas tvaṃ sanātanaḥ //)"

[1] "Nārāyaṇa" nārāyaṇaḥ: Ct and Cr offer etymological explanations of the name. Ct, in a variation of his gloss of the name at 6.105.12 (see notes), understands it to mean "the abode of all living things (nārāyaṇo nārasya jīvasamūhasya sthānam)." Cr glosses, "he who proceeds only in accordance with right conduct (nārāyaṇo nāreṇa nītyaiva ayate gacchati)." Perhaps Cr is seeking additional justification for Rāma's killing of Śambūka.

[2] "of all beings" sarvabhūtānām: V2 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sarvadevānām, "of all the gods."

[3] "the eternal Puruṣa" puruṣas tvaṃ sanātanaḥ: Ct glosses, "Brahma (brahma)."

12. "favor me" matpriyaṃ kuru: Literally, "you must do a favor for me." The commentators are at pains to explain why Rāma's acceptance of a gift from Agastya represents a particular favor to the latter. Ct raises the possible objection that it is improper for a kshatriya to accept anything from a brahman, but explains: "[He, Agastya, would argue]: 'Since you [Rāma] are the king, it would be improper for me to approach you empty handed, and, therefore, accepting my gift, even though it is inappropriate, would be a favor to me, while you would incur no fault." Ct then states that the intention here is that there is no fault, just as in the case of accepting a gift from one's devotee or accepting a sacrificial oblation. (nanu kṣatriyasya brāhmaṇād dravyagrahaṇam anucitaṃ tatrāha matpriyaṃ kurv iti. matpriyārtham anucitam api kāryam ity āśayaḥ. kiṃ ca rājatvād riktahastatayā tvaddarśanasya mamānucitatayaitad grahaṇe mama priyaṃ bhavati. tava ca doṣo nāsti. bhaktadattāṅgīkāra iva haviṣo 'ṅgīkāra iva ca doṣābhāvāc cetyāśayaḥ.) See Appendix I, No. 12, following notes to verse 14 below, where Rāma himself raises this objection. Compare, too, 7.90.1–3 and notes and 2.110.20 and notes.

"ornament" ābharaṇam: Both Ct and Cr believe the ornament to be a bracelet or armlet (valayarūpam).

"It is celestial with its celestial beauty" divyaṃ divyena vapuṣā (= 7.88.12c): Ct understands the term vapuṣā here to mean "form or fabrication (saṃniveśeṇa)." Cr attempts to flesh out the syntax by adding the adjective "characterized by (upalakṣitaḥ)."

13. "For it is said that the giving away of something that has been given brings great benefits." dattasya hi punardānaṃ sumahat phalam ucyate: Literally, "for the regifting of something given is said to be a very great fruit." Ś,Ñ2,V2,3,B1,2,D6,7,10–12, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read -dāne, "in the giving," for -dānam, which lends the phrase the sense "in giving away there is very great fruit or benefit." The commentators are still concerned about the propriety of the gift and introduce several arguments as to why it is both proper and beneficial. Ct observes that there is great benefit in giving to one's chosen divinity, etc., a gift that was given to one by anybody, provided that one has not used it. He further cites a smṛti passage (ViṣṇuDhaP 3.287.8) to the effect that the receipt [of such a gift] is eight times as meritorious [as giving it]. In this way Ct understands that Agastya's intention is to say that since the gift will be the cause of such a great result, it is a favor for him to give it to Rāma. (yena kenāpi dattasyānupabhujya punaḥ sveṣṭadevādibhyo dāne mahat phalam ucyate. labdhāv aṣṭaguṇaṃ puṇyam iti smaraṇāt. evaṃ ca mahāphalahetutvāt tubhyaṃ taddānaṃ mama priyam iti bhāvaḥ.) Cr similarly notes that there is an extremely great efficacy in the giving away of an article that has been first given, that is to say, offered wholeheartedly. (dattasya manasā samarpitasya vastunaḥ punardāne mahat phalam atyarthaniṣpattir ucyate.) Ck and Cg understand similarly; however, both specify that the article to be regifted should be an excellent one (uttamavastunaḥ).

"bull among men" nararṣabha: Ñ,V,B1–3,D6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead narādhipa, "overlord of men."

Following 13ab, Ś,V2,3,B,D6–8,10–12,S insert a passage of one line [1133*]: "For you, sir, are capable of protecting it and even of protecting the Maruts together with Indra[1] (bharaṇe hi bhavāñ śaktaḥ sendrāṇāṃ marutām api)."

[1] "For you, sir, are capable of protecting it and even of protecting the Maruts together with Indra." bharaṇe he bhavañ śaktaḥ sendrāṇāṃ marutām api: Literally, "For you, sir, are capable with respect to the bearing of even the Maruts together with Indra." The elliptical construction is awkward. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read phalānāṃ mahatām api for sendrāṇāṃ marutām api, lending the line the sense "For you, sir, are able to support [it] and even [its] great benefits." Cg notes this reading as a variant. We follow Cg, who understands bharaṇe in the sense of "in protecting (rakṣaṇe)" and takes the term marutām by synecdoche to refer to the gods in general. He then understands that by the use of the particle api Agastya is saying, "How much more would Rāma be able to protect this [i.e., the ornament]." (marutāṃ devānām api. bharaṇe rakṣaṇe. apiśabdāt kimutaitad bharaṇa ity arthaḥ.) Ct, who reads the variant, understands the phrase to mean "You alone are capable, that is to say, are worthy, to wear the ornament. Moreover, to the phrase 'of great benefits (mahatām api phalānām),' one should add the words 'You are capable of [lit., 'in'] the giving [of great benefits], such as the brahmaloka.' (ābharaṇasya dhāraṇe bhavān eva śakto yogyaḥ. kiṃ ca mahatām api phalānāṃ brahmalokādīnāṃ dāne ca tvaṃ śakta iti śeṣaḥ.)" Ck only specifies that the referent is the ornament (ābharaṇasya bharaṇa ity arthaḥ). Cr, who also reads the variant, interprets only, "You alone are capable of granting great, that is, extraordinary, benefits (mahatām atyutkṛṣṭāṇāṃ phalānāṃ bharaṇe dhāraṇe dāna ity artho bhavān eva śaktaḥ)."

Following 1133*, V2,B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ñ,V1,D1–5,9 insert following 13ab, a passage of one line [1134*]: "For you are able to save even the heaven-dwelling gods, including Indra[1] (tvaṃ hi śaktas tārayituṃ sendrān api divaukasaḥ)."

[1] "For you are able to save even the heaven-dwelling gods, including Indra." tvaṃ hi śaktas tārayituṃ sendrān api divaukasaḥ: Literally, "For you are able to save even the those whose dwelling is heaven, including Indra." Ct understands the line to be uttered in response to a possible objection on Rāma's part to the effect that Agastya should give the gift to those greater than he, that is, to Indra, etc. The real meaning of the verse is then, according to Ct, that there are no beings greater than Rāma. (nanu matto 'pi mahadbhya indrādibhyo dīyatāṃ tatrāha tvaṃ hīti. te tvatto na mahānta iti bhāvaḥ.) Cr understands the potential objection to be that it is the gods who are well known for providing beneficial results. Therefore, according to Cr, the verse specifies that Rāma is able to save even those gods, including Indra, that is to say, that he alone is capable of causing them to attain his own world. Cr concludes that what is suggested here is Agastya's desire to attain Sāketa (i.e., Rāma's heavenly abode). (nanu phaladāyakatvena devāḥ prasiddhā ity ata āha sendrān divaukaso 'pi tārayituṃ svalokaṃ prāpayituṃ tvam eva samartha etenāgastyasya sāketaprāptīcchā sūcitā.)

Following verse 13, Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–7,9–12,T1,3,G,M1,2,4–10, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert Appendix I, No. 12. For a translation of Appendix I, No. 12, and a more detailed account of the textual evidence concerning this passage, see notes to verse 14 below. Given the strong textual support, the passage's omission from the critical edition is questionable.

14. "And Rāma accepted the great sage's splendid and celestial ornament, which resembled the blazing sun." tad rāmaḥ pratijagrāha munes tasya mahātmanaḥ [14ab] / divyam ābharaṇaṃ citraṃ pradīptam iva bhāskaram [14cd] //: KK and VSP invert 14ab (= 7.76.47cd) and 14cd (= 7.76.32ef) but insert between them Appendix I, No. 12 (twenty-six lines = 7.76.33–46). GPP reads 14cd (divyam first time) in brackets, unnumbered, following 13cd. Following 7.67.14cd (divyam), GPP reads Appendix I, No. 12, line 1 (athovāca = GPP 7.67.33cd), which is then followed by Appendix I, No. 12, lines 2–26, which GPP places in brackets, unnumbered, between its 7.76.33–34. GPP then reads 14ab (tad rāmaḥ) and 14cd (divyam second time) in brackets, unnumbered, followed by 15ab, in brackets, unnumbered. GPP then reads 15ab (pratigṛhya) in brackets, unnumbered. Gita Press reads following 13cd (tasmād = 7.76.33ab), Appendix I, No. 12 (= 7.76.33cd–46ab), followed by 14cd (= 7.76.47ab), followed by 15ab (= 7.76.47cd). Lahore reads its version of Appendix I, No. 12, as its verse 7.79.13–26, following verse 13cd (= 7.79.12cd), followed by the critical edition's verse 14ab (= 24ab). Gorresio similarly reads the appendix as his verses 7.83.13–27ab. Of the translations consulted that follow the text of Ct, Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 594) and Benoît (1999, p. 1384) omit the passage, while Shastri (1959, vol. 3, pp. 585–86) includes the passage with a note following his rendition of critical verse 13 (= GPP 7.76.33ab) and comments, "Note: the following fourteen verses are considered to be interpolations." Please see above table for a concordance of the various editions consulted.

Appendix I, No. 12.

"Then great-armed[1] Rāma, the great chariot-warrior of the Ikṣvākus, foremost among the wise, recalling the code of the kshatriyas, said:[1–2] 'Surely the acceptance of a gift,[2] blessed one, is not condemned in the case of a brahman. But how, brahman, can a knowledgeable kshatriya accept anything?[3][3–4] And, lord of brahmans, acceptance of a gift on the part of kshatriyas is highly censured,[4] especially in the case of something given by a brahman.'[5–6] Addressed in this fashion by Rāma, the great seer replied: 'In ancient times, that is, in the Kṛta Yuga,[5] Rāma, when brahmans were preeminent,[6] all peoples were without kings, while Indra of the hundred sacrifices was the king of the gods.[7][7–9] And so the people ran all together to the Lord of the god among gods[8] for the sake of [getting] a king, [saying]:[10] "You established Indra of the hundred sacrifices as king of the gods, O God. Please grant us[9] a bull among men as our king, O Lord of the worlds, offering worship to whom[10] we shall live, cleansed of our sin. We will not live without a king. This is our firm resolve.[11]"[11–14] Then Brahmā, foremost among the gods, summoned the world guardians, including Vāsava, and told them all: "You must give up portions of your blazing energy.[12]"[15–16] Then the world guardians gave up one quarter[13] of their own blazing energy. And then Brahmā sneezed, from which was born King Kṣupa.[14][17–18] Brahmā imbued him with those portions[15] of the world guardians, and he gave Kṣupa to the people to be their king and lord.[19–20] Through his portion derived from Indra,[16] he ruled the earth, while through the portion derived from Varuṇa, the king nourished the people's bodies.[17][21–22] Then, through the portion derived from Kubera, he gave them wealth.[18] And with the portion that was derived from Yama he disciplined the people.[23–24] Therefore, for the sake of my salvation, delight of the Raghus and best of men, please accept this ornament[19] with your portion derived from Indra,[20] O lord.[25–26]' "

[1] "great-armed" mahābāhuḥ: D10,11, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahātmānam, "the great [one]," which then refers not to Rāma but to Agastya, lending the line the sense "Rāma . . . said to the great [sage]."

[2] "Surely the acceptance of a gift" pratigraho vai: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pratigraho 'yam, "this acceptance of a gift."

[3] "But how, brahman, can a knowledgeable kshatriya accept anything?" kṣatriyeṇa kathaṃ vipra pratigrāhyaṃ vijānatā: Literally, "How, O brahman, is it to be accepted by a kṣatriya who knows?" D6,7,10,11, and GPP and Gita Press read bhavet tataḥ for vijānatā, lending the line the sense "How, O brahman, might there be acceptance from him or because of that by a kshatriya?" This line and the next are in KK (= 7.76.34cd–35ab) and omitted in VSP.

[4] "And, lord of brahmans, acceptance of a gift on the part of kshatriyas is highly censured" pratigraho hi viprendra kṣatriyāṇāṃ sugarhitaḥ: This line is in KK, while VSP omits the line.

Following line 5, KK and VSP (following line 3 due to omission) insert a passage of one line [App. I, No. 12, 1*]: "I am a kshatriya, bull among brahmans, how then can I accept [anything] (gṛhṇīyāṃ kṣatriyo 'haṃ vai kathaṃ brāhmaṇapuṃgava /)?"

[5] "In ancient times, that is, in the Kṛta Yuga" kṛtayuge . . . purā yuge: Literally, "in the Kṛta Yuga . . . long ago in a yuga."

[6] "when brahmans were preeminent" brahmabhūte: Literally, "which consisted of brahmans." See 7.65.10 and notes, where the compound is also found. In their comments to that passage, Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "in which the brahman class was foremost (brahmavarṇapradhāne)." Cr understands similarly. Here, only Cs comments on the term, glossing, "filled with brahmans or abundant with brahmans (brahmapracūre)."

[7] "while Indra of the hundred sacrifices was the king of the gods" surāṇāṃ śatakratuḥ: Literally, "he of the hundred sacrifices of the gods." We follow Cs in understanding the elliptical reference to be to Indra's kingship of the gods, for they alone had such governance. (surāṇāṃ tanmātrasya. śatakratū rājāsīt.)

[8] "to the Lord of the god among gods" devadeveśam: Literally, "the Lord of the god of gods." Cs glosses, "to Brahmā (brahmānam)."

[9] "Please grant us" prayacchāsmāsu: KK and VSP read instead prayaccha no hi, "Indeed, please grant us."

[10] "offering worship to whom" yasmai pūjāṃ prayuñjānāḥ: Literally, "practicing worship to whom." KK and VSP read tasmai, "to him," for yasmai, "to whom." Cs quotes the dictum that every king is in fact Viṣṇu (nāviṣṇuḥ pṛthivīpatiḥ)."

[11] "This is our firm resolve." eṣa no niścayaḥ paraḥ: Literally, "this is our highest resolve."

Following line 14, KK (7.76.41ab) and VSP (7.76.40ab) insert a passage of one line [App. I, No. 12, 4*]: "Having heard the speech of the people and having made a resolution on this important matter . . . (prajānāṃ vacanaṃ śrutvā niścayitvārtham uttamam /)."

[12] "portions of your blazing energy" tejobhāgān: Cs explains, "the portions for producing the form of the king (nṛparūpasaṃpādane bhāgān aṃśān)."

[13] "one quarter" caturbhāgam: Literally, "one-fourth portion." D6,7,10,11, and GPP and Gita Press read instead sarve bhāgān, lending the line the sense "Then all the world guardians gave up portions of their own blazing energy."

[14] "And then Brahmā sneezed, from which was born King Kṣupa." akṣupac ca tato brahmā yato jātaḥ kṣupo nṛpaḥ: It is clear that it is Brahmā's action that provides the basis for the new king's name. What is not clear, however, is exactly what that action is. The root √kṣup normally means "to be depressed or afraid," but this seems entirely unsuitable to the context. Only Gorresio (1870, p. 243) understands the verb in this sense, rendering, "Venne in quella meno d'animo (aksupat) il Deva Brahma: ond' ebbe origine il re per nome Ksupa." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 576) renders, "Brahmā then shook his body, and the King Kshupa was born." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 586) ignores the verb entirely but notes that the name Kṣupa means "a shrub or small tree with roots," referring to the standard lexical meaning of the noun. For want of a better alternative, we follow Cs, the only commentator to remark on this passage, who glosses the verb as "he made a sneeze (kṣutaṃ kṛtavān)," choosing the onomatopoetic noun kṣut, "sneeze," which at least sounds something like √kṣup and is more or less reasonable contextually. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 886) evidently also follows Cs, offering, "Then Brahmā sneezed, whence was born king Kṣupa." Dutt (1894, p. 1795), perhaps influenced by Cs idiosyncratically, translates, "Thereupon Brahmā made a Khshupa, or sound, and therefrom originated a king under the name of Khshupa."

[15] "imbued him with those portions" tam . . . sahāṃśaiḥ samayojayat: Literally, "he caused him to be joined together with the portions." Ñ,B1,D2,3,5–7,9,10, and GPP and Gita Press read the more or less synonymous samāṃśaiḥ for sahāṃśaiḥ.

[16] "Through the portion derived from Indra" indreṇa tu bhāgena: Literally, "with the portion that is Indra." Ś1,2,Ñ,V,B2,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all read the expected taddhita derivative aindreṇa, "belonging to Indra." Ñ2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the more or less synonymous ca for tu. See note 20 below.

[17] "the king nourished the people's bodies" vapuḥ puṣyati pārthivaḥ: Literally, "the king nourished the body." Cs glosses the causative poṣayati, "he causes to be nourished," to indicate that the normally intransitive verb √puṣ "is nourished," is to be understood transitively. Ś,D8,12, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read the vocative rāghava, "O Rāghava," for the nominative singular pārthivaḥ, "the king." The translators are divided as to whether the king is nourishing the bodies of his people or his own body. The former position is held by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 576) and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 886). The latter is adopted by Gorresio (1870, p. 244), Dutt (1894, p. 1795), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 586). We prefer the former alternative, as it is in consonance with the other activities ascribed to the king, all of which are directed toward his subjects.

[18] "he gave them wealth" vittam āsāṃ dadau: Cs glosses the genitive āsām, "of them," with the dative "to the people (prajābhyaḥ). GPP and Gita Press read, while KK (1913, p. 208, note 2) notes, as a variant, vittapābham for vittam āsām. This lends the phrase the sense "He gave them the splendor or likeness of the protector of wealth (i.e., Kubera)."

[19] "this ornament" ābharaṇam: D10,11, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the formulaic bhadraṃ te, "blessings to you," which is frequently found in the epic in conjunction with a polite imperative. See 7.66.17 and Tubb 2006.

[20] "with your portion derived from Indra" tadendreṇa . . . bhāgena: Ñ,B1,2,D5,6, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tadaindreṇa or tadaiṃdreṇa for tadendreṇa. See note 16 above. Cs explains the lines as follows: "What is suggested by the phrase 'with the portion derived from Indra (aindreṇa bhāgena)' is that it is just as appropriate for Rāma to accept [Agastya's gift] as it is for one in the position of the lord of gods to accept sacrificial oblations, etc." The principal purpose, Cs continues, is for the sake of [Agastya's] salvation. (aindreṇa bhāgena. devatādhipatitvenāhutyādivad evaitadgrahaṇayogyatvam anena sūcayati. mukhyaṃ nimittam āha—tāraṇārtham iti.)

15. "Once Rāma had accepted that unsurpassed ornament" pratigṛhya tato rāmas tad ābharaṇam uttamam: The line marks the end of the unnumbered, bracketed passage in GPP.

"he began to ask the sage how the celestial jewel had come to be his" āgamaṃ tasya divyasya praṣṭum evopacakrame: Literally, "he began to ask about the arrival of that celestial [thing]." D6,7,10,11,M4, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP all read dīptasya, "blazing," for divyasya, "celestial." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss "the path of acquisition (prāptimārgaḥ)" for "arrival (āgamam)."

16. "How and from where . . . And who" kathaṃ . . . vā kuto vā kena vā: Ct and Cr understand the first term to mean "by what means," the second "for what reason," and the third "by what person" was [the ornament] brought, that is to say, given (kathaṃ kena prakāreṇa kuto hetoḥ kena puruṣeṇāhṛtaṃ dattam—so Ct; Cr similarly). Ck is similar but only remarks on the terms kena and hṛtam (kuto vā kena vā puruṣeṇa hṛtaṃ dattam). Cg understands somewhat differently. He takes kutaḥ to mean "for what reason," while kena refers to the person who brought, that is, gave [the ornament]. (kuto vā kena vā nimittena kena vā puruṣeṇa vā hṛtam upahṛtam. dattam iti yāvat.)

"brahman" brahman: D6,7,10,11,T4,M6–8, and GPP, Gita Press, KK (1913), and VSP read instead divyam, "celestial," which would the modify "this [thing] (idam)." KK (1905 only) reads divya[vapuṣā], "with celestial [beauty]."

"did the blessed one acquire" bhagavatā prāptam: Literally, "[How] was it acquired by the blessed one?" D3,6,7,10,11, and GPP and Gita Press read instead [kathaṃ] vā bhavatā prāptam, "Or [how] was it acquired by you, sir?"

"splendid" uttamam: Literally, "best." D6,7,10,11,T1,4,G3,M1,3, and GPP and Gita Press read instead the redundant adbhutam, "marvelous."

"so filled with beauty" vapuṣā yuktam: As at verse 12 above, Ct understands vapuḥ here in its sense of "form or fabrication." He explains the line as meaning "Endowed with a special fabrication such that it is marvelous (adbhutaṃ yathā bhavati tathā vapuṣā saṃniveśaviśeṣeṇa yuktam)." Cr understands similarly.

17. "out of curiosity" kutūhalatayā: Literally, "through the state of curiosity." Ñ2,V2, B1,D2,6–8,10,11,T2–4,G1,M1,2,6, and GPP and Gita Press read instead the synonymous kautūhalatayā.

18. "long ago in a bygone Tretā Yuga" purā tretāyuge gate: Literally, "long ago in the Tretā Yuga that is gone." This reading of the phrase would be in keeping with the purāṇic tradition, which holds that the events of the Rāmāyaṇa took place in the Tretā Yuga. Thus, one can understand that Agastya is referring to an earlier Tretā Yuga, one of the four cosmic eras that repeat themselves endlessly. V2,D1,10,T1,2,G3,M1–9, and Gorresio, GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yuge for gate, giving the phrase the sense "long ago in the age known as the Tretā Yuga." See note to verse 14 above and also Appendix I, No. 12, line 8 and note 5. Cf. 7.65.11–12 and notes. Ck and Cg understand that the reference is to an age known as the Tretā Yuga (tretāyuge tretāyugākhye yuge—so Ck; Cg similarly). Ct explicitly understands the variant reading to refer to a previous yuga that was known as the Tretā Yuga (pūrvatanatretāyugākhye yuge). Cr reads the phrase as tretāyuge + ayuge, yielding the sense "in a Tretā Yuga that was different [from this] yuga (ayuge yugavilakṣaṇe tretāyuge)." See 7.68.1 and notes. One must understand that the commentators are writing in a period when the standard mapping of the Vaiṣṇava avatāras onto the system of the four yugas had long been established. On the somewhat confused and confusing issue of how the Uttarakāṇḍa understands the relationship of the events of the Rāmāyaṇa to the yugas, see the notes to 7.65.1–20.

Following verse 18, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,7,9,12,T3,M3, and KK and VSP insert, while Ñ2, V2,B insert line 1 only, and T2 inserts following 7.68.5ab, a passage of two lines [1135*]: "When the Dvāpara Yuga had begun,[1] [listen to] the wonderful thing I saw in the forest with specific reference to this gift, extremely great-armed one[2] (dvāpare samanuprāpte vane yad dṛṣṭavān aham / āścaryaṃ sumahābāho dānam āśritya kevalam /)."

[1] "When the Dvāpara Yuga had begun" dvāpare samanuprāpte: Literally, "When the Dvāpara had begun." It appears that the author of this verse understood the phrase tretāyuge gate in verse 18 as a locative absolute in the sense of "when the Tretā Yuga had passed." This, however, is not consistent with what follows in sarga 68, where the events described take place in a Tretā Yuga (7.68.1). M3 and KK and VSP read instead ramaṇīyapradeśe 'smin, "in this charming region." This verse is translated only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 577).

[2] "extremely great-armed one" sumahābāho: M3 and KK and VSP read instead me mahābāho, lending the last line the sense "the wonderful thing . . . with specific reference to my gift, great-armed one."

1. The story of Śveta is found at Padmapurāṇa (ĀnSS) 5(Sṛṣṭikhaṇḍa).33.60–132, with a preliminary history given at (ĀnSS) 5(Sṛṣṭikhaṇḍa).32.102–191, through a conversation between Śveta and Vasiṣṭha.

"in that Tretā Yuga" tretāyuge: Literally, "in the Tretā Yuga." The reference is to the Tretā Yuga mentioned by Agastya at the end of the preceding sarga (7.67.18). Here again, as in the case of Nārada's account in sarga 65, it is not perfectly clear whether Agastya is referring to a previous yuga of the current mahāyuga, or cycle of four cosmic eras, or to the Tretā Yuga of a previous cycle. For discussion of the Uttarakāṇḍa's understanding of the relationship of the Rāmāyaṇa and the Tretā Yuga, see notes to 7.65.11–20 and 7.67.18.

The syllables tretā- are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The only variant noted is found in Ś,D8,12,T3, which read instead kṛta-, lending the compound the sense "in the Kṛta Yuga." This variant is so poorly supported that one wonders why the critical editors marked their reading as uncertain. See notes to 7.67.18.

"there was a . . . forest tract" hy āsīd araṇyam: Literally, "there was a forest." Here we take hi as pleonastic. D6,7,10,11,S read rāma, "O Rāma," for hy āsīd, "there was." B1,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read babhūva, "there was," for araṇyam, "forest," while KK and VSP read instead hy araṇyam, "the forest," for araṇyam, "forest," a reading not noted in the critical apparatus. Thus the reading of GPP and Gita Press lacks a noun, which Ct and Cr supply (araṇyam iti śeṣaḥ), while the reading of KK and VSP lacks a verb, which Ck and Cg supply (abhūd iti śeṣaḥ).

"a hundred leagues in every direction" samantād yojanaśatam: Literally, "on all sides a hundred yojanas." Various translators consulted understand the reference to be to different dimensions of the forest. Understanding as we do, Gorresio (1870, p. 244) renders, "distesa cento yoǵani per ogni lato," while Dutt (1894, p. 1796) offers, "extending on every side." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 595) has "de cent Yojana de rayon," while Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 586) translates, "some four hundred miles in extent." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 577) translates "with a radius of a hundred yojanas." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 886) renders, "extending to hundred yojanas," while Benoît (1999, p. 1384) translates, "sur une centaine de lieues."

"It was devoid of birds and beasts." nirmṛgaṃ pakṣivarjitam: Literally, "lacking deer [and] without birds." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous vimṛgam, "devoid of beasts or deer," for nirmṛgam. Compare 1137*, following notes to verse 4 below; see also verses 6.68.6; 6.69.8,16; and notes.

2. "As I was performing severe austerities in an uninhabited region of the forest, dear boy, I wandered about that forest in order to explore it." tasmin nirmānuṣe 'raṇye kurvāṇas tapa uttamam / aham ākramituṃ saumya tad araṇyam upāgamam //: Literally, "while performing supreme austerity in that forest devoid of men, I came to that forest, gentle one, to traverse [it]." The verse is awkward and repetitive. The commentators attempt to unpack its odd syntax by taking araṇye, "in the forest," in the sense of a particular spot in the forest (tadekadeśe—so Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr). They further understand the infinitive ākramitum, "to traverse or tread upon," in the sense of "wander all about," while Ck, Cg, and Ct additionally understand that the purpose of Agastya's wandering is to familiarize himself with the entire forest (tadaraṇyam ākramitum āsamantāt paryaṭanaṃ kṛtvā kārtsnyenāvagantum upāgamam upagatavān—so Ck; Cg and Ct similarly). The word nirmānuṣe, "devoid of men," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,V2,3,D3,5–7,10,11,T,G,M1,2,4,5,8,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tadāraṇyam, "then the forest," for tad araṇyam, "that forest." Given the manuscript evidence, the critical editors' choice of readings here is difficult to understand.

3. "I cannot describe" nirdeṣṭuṃ na śaśāka: The verbal form śaśāka is ambiguous, as it can be either first or third person perfect (liṭ). Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand it to be the first person, but only Ct alludes to the normal restriction of the perfect tense (liṭ) to actions not directly witnessed by the speaker. He understands the usage here to be irregular (aparokṣe liḍ ārṣaḥ). Cr avoids the issue by providing a third person subject, "no one" ([na śaśāka] kaścid apīti śeṣaḥ). See notes to verse 7 below and also 7.69.12 and 7.69.24.

"with . . . trees" pādapaiḥ: The reading is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. B1,D3,6,7,10,11,T1,2,4,G,M1,2,4–10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kānanaiḥ, "with groves."

"many different kinds" bahurūpaiḥ: Cs offers two glosses. His first, as in our understanding, is "of many forms or kinds," while the second is "made of gold." He justifies the second meaning by quoting the Kāṭhakabhāṣya, which gives "gold" as a synonym for the term bahurūpam. (bahurūpair anekākāraiḥ suvarṇamayair vā. bahurūpaṃ ca pūraṭam iti kāṭhakabhāṣyābhihitābhidhānāt.)

4. "a league across" yojanam āyatam: Literally, "extended for a yojana." See note to 7.72.14.

"covered with waterweeds" samatikrāntaśaivalam: Literally, "whose śaivala was overspread." The term śaivala is used to refer to duckweed (Blyxa octandra), which is generally regarded in Sanskrit poetry as a charming addition to bodies of water. Cr, the only commentator to gloss this compound, understands it to mean "free from śaivala (śaivalarahitam ity arthaḥ)." This interpretation has been followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1796), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 587), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 577), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 887). See, too, 6.46.26.

Following 4ab, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M2–5,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,9,T3,4,M1,6–8 substitute for 4cd, a passage of one line [1137*]: "It was thronged with haṃsas and kāraṇḍavas and beautified with cakravākas (haṃsakāraṇḍavākīrṇaṃ cakravākopaśobhitam /)."

It is hard to understand why this line, which appears in this position in virtually all manuscripts [except for D8] and in the printed editions consulted, should have been omitted from the critical text, while 4cd is apparently missing from Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,9,T3,4,M1,6–8 and yet included. Perhaps the editors found it to be a jarring contradiction to the information in verse 1, where the forest was said to be devoid of birds, although it does not appear to be a problem in verse 5 below. A similar passage is found at 7.31.18–19. See notes to these verses for identification of these birds.

5. "It was truly a wonder." tad āścāryam ivātyartham: Literally, "To a great degree that was like a wonder."

"its waters were pleasant to the taste" sukhāsvādam: Literally, "it [the lake] had a pleasant taste." Cr glosses, "which had a pleasant, that is to say, pleasurable, taste, that is to say, whose water was characterized by flavor (sukhaṃ sukhakaram āsvādam āsvādaviśiṣṭatoyaṃ yasya)." Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "possessed of food and drink that brought pleasure (sukhāvahaprāśanapānīyavad ity arthaḥ)."

"limpid" arajaskam: Literally, "without silt."

"calm, and" tathākṣobhyam: Literally, "and not to be agitated." Cr glosses, "impossible to agitate (saṃcālayitum aśakyam)." Several of the translators consulted understand the term to refer to the depth and/or calmness of the lake. Thus Dutt (1894, p. 1796) renders, "deep, calm," and, similarly, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 587) offers, "deep, tranquil," while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 577) translates, "and was of immense depth." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 595) understands as we do; others ignore the term. Ś1,V3,D6,7,10,11,M8,10, and GPP and NSP read instead tadākṣobhyam, "then, calm." M7 and Gita Press read tad akṣobhyam, "that calm [lake]."

"lovely" śrīmat: We take the term as an independent adjective referring to the lake itself. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 577) and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 887) understand the adjective to be in compound, reading śrīmatpakṣigaṇaiḥ, "with flocks of lovely birds or lovely flocks of birds."

6. "near that lake" tasmin saraḥsamīpe tu: Ñ,V1,2,B1,2,D1,3,4,9,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous samīpe tasya sarasaḥ.

7. "I . . . went down" upacakrame: Literally, "I approached." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all note the irregular use of the perfect (liṭ) for events witnessed by the speaker (aparokṣe 'pi liṭ ārṣaḥ—so Ck, Cg, and Cr; Ct similarly). See Ct's comments to verse 3 above. See, too, notes to 6.69.12 and 7.69.24. The commentators note that Agastya would have gone to the lake to perform his obligatory morning ablutions, etc. (prātaḥkartavyaṃ snānādi kartum iti śeṣaḥ—so Cr; Ck, Cg, and Ct similarly).

"rising early in the morning" prabhāte kālyam utthāya: Literally, "having arisen in the morning at daybreak or in a timely fashion."

8. "It . . . showed no signs of decay" ajaram: Literally, "undecaying or unaging." The term is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś1,V3,D7,10,11,M1,2,8,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead arajaḥ, "devoid of taint or dirt."

"Still exuding a splendid vital glow, it was lying" tiṣṭhantaṃ parayā lakṣmyā: Literally, "standing with extreme splendor or beauty." We understand the term lakṣṃī here, as we did elsewhere (see 6.36.34; 6.38.31; and notes), to refer to the vital glow that normally indicates the presence of life, even in the case of an unconscious or comatose person. Here, of course, the body in question is dead, but the description clearly indicates that it shows no outward signs of death or decay. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand, "endowed with a vital glow (lakṣmyopetam)."

Following 8ab, GPP (in brackets, unnumbered), KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1139*]: "Its limbs were plump from dining with peers,[1] and it was immersed in that splendid lake (pañktibhedena puṣṭāṅgaṃ samāśritasarovaram)."

[1] "from dining with peers" pañktibhedena: Literally, "through a type of segregated dining." The term pañktibheda is generally understood, at least in modernity, as the practice of dining communally, but exclusively with members of one's own class or caste. This term is most commonly used of brahmans. Perhaps the idea here is that since Śveta, despite his ascetic practice, was a king, he dined luxuriously with men of his class and thus became corpulent. The commentators are silent, and no translator consulted renders the line.

9. "I stood" viṣṭhitaḥ: T1,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead uṣitaḥ, "I dwelt or passed time."

10. "But . . . after some time" muhūrtāt tu: The phrase is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ś,Ñ2,V3,B,D8,12,T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead muhūrtena, "after a while."

"Yoked to haṃsas" haṃsayuktam: The Puṣpaka is also described as being yoked to haṃsas at 6.110.23 and 3571*, following notes to verse 6.115.30. Compare the description at 7.15.29–31 and notes; and at 293*, following notes to 7.15.30.

11. "attentively" atyartham: Literally, "excessively or to a very high degree." We read the term in its usual adverbial sense, despite its separation from the verb upāste, "[the thousand] attended." Ct, the only commentator to gloss this term, reads it adjectivally and elliptically to mean "[one thousand apsarases] possessed of extraordinary beauty (atirūpavantam)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 595) and Benoît (1999, p. 1385) follow Ct, both translating, "d'une beauté extraordinaire." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 587) follows Roussel, rendering, "of extraordinary beauty," while Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 578) understands, "extraordinarily beautiful." Gorresio (1870, p. 245) uniquely understands the term as an intensifier of the word svargiṇam, "heavenly," rendering the phrase atyarthaṃ svargiṇam as "un Essere al tutto celestiale." Dutt (1894, p. 1797) and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 887) apparently ignore the term.

"Some of them sang delightful songs" gānti geyāni ramyāṇi: Ñ2,V1,2,B2–4,T1,2,G2,M3, and KK and VSP read instead gāyanti divyageyāni, "they sang celestial songs," while D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read gāyanti kāścid ramyāṇi, "some sang charming [songs]."

Following verse 11, Ś,V3,D3,6–8,10–12,T,G,M1–6,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [1144*], while Ñ,V1,2,B,D1,2,4,5,9,M7 insert line 1 only: "[Some played] mṛdaṅgas, lutes, and paṇavas, while others danced[1] and still others constantly fanned his face—its eyes like lotus petals—with costly gold-handled yak-tail fly whisks[2] that shone like moonbeams.[3][1–3] Then, leaving[4] his lion throne as might the many-rayed sun the peak of Mount Meru . . . [4]"

[1] "mṛdaṅgas, lutes, and paṇavas, while others danced" mṛdaṅgavīṇāpaṇavān nṛtyanti ca tathā parāḥ [line 1]: Both paṇavas and mṛdaṅgas are types of drums; see notes to 5.8.39 and 6.34.12. G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead kṣvelayanti tathā cānyāḥ, "and others frolicked as well." All manuscripts read this line, and its exclusion from the critical edition is questionable.

[2] "with . . . costly gold-handled yak-tail fly whisks" hemadaṇḍair mahādhanaiḥ: Literally, "with costly gold-handled [things]." Ś,D3,8,12,T,1,4,G1,3,M3,5, and KK and VSP read ca [sa- Ś,D8,12] cāmaraiḥ, "and [with] yak-tail fly whisks," for mahādhanaiḥ, "costly." Cm and Ct supply the term "yak-tail fly whisks or chowries (cāmarair iti śeṣaḥ)," while Cv and Cr understand, "fans or whisks (vyajanaiḥ)." Compare 6.60.14 and 6.115.13–16 and notes, where it appears that golden handles were a standard element of the royal yak-tail fly whisks.

[3] "that shone like moonbeams" candraraśmyābhaiḥ: Cs notes that they (i.e., the fly whisks) were endowed with hair that resembled those (i.e., moonbeams) (tadābhakeśayuktaiḥ).

[4] "leaving" hitvā: Literally, "having left or abandoned." T1,2, and KK and VSP read instead tyaktvā, "having left or abandoned."

13. "Then" tataḥ: T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead tathā, "and or thus."

"duly and" ca suṣṭhu ca: Ñ2,D1–7,9–11,T2, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead supīvaram, "fatty or plump," which would then modify māṃsam, "flesh."

"to wash" saṃsprasṭum: As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr point out, the reference is to the purificatory rinsing of the mouth after eating (śuddhācamanaṃ kartum).

14. "bull among men" puruṣarṣabha: Ñ2,V2,B1,2,D6,7,10–12,M6,7,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead raghunandana, "O delight of the Raghus," while KK and VSP read raghupuṅgava, "O bull among the Raghus."

"that excellent and splendid flying palace" vimānavaram uttamam: Literally, "the excellent best of vimānas."

15. "that . . . I spoke words to him in this fashion, bull among men" tam . . . / athāham abruvaṃ vākyaṃ tam evaṃ puruṣarṣabha //: D6,7,10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tam eva, "to him directly," for tam evam, "to him in this fashion." Cs continues his rationalization of the pronouns, claiming that the syntax is "having watched him mounting, I spoke directly to him." (tam ārohantam udīkṣya tam evāham abravam ity anvayaḥ. atas tam iti ca nādhikam.) T1,2,G3, and KK and VSP read svargiṇam, "[to] the heavenly being," for tam evam, "[to] him in this fashion." KK (1913) and VSP silently correct the verbal form abruvam to abravam.

"godlike being . . . I" ahaṃ devasaṃkāśam . . . /. . . aham: The repetition of the pronoun aham in this awkward verse is noted by Cs, who attempts to explain it away. He takes the sequence ahaṃ devasaṃkāśam as a single word in which the compound ahaṃdeva- refers to Rudra. Thus he understands it to mean "resembled the god Aham, i.e., Rudra." (ahaṃdevasaṃkāśam iti padam ekam. ahaṃdevo rudraḥ. tatsaṃkāśam. tena nāhaṃ punaruktam.) Cg, on the other hand, justifies the repetition on the basis of there being two distinct actions of which the pronoun is the subject (aham ity asya kriyābhedād bhedaḥ).

16. "gentle sir" saumya: Literally, "O gentle [one]."

"this" ayam: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the neuter pronoun idam. Cs understands the neuter to refer to the body of the corpse (śavakalevaram).

"Please tell me." vaktum arhasi: Literally, "You should speak." Cr understands, "Please speak to what was asked (vaktum arhasi pṛṣṭam iti śeṣaḥ)."

17. "What an extraordinary thing—on the one hand, such a splendid being, virtually a god, and on the other this abominable food! Gentle friend, I wish to hear about this truthfully." āścaryam īdṛśo bhāvo bhāsvaro devasaṃmataḥ / āhāro garhitaḥ saumya śrotum icchāmi tattvataḥ //: Literally, "A wonderful thing! Such a splendid being considered as a god. Food that is abominable. Gentle one, I wish to hear truthfully." The syntax is scattered and highly elliptical. No edition or commentator reads with the critical edition, and we have fleshed it out with our best understanding of the intention. The word saṃmataḥ, "considered," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read for verse 17 kasya syād īdṛśo bhāva āhāro devasaṃmata / āścaryaṃ vartate saumya śrotum icchāmi tattvataḥ //. The sense of this variant would be "Who would have such an intention [and] food, O you who are virtually a god? It is an extraordinary thing, gentle one. I wish to hear truthfully [about it]." KK and VSP read the nominative devasaṃmataḥ with the critical edition, which would then yield the unlikely meaning "[food] approved by the gods." Cs, the only commentator to remark on the nominative variant, takes advantage of the sandhi environment to understand, "not approved by the gods, that is to say, fit only for rākṣasas. (adevasaṃmataḥ. rākṣasayogyaḥ.)" Note that the term bhāvaḥ in the reading of the critical edition and in Gorresio's edition must be taken in its sense of "creature, being," while in the reading of the southern commentators it must be taken, as indicated by Cr, in the sense of "intention or idea (abhiprāyaḥ)."

Following verse 17, Ñ2,V2,B,D7,10,11, and Gorresio (lines 2–5 only), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of five lines (lines 2–5 constitute a four-line verse consisting of four pādas), while Ñ1,V1,D1,3–5,9,T2–4,M3 insert line 1 only [1148*]: " 'I do not think that this corpse is the appropriate food[1] for you.' Addressed in this fashion with kindly words out of curiosity, O lord of men, that heavenly being, having listened to my entire speech, then told me everything. (nāham aupayikaṃ manye tava bhojyam imaṃ śavam [1] / ity evaṃ uktaḥ sa narendra nākī kautūhalāt sūnṛtayā girā ca [2–3] / śrutvā ca vākyaṃ mama sarvam etat sarvaṃ tathā cākathayan mameti [4–5] /)"

[1] "food" bhojyam: D10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous bhakṣyam.

The meter of line 1 is anuṣṭubh, while the meter of lines 2–5 is indravajrā.

Sarga 69

1. "replied thus" pratyuvādedam: Literally, "he responded this."

2. "Since you are asking me" yathā pṛcchasi mām: Literally, "in which way you are asking me."

"twice-born brahman" dvija: Literally, "twice-born [one]."

"inescapable events and how they led to both my felicity and misery" yathā vṛttaṃ mamaitat sukhaduḥkhayoḥ / duratikramaṇīyaṃ hi: Literally, "in what manner [was] this difficult or impossible to be overcome conduct of mine in regard to pleasure and misery." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read purā, "long ago, in the past," for yathā, "in which manner." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read anatikramaṇīyaṃ ca [hi—KK, VSP], "and it is not to be overcome or crossed over," for duratikramaṇīyaṃ hi, "difficult or impossible to be overcome." Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand vṛttam . . . sukhaduḥkhayoḥ, "the conduct of or in regard to pleasure and misery," to refer to the cause of Śveta's pleasure and misery in the form, respectively, of his celestial body and necrophagia (sukhaduḥkhayor divyadehaśavabhakṣaṇanimittakayoḥ kāraṇam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cs similarly). Cs further glosses his similar variant anatikramaṇīyam, "it is not to be overcome or crossed over," as "impossible to get over or overcome (atyetum aśakyam)."

3. "the king of Vidarbha" rājā vaidarbhakaḥ: Literally, "the Vaidarbhan king." See 1.31.1 and 1.37.3 (vaidarbha) and 4.40.11 (vidarbha).

4. "Suratha" surathaḥ: See 7.19.5 and notes.

5. "the people consecrated me as king" paurā mām abhyaṣecayan: Literally, "the townsfolk anointed or consecrated me."

"righteously" dharmeṇa: Literally, "with righteousness." V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dharmyaṃ ca, which would then modify rājyam, yielding the sense "and . . . righteous kingdom."

6. "passed, while I ruled the kingdom . . . protecting" samatītāni . . . / rājyaṃ kārayataḥ . . . rakṣataḥ: Cr understands, as do we, that the implied subject of the present participles is mama, "of me" (rājyaṃ kārayato mama). Cs notes the use of the causal participial phrase rājyaṃ kārayataḥ, "causing to rule the kingdom," in the sense of the simplex, rājyaṃ kurvataḥ, "ruling the kingdom" (kārayataḥ kurvataḥ). KK and VSP read mamātītāni, "passed, as I was" for samatītāni, "passed," which explicitly provides the subject for the participles.

7. "by virtue of a certain sign" nimitte kasmiṃścit: We understand the phrase with Cs as an absolute construction. He adds the participle prāpte, lending the sense "a certain sign having arisen (prāpte sati)." The commentators understand nimitta here in its sense of "sign or indication." Cg and Ct gloss, "by a certain sign (kenacil lakṣaṇena—Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cg adds that this is a reference to such indications as particular bodily signs (kenacin nimittena lakṣaṇena sāmudrikādinā). On the science of bodily signs (sāmudrikaśāstra), see 5.31.9; 5.33.11–20; and notes; and 6.38.2 and notes. Cs glosses, "a sign indicating death (maraṇasūcikacihne)."

"foremost of twice-born brahmans" dvijottama: Literally, "foremost of the twice-born [ones]."

"keeping my mortality in mind" kāladharmaṃ hṛdi nyasya: Literally, "having set down in the heart the law of time." The compound kāladharma is a euphemism for death. Ct glosses simply, "death (mṛtyum)." Cr explains, "having set in the heart the inevitable destruction of the body in a short time (alpakālenāvaśyaṃ dehavighātaṃ hṛdi nyasya)." Cg glosses, "He knew the time of his own death, that is the meaning (svasyamaraṇakālaṃ jñātety arthaḥ)." See 1.41.1,9; 2.66.30; 6.80.8; 7.89.11; and notes for other occurrences of the phrase kāladharma in the Rāmāyaṇa.

9. "After consecrating" abhiṣicya: Literally, "having consecrated." Ś,D8,12,M3,5, and KK and VSP read instead hy abhiṣicya, "indeed, having consecrated," to avoid the hiatus.

"the lord of men" narādhipam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahīpatim, "lord of the earth."

10. "great sage" mahāmune: Ś,Ñ1,V3,B1,D1,4,6–8,10,12,T3,M2,4,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāvane, "in the great forest."

11. "But then . . . while I was dwelling in heaven . . . me" tato māṃ svargasaṃsthaṃ vai: Literally, "[afflicted] me who was located in heaven." D6,7,10,11,M1,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasya me [tasyeme—so GPP, NSP, and Gita Press] svargabhūtasya, "of me who was in heaven." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand -bhūtasya here in the sense of "reached (prāptasya)," while the variant ime, "these two," found in GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, would agree with kṣutpipāse, "hunger and thirst," lending the sense "these two, hunger and thirst."

"foremost of twice-born brahmans" dvijottama: Literally, "foremost of twice-born [ones]."

"supremely noble sage" paramodāra: Literally, "O one of supreme nobility." D6,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead parame vīra, "severe [hunger and thirst], O hero."

12. "I . . . said" uvāca: This is yet another example of this passage's repeated use of the first person (uttamapuruṣa) perfect (liṭ). Cr attributes Śveta's usage of the form to his excess of excitement (harṣātiśayāt pārokṣyaṃ vacanākāram āha). See notes to 6.68.3 and 6.68.7 and verse 24 below.

"Grandfather Brahmā" pitāmaham: Literally, "the grandfather."

"foremost in the three worlds" tribhuvanaśreṣṭham: Our understanding follows the second alternative of Ct: "Or the meaning is 'foremost even among the three worlds' (yadvā triṣv api bhuvaneṣu śreṣṭham ity arthaḥ)." Ck's explanation and Ct's first alternative is "foremost in the world that is third in respect to the two other worlds, bhū and svaḥ, that is to say, Brahmaloka (tṛtīye bhuvane bhūsvaḥpadāpekṣayā tṛtīyabrahmaloke śreṣṭham—so Ct; Ck similarly)."

"should be free from hunger and thirst" kṣutpipāsāvivarjitaḥ: Literally, "[is] free from hunger and thirst."

13. "this the outcome" iyam . . . prāptiḥ: Literally, "this attainment." D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the roughly synonymous ayam . . . pākaḥ, "this the fruition or consequence."

"that I am nonetheless subjected to hunger and thirst" kṣutpipāsāvaśo 'smi yat: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṣutpipāsānugo hy aham, literally, "for I [am] followed by hunger and thirst." We follow Ct, who glosses, "He whose followers are hunger and thirst (kṣutpipāse anuge yasya saḥ)."

14. "Grandfather Brahmā" pitāmahaḥ: Literally, "the grandfather."

15. "While you were performing severe austerities" tvayā . . . kurvatā tapa uttamam: Literally, "by you [who were] performing the highest austerities." Cg understands that Śveta, in feeding only himself, failed to perform the highest form of austerity (mukhyaṃ tapo na kṛtaṃ svaśarīram eva kevalaṃ tvayā puṣṭam). Ck believes that he failed to perform the highest type of asceticism, that is, fasting (svaśarīraṃ tvayā puṣṭam anaśanamukhyaṃ tapo na kṛtam). Among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 579) follows Cg's interpretation, rendering, "You did not practice the highest austerities; you merely nourished your own body."

16. "You did not give even the smallest donation" dattaṃ na te 'sti sūkṣmo 'pi: Ck, Cg, and Ct all note the lack of gender agreement between dattam and sūkṣmaḥ and understand that we are to take the participle dattam, "given," in the sense of a gift [of food] to gods, pitṛs, and guests (sūkṣmo 'pi liṅgavyatyaya ārṣaḥ . . . te dattaṃ dānaṃ nāsti devapitratithiṣu—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly). GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read this line twice, once here as tṛptir na te 'sti sūkṣmāpi, "you did not gain even the smallest satisfaction . . ." (KK and VSP as 7.78.16a; GPP following verse 15, unnumbered, in brackets), and again following 1157*, as dattaṃ na te 'sti sūkṣmo 'pi (KK and VSP 7.78.17a; GPP, NSP, and Gita Press 7.78.16a).

"in that forest frequented by creatures" vane sattvaniṣevite: The adjective is rather jarring in light of the fact that the forest has been repeatedly described as devoid of birds, beasts, and ascetics. See 7.68.1,6, and notes and verse 8 above. Perhaps the author has included living creatures here to highlight Śveta's dereliction in failing to offer food to others. D10,11,T2,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (second time only: KK and VSP = 7.78.1b; GPP, NSP, and Gita Press = 16b) read instead tapa eva niśevase, "you devote yourself entirely to austerities"—the first time all editions read with the critical edition.

Following 16ab (first occurrence), M3 and KK, VSP (following 7.78.16ab), and GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, following 7.78.15) insert, while Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,8,9,12,T4,M6 substitute for 16ab, and T2,3 insert following verse 15, a passage of two lines [1157*]: "But at that time, in your delusion, you did not give alms to any ascetic who came begging there, even though he was a guest[1] (api ced bhikṣamāṇāya bhikṣā vai yataye purā / na hi dattā tvayā tatra mohād atithaye 'pi vai //). "

[1] "But at that time, in your delusion, you did not give alms to any ascetic who came begging there, even though he was a guest." api ced bhikṣamāṇāya bhikṣā vai yataye purā / na hi dattā tvayā tatra mohād atithaye 'pi vai //: GPP, KK, and VSP show a number of variants. KK (1913) reads: purā tu bhikṣamāṇāya bhikṣā vai yataye nṛpa / na hi dattā tvayendrābha yasmād atithaye 'pi vai //, "Since at that time, O king who resembles Indra, alms were not given by you to an ascetic who came begging even though he was a guest." KK (1905) reads for tvam, "you," tu, "but," in which case one must somehow construe the nominative pronoun with the preceding finite verb niṣevase, "you devote." GPP reads purāttum, "formerly to eat," for purā tu, "but formerly."

17. "you must eat . . . your . . . body" svaśarīram . . . / bhakṣayasva: Cr explains that Śveta would be eating only the best or choice portions of the body (sārāṃśaṃ bhakṣayitvā). V2,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M1,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the gerund bhakṣayitvā, "having eaten."

"and it will satisfy your hunger" sā te tṛptir bhaviṣyati: Literally, "that will be your satisfaction." V2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tena, "through or by virtue of that," for sā te. Cr glosses tena here as "through or by eating [your own] flesh (māṃsabhakṣaṇena)." V2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read vṛttiḥ (bṛttiḥ [sic]—Gita Press), "livelihood," for tṛptiḥ, "satisfaction." Ct and Cr understand this term in the sense of nivṛttiḥ, "cessation," glossing, "that will be the cessation of your hunger, etc. (te vṛttiḥ kṣudādinivṛttir bhaviṣyati—so Ct; Cr similarly)."

18. "the very great seer" sumahān ṛṣiḥ: Ñ2,V2,D10,11,T1,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa mahān ṛṣiḥ, "that great seer."

"shall set foot" ākramiṣyati: Literally, "he will step or he will tread upon." Ś,Ñ,V,B, D,T4,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āgamiṣyati, "he will come."

"you shall be freed from this hideous fate" kṛcchrād vimokṣyase: Literally, "you will be freed from pain or hardship." V3,B4,D10,11,T1,G1,2,M1,7–9, and GPP and NSP read instead the third person singular (prathamapuruṣa ekavacana) vimokṣyate, which must then be read transitively. Ct understands it as a future causal to emphasize its transitivity, "he will free [lit., 'will cause to be free'] (vimocayiṣyati)." Cr makes the subject and object of the verb explicit, understanding, "the words 'Agastya' and 'you' should be added (vimokṣyate 'gastyas tvām iti śeṣaḥ)." The meaning would then be "Agastya will free you."

19. "gentle Śveta" saumya: Literally, "O gentle one."

"what to say" kiṃ punaḥ: Literally, "how much more so."

"great-armed king" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]."

20. "foremost among twice-born brahmans" dvijottama: Literally, "foremost of twice-born [ones].

21. "it never diminishes" kṣayaṃ nābhyeti: Literally, "it does not approach diminution."

"And this . . . is the ultimate satisfaction of my hunger" tṛptiś cāpi mamottamā: Literally, "moreover [it is] my supreme satisfaction."

22. "You must release me" vimokṣaya: Literally, "you must release." Ś,V1,2,B3 (second time),4,D3,5,8,12,T3,4, and KK and VSP read instead the causal vimocaya, "you must set free or liberate." Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand that we must supply the pronoun "me (mām)."

"fallen into this wretched state because of this hideous fate" kṛcchrabhūtasya kṛcchrād asmāt: Literally, "who has become a calamity from this calamity." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all gloss, "of one who has come to this calamity (kṛcchrabhūtasya kṛcchraṃ prāptasya—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly)." We have rendered the term kṛcchram in two different ways to avoid an awkward redundancy.

"For no one other than you, a twice-born sage born from a pot, could have come here." anyeṣām agatir hy atra kumbhayonim ṛte dvijam: Literally, "except a twice-born, who had a pot for a womb, there is no passage here for others." D6,10,11,T3, and KK and VSP substitute the synonymous na gatiḥ, "no passage," for the critical edition's agatiḥ. The sentence is awkward and elliptical. According to Ck and Ct, the idea is that Śveta is able to recognize the pot-born sage Agastya since, out of fear, others cannot come to the deserted forest (kumbhayoniṃ dvijam ṛte bhayād anyeṣām atra nirmānuṣe gatir nāsti. atas tvam agastya iti nirṇītam iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck somewhat similarly). Cr, on the other hand, understands atra, "here or regarding this," to refer to the act of liberation, which, he claims, only Agastya can accomplish (hi yataḥ kumbhayoniṃ bhavantam ṛte vinātrāsmin vimokṣaṇe 'yeṣāṃ gatir na). For other references to Agastya as "pot-born," see 7.2.1; 7.51-5*.5; 1127*, lines 9–10 (inserted in translation following 7.67.5); 7.67.8; 7.73.2; and notes

23. "for saving me" tāraṇārtham: Literally, "for the sake of saving." Like Ck, we understand that the pronoun "of us or our (asmat)" needs to be supplied (asmattāraṇanimittam)." D6,7,10,11,M5,6,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dhāraṇārtham, "for the sake of wearing or keeping."

"brahman-seer" brahmarṣe: D6,7,10,11,T1,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the formulaic bhadraṃ te, "bless you," which frequently serves in the epic as a marker of a polite imperative. See Tubb 2006.

Following verse 23, Ś1 (in margin),2,3,Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–7,9–11,T1–3,G2,3,M3,7–9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [1161*]: "Here[1] now, twice-born brahman-seer, I give you ornaments, gold, wealth, garments, delicacies, and other objects of enjoyment.[2][1–2] I grant you all objects of desire and enjoyable things, bull among sages. Be gracious to me, blessed one, by saving me.[3][3–4]"

[1] "Here" iha: D6,7,10,11,G2, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead idam, "this," which would then construe with suvarṇam, "gold."

[2] "delicacies, and other objects of enjoyment" bhakṣyaṃ bhojyaṃ ca: Literally, "that which is to be eaten and that which is to be enjoyed." The reference could also be to the distinction between foods that require chewing (bhakṣya) and those that do not (bhojya), which constitute the first two of the four types of food classified by consistency (i.e., bhakṣya, bhojya, lehya ["to be licked"), and peya ["to be drunk"]). See Goldstücker 1861, pp. 127–128.

[3] "by saving me" tāraṇe: Literally, "in regard to saving."

24. "I accepted" aham . . . upajagrāha: Here again Cr provides a rationale for the first person perfect (uttamapuruṣa ekavacana liṭ), arguing that Agastya uses it out of an excess of joy produced by Rāma's questioning (aham upajagrāha rāmapraśnajanitaharṣātiśayāt pārokṣyam). See notes to 7.68.3 and 7.68.7 and verse 12 above.

"that . . . ornament" tad ābharaṇam: Cs, referencing Mahābhāratatātparyanirṇaya 9.22 of Śrī Ānandatīrthabhagavatpāda (Madhva), comments, "The ornament is a necklace because of the statement: 'Rāghava received from Agastya that garland which had been given by Śveta.' (ābharaṇaṃ mālāṃ. śvetadattāṃ tathā mālām agastyād āpa rāghava ity ukteḥ.)" Compare PadmaP (ĀnSS) 5.33.32.

"for the sake of saving him" tāraṇāya: Literally, "for saving."

25. "the . . . vanished" sa nanāśa ha: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar vinanāśa ha. Ck and Ct ascribe the sudden disappearance of the corpse to Agastya's virtuous act (tatsukṛtabalād iti śeṣaḥ). Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that the meaning is that the body was no longer there to be consumed (punar bhakṣaṇāya nopasthito 'bhūd ity arthaḥ).

26. "with the greatest delight . . . overjoyed" parayā mudā / . . . pramuditaḥ: The two expressions are somewhat redundant. In an effort to avoid the redundancy, Cr understands the adjective parayā twice, once describing Śveta's royal splendor and once describing the happiness of the highest heaven, leaving pramuditaḥ alone to describe Śveta (parayā rājadīptyopalakṣitaḥ pramudito rājarṣiḥ parayā mudopalakṣitaṃ tridivam). Ct explains the term pramuditaḥ, "overjoyed," as meaning "having attained extreme satisfaction through freedom from hunger and thirst (pramuditaḥ kṣutpipāsārahitatayātisaṃtoṣaṃ prāptaḥ)."

"once more" punaḥ: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11,T1–3,G,M1–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sukham, "happily."

Sarga 70

The story of Daṇḍa and Śukra's daughter Arajā is also known to the Padmapurāṇa ([ĀnSS] 5[Sṛṣṭikhaṇḍa].34.1–59). See, too, Glucklich 1988 for an analysis of the term daṇḍa and of its symbolic and mythological significance in this story.

1. "out of respect for him as a guru" gauravāt: Literally, "out of respectability or venerability." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand that Rāma questions Agastya because of his respect for him as an omniscient guru who will reveal everything (gauravāt sarvajñaḥ sarvavaktā paramagurur iti saṃbhāvanayety arthaḥ—so Ck, Ct; Cg and Cr similarly).

2. "that . . . forest" tad vanam . . . /. . . tat: Literally, "that forest . . . that." M3 and KK and VSP, perhaps to avoid the repetition, read syāt, "[how] would [it] be," for the second tat.

"the king of Vidarbha" vaidarbhako rājā: Literally, "the king belonging to Vidarbha." See 7.69.3 and note.

3. "And how is it that . . . forest that had become . . . devoid of creatures" niḥsattvaṃ ca vanaṃ jātam: Literally, "and the forest that had become devoid of creatures." The critical edition conspicuously lacks an interrogative particle to mark the question that Rāma wishes to have answered. Most northern manuscripts and all printed editions consulted place the interrogative particle katham, "how," in one or another of the verse's pādas. We have supplied it here as well. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tad vanaṃ sa kathaṃ rājā, "How [did] that king [enter] that forest?"

"just as it happened" tattvataḥ: Literally, "truthfully or in reality." Here the adverb carries more the sense of "fully or in detail." As Cr notes, Rāma is saying that, having heard a general version of the story, he now wishes to hear it more fully (śrutasāmānyavṛttānto 'haṃ tattvataḥ śrotum icchāmi).

4. "that sage of supremely blazing energy" paramatejasvī: Literally, "the one of supremely blazing energy."

"words" bhāṣitam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous vacanam.

5. "Manu" manuḥ: Manu is the primordial king and progenitor of both the solar and lunar lineages.

"wielded the rod of punishment" daṇḍadharaḥ: Literally, "the bearer of the rod." The term, as noted by Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, is a kenning for king (daṇḍadharo rājā). These same commentators, except for Cr, understand the term to refer to Manu, the primordial king, as being the authority who promulgated the laws by which the social classes and life stages were apportioned (varṇāśramavibhāgataddharmapravartanādhikṛtaḥ). The term daṇḍa, "rod or staff," refers to the coercive power of the king who wields it to govern and chastise erring subjects. Accordingly, in this passage we have rendered the term as "the rod of punishment," except where it is used as proper noun (see verse 15 and note below). See 7.73.11 and notes.

"the increaser of his lineage" kulavardhanaḥ: Ś,D6–8,10–12,T1,2,G3,M3, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kulanandanaḥ, "the delight of his lineage."

6. "Manu . . . said" uvāca ha: Literally, "he said." With Cr, we add the name Manu to avoid confusion (manuḥ . . . uvāca). D10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead uvāca tam, "he said to him," replacing the emphatic particle ha with the pronoun tam, "him."

"his . . . son in his former kingdom" taṃ putraṃ pūrvake rājye: Literally, "that son in a previous or earlier kingdom." D7,10,11,T3,4,M10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the accusative singular pūrvakam for pūrvake, which then must modify putram, lending the phrase the sense of "a prior or earlier son." Here pūrvakam, as Cr notes, must be understood in the sense of "eldest (jyeṣṭham)." Most northern manuscripts (Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–4,8,9,12) and Lahore appear to gloss this reading with the facilior pūrvajam, "first born."

"founder" kartā: Literally, "maker."

7. "the son promised" pratijñātam . . . putreṇa: Literally, "it was promised by the son." V2,B2–4, the text of Gorresio, and apparently the text followed by Cr read pratijñāte for pratijñātam. Cr understands the locative as part of an elliptical absolutive construction, "as soon as he had promised (pratijñāte saty eva)."

"saying, 'So be it' " tatheti: Literally, "Thus." V2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead tathaiva, "in that very way."

"supremely delighted" paramasaṃhṛṣṭaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead paramasaṃtuṣṭaḥ, "supremely gratified."

8. "supremely illustrious son" paramodāra: Literally, "supremely noble [one]."

"with the rod of punishment" daṇḍena: Literally, "with the rod." Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "which is the innate duty [dharma] of the kshatriyas (kṣatriya-[kṣetra- —sic, so Ck] sahajadharmabhūtena)." Ct adds the further gloss, "with instruction or chastisement (śikṣaṇena)."

"but let that rod not be used without good cause" mā ca daṇḍam akāraṇe: Literally, "and not the rod with respect to a noncause or without cause." Cg and Ct supply the verb pātayet, lending the phrase the sense "let the rod not be made to fall for no cause." Cr understands the term akāraṇe to be a bahuvrīhi compound modifying a missing term for people. He also supplies the verb kuru, "do or make," thus lending the line the sense "You must not use the rod [daṇḍam] on people who are without any reason for punishment [daṇḍa] (akāraṇe daṇḍakāraṇarahite jane daṇḍaṃ mā kurv iti śeṣaḥ)."

9. "The rod of punishment, when employed properly and brought down upon men who have committed crimes, leads a king to heaven." aparādhiṣu yo daṇḍaḥ pātyate mānaveṣu vai / sa daṇḍo vidhivan muktaḥ svargaṃ nayati pārthivam //: Literally, "The rod that is made to fall upon men who are criminals, that rod, loosed properly, leads a king to heaven." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss the phrase vidhivan muktaḥ, "loosed according to rule" as follows: " 'According to rule' means 'according to the śāstras,' that is, 'according to the offense'; 'loosed' means 'set in motion or employed.' (vidhivad yathāśāstram. yathāparādhaṃ muktaḥ pravartita ity arthaḥ.)"

10. "For if you do this" kurvatas te: Literally, "of you doing." Ct and Cr differ slightly as to what might be the object of the participle. The former supplies the word daṇḍa, "the rod of punishment," while Cr supplies yatnam, lending the phrase the sense "of you making an effort."

11. "attentively" samādhinā: The term is ambiguous here. Cg takes samādhi in its sense of profound yogic concentration or trance, glossing, "through yoga (yogena)." Ct glosses, "through that single-pointed concentration of mind that is accompanied by the composure [-anusaṃdhāna-] associated with the [recitation] of the sacred syllable oṃ (praṇavānusaṃdhānasahitacittaikāgryeṇa)." Ck extends this definition, seeing the term samādhi as a reference to "that yoga that is associated with the composure attendant upon one's [grasp] of one's true identity with the uncreated Lord and that yoga that involves the composure attendant upon the sacred syllable oṃ uttered at the time of death (akṛtakabhagavadananyatānusaṃdhānayogena niryāṇapraṇavānusaṃdhānayogena cety arthaḥ). Ck goes on to discuss additional aspects of this final mental concentration and quotes a text he identifies as the Brahmasiddhānta. In other words, Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand that Manu has voluntarily left his body in a profound yogic trance. They thus construe the instrumental samādhinā with the finite verb jagāma, "he went." This interpretation is found in the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 581), who renders, "Manu gladly went to the eternal world of Brahmā by practicing samādhi," and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 891), which offers, "Manu . . . went to the eternal abode of Brahmā through Samādhi (trance)." This interpretation is perfectly plausible. On the other hand, given the placement of the term in the verse, we are inclined to follow Gorresio (1870, p. 249), who takes the term in its sense of "attentiveness or concentration" and construes it with the gerund saṃdiśya, "having instructed." He thus renders, "Ammonito . . . con grande studio il figlio."

12. "for the highest heaven" tridive: Literally, "in the third heaven." D6,T1,2,G2,3,M, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative tridivam, "to the highest heaven."

"thinking" iti: Since the verse only provides the quotation marker, we have supplied the participle for the sake of clarity.

13. "by means of various sacrificial rites" karmabhir bahurūpaiś ca: Literally, "with actions of many forms." We believe, as do Gorresio (1870, p. 250), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 599), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 581), that the term karmabhiḥ here is probably meant in its technical sense of ritual or sacrificial actions. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the phrase to mean "with different types of pious acts, characterized by sacrifice, charity, and austerities (bahurūpair yajñadānatapolakṣaṇaiḥ)." Cr glosses, "consisting of sacrifice, charity, etc. (yajñadānādyātmakaiḥ)."

"fathered . . . a hundred sons" sutān / janayāmāsa . . . śatam: Literally, "he caused one hundred sons to be born." Ñ1,V1,D5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tadā, "then," for sutān, "sons," leaving the verb janayāmāsa, "he caused to be born," to have as its object śatam, "one hundred," which then must be read with devasutopamān, "who were equal to the sons of the gods."

14. "stupid and ignorant" mūḍhaś cākṛtavidyaś ca: Literally, "dull and not having completed [the fields of] knowledge." We understand the first adjective to refer to the boy's natural lack of intelligence and the second to his lack of formal education.

15. "Foreseeing that": The verse is somewhat elliptical, and it is necessary to supply some verbal form to indicate Ikṣvāku's realization of his son's fate. Ck, Cg, and Ct note that it is through the father's omniscience that he decides to give his son a name that reflects the fact that he will be subject to the daṇḍa (daṇḍa ity ākhyākaraṇaṃ pituḥ sarvajñatvād anvarthatāvasāyapūrvakam—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly).

"dullard" alpatejasaḥ: Literally, "of that one of little brilliance or blazing splendor."

16. "Perceiving his son's terrible defect" sa paśyamānas taṃ doṣaṃ ghoraṃ putrasya: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead apaśyamānas taṃ deśaṃ ghoraṃ putrasya, "not seeing a terrible country for his son." Ct and Cr understand that the king is unable to find a terrible enough country to be suitable as a kingdom for Daṇḍa (putrasya daṇḍasya yogyaṃ ghoraṃ deśam apaśyamānaḥ—so Cr; Ct similarly).

"between the Vindhya and Śaivala mountains" vindhyaśaivalayor madhye: On a mountain called Śaivala, see notes to 7.66.12.

18. "and . . . Uśanas" cośanasam: D6,7,10,11,M3,4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous tūśanasam. The sage Uśanas, also known as Śukrācārya, is a scion of the Bhārgava gotra and is identified with the planet Venus. He is frequently represented as the hereditary purohita of the asuras. See Sutherland 1979. See, too, 6.40.28; 6.45.12; and notes.

19. "ruled that kingdom" tad rājyaṃ kārayat: Literally, "he caused that kingdom to be carried out or performed." The causal (ṇijanta) likely needs to be understood as a simplex. The irregular augmentless imperfect of the causative is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The critical reading appears to be based on only three manuscripts: V3,M1,9. D6,7,10,11,G3,M5,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tad rājyam akarot, "he ruled that kingdom," which would have virtually the same meaning as our translation.

"as if it were the kingdom of the gods in heaven" devarājyaṃ yathā divi: Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead devarājo yathā divi, "like the king of the gods in heaven." M3 and KK and VSP read instead devarājyaṃ yathā vṛṣā, "just as the virile one [Indra] [rules] the kingdom of the gods." The preference of the editors for the readings of G and M is particularly apparent in the choice of the reading here.

Following verse 19, Ñ2,V2,B,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1169*]: "Then, at that time, that great and magnificent[1] king, the son of the lord of men, ruled the kingdom together with Uśanas, just as does Śakra in heaven together with Uśanas[2] (tataḥ sa rājā manujendraputraḥ sārdhaṃ ca tenośanasā tadānīm / cakāra rājyaṃ sumahān mahātmā śakro divīvośanasā sametaḥ //)."

[1] "that great and magnificent" sumahān mahātmā: Literally, "that very great, great [one]." No commentators remark on the redundancy.

[2] "just as does Śakra in heaven together with Uśanas" śakro divīvośanasā sametaḥ: Not only the rhetoric but the mythology of the verse is flawed. The word śakra, "mighty or powerful one," is almost invariably an epithet of Indra, the king of the gods. Indra's heavenly rule is a conventional upamāna, "object of comparison," for the rule of a great earthly monarch. Of course, he does this with the assistance of his purohita Bṛhaspati, not with that of Uśanas, who is the well-known purohita of the enemies of the gods, the asuras. Ct, Cr, and Cs struggle to rationalize the reference. Ct remarks that the word śakra here refers to Bali (śakro 'tra baliḥ). Bali or Mahābali is a well-known king of the asuras whose purohita was, indeed, Uśanas, but it is a stretch to refer to him as ruling in heaven. Cr explains the rhetorical figure here as an abhūtopamā, that is to say, a simile in which the object of comparison is nonexistent. For a definition of the figure, see Gerow 1971, p. 149. Cs exercises the greatest ingenuity in offering a variety of explanations of the seeming anomaly. In the first, he breaks the sequence sametaḥ, which we have taken in its most probable sense as a participle meaning "together with or accompanied by," as sama + itaḥ, which he then understands as a tatpuruṣa compound in the sense of samena itaḥ, "followed by an equal." He explains this by saying that [Śakra, i.e., Indra] was accompanied by Bṛhaspati, who, because of the equivalence between the two sages as the gurus, respectively of the *dānava*s and the gods, was the equal of Uśanas. Otherwise, Cs continues, this would be an occasion of nonconformity (as it contradicts the well-known association between Indra and Bṛhaspati). Even so, Cs continues, the redundancy would be difficult to explain. Cs then proposes to take advantage of the sandhi to read aśakraḥ, "non-Indra," that is, someone other than Indra, who is, nonetheless, like him, that is to say, the demon king Bali. Cs acknowledges that because both figures occupy the same position, the reference could be either to Śakra [Indra] or to Bali. Finally, Cs proposes, as yet another alternative, taking the term śakra not as a proper name or epithet but simply in its adjectival sense of "powerful," which can then simply refer to Bali. He supports this claim by quoting the Viśvakośa, which permits the use of the term śakra to refer either to any powerful person or to great Indra. (sametaḥ samenetaḥ. uśanasā śukreṇa yaḥ samas tena dānavadevagurutvena sāmyaṃ tena bṛhaspatineto yukta ity arthaḥ. anyathānānurūpyāpatteḥ. punaruktiś cānevaṃkaraṇe duruttarā syāt. aśakraḥ śakrabhinnas tatsadṛśo baliḥ. tatpadasthatvāc chakro balir vā. śakraḥ śaktimān balir iti vā. śakraḥ śakte mahendre ceti viśvaḥ.)

The meter is upajāti.

Sarga 71

1. "he continued with the next part of the story" asyām evāparaṃ vākyaṃ kathāyām upacakrame: Literally, "he began further speech in regard to that very tale." Ck and Ct introduce the sarga by noting that Agastya now narrates the principal tale, which had been introduced through the previous narration (evam uktopodghātāṃ prakṛtakathām āha—so Ct; Ck similarly). Ck, Cg, and Ct then explain the line to mean that the sage now speaks words that are connected with the story that he had already started (Ct), that are connected with the previously narrated gift [of the ornament] (Cg), or that are connected with the previously narrated [tale of] Daṇḍa (Ck). The idea, these commentators note, is that this further narration is responsive to [Rāma's original] question [as to why the forest was desolate]. (asyām evāparaṃ vākyam upakrāntakathāyām eva saṃbaddham. tat pṛṣṭottarabhūtam ity arthaḥ—so Ct; asyām evāparaṃ vākyam iti. proktadānakathāyām eva saṃbaddham aparaṃ tatpṛṣṭottarabhūtaṃ kathāntaram ity arthaḥ—so Cg; asyām evāparaṃ vā[kya]m iti. proktadaṇḍakathāyām eva saṃbaddham aparam tva[t]pṛṣṭottarabhūtaṃ kathāntaram ity arthaḥ—so Ck.) Cr understands the phrase asyām . . . kathāyām to be an elliptical locative absolute (sati saptamī). He supplies the adjective samāptāyām, "completed," lending the phrase the sense "when that tale had been completed, he began another speech (asyāṃ kathāyāṃ samāptāyām iti śeṣo 'paraṃ vākyam upacakrame)."

2. "for many tens of thousands of years" bahuvarṣagaṇāyutam: Literally, "ten thousand of many multitudes of years."

"dull-witted" mandātmā: V2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead dāntātmā, "of subdued mind." This is glossed by Ct with the more formulaic jitendriyaḥ, "by whom the senses had been conquered or subdued.

"which was free from all troubles" nihatakaṇṭakam: Literally, "whose thorns [i.e., troubles] had been destroyed."

3. "once" kāle kasmiṃścid: Literally, "at a certain time."

"during the . . . month of Caitra" caitre māsi: Literally, "in the month Caitra." Caitra is the month of the Hindu calendar that corresponds to March–April.

"Bhārgava" bhārgavam: Literally, "belonging to the Bhārgava." Ck, Cg, and Ct all note that the sage Bhārgava here is Śukra (Uśanas). Additionally, Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs all understand that the word bhārgava, "belonging to Bhārgava," here is a taddhita, or secondary derivation, of the proper noun bhārgavaḥ, "Bhārgava" (bhārgavaḥ śukras tasyāyam api bhārgavas tam—so Ck and Cg; Ct and Cs similarly).

5. The story of the rape of Arajā has received little scholarly attention. See Vyas 1949, Sutherland 1979, and Glucklich 1988.

"that extremely dull-witted king" sudurmedhāḥ: Literally, "the one of extremely poor or bad intelligence."

"Anañga" anaṅga-: Literally, "the disembodied [one]." This is a common epithet of Kāma, the god of love. The epithet, however, is rarely encountered in the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa. See verse 6 below and 1.22.14.

"in great agitation" susaṃvignaḥ: Literally, "very agitated." Cs understands the adjective to mean that Daṇḍa was inwardly frightened, thinking: "Who is she? What is she saying? What might happen?" (susaṃvignaḥ keyaṃ kiṃ vadati kiṃ bhaved ity antarbhītiyutaḥ.) T1,G2,M3,4,9, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the feminine accusative susaṃvignām, which then would apply to the girl and have the sense "frightened or timid."

6. "Where are you from" kutas tvam: We agree with Cr, who supplies the word āgatā, fleshing out the phrase to mean "From whence have you come (kutas tvam āgateti śeṣaḥ)?" Cs glosses, "For what reason are you here (kutaḥ kāraṇād atrāsi)?"

"lovely, fair-hipped girl . . . my fair-waisted one" suśroṇi . . . śubhe /. . . sumadhyame: Literally, "O one of beautiful hips, O lovely one, O one of beautiful waist." Ñ2,B1, D3,6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śubhānane, "O fair-faced [one]" for sumadhyame, "O one of beautiful waist."

"I ask you" pṛcchāmi tvām: KK and VSP (and GPP in a footnote) read instead gacchāmi tvām, "I approach you."

7. "But . . . in this fashion" tv evam: KK and VSP read instead caivam, "And . . . in this fashion."

"the lustful king . . . to him" tasya kāminaḥ /. . . nṛpam: Literally, "[as] the lustful one [was speaking] . . . to the king." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tv idam, "and or but this," for nṛpam, "king." The word idam would then modifiy vacaḥ, "words."

"intoxicated in his infatuation" mohonmattasya: Ck and Cg explain, "devoid of discrimination as to proper and improper words and actions because of infatuation, that is, the infatuation of lust. (mohena kāmamohena. unmatta ucitānucitavacanakarmavivekarahitaḥ.)" Ct similarly glosses the compound as "devoid of discrimination as to what is proper and improper because of infatuation, that is, the infatuation of passion (mohena rāgamohenonmattasyocitānucitavivekarahitasya)."

8. "You must know me to be the eldest daughter of the godlike Bhārgava, tireless in action. My name, lord of kings, is Arajā, and I dwell here in the ashram." bhārgavasya sutāṃ viddhi devasyākliṣṭakarmaṇaḥ / arajāṃ nāma rājendra jyeṣṭhām āśramavāsinīm //: The verse constitutes a single sentence, which would be literally rendered as "O Indra among kings, know [me as] the eldest daughter of the god Bhārgava, of unwearied actions, named Arajā, [she who] dwells in the ashram." The name Arajā means "without taint or dirt." The name also has a strong resonance with the term arajāḥ (fem.), "one who has not yet had a menstrual period." Cs observes that Arajā is saying that she is older than Devayāni. Devayānī is another daughter of Uśanas, who figures prominently in the story recounted at 7.51-6*–7.51-7*, MBh 1.71–78, and MatsyaP 24–44. Cs explains the use of the term devasya, "of the god," which in the case of human beings is generally restricted to kings. He says, "[Uśanas] is to be extolled for having been accepted by you [Daṇḍa] as his guru (devasya tvayā gurutvena svīkārāt stutyasya)."

Following verse 8, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1170*]: "You must not force yourself upon me,[1] your majesty, for I am a daughter, subject to the will of my father[2] (mā mā spṛśa balāt kanyā pitṛvaśā hy aham)."

[1] "You must not force yourself upon me" mā mā spṛśa balāt: Literally, "Do not touch me through force." One could optionally understand, "Do not, do not touch forcibly."

D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mā māṃ spṛśa balāt, "Do not touch me through force."

[2] "for I am a daughter subject to my father's wishes" kanyā pitṛvaśā hy aham: Literally, "for I am a daughter controlled by a father." The word kanyā, "daughter," also implies unmarried and virginal.

9. "My father is your guru" guruḥ pitā me: Literally, "My father is a guru."

"of that great sage" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of that great [one]."

"sage of great austerities" mahātapāḥ: Literally, "one of great austerities."

"would inflict . . . calamity upon you" vyasanam . . . te dadyāt: Literally, "he would give a calamity to you."

10. "If, however, you are to do this with me according to the path of the virtuous, which is fixed according to righteousness" yadi vātra mayā kāryaṃ dharmadṛṣṭena satpathā: Literally, "Or if, in this, it is to be done by or with me according to the path of the virtuous, envisioned by righteousness." The line is elliptical and touches on sensitive issues that are perhaps difficult for Arajā to express openly in the context. It is uncertain whether the instrumental pronoun mayā is to be understood here as one of agency or accompaniment. Only Cr specifies that it should be read in the latter sense, as noted below. D5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read anyat, "another," for atra, "in this." Ct glosses, "Or if this is to be different, that is, in keeping with the enjoyment of desire, then ask for me according to the path of the virtuous, which is viewed according to righteousness (yadi vānyat kāmabhogānukūlyaṃ tarhi dharmadṛṣṭena satpathā sanmārgeṇa māṃ varayasva)." Ck and Cg similarly gloss anyat as kāmabhogānukūlyam, "in conformity with the enjoyment of desire." Cr glosses, "If it is to be done differently by you together with me, that is, sexual enjoyment different from the one I mentioned, then you must request my father for the purpose of marriage according to the path of the virtuous, that is, the correct path, which has been perceived, that is, set forth, by the righteous (yadi mayā sahānyad maduktabhinnaratim ity arthas tvayā kāryaṃ tarhi dharmadṛṣṭena dharmātmabhiḥ pravartitena satpathā samīcīnamārgeṇa me pitaraṃ varayasva vivāhārthaṃ yācayasvety arthaḥ)." Cs glosses, "Or if something different, that is, actions, including lovemaking, etc., are to be done, then it must be by the path of the virtuous perceived through righteousness, that is to say, the path of marriage ordained in the vedas (yadi vānyat suratādikaṃ kāryaṃ tarhi dharmadṛṣṭena satpathā vedavihitavivāhamārgeṇa)."

11. "dreadful" ghorābhisaṃhitam: Literally, "connected with [something] terrible." In order to make sense of the compound we need to take the adjective ghora-, "dreadful or terrible," nominally to mean "something terrible." Ck and Cg gloss, "connected with a great disaster (mahānarthasaṃbaddham)." Ct renders, "having a disastrous result (mahānarthaphalam)." See note to 7.72.6.

Following verse 11, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1171*]: "But if he is petitioned, my father will give me[1] to you, O you of flawless body (dāsyate cānavadyāṅga tava māṃ yācitaḥ pitā /)."

[1] "me" mām: D10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead the synonymous enclitic mā.

12. "smitten by the arrows of Kāma" kāmaśarārditaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāmavaśaṃ gataḥ, "gone to control of Kāma."

"intoxicated with desire" madonmattaḥ: Cs glosses, "with respect to one whom he ought to honor (satkāryaviṣaye)."

"cupped his hands to his forehead" śirasy ādhāya so 'ñjalim: Literally, "he, having placed an añjali on his head." Cs observes that what is suggested here is Daṇḍa's recollection of a gesture designed to accomplish one's intentions (śirasy ādhāyety anena svābhipretasādhaneṅgasmṛtimān iti sūcyate). D6,7,11,T1,2,G3,M3,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read cāñjalim, "and an añjali," for so 'ñjalim, "he [having placed] an añjali."

13. "fair-hipped girl" suśroṇi: Literally, "O lovely-hipped [one]."

"you must not let this moment pass" na kālaṃ kṣeptum arhasi: Literally, "you should not lose time." Cr understands the phrase to mean that Arajā should not delay through not engaging in lovemaking (kālaṃ kṣeptum asaṅgamena vilambayituṃ nārhasi). Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the phrase to mean that she should not waste time or tarry (vilambaṃ kartum ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly).

"my fair-faced one" śubhānane: Literally, "O lovely-faced [one]." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead varānane, "O one of lovely [lit., 'excellent'] face."

"my very life is being torn apart on your account" mama prāṇā vidīryante: Literally, "My life breaths are being torn to pieces."

14. "As long as I have you, let me suffer death or dreadful sin." tvāṃ prāpya hi vadho vāpi pāpaṃ vāpi sudāruṇam: The line is elliptical. A literal meaning would be "For having obtained you, whether death or very terrible sin." The verb pra + √āp here is used, as it is elsewhere, as a term of sexual conquest. See note to 7.72.4. We agree with Ck, Cg, and Ct, who gloss, "If my death, etc., should occur, then let it be so. These words should be supplied. (me yadi vadhādir bhaved bhavatu nāmeti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly.)" Cr is similar but adds the following: "There would be no suffering in death, etc., but only in the delay of union. That is the purport. (vadhādau na duḥkhaṃ saṅgamavilamba eva duḥkham iti tātparyam.)" Ś,Ñ2,V1,2,B,D6–8,10,11,M3,5,6,9, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tu, "and or but," for hi, "for." KK and VSP read a variant of the entire line: tvāṃ prāpya me vadho vā syāc chāpo vā yadi dāruṇaḥ, "Having obtained you, whether there would be for me death or a terrible curse."

"So love me, timid one, your lover, who loves you to distraction." bhaktaṃ bhajasva māṃ bhiru bhajamānaṃ suvihvalam: Literally, "Devote yourself to me, your devotee, devoting very distractedly, timid one." Note the anuprāsa (alliteration).

15. "seized" gṛhya: Literally, "having seized." Note the irregular form. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the grammatically correct prāpya, "having obtained."

"began to rape her" maithunāyopacakrame: Literally, "he began to couple [with her]." There are very few references to forcible rape in the epic literature, and three of them are in the Uttarakāṇḍa: here; at 7.26.30, where Rāvaṇa rapes Rambhā; and at 7.30.27, where Indra rapes Ahalyā. This exact phrase is used at 7.26.30. See, too, notes to 7.17.22.

16. "this evil, very dreadful, and extremely horrifying thing" tam anarthaṃ mahāghoram . . . sudāruṇam: Cs attempts to distinguish the terms in regard to the different consequences of Daṇḍa's transgression. He takes the first term in its sense of "useless with specific reference to life in the next world." He takes the second to mean horrible to [Daṇḍa's] subjects and the third to refer to the act's being the cause of the depopulation of the region. (anarthaṃ paratraniṣphalam. mahāghoraṃ prajānām. sudāruṇaṃ deśanairjanyadatveneti vivekaḥ.) B1 and KK and VSP read instead etam artham, "this purpose," for tam anartham, "this evil."

"went immediately" prayayau cāśu: Literally, "and he went quickly." Ñ2,V2,B1,2,D6, 7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prayayāv āśu, "he went quickly."

17. "she waited" sā . . . / pratīkṣate: D6,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the present participle pratīkṣantī, "[she] waiting." With this variant, the verse lacks a finite verb. Ck and Cg flesh out the ellipsis by adding the finite verb āste, "she remained or sat" (āsta iti śeṣaḥ).

Sarga 72

1. "having heard about what had happened" upaśrutya: Literally, "having heard." The reference is elliptical. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand that Uśanas has heard from his disciples about what happened to Arajā (upaśrutya śiṣyamukhād arajāvṛttāntam—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly).

2. "covered with blood" rajasā samabhiplutām: The phrase is ambiguous, perhaps deliberately so. One normal and contextual meaning of rajas is "dust" or "dirt," and this is the meaning reflected in all the translations consulted with the exception of Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 893), which understands the term in its lexical sense of "semen." We, however, believe that the context of the deflowering of the virginal Arajā, whose name can mean "non-menstruating," suggests that the poet has in mind the sense of menstrual flow or vaginal bleeding. That the meaning here refers to blood is further supported by the use of the term samabhipluta, which in combination with the term rajas is used of a woman during menstruation. As noted below, the simile additionally reinforces the idea that the term refers to blood. See, for example, ManuSm 4.41–42. See also 7.77.14 and notes. Note, however, that it is possible that the punishment meted out by Uśanas in the form of a great and destructive dust storm may reflect the fact that his daughter was humiliated and covered with dust.

"she had lost her radiance like the moonlight swallowed up in the morning by the red dawn" jyotsnām ivāruṇagrastāṃ pratyūṣe na virājatīm: Literally, "not shining, like moonlight swallowed by dawn in the morning." The simile is based not only on the greater brightness of the solar rays than those of the moon at dawn but on the redness of dawn. Aruṇa, literally, "the ruddy one," is mythologically represented as the charioteer of the sun (see, for example, MBh 1.24.15–20). The redness, of course, further supports the notion that Arajā is tainted with blood [or red dust]. V3,D10 (marginal),11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read iva grahagrastām for ivāruṇagrastām, lending the phrase the sense "like moonlight occluded or eclipsed by a planet." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 601) renders, "pareille à l'orbe lunaire, dévoré par l'étoile (de Rahu)." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 592), who offers, "Like unto the moon that has been devoured by the planet Rahu." Benoît (1999, p. 1390) translates, "pareille au disque de la lune . . . les jours d'éclipse."

3. "his anger flared up . . . as if to consume" tasya roṣaḥ samabhavat . . . / nirdahann iva: Literally, "his anger arose, as if burning up." Despite the fractured syntax, we follow Cr in taking roṣaḥ, "anger," as the subject of the participle nirdahan, "burning." We do so because of the conventional trope of anger as a source of combustion. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 893) also understands similarly. On the basis of the syntax, another plausible reading would be to take the second half of the verse independently, yielding the sense "As if burning up the three worlds, he said this to his disciples." This interpretation is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1882), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 601), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 592), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 583), and Benoît (1999, p. 1390).

"this" idam: GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar etat, "this." This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

4. "as a raging flame of fire" kruddhām agniśikhām iva: Literally, "like an angry flame of fire." The image is somewhat awkward. Commentators who share it struggle, and not very convincingly, to interpret it. Ck understands kruddhām, "angry," to modify an unstated term arajāprāptim, "the acquisition [i.e., rape] of Arajā." Ck employs the verb pra + √āp in its sense of sexual conquest, as it was used earlier. See notes to 7.71.14. This would form a second object of the imperative paśyadhvam, "witness," in pāda a, and the sense would be "[witness the destruction . . .] and the angry acquisition [i.e., the violent rape] of Arajā, which is like a flame of fire (agniśikhām iva sthitāṃ kruddhām arajāprāptim)." Cg understands the unspoken modificand of kruddhām agniśikhām iva sthitām to be Arajā herself. He thus understands, "[and witness] angry Arajā, standing there like a flame of fire (agniśikhām iva sthitāṃ kruddhāṃ arajām)." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the ablative kruddhāt, "out of anger," for the accusative kruddhām. This would seem to be a facilior, lending the line the sense of "witness the destruction of Daṇḍa [resulting] from [my] anger." Ct and Cg, who note this as a variant reading, supply the participle jāyamānam, "arising from." Even Ck, who reads with the critical edition, provides a phrase indicating that Daṇḍa's destruction is a consequence of Uśanas's anger (matkrodhato jāyamānam).

"perverse" viparītasya: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term here to mean "one of perverse practices (viparītānuṣṭhānavataḥ—so Ck and Ct; viparītānuṣṭhānasya—so Cg)." Cr glosses, "who follows a contrary or forbidden path (viruddhamārgavarttinaḥ)."

"ignorant" aviditātmanaḥ: Literally, "whose self is unknown." This relatively unusual and ambiguous term appears to be the opposite of the more widely used viditātman, "celebrated or knowing the self," a term often used of Rāma in the epic. See note to 6.31.58. The commentators here are silent on this term. T1,G2,3,M2–5,7–9, and KK and VSP read instead avijitātmanaḥ, "of unrestrained or unconquered self." Earlier at 6.31.58, Cg glosses the word aviditātman, which is there a variant of avijitātman, "of unrestrained or unconquered self," as asvādhīnamanaska, "one whose mind is not under his own control." Translators offer a variety of more or less convincing interpretations of the term here. Some translations consulted understand the term, as do we, to refer to Daṇḍa's well-documented ignorance or stupidity. Thus Gorresio (1870, p. 252) renders, "stolto," while Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 893) offers, "ignorant," and Benoît (1999, p. 1390) suggests, "insensé." However, some translations offer different interpretations. Thus Dutt (1894, p. 1882) translates, "vicious." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 583), somewhat similarly and apparently recalling Cg's gloss at 6.31.58, renders, "who lacks self-control." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 601) appears to misunderstand the term entirely, rendering, "qui ne me connaît pas." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 592) appears to ignore it.

5. "this evil fool . . . faces destruction" kṣayo 'sya durmateḥ prāptaḥ . . . durātmanaḥ: Literally, "the destruction of this ignorant, evil-minded [one] has come." D6,10,11,M4, and GPP and NSP read mahātmanaḥ, "of the great [one]," for durātmanaḥ, "of the evil [one]."

"who" yaḥ: Cs notes that the reference is to a person lacking spells or jewels [that would protect him] (yaḥ mantramaṇyādirahitaḥ).

"dared to touch" spraṣṭum icchati: Literally, "he wants or desires to touch." D10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the somewhat awkward spraṣṭum arhati, "he is obliged to touch."

6. "such a sin" pāpam īdṛśam: Ck and Cg specify that the particular type of offense is in the form of the rape of Uśanas's daughter (īdṛśam iti matputrīdharṣaṇarūpam ity arthaḥ).

"dreadful to contemplate" ghoradarśanam: Literally, "dreadful to behold." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ghorasaṃhitam, "connected with [something] dreadful." For this construction, see note to 7.71.11.

7. "who performs such evil acts" pāpakarmasamācāraḥ: Literally, "who has evil actions for his conduct or behavior."

"along with his retainers, troops and mounts" sabhṛtyabalavāhanaḥ: Ñ2,B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead saputrabalavāhanaḥ, "along with his sons, troops, and mounts."

8. "With an immense dust storm" pāṃsuvarṣeṇa mahatā: Literally, "with a great shower of dust."

"Indra, the chastiser of Pāka" pākaśāsanaḥ: Literally, "the chastiser of Pāka."

"will parch" dhakṣyate: Literally, "he will burn or scorch." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all gloss, "he will destroy (nāśayiṣyati—so Ck, Cg, Ct; vināśayiṣyate—Cr)." Cs takes the force of the root √dah, "to burn," literally and explains that the dust will have the power to burn because it will be accompanied by the fire of the sage's wrath (tatkopānalasahakṛtatvāt pāṃsūnāṃ dhakṣaṇaśaktatā jñeyā).

9. "will be completely destroyed" nāśaṃ yāsyanti sarvaśaḥ: Literally, "they will go completely to destruction." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vilayaṃ sarvato 'gaman, "they went completely to dissolution." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all gloss the aorist here as a future (agaman gamiṣyantīti yāvat—so Ck and Cg; Ct and Cr similarly).

10. "After seven nights" saptarātrāt: Literally, "after a period of seven nights." B1, D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saptarātram, "for a period of seven nights." Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand, "by the end of a period of seven nights (saptarātraparyantam)."

"every living thing" sarvasamucchrayaḥ: Literally, "everything that grows up." Cr, whom we follow, understands the term to refer to everything characterized by significant growth (ativṛddhiviśiṣṭam). Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct understand the term to refer to those living things, moving and fixed, that arise from that country. (carācaraprāṇimātram ity arthaḥ. ucchrayata udbhavaty asmād deśād ity ucchrayaḥ—so Ck and Cm; Cg and Ct similarly.) V3,B2,D1,3,4,10,11,T1,2,3,G3,M3,5,6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous sarvaṃ samucchrayam, while D6,7,T4, and KK and VSP read the similarly synonymous sarvasamucchrayam.

"throughout the length and breadth of Daṇḍa's realm" daṇḍasya viṣayo yāvat tāvat: Literally, "to whatever extent the realm of Daṇḍa, to that extent."

"will become invisible as if made of dust" pāṃsubhūta ivālakṣyaḥ: Literally, "not to be discerned as if having become dust." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pāṃsuvarṣam ivālakṣyam, "not to be discerned like a dust storm."

11. "inflamed with anger" krodhasaṃtaptaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead krodhatāmrākṣaḥ, "his eyes red with anger."

"the people who dwelt in the ashram" tam āśramanivāsinam / janam: Ñ2,B1,2,4, T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead tadāśramanivāsinam / janam, "the people who lived in his ashram."

"beyond the borders of this country" janapadānteṣu: Literally, "at the ends or borders of the country."

12. Ck, Cg, and Ct note that with this verse Agastya has now answered Rāma's earlier question as to how the forest came to be devoid of animals and birds (etāvatā kathaṃ tadamṛgadvijam ity asyottaraṃ nivṛttam). See verses 7.70.2–3.

"from Daṇḍa's realm" viṣayāt tasya: Literally, "from his realm." Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,7–12,M6, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead viṣayāt tasmāt, "from that realm."

"made their residence outside of it" sthānaṃ cakre 'tha bāhyataḥ: Literally, "[the people] made a place or dwelling outside."

13. The episode here is reminiscent of the well-known story of Gautama's curse of the more culpable Ahalyā at Bālakāṇḍa sarga 47 and Uttarakāṇḍa 30.17–37. In this story, Ahalyā is similarly punished by being made invisible to all creatures and instructed to perform protracted austerities in a deserted ashram. See, especially, 1.47.29 and 7.30.34. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand this verse to begin the answer to Rāma's question as to why Agastya had entered the deserted forest to perform austerities (atha nirjanaṃ vanaṃ kathaṃ tapase praviṣṭa ity asyottaram āha—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

"you stupid girl" durmedhe: Literally, "O one of bad intelligence or little wisdom." Cs acknowledges the meaning and form of the term (feminine vocative) but cites grammatical and lexical sources according to which the term medhas can mean, depending on its gender, either intelligence or sacrifice. He then offers as an alternative that we understand the term as a masculine locative bahuvrīhi compound in the sense of "having poor or no sacrifices" and modifying āśrame, lending the phrase the sense "in this ashram in which there will be no sacrifices." (he durmedhe durmedhaḥ. durmedhe ni[dur]yajñādimaty āśrama iti vā. asicbuddhiparyāyamedhāśabdasyeti jñāyate. strīliṅgaprajāśabdasāhacaryāt. yajñavācy ayaṃ puṃliṅgaḥ. medhaḥ kratau striyāṃ medhāmatāv iti viśvaḥ.)

"engaged in profound meditation" susamāhitā: Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "having become one possessed of auspicious meditation (śobhanasamādhimatī bhūtvety arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Ck, Cg, and Ct see the verse as explaining the reason why Arajā must practice meditation. It is necessary, they say, in order for her to expiate the sin she incurred by having been so stupid as to tolerate being raped by Daṇḍa. (samādhyanuṣṭhāne nimittam āha. durmedha iti. yasmād daṇḍadharṣaṇasahiṣṇur durmatir asi. atas tatpāpanivṛttaye samādhir āvaśyaka iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Cs argues, in the same vein, that her meditation in the ashram is to dispel the sin (etatpāpaparihārārthaṃ samāhitehāśrame vasa). Cr observes that Uśanas's instruction to his daughter suggests that she bears some measure of blame for the incident (etenārajāyā api kiṃcid aparādhaḥ sūcitaḥ).

14. "This lake . . . brilliantly clear for the distance of a league around" idaṃ yojanaparyantaṃ saraḥ surucira prabham: Like Ck, Cg, and Ct, we understand this to be a response to an implicit question of how it would be possible for Arajā to live in the midst of a dust storm (kathaṃ vastuṃ śakyaṃ pāṃsuvarṣa ity atrāha—idaṃ yojanaṃ paryantam ityādi—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly). We thus understand the idea to be that the sage has provided for a clear space free from dust extending for a yojana around the lake. This is also the understanding of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 583), who offers, "This lake shall be clear and pleasant for a distance of one yojana all around." All other translations consulted understand the reference to be simply to the dimensions of the lake, no doubt with reference to 7.68.4, where the lake is first described as "a league across (yojanāyatam)."

"Enjoying it" bhuṅkṣva: Literally, "enjoy." The object of the imperative verb must no doubt be saraḥ, "lake," although the exact sense is not clear. Probably the idea is that the lake and its clear area will provide Arajā with her means of livelihood. The commentators are not helpful here, and, among the translators consulted, only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 583) attempts to flesh out the expression, rendering, "You may live here without anxiety (eking out your livelihood from its resources)."

"without anxiety" vijvarā: The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"you must wait here for the proper time" kālaś cātra pratīkṣyatām: Literally, "And let the time be awaited here." The time referred to here is presumably that suggested by Cr, who glosses, "the time of the cessation of your transgression (aparādhanivṛttisamayaḥ)," although the sage has mentioned no terminus to the period of Arajā's expiation.

15. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand this verse to be a response to the implicit question as to how Agastya could have come to the forest near the lake to practice austerities when the region had been rendered toxic by Uśanas's curse. Thus Cr introduces the verse by saying: "But how could one live here given the instantly lethal nature of that ashram (nanv asyāśramasyāpy āśu vināśitvāt katham atra vāsa ity ata āha tvad iti)?" Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Agastya has come to the region of the lake to practice austerities because of its being a salutary environment thanks to the grace of Uśanas (evaṃ cośanaso 'nugraheṇa saraḥpradeśasya sukhāvahatvāt sukhavāsatvāc cātra tapase praviṣṭa iti bhāvaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

"whatever creatures" ye sattvāḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the reference to be to birds and animals (paśupakṣimṛgā ity arthaḥ—so Ck; Cg and Ct similarly).

"that night" tāṃ niśām: Presumably the sense is "before that night," that is to say, the night, that is, the seventh night, upon which the great dust storm will descend. Ck and

Ct suggest adding the phrase "within the period of seven nights (saptarātramadhye 'pīti śeṣaḥ)." See verses 7 and 10 above.d

"will be forever spared" avadhyāḥ . . . bhaviṣyanti nityadā: Literally, "They will be forever not to be killed." Presumably the idea is that the creatures will be safe so long as they remain in the clear area around the lake.

Following verse 15, Ś,Ñ1,V,B,D1–5,7–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ2 inserts following 16ab (first occurrence), a passage of two lines [1182*]: "When Bhārgava's deeply distraught daughter Arajā[1] had heard that seer's[2] command, she said to her father, the Bhārgava, 'So be it' (śrutvā niyogaṃ tasyarṣer arajā bhārgavī tadā / tatheti pitaraṃ prāha bhārgavaṃ bhṛśaduḥkhitā //)."

[1] "Bhārgava's . . . daughter Arajā" arajā bhārgavī: Literally, "Arajā Bhārgavī." Ñ1,V1, D1,2,4,7,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sārajā, "she, Arajā."

[2] "that seer's" tasyarṣeḥ: Literally, "of that seer." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead brahmarṣeḥ, "of the brahman-seer."

16. "he took up his residence elsewhere" vāsam anyatra samupākramat: Literally, "he went to a dwelling elsewhere." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samakārayat, "he arranged for," for samupākramat, "he went to," lending the line the sense "he arranged for a dwelling elsewhere."

"everything was reduced to ashes" bhasmasād bhūtam: Literally, "it became ashen." The critical reading is elliptical, as it fails to specify what is reduced to ashes. This ellipsis is remedied by the insertion of 1184* following 16ab (see below).

Following 16ab, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1184*]: "And that kingdom of the lord of men, along with his dependents, troops, and mounts, [was reduced to ashes] (tac ca rājyaṃ narendrasya bhṛtyabalavāhanam /)."

17. "This is that very realm of Daṇḍa" tasyāsau daṇḍaviṣayaḥ: It is difficult to construe the genitive pronoun tasya. Cr takes it as a reference to Daṇḍa himself and then, to avoid the obvious redundancy with the term daṇḍaviṣaya, "Daṇḍa's realm," glosses the compound as "that country characterized by the rod of punishment [daṇḍa] (tasya daṇḍasya daṇḍaviṣayo daṇḍaviśiṣṭadeśaḥ)." Cv similarly sees tasya as referring to the king (tasya rājñaḥ) and then appears to read the genitive as if it were an instrumental (tṛtīyā) functioning as the subject of the absolute construction. This yields the sense "when the unrighteous act had been committed by that king (tasya rājño vaidharmake kṛte)." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct all take the genitive to be used irregularly for the nominative, and we feel, on balance, that this is a preferable interpretation. Cm observes, "In the case of 'tasya,' this is a genitive in the sense of a nominative (tasyeti prathamārthe ṣaṣṭhī)." The others explain that the genitive is used irregularly and that the sense is "this is that very [kingdom]." (tasyāsau. vyatyayāṭ ṣaṣṭhī. so 'sāv ity arthaḥ.)

"between the peaks of the Vindhya and the Śaivala mountains" vindhyāśaivalaśānuṣu: Literally, "on the peaks of Vindhya and Śaivala." Apart from the geographical improbability of the literal rendering, we interpret in light of 7.70.16, where it is stated explicitly that the region lies between the two mountain ranges. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vindhyaśaivalayor nṛpa, "on or between the Vindhya and the Śaivala, O king."

"when that violation of righteousness had been committed." purā vaidharmake kṛte: Literally, "when that un-dharmic deed had been done." We follow the interpretation of Cm, who understands that the realm had been cursed when that perverted or unrighteous action had been committed by Daṇḍa and takes the phrase as an elliptical locative absolute (tena daṇḍena viparītadharme kṛte sati). This interpretation is similar to Cv's mentioned above. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the somewhat obscure variant vaidharmye sahite kṛte. The commentators struggle to interpret the awkward phrase. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term sahite to mean "possessed of complete righteousness and happiness" and take it as an adjective modifying kṛte, for which they gloss Kṛta Yuga. They thus read the verse to mean "This is that very kingdom that was cursed by the brahman-seer when the perversion of dharma had been committed by that king back in the Kṛta Yuga, which was possessed of complete righteousness and happiness (sahite pūrṇadharmapūrṇasaukhyasahite kṛte kṛtayuge tena rājñā vaidharmye dharmavaiparītye kṛte sati yo brahmarṣiṇā śaptaḥ so 'sāv ity anvayaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cr, taking advantage of the ambiguities of sandhi, proposes that we read not sahite but asahite, which he derives from the root √sah, "to bear or endure," glossing, "unbearable (asahanīye)." He thus interprets the pāda to mean "when that unbearable violation of dharma had been committed (asahite 'sahanīye vaidharmye kṛte sati)."

18. "while the area where the ascetics stayed likewise became 'Janasthāna' " tapasvinaḥ sthitā yatra janasthānam atho 'bhavat: Literally, "where the ascetics stay then likewise became Janasthāna ['the place of people']." V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hy atra, "since here," for yatra, "where," and ataḥ, "therefore or from then" for atho, "likewise." This lends the line the sense "Since ascetics are here, it therefore became 'Janasthāna.' " The variant reading is ambiguous in that it appears to suggest that the once deserted Daṇḍakāraṇya has now become repopulated and therefore renamed the Janasthāna, whereas we believe the Rāmāyaṇa and later traditions understand the Janasthāna to be an area within the Daṇḍakāraṇya. This area would be, we believe, the area around the lake, which was spared the devastation wrought on the rest of the region by Uśanas's curse.

19. "the sandhyā rites" sandhyām: See notes to verse 21 below.

20. "have performed their ablutions" kṛtodakāḥ: Literally, "those by whom the ablutions have been performed." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "having performed their rituals, starting with their ablution (kṛtodakāḥ kṛtasnānādikarmāṇa ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly)."

"the sun" ādityam: Literally, "Āditya."

21. "And those seers, the foremost of brahmans, all together are hymning the sun" sa tair ṛṣibhir abhyastaḥ sahitair brahmasattamaiḥ / raviḥ: Literally, "He, Ravi [the sun], being recited by the seers, the best of brahmans, together or by the seers together with the best of brahmans." The term abhyastaḥ, "practiced, repeated, or studied," seems ill suited to the context. However, in the context of the sandhyāvandana, the worship of the sun at sunset, we believe it must be understood in the sense of "hymned." No commentator or printed edition reads with the critical text. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa tair brāhmaṇam abhyastaṃ sahitair brahmavittamaiḥ / raviḥ. This reading is elliptical, and Ck, Cg, and Ct supply the gerund prāpya, "having received," and the object pūjām, "worship." Ck and Cg understand that this worship is characterized by practices suitable to brahmans, that is to say, the practice of the vedas, mantras, tantra, and yoga (abhyastaṃ brāhmaṇaṃ brahmamantratantrayogābhyāsalakṣaṇapūjāṃ prāpyeti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg). Ct understands the term abhyastam to refer to worship characterized by the repetition or recitation of the knowledge taught in the upaniṣads, which are studied by the brahmans (abhyastaṃ brāhmaṇaṃ brāhmaṇapaṭhitopaniṣadbodhitajñānābhyāsaṃ tallakṣaṇāṃ pūjāṃ prāpyeti śeṣaḥ). Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term sahitaiḥ to mean "gathered near the bathing spot (tīrthasamīpe saṃgataiḥ)." Cr takes a quite different tack, understanding the adjective brāhmaṇam, "brahmanical," to qualify udakam, the water of the lake, which is nearby and is resorted to, that is to say, prescribed, by the brahmans. This is the water in which Rāma is instructed to bathe. (brāhmaṇaṃ brahmopadiṣṭam abhyastaṃ samīpavarty udakam upa- spṛśa ca.) Cr glosses sahitaiḥ as "assembled or having become an assembly (saṅghībhūtaiḥ)." Thus Cr's understanding of the verse is as follows: "The sun has set; therefore you must go along with the assembled brahman-seers, who are the foremost knowers of the veda, and you must bathe in the nearby water that is brahmanical, that is, resorted to, that is to say, prescribed, by the brahmans (ravir astaṃgato 'taḥ sahitaiḥ saṅghībhūtair brahmavittamair brahmarṣibhiḥ saha gaccha brāhmaṇaṃ brahmopadiṣṭam abhyastaṃ samīpavarty udakam upaspṛśa ca)."

"perform your ablutions" udakam upaspṛśa: Literally, "touch or sip water." The verb upa + √spṛṣ is often used in the sense of "to bathe ritually."

Sarga 73

1. "approached" upākrāmat: D6,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press oddly read instead apākrāmat, the normal sense of which would be "he withdrew or went away from." Here, however, as Cr notes, it must be taken in the sense of "he went to or he approached (apākrāmad agacchat)."

"frequented by apsarases" apsarobhir niṣevitam: D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead apsaroganasevitam, "frequented by hosts of apsarases."

"the sandhyā rites" sandhyām: See notes to 7.72.21.

2. "the evening sandhyā rites" sandhyām . . . paścimām: Literally, "the western twilight rites or worship of the sun at sunset." See notes to 7.72.21.

"of the . . . pot-born sage" kumbhayoneḥ: Literally, "of the one whose womb or origin was a pot." The reference is, of course, to Agastya. See notes to 7.2.1; 1127*, lines 9–10, following notes to 7.67.5; 7.67.8; and 7.69.22.

3. "many kinds of fruits and roots as well as herbs" bahuguṇaṃ phalamūlaṃ tathauṣadhīḥ: V1,D10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kandamūlam. The term kanda refers to tuberous roots, such as radishes, or to edible bulbs, such as onions. The commentators understand the compound kandamūla in the sense of "a root in the form of a kanda, i.e., radish (kandamūlaṃ kandarūpaṃ mūlaṃ kandamūlam—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)." The term kandamūla is found in a list of roots in the Rājanighaṇṭu (7.14 Mūlakādivarga). D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tathauṣadham, "and an herb as well," while M3 and KK and VSP read tathauṣadhim, "and an herb as well." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the singular term to refer to a specific divine, antiaging herb that eliminates aging and gray hair. (auṣadhiṃ divyauṣadhirūpam. jarāpalitaghnam ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly.) Cs goes into the botanical details here more fully than do the other commentators. He quotes Ct's generic remark but then proposes to read the compound as a dvandva, in the sense of kanda and mūla. Citing the Viśvakośa, he identifies kandaḥ as the edible root sūraṇa (Amorphophallus campanulatus—elephant [foot] yam), etc., and, citing the same source, he identifies mūla as śiphā, perhaps the edible root of a water lily or lotus or a turmeric root. Cs defines auṣadham (v.l.) as curative herbs such as the amṛtavallī (Cocculus cordifolius) and perhaps identical with the amṛtalaṭā, for which Apte (s.v.) gives the Marathi name guḍūcī. (kandamūlaṃ kandarūpaṃ mūlam iti nāgojibhaṭṭaḥ. kandaḥ sūraṇādiḥ kandas tu sūraṇe sasyamūle jaladhare 'pi ceti viśvaḥ. mūlaṃ śiphā. mūlam ādye śiphāyāṃ syād iti viśvaḥ. auṣadham ārogyadam amṛtavallyādi.)

"and wholesome vegetables" śākāni ca pavitrāṇi: Literally, "and pure vegetables or greens." D10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śālyādīni, "rice, etc." Cs glosses this variant as "divine rice, etc. (śālyādīni divyataṇḍulādīni)."

4. "he spent the night there" tāṃ rātriṃ samupāvasat: Literally, "he spent that night fasting." Ś,Ñ,V,B1,2,4,D1,4,7,8,10–12,T2–4,G1,M1,3,10, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samupāviśat, "he passed or spent [the night]." It is not clear why the editors of the critical edition chose to reject this reading, which is attested in all recensions.

5. "After rising early in the morning" prabhāte kālyam utthāya: Literally, "having arisen in the morning at daybreak or in a timely fashion." We understand the word kālyam here adverbially in the sense of "early." This use of the term in this phrase or similar ones is seen in a number of places in the epic. The exact phrase is found in at least two other places (1.71.20 and 7.68.7), while the phrase kālyam utthāya occurs at 2.23.27 and 2.83.1 and the similar utthitaḥ kālyam is found at 4.15.7. See, too, notes to 6.68.7. Our interpretation is shared by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 584), who renders, "Getting up early in the morning." The context here, however, also permits taking the term kālyam adjectivally to modify āhnikam, yielding the sense "matutinal daily rites." This is the interpretation of Cg, Ct, and Cr, who gloss, "daily rites belonging to the morning time (kālyaṃ prātaḥkālikam āhnikam)." This interpretation is followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 603), who offers, "ayant accompli les rites du matin." He, in turn, is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 594), who translates, "having performed the morning rituals," and Benoît (1999, p. 1392), who renders, "accomplit les rites matinaux."

"performing" kṛtvā: Literally, "having performed." The word is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"for permission to depart" gamanāya: Literally, "for going or setting out." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand, "in order to secure permission for going (gamanāyānujñāṃ grahītum—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)."

6. "the great pot-born seer" maharṣiṃ kumbhasaṃbhavam: See notes to verse 2 above.

"I would depart, and so I beg of you" āpṛcche tvāṃ gamiṣyāmi: Literally, "I ask you, I will go." The words tvām, "you," and gamiṣyāmi, "I will go," are marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead the somewhat odd svāśramaṃ gantum for tvām gamiṣyāmi, lending the line the sense "I ask [you], please grant me permission to go to my own ashram." Cs offers a sort of psychological explanation as to why Rāma would refer to his city as an ashram. He explains: "His own ashram is his own city. One must understand that Rāma uses the phrase 'my own ashram' because he is in the grip of indifference to all worldly objects after having abandoned Sītā because of the disposition of the people. (svāśramaṃ svanagarīm. sītāṃ lokarityā tyaktavato rāmasya viraktivaśāt svāśramam ity uktir iti mantavyam.)" Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the more contextually apposite svāṃ purīṃ gantum, "to go to my own city."

7. "such a great personage as you" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the great [one]."

"here to see you in order to purify myself" draṣṭum . . . pāvanārtham ihātmanaḥ: Literally, "to see for the purpose of the purification of myself here." V2,B4,D7,9–11,T2, and GPP and NSP read mahātmanaḥ, "of the great one," for ihātmanaḥ, "here . . . of myself." Ck, Cg, and Ct flesh out the elliptical expression, explaining: "The meaning is that he said, 'I shall return for the purification of myself even later whenever there is the desire' (ataḥ param api yadākāṅkṣā tadātmanaḥ pāvanārtham āgamiṣyāmīty uktavān ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)." Cs understands that Rāma refers to his own purification from a worldly perspective, while from the perspective of his being the essential inner-being [of all] it refers to the purification of Agastya (pāvanārthaṃ lokadṛṣṭyā mamāntaraṅgikatayā tava pāvanārtham ity arthaḥ).

8. "these words—so marvelous to apprehend" vākyam adbhutadarśanam: Literally, "speech, the sight of which was marvelous." Here, of course, the term darśana, normally "sight or visual perception," must be taken generally in the sense of perception.

"the sage, so rich in austerities" tapodhanaḥ: Literally, "the [one] who has asceticism for wealth."

"who viewed all through the eye of righteousness" dharmanetraḥ: The compound is ambiguous, and its interpretation depends on how one understands the term netra. The word basically means "leader or guide" and is most commonly used in its more restricted sense of "the eye [i.e., that which leads or guides]." Thus the compound can mean "guide or leader in dharma" or "having dharma for his guide," or, if one takes the latter sense, as "he who has dharma for his eye" or "whose eye is on dharma." Cr chooses the first interpretation. He glosses, "a leader, that is, a promoter, of dharma, that is, Agastya (dharmanetro dharmapravarttako 'gastyaḥ)." Cs, somewhat similarly to Cr, understands, "a guide or governor with respect to righteous action." He then compares the compound to the term prajñānetraḥ, "having wisdom for [one's only] guide." (yadvā dharmanetro dharmakaraṇe niyāmakaḥ. prajñānetraśabdavad ayaṃ śabdaḥ.) Ck, Cg, and Ct take the term to mean that Agastya possesses a special form of dharma as his eye. Cg simply refers to this faculty as dharma, which he defines as the means for acquiring knowledge. (dharmo netraṃ jñānasādhanaṃ yasya sa tathā.) Ct expands somewhat, explaining, "he who has dharma, that is, the dharma consisting of yoga, which is the eye that is the means to omniscience (dharmo yogadharmo netraṃ sarvajñānasādhanaṃ cakṣur yasya saḥ)." Ck's gloss is the same as Ct's, with the prefixation of the term "brahma" to the compound yogadharmaḥ, lending the compound the sense "he who has that dharma that consists of yoga concentrated upon Brahman (dharmo brahmayogadharmo netraṃ sarvajñānasādhanaṃ cakṣur yasya saḥ)."

"supremely delighted" paramaprītaḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct propose that we add the words "because of [Rāma's] courteous or modest words in this fashion (evaṃ vinayavacanād iti śeṣaḥ)."

9. "extremely wonderful" atyadbhutam: Cr notes that Rāma's words to the effect that he would return to the ashram to be purified are wonderful in light of the fact that he is, himself, the one who purifies all beings (tvam eva sarvabhūtānāṃ pāvanaḥ svataḥ pāvanakarttāta idaṃ pāvanārtham āgamiṣyāmīti vākyam atyadbhutam).

"each of their syllables mellifluous" śubhākṣaram: Literally, "having lovely or auspicious syllables."

"It is you alone . . . who purify all the worlds" pāvanaḥ sarvalokānāṃ tvam eva: Literally, "you, alone, are the purification of all worlds." Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D,3,4,G1,2,M7, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarvabhūtānām, "of all beings," for sarvalokānām, "of all worlds." Ct understands that in uttering these words, Agastya is taking to heart the identity of Rāma as the Supreme Being, Brahman (athāgastyo rāmasya brahmatvaṃ hṛdikṛtyāha). Ck more elaborately explains, "Agastya, recognizing, that is to say, placing in his heart, Rāma's supreme nature characterized by the state of being a portion of the blazing energy of Brahman, says [the verse beginning with pāvanaḥ] (asāv agastyo rāmasya paramaṃ tattvaṃ brahmatejoñgatvalakṣaṇaṃ vijñāya hṛdikṛtyāha)." Both commentators then quote Yājñavalkyasmṛti 3.34 to the effect that the highest form of purity or sanctification of the [individual] soul (kṣetrajña) is considered to arise from knowledge of the Lord (kṣetrajñasyeśvarajñānād viśuddhiḥ paramā matā). Cs argues that Agastya utters these words because he cannot bear the apparent or external meaning of [Rāma's] statement that [he will return] for purification. Cs further notes that the real meaning of this is summed up according to the passage from the Viṣṇusahasranāmastotra (MBh 13.135.10) beginning with the words "whoever knows [Viṣṇu] as the purifier/sanctifier of all purifiers/sanctifiers." (pāvanārtham ity uktasya bāhyārtham asahamāno 'gastya āha pāvana iti. pavitrāṇāṃ pavitraṃ ya iti mānād iti bhāvaḥ.)

10. "And all who see you" ye nu paśyanti kecana: Literally, "indeed those who see." G2,M2,6,10, and KK and VSP read instead ye ca paśyanti kecana, "and those who see," while GPP, NSP, and Gita Press all read ye 'nupaśyanti kecana, "those who contemplate."

It is not clear, however, how one would distinguish the two possible readings absent an avagraha or other indicator in the manuscripts. Ck and Ct, both of whom understand the verb to be paśyanti, argue that we should read it in two different senses to refer both to those who contemplate Rāma in their minds in his true state as Brahman and to those who physically see his playful incarnate form as Viṣṇu. (ye tvaṃ paśyanti citte svatattvabrahmatayā paśyantīty arthaḥ. tava līlāvatāramūrtiṃ viṣṇutvena cakṣuṣā ca ye paśyantīty arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly.) For other avagraha issues, see notes to 7.6.9,32; 99*, note 6, following notes to 7.6.32; and 7.30.31.

"purified" pāvitāḥ: Ck and Ct add the phrase "by both meditation on and sight of you (tvaddhyānadarśanābhyām iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly)." Cr understands the form here in an active sense to mean "purifiers," literally, "agents of purification" (pāvitāḥ pāvanakartāraḥ santaḥ).

"and attain heaven . . . they" svargabhūtās te: Literally, "they become heaven." Ck and Ct gloss, "They attain heaven either immediately or in the future, that is, upon the end of their corporeal bodies (dehānte svargabhūtāḥ param aparaṃ vā svargaṃ prāptāḥ)." Cg glosses simply, "They attain heaven (svargaṃ prāptāḥ)." Cs understands the phrase differently. He believes that the term svarga here refers to heavenly happiness and takes the compound to mean "extremely happy." He bases this on the saying that "the word svar refers to happiness," and so here the word svarga must be taken in the sense of "happiness that is like heaven." (svargabhūtāḥ sukharūpiṇas tat sukhaṃ svaḥpadāspadam ity ukteḥ svargasyeva sukhasyāpi svargaśabdavācyatvasaṃbhavāt.)

"heaven where they are worshiped by the divinities" pūjyante divi daivataiḥ: Literally, "they are worshiped in heaven by the divinities." D6,7,10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read pūjyās te, "they are worthy of worship," for pūjyante, "they are worshiped." Ñ2,B1,3,D6,7,10,11,M6, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tridiveśvaraiḥ, "by the lords of the third or highest heaven," for divi daivataiḥ, "in heaven by the divinities." KK and VSP as well as Ck and Ct read sarvadevataiḥ, "by all the divinities," for divi daivataiḥ, "in heaven by the divinities." Ct observes that what is stated here is the fruit of a favorable look at [Rāma] (evam anukūladṛṣṭeḥ phalam uktam).

11. Ct correctly, in our opinion, sees this verse as describing the consequences of looking upon Rāma in a way contrary to that described in the previous verse. He appears, however, to be somewhat concerned at the harshness of the punishment expressed here. This is, no doubt, in light of the Vaiṣṇava concept of dveṣabhakti, whereby even beings who are obsessed with hatred of the Lord, figures such as Rāvaṇa, Pūtanā, Śiśupāla, etc., nonetheless attain salvation through their mental focus on or close proximity to him. He explains the verse as follows: "Now he expresses the [fruit] of looking upon [the Lord] in a hostile manner. By using the general term "living beings," he indicates that even when [those beings] have the power of asceticism, they will go to hell merely through hostility toward you [Rāma]. However, by stating that these [beings] go suddenly, that is to say, at that very moment, to hell, it is suggested that at a subsequent time, even when there is such a going, they will still come to enjoy heaven and liberation through the virtue of a sight of you. (atha pratikūladṛṣṭes tad āha—ye ceti. prāṇina iti sāmānyoktyā tapaḥprabhāve saty api tvaddveṣamātreṇa nirayagāmitoktā. parantu te sadyas tatkṣaṇam eva nirayagāmina ity uktyā kālāntare tādṛśarītyāpi tvaddarśanamāhātmyāt te svargamokṣabhāja iti sūcitam.)"

"who look upon" ye . . . īkṣante: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous ye . . . paśyanti, "they who see or look upon."

"go straight to hell" sadyo nirayagāminaḥ: Literally, "go immediately to niraya." Cr views the temporal sequence somewhat differently. In his understanding, those who take a hostile view of Rāma go to hell and there are beaten with the rod of Yama, rather than being killed by Yama, and then transported to hell (ye prāṇino ghoracakṣurbhis tvāṃ paśyanti te nirayagāminaḥ santo yamadaṇḍena hatā bhavantīti śeṣaḥ).

Following verse 11, Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–7,9–11,T,G,M1–3,5–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while M4 inserts after 8ab, a passage of two lines [1188*]: "Such are you, foremost of the Raghus, the purifier[1] of all embodied beings. And those who even tell about you[2] on earth will attain final emancipation,[3] Rāghava." (īdṛśas tvaṃ raghuśreṣṭha pāvanaḥ sarvadehinām / bhuvi tvāṃ kathayanto 'pi siddhim eṣyanti rāghava //)"

[1] "the purifier" pāvanaḥ: Ct glosses, "one whose inherent nature is the state of being a purifier distinguished from all others (itaravilakṣaṇapāvanatvasvabhāvaḥ)." Ck glosses, "the supreme purifier, consisting of supreme bliss, whose inherent nature is Brahman (paramapāvanaḥ paramānando brahmasvabhāvaḥ)."

[2] "who even tell about you" tvāṃ kathayanto 'pi: Literally, "even [those] speaking or telling about you." Ñ1,V1,B3,D2,6,7,9–11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hi, "for," for [a]pi, "even." Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to those who recite Rāma's carita, "deeds or tale" (tvaccaritaṃ kīrtayantaḥ). Cs notes the distinction between those who actually see Rāma now and those who, unable to see him, merely recite his deeds, noting that both groups attain liberation. (dṛṣṭvedānīṃ vimucyante. pārokṣe tvāṃ kathayantas tvaccaritam udāharanto janāḥ siddhiṃ muktim eṣyanti.) Ct continues, understanding that those who speak about Rāma, even out of any of the negative emotions such as passion, enmity, desire, or fear, nonetheless ultimately attain liberation (ye tvāṃ rāgadveṣakāmabhayānyatamair api kathayantas te siddhiṃ mokṣaṃ gamiṣyanti).

[3] "those . . . will attain . . . final emancipation" siddhim eṣyanti: Literally, "they will go to perfection or final beatitude." Ck understands the phrase to mean: "Because of their extreme purity, they will gradually obtain the supreme supernatural powers characterized by equanimity (śodhotkarṣāt sāmyatālakṣaṇaparamasiddhīḥ kramāt prāpnuvantīty arthaḥ)." Ct glosses, "By means of the purity of their minds, they will go to, that is, will attain, final beatitude in the form of becoming Brahman (siddhiṃ brahmatārūpāṃ cittaśuddhidvāraiṣyanti prāpsyanti)." Cg similarly understands, "Siddhi is the highest state of being, that is, the state of Brahman (siddhiṃ paramaṃ tattvaṃ brahmabhāvam)."

12. "So go safely and confidently on your journey, free from all dangers." gaccha cāriṣṭam avyagraḥ panthānam akutobhayam: This line is almost identical to 2.31.26, and its first pāda is closely similar to 1.23.3a and 3.7.11a. It seems to be a formulaic blessing on behalf of someone about to set out on a journey. The term ariṣṭam, "safe, secure, or uninjured," can be taken here adverbially in the sense of "safely," as we have done. This is the interpretation of Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct, who understand the term here to mean "comfortably or happily (sukham)." It can also be taken as an adjective modifying panthānam, "path or journey," as Cr has done. He glosses, "Go on a path that is 'ariṣṭa,' that is, 'free from obstacles,' and therefore 'free from danger' (ariṣṭaṃ vighnarahitam ata evākutobhayaṃ panthānaṃ tvaṃ gaccha)." Ñ1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the virtually synonymous tvaṃ gacchāriṣṭam, "you should go safely." See 1.23.3; 2.31.26; 3.7.11; and note to 2.31.26. Compare 5.1.179 and 6.55.120. Compare, too, MBh 1.24.9; 1.136.19; and Appendix I, No. 114, line 457, following MBh 1.212.1. On the term ariṣṭa, see Renou 1939, especially p. 7.

"For you, sir, are the recourse of all the world." gatir hi jagato bhavān: Literally, "For you are the path or recourse of the world." Ct glosses the term gatiḥ as "the means of going to heaven, etc. (gatiḥ svargādigatisādhanam)."

13. "extended his arms with his hands cupped in reverence" prāñjaliḥ pragrahaḥ: Literally, "with hands cupped in reverence, holding in front or stretching forth." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss "having extended his arms (udyatabāhuḥ)" for pragrahaḥ, "stretching forth."

This phrase is used elsewhere in the Uttarakāṇḍa in the sense given here. See 7.47.10; 7.50.7; 7.90.15; and notes.

"of holy conduct" puṇyaśīlinam: The element puṇya- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11,M7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead satyaśīlinam, "of truthful conduct." T2,M4, and KK and VSP read instead puṇyaśālinam, "rich in merit or holiness."

14. "that foremost of sages" muniśreṣṭham: D3,6,7,10,11,T2,M1,2,4,5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ṛṣiśreṣṭham, "foremost of seers."

"those sages, so rich in austerities" tān . . . tapodhanān: Literally, "those who have asceticism for wealth."

"calmly" avyagraḥ: Literally, "steady or not agitated." Compare verse 12 above, where we translate avyagraḥ as "confidently."

15. "thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣam: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

16. "Comfortably mounted" svasthaḥ: Literally, "at ease or comfortable." Among the printed editions consulted, only Lahore (7.84.17) reads with the critical edition. Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the orthographically (in nāgarī) similar khasthaḥ, "situated in the sky or air," a reading that appears to comport better with the simile of the moon abutting the clouds at the onset of the rains. For some reason, this reading is not attested in the critical apparatus, which only reports a single instance of a variant (D3, svasthaṃ dadṛśire rāmam, "they saw Rāma, who was composed"). Gorresio (1870, p. 255) reads khasthaḥ and translates, "Stando su per l'aria." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 604) renders, "Debut dans les airs." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 594), who offers, "Standing in space." Benoît (1999, p. 1392) translates, "Survolant les cieux." Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 895) reads khasthaḥ, but nonetheless renders, "well-composed." Both Dutt (1894, p. 1885) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 585) ignore the term completely.

"resembled the hare-marked moon abutting the clouds" śaśī meghasamīpastho yathā: Literally, "like the one with the hare or rabbit located in the vicinity of a cloud or clouds." Cr claims that this simile suggests that Rāma was revered by all (etenopamālaṃkāreṇa rāmaḥ sarvair namaskṛto 'bhūd iti sūcitam). The simile is an awkward one, as it compares the juxtaposition of the dark-complected Rāma and the brightly gilded puṣpaka with the image of the bright moon against the dark storm clouds of the monsoon.

"at the onset of the rainy season" jaladharāgame: Literally, "at the approach of the water bearer (i.e., cloud) or water bearers (i.e., clouds)."

17. "who was honored all along the way" pūjyamānas tatas tataḥ: Literally, "[he] being honored from that [and] from that or here and there." We follow Cr, who glosses, "at place after place honored (tatra tatra pūjyamānaḥ)."

"descended from the flying palace" vimānād avarohata: Note the loss of the preterite augment. Ñ2,B3,4,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead madhyakakṣām avātarat, "he descended to the middle enclosure or courtyard." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous madhyakakṣyām avāruhat. In connection with these variants, Ck, Cg, and Ct suggest adding a second gerund, prāpya, "having reached," after madhyakakṣ[y]ām so that the line would mean "having reached Ayodhyā, Kākutstha, having reached the middle courtyard, descended" (madhyakakṣyāṃ prāpyeti śeṣaḥ—Ck and Cg; Ct similarly). Cr understands, "Having reached Ayodhyā, he descended to, that is, reached, the middle courtyard (ayodhyāṃ prāpya madhyakakṣām avātarat prāpnot)."

18. "After dismissing" visṛjya: Literally, "having discharged or released." Ct explains as follows: " 'Having dismissed' means 'having rendered it devoid of himself,' that is to say, 'having caused it to be dismissed,' in other words, 'having instructed it: "Now, carry Kubera." ' " (visṛjya svarahitaṃ kṛtvā. visarjayitvā. kuberaṃ vahety anujñāya.)" Cs, as he does so often, takes advantage of the sandhi environment to understand the negative of the gerund. He thus argues that Rāma instructs the Puṣpaka not to abandon or repudiate Kubera but rather to remain with [him]. (avisṛjya. kuberam iti śeṣaḥ. atyaktvātiṣṭha.)

"which moved at its master's will" kāmagāminam: Literally, "going according to will or desire. B2,4,T1,2,G3, and KK and VSP read instead the neuter equivalent, kāmagāmi tat, "that one which moved at will." Cs remarks on what he sees as the impropriety of the neuter gender here in light of the fact that the word puṣpaka is masculine. He thus argues that the correct reading would be the masculine form kāmagāminam [which is found in the critical edition]. (puṣpakaśabdaḥ puṃsy api. tena kāmagāminam iti yujyate.) See 293*, note 1, following notes to 7.15.30; 7.16.4; 7.23.24; 7.25.10; and notes. See, too, 6.72.12; and notes; and 3071*, note 1, following notes to 6.96.29.

"who was posted in the inner courtyard" kakṣyāntaravinikṣiptam: Literally, "deposited in the interior of the courtyard." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kakṣāntarasthitaṃ kṣipram, lending the line the sense "quickly said these words to the gatekeeper, who was stationed in the inner courtyard."

Following 18ab, D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1192*]: "And the lord, having caused [the Puṣpaka] to be dismissed [with the words]: 'Go, may all be well with you . . . [1] (visarjayitvā gaccheti svasti te 'stv iti ca prabhuḥ)."

[1] "And the lord, having caused [the Puṣpaka] to be dismissed [with the words]: 'Go, may all be well with you . . . ' " visarjayitvā gaccheti svasti te 'stv iti ca prabhuḥ: Cs now argues that the causative gerund visarjayitvā, "having caused to release or be dismissed," construes properly with the imperative "Go." In this way he concludes that the other [gerund, i.e., visṛjya of 18a] is not rendered meaningless, nor does the construction become forced or unintelligible (gaccheti visarjayitvety anvayaḥ. ato nānyataravaiyarthyaṃ na kliṣṭakalpanā ca.)

19. "Go . . . report . . . and summon them" gatvā . . . /. . . ākhyāya śabdāpaya ca: Literally, "having gone . . . having told . . . cause [them] to be called." Ś,V3,D1–5,7,8,10–12,T1,2,G3,M5–7, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the plural, śabdāpayata, "[you] cause [them] to be called," for the singular śabdāpaya. The commentators differ slightly as to how to understand the causative plural śabdāpayata. Ct first glosses, "The meaning is 'You [i.e., the doorkeeper] must summon through the agency of the chamberlain.' " He regards the use of the plural as irregular and finally states, "The meaning is 'You must cause a summons to be made.' " (dauvārikeṇāhvayasvety arthaḥ. bahuvacanam ārṣam. āhvānaṃ kārayety arthaḥ.) Cr supplies the plural pronoun yūyam, "you," as the subject of the causal (āhūyata yūyam iti śeṣaḥ). Ck understands that both the causative marker puk (the letter "p" in śabdāpayata) and the plural are irregular and that "The meaning is 'You [singular] must make a summons.' " (pugārṣaḥ. āhvānaṃ kurv ity arthaḥ. bahuvacanaṃ cārṣaḥ.) Cg agrees that both the causative marker puk and the plural are irregular, glossing, "The meaning is 'Make yourself the speaker.' " (pugārṣaḥ. ātmānaṃ śabdavantaṃ kurv ity arthaḥ. bahuvacanam ārṣam.) Cs believes that the occurrence of the plural here is to be explained as an idiosyncratic usage (prātisvikoktir iyam iti bahuvacanopapattiḥ).

2. "beloved" priyau: B3,4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ubhau, "both or those two."

3. "I have faithfully accomplished this unsurpassed task for the twice-born brahman." kṛtaṃ mayā yathātathyaṃ dvijakāryam anuttamam: Literally, "The unsurpassed mission of the twice-born [one] has been accomplished by me in accordance with truthfulness." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, Rāma is referring to the revivification of the brahman's child through the execution of Śambūka as narrated at 7.67. They explain, "What needed to be done for the twice-born has been done just as promised. The meaning is that the child has been brought back to life. (dvijakāryaṃ yathā pratijñātaṃ tathā tathyaṃ kṛtam. bāla ujjīvita ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.)"

"And therefore, Rāghavas, I now wish to firmly establish the bulwark of righteousness." dharmasetum ato bhūyaḥ kartum icchāmi rāghavau: Literally, "O you two Rāghavas, I wish once again therefore to make a limit or barrier of dharma or a dharma-barrier." The word ataḥ, "therefore," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ1,V1,3,B2,D5–7,10,11,G,M2,4,7,8,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead atho, "now," for ataḥ, "therefore." The commentators are in agreement that the term dharmasetu refers to the rājasūya, or the ritual of royal consecration, whereby a king establishes his universal sovereignty. Ck, Ct, and Cs all quote a vidhi to the effect that a king should sacrifice by means of the rājasūya [to establish] a limit for dharma. They then argue that the dharmasetu is the defining mark of righteous ritual practice of kings and that it is nothing other than that rite which is specific to kings, that is, the rājasūya. The meaning is that it is not a general practice of righteousness. (dharmasetuṃ teneṣṭvā rājā rājasūyena yajeta . . . iti rājani vyavasthāpitayāgatvād rājñāṃ yāgadharmamaryādābhūtam asādhāraṇadharmabhūtam ity arthaḥ—so Ck.) Rāma will mention the rājasūya by name in verse 4 below. Ct and Cg express a similar idea, evidently derived from Ck, but more succinctly. Cs similarly understands the term to refer to the ritual in the form of the limitations imposed upon kings by the vidhi quoted above. He then argues that what is being stated here is Rāma's desire to perform rituals in an exemplary fashion for others to follow. This, he claims, is in accordance with the engagement of Lord Kṛṣṇa himself in karma as expressed at Bhagvadgītā 3.23, which he quotes. The point of this verse is that if he, i.e., Kṛṣṇa, did not vigilantly engage in action, men would follow that negative example. Cs concludes that therefore Rāma's purpose here is purely exemplary and that he does not propose to sacrifice for the sake of any as yet unattained reward. (dharmasetuṃ rājā rājasūyena yajetetyādibodhitarājamaryādārūpaṃ karma. yadi hy ahaṃ na varteyaṃ jātu karmaṇy atandritaḥ / mama vartmānuvartante manuṣyāḥ pārthā sarvaśa ity ukter īśvarasyāpītarapravṛttaye karmānuṣṭhānaṃ vihitam iti kartum icchāmīty uktiḥ. na tv aprāptaphalalābhārtham iti bhāvaḥ.)

On the rājasūya sacrifice, see 7.25.8 and notes.

Following verse 3, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [1193*]: "I believe that this bulwark of righteousness is imperishable and immutable.[1] It is productive of righteousness[2] and destroys all sins. (akṣayaś cāvyayaś caiva dharmasetur mato mama / dharmaprasavanaṃ tv etat sarvapāpapraṇāśanam //)"

[1] "imperishable and immutable" akṣayaś cāvyayaś caiva: KK and VSP read the slight variant akṣayyaḥ for akṣayaḥ. Ct and Cr explain the two similar terms as referring to the benefits of the sacrifice. Ct understands the first to refer to the rite's production of fruits that are suitable for enjoyment for a long time and the second to the rite's being the cause of other similar righteous practices. (akṣayo bahukālānubhavayogyaphalatvāt. avyayaḥ sajātīyadharmāntarahetutvāt.) Ct concludes this analysis by stating, "Such is the performance of the rājasūya, what else need be said? (rājasūyānuṣṭhānam evaṃbhūtam iti kiṃ vaktavyam.)" Cr, who reads the variant dharmapravacanam (see below), understands that because the rājasūya is accompanied by a great deal of debate on dharma, it is destructive of all sins and therefore is imperishable (akṣayaḥ), that is to say, it must be practiced for a long time, and it is immutable (avyayaḥ) in that it is continually fruitful (yato dharmapravacanaṃ prabhūtadharmacarcā sarvapāpapraṇāśanaṃ bhavaty ato 'kṣayo bahukālasādhyo 'vyayo nityaphalakaḥ).

[2] "It is productive of righteousness" dharmaprasavanaṃ tv etat: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dharmapravacanaṃ caiva, "and it is [replete] with discourses on dharma." Ck and Ct understand the term dharmapravacanam to refer to Rāma's own praising of the righteousness of the rājasūya, which is in fact the bulwark (mama maryādābhūtarājasūyadharmasaṃkīrtanaṃ cety arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly). Ct suggests that Rāma's praising of the rājasūya will confer the benefits of the rite upon those who simply hear about it. We infer this from his quotation of the often-repeated vedic formula "whoever knows this [gains the benefits of it] (ya u cainam evaṃ vedeti śruteḥ)." KK and VSP read dharmaprasādhakaṃ hy etat, "bringing about dharma," for dharmaprasavanaṃ tv etat. Cg glosses this as "increasing dharma (dharmavardhakam ity arthaḥ)." Cg notes the variant of Ck and Ct.

4. "to perform" yaṣṭum: Literally, "to sacrifice or to offer."

"with both of you, who are my second selves" yuvābhyām ātmabhūtābhyām: Literally, "with you two, who are myself." Cs glosses, "equal to [my] life breaths (prāṇasamābhyām)." Lakṣmaṇa is several times referred to as "a second life breath outside Rāma's body." See, for example, 1.17.17; 3.32.13; 6.19.24; and notes. Cf. 6.40.46.

"for" hi: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tu, "and."

"in this" tatra: Literally, "there." Cs takes the adverb as a kind of shorthand for a locative absolute (sati saptamī) phrase, "when that is done (tasmin kṛte)."

"everlasting righteousness" dharmaḥ . . . śāśvataḥ: Cs glosses, "it is eternally meritorious (śāśvatikaṃ puṇyaṃ bhavati)."

5. "it was by sacrificing with the rājasūya rite" iṣṭvā . . . rājasūyena: Literally, "having sacrificed with the rājasūya." Compare verse 6 below. On the rājasūya sacrifice, see 7.25.8 and notes.

"attained the position of Varuṇa" varuṇatvam upāgamat: Literally, "He reached the state of being Varuṇa." The idea is that Mitra, in fact, became Varuṇa. We are following Cs, who explains, "Mitra, who was fit for his [Varuṇa's] position, attained Varuṇa-ness. (mitras tatpadayogyaḥ. varuṇatvam upāgamat.)" On Mitra sharing Varuṇa's position, see 7.51-7*.11 and notes. It is a commonplace of ancient Indian mythological thought that the various vedic divinities attain and hold their specific positions by virtue of the ritual actions they have performed in previous existences. Thus, for example, Indra is frequently referred to as śatakratu, "of the hundred sacrifices," indicating that he attained the position of king of the gods through his multiple ritual performances.

6. "it was by sacrificing with the rājasūya rite" rājasūyena iṣṭvā: Literally, "having sacrificed with the rājasūya." Note the hiatus. Compare verse 5 above.

"fame . . . and an eternal domain" kīrtiṃ sthānaṃ ca śāśvatam: Literally, "fame and eternal place or standing." D1,2,4,6–9,12,T1,4,G,M1,3,8 and KK and VSP read instead kīrtisthānaṃ ca śāśvatam, "and an eternal place of fame." Again the idea is that a significant vedic divinity, King Soma, has attained his divine status through performance of the rājasūya.

"among all the worlds" sarvalokānām: Literally, "of all the worlds." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the locative sarvalokeṣu, "in all the worlds."

7. "at this time" asminn ahani: Literally, "on this day." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "felicitous in this world (ihaloke sukham—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)."

"and . . . beneficial in the time to come" hitaṃ cāyatiyuktam: Literally, "and a welfare or benefit connected with the future or posterity." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term āyati- to refer to later or future time (uttarakāle), by which, in light of their gloss on the phrase asminn ahani (see above), they seem to mean the life in the next world. Cr glosses the phrase as "beneficial, that is, associated with increase or prosperity in the later time (āyatiyuktaṃ uttarakālavṛddhisahitaṃ hitam)."

"you must state" vaktum arhathaḥ: B4 and KK and VSP read kartum arhathaḥ, "you must do."

"prudently" prayatau: Literally, "[you two] being restrained or diligent."

9. "In you, noble brother, resides the highest righteousness. On you rests the entire earth, the bearer of wealth. And in you, great-armed prince of measureless valor, abides glory." tvayi dharmaḥ paraḥ sādho tvayi sarvā vasuṃdharā / pratiṣṭhitā mahābāho yaśaś cāmitavikrama //: Literally, "In you, the highest dharma, virtuous [one], in you the entire bearer of wealth is established, great-armed [one], glory, too, O you of unmeasured valor." Ck, Cg, and Ct explain that the intention of the phrase "the entire bearer of wealth is established" is derived from the fact of Rāma's being the universal ruler of the entire earth (sarvā vasuṃdharā pratiṣṭhitā. sārvabhaumatvād ity āśayaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

10. "Just as the immortal gods . . . Prajāpati" prajāpatim ivāmarāḥ: Literally, "like the immortals, Prajāpati." Ck and Ct understand that Rāma is held in such high regard because of his supreme trustworthiness (paramāptatvena—so Ct; Ck similarly). Because of the somewhat disordered syntax of the verse, Cr reads it as if it contains only one simile. He glosses, "All the protectors of the earth and the immortals, like us, rightly look upon you as Prajāpati (sarve mahīpālā amarāś ca prajāpatiṃ tvāṃ vayam iva yathāvan nirīkṣante)."

"look upon . . . look upon" nirīkṣante: Literally, "they look upon."

"the great kings, those protectors of the earth" mahīpālāḥ . . . mahātmānaḥ: Literally, "the great protectors of the earth." D6,7,10,11,G1,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the accusative mahātmānam, "great," for the nominative mahātmānaḥ, "great." In this case, the adjective would modify Rāma rather than the kings. See notes to 7.38.3.

"and so do we" yathā vayam: Literally, "just as we [do]."

11. "the people" prajāḥ: D10,11,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the tautologous putrāḥ, "sons." The variant is contextually problematic in that, up until this point in the story, Rāma is unaware that he has any sons.

"of all living beings on earth as well" pṛthivyām . . . prāṇinām api: D1,6,7,10,11, T1,3,4,G3,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the genitive pṛthivyāḥ, "of the earth," for the locative pṛthivyām, "on the earth." This lends the line the sense of either "you are the refuge of the earth's living beings" or "you are the refuge of the earth and of living beings."

12. "which would witness the destruction" vināśo yatra dṛśyate: Literally, "where or in which would be seen destruction."

"on earth" pṛthivyām: Ñ1,V3,D3,7,10, and GPP and NSP read instead pṛthivyāḥ, "of earth." This variant, as above, can be read to mean either "the destruction of the royal lineages of the earth" or "the destruction of the royal lineages and of the earth."

13. "in the performance of that" tatra: Literally, "in that or in connection with that." Ck and Ct gloss, "on the occasion of the conquest for the purpose of the rājasūya (rājasūyārthavijaye)." Cr similarly glosses, "at the time of the conquest of the kings caused by the rājasūya (rājasūyahetukavijayasamaye)."

"the annihilation—like the universal destruction" kṣayaḥ sarvāntakopamaḥ: Literally, "a destruction similar to the ender of all things." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃkṣayaḥ sarvakopajaḥ, "the destruction born of universal anger."

The commentators and translators who share this poorly attested and inferior reading struggle to make sense of it. The general idea is that by defeating all the kings of the earth, as one must do in order to perform the rājasūya, Rāma will provoke universal indignation. Thus Cr glosses, "There will be a destruction produced or born of the anger referent to all the haughty [kings] (sarvakopajaḥ sarvābhimāniviṣayakakrodhajanitaḥ saṃkṣayo bhavitā)."

"of all men who have attained manly valor" ye . . . puruṣāḥ . . . pauruṣam āgatāḥ: Ck and Ct both take the phrase to mean "those men who have attained the status of heroes (śauryaṃ prāptāḥ)." Cr, somewhat similarly, understands, "those who have attained pride in their strength (balagarvam āgatāḥ)." In the context, we believe the reference is to the kings and other warriors who would be massacred in the course of Rāma's wars of conquest connected to the rājasūya. On the destruction of kings and their armies in the course of Yudhiṣṭhira's rājasūya, see MBh Sabhāparvan 23–25. See, too, Introduction, "Historicity and Sovereignty," pp. 160–64, and R. Goldman 2016.

14. "you" sa tvam: Literally, "he, you." B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sarvam, "everything or all," which Ct construes as the subject of the clause in pāda d. He notes, " 'Everything is under your control': that is the syntax (sarvaṃ tava vaśe vartata ity anvayaḥ—so Ct; Cg similarly)." Cr understands similarly and expands a bit, glossing: "The entire world is under your control. Therefore you ought not destroy the earth even though there are haughty [kings] upon it (tava vaśe sarvaṃ jagad vartate 'taḥ pṛthīviṃ tadvarttyabhimānino 'pi hantuṃ tvaṃ nārhasi)."

15. "which seemed to consist of the nectar of immortality" amṛtamayaṃ yathā: M3 and KK and VSP read instead amṛtamayaṃ tadā, which would lend the line the sense "Then, when . . . Rāma had heard that speech . . . which consisted of the nectar of immortality."

16. "these splendid words" śubhāṃ vāṇīm: Literally, "splendid words." V3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous śubhaṃ vākyam.

"the increaser of Kaikeyī's joy" kaikeyyā nandivardhanam: Ŝ,Ñ1,V3,D (except 3), and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous kaikeyyānandavardhanam.

"indeed . . . by your words" tava . . . vacanena hi: The word hi is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tava . . . vacane 'nagha, "in reference to your words, blameless one." Ct understands, "because of the reason in the form of your words (vacane vacanarūpe nimitte)." Ck understands similarly.

17. "These words . . . will be the salvation of earth" idaṃ vacanam . . . pṛthivyāḥ paripālanam: Literally, "this speech [is] the protection of the earth."

"in conformity with righteousness" dharmasamāhitam: Literally, "joined or provided with dharma." GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dharmasamāgatam, "conjoined with dharma."

"boldly" aklībam: Literally, "in a non-cowardly or non-impotent fashion." One can also read the term adjectivally in the sense of "manly, courageous, etc.," to modify vacanam, "speech or words." The idea is that Bharata has had the courage to speak out against his older brother's plan.

18. "I . . . from that intention of mine" eṣa tasmād abhiprāyāt: Literally, "this one . . . from that intention." The syntax of the verse is rather elliptical. V2,D10,11,T2,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead eṣyadasmadabhiprāyāt, "from that intention of ours that was to go forward." Ck, Cg, and Ct all try to parse the awkward compound. Ck and Cg understand, "[I will desist] from my intention. The meaning is 'The intention [of me] who was about to approach my intention, that is to say, who was desirous of approaching my desired action.' (eṣyadasmadabhiprāyāt. asmadabhiprāyam eṣyato māmakacikīrṣām ājigamiṣata ity arthaḥ.)" Ct understands similarly. Cr takes the compound as a bahuvrīhi and explains the verse as follows: "Because of your excellent speech, I will desist from that rājasūya in which our intention was going to proceed, that is to say, was approaching. One should add the phrase 'through my own reasoning.' (eṣyan prāpnuvann asmadabhiprāyo yasmiṃs tasmād rājasūyāt tava suvyāhṛtena vacanena nivartayāmi svohitam iti śeṣaḥ.)"

19. "I shall heed" śṛṇomi: Literally, "I hear."

"which were so well spoken and finely articulated" sādhūktaṃ susamāhitam: Literally, "well said [and] well put together." V3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sādhu yuktaṃ mahābala, "which are excellent and fitting, O immensely powerful one." Alternatively, one could read sādhu as modifying yuktam in the sense "highly fitting." T1,2,G,M1–8,10, and KK and VSP read instead sādhuyuktaṃ mahāmate, "which are highly fitting, O highly intelligent one." Ck and Ct understand sādhu as an adjective with the sense of "conferring prosperity or auspiciousness (śubhāvaham)." Cr, on the other hand, reads it adverbially with the finite verb śṛṇomi, yielding the sense "I will assuredly listen (sādhu śṛṇomi)."

For 19ab, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute, while V2,B3,4,S substitute line 2 only for 19ab, and V3,D3 insert line 2 only after verse 18, a passage of two lines [1201*]: "Actions that oppress the people[1] are never to be performed by the wise, and, elder brother of Lakṣmaṇa, beneficial words, even of children, are indeed[2] to be accepted (lokapīḍākaraṃ karma na kartavyaṃ vicakṣaṇaiḥ / bālānāṃ hi śubhaṃ vākyaṃ grāhyaṃ lakṣmaṇapūrvaja /)."

[1] "Actions that oppress the people" lokapīḍākaraṃ karma: Literally, "action causing suffering to the world or people."

[2] "indeed" hi: D7,10,11,T3,4,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, literally, "but or and." Ct argues that this must, however, be taken in the sense of api, lending the phrase the sense "even of children" (tu apyarthe).

Sarga 75

1. "too" api: V1,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead atha, "now."

2. "the aśvamedha" aśvamedhaḥ: Daśaratha performs an aśvamedha in the Bālakāṇḍa (see sargas 12–13 and notes to sarga 13), and Rāma will perform his aśvamedha at Uttarakāṇḍa sarga 83. According to both the Bālakāṇḍa (1.74) and the Yuddhakāṇḍa (116.81–82 and notes), during the course of his rule, Rāma performs no fewer than one hundred aśvamedhas. The one he is about to perform presumably will be his first. On the aśvamedha sacrifice, see Jamison 1996. See, too, Introduction, "Structure," pp. 119–30.

"purifies one of all sins" pāvanaḥ sarvapāpmanām: Literally, "the purifier of all sins." The aśvamedha, or "horse sacrifice," is often described as eliminating all sins and obstacles for the king who performs it. Ck, Cg, and Ct (in his introduction to the following verse) quote Taittirīyasaṃhitā 5.3.12, which states that whoever sacrifices with the aśvamedha transcends every sin, even the killing of a brahman (sarvaṃ papmānaṃ tarati tarati brahmahatyāṃ yo 'śvamedhena yajata iti śruteḥ).

"May this incomparable and sanctifying foremost of sacrifices please you" pāvanas tava durdharṣo rocatāṃ kratupuṃgavaḥ: Literally, "May the purifying, unconquerable, bull among rites be pleasing to you." Ñ1,V1,D6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read raghunandana, "O delight of the Raghus," for kratupuṃgavaḥ, "bull among rites."

3. "we have heard" śrūyate: Literally, "it is heard."

"concerning Śakra Vāsava . . . he" vāsave . . . / śakraḥ: Literally, "in reference to Vāsava . . . Śakra."

"overwhelmed by the sin of killing a brahman" brahmahatyāvṛtaḥ: Literally, "enclosed or overcast with the killing of a brahman." Brahmahatyā is among, if not the foremost of, the cardinal sins recorded in the dharmaśāstras. See, for example, ManuSm 11.54 and R. Goldman 1978.

"with the aśvamedha" hayamedhena: Literally, "with the hayamedha." The text commonly uses this synonymous term for the aśvamedha, "horse sacrifice." See notes to 7.50.14.

4. "when the gods and asuras had come together" devāsurasamāgame: Literally, "at the coming together or assembly of the devas and asuras." The term is somewhat ambiguous, as the term samāgama can refer to either amicable or hostile meetings. Ct and Cr gloss, "at the time of affection between the devas and asuras (devāsurasnehakāle—so Ct; Cr similarly)." Translators differ as to how to interpret the term. Gorresio (1870, p. 258), Dutt (1894, p. 1887), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 898) understand the reference to be to the war between the two parties, while Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 606), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 596) and Benoît (1999, p. 1394), understands the term to mean that the devas and asuras were united. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 587), no doubt influenced by the commentators, takes the compound to refer to the period when the gods and the asuras were friends.

"descendant of Diti named Vṛtra" vṛtro nāma . . . daiteyaḥ: Literally, "a daiteya by the name of Vṛtra." The great primordial serpentine asura, Vṛtra, "the Encloser," is the paradigmatic enemy of the vedic divinity Indra. The story of Vṛtra is told in Uttarakāṇḍa sargas 75–77. He is also mentioned in Prakṣipta I, sarga 1.40 (= App. I, No. 1, lines 81–84). Accounts of Indra's slaying of Vṛtra abound in the vedic literature, as well as in the epics and purāṇas, and their battle comes to stand as a commonplace object of comparison for single combat in the epic literature (see notes to 3.29.28 and 6.55.123). In the later vedic literature, Vṛtra comes to be represented as a brahman, so that in killing him, Indra incurs the dreadful sin of brahmahatyā, which he must then expiate or redistribute. See Introduction, "Structure," pp. 119–30. On Vṛtra in the Uttarakāṇḍa, see, too, 7.6.39; 7.22.22–23; 7.27.9; 7.35.34; and notes.

5. "He was a hundred leagues in breadth and three times that in height" vistīrṇo yojanaśatam ucchritas triguṇaṃ tataḥ: Literally, "[He was] a hundred yojanas wide [and] three times tall with respect to that."

"in his affection . . . fondly" anurāgeṇa . . . snehāt: Literally, "with love, out of affection." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand that by the term anurāgeṇa it is meant that Vṛtra arrogantly viewed all the living things in the world as belonging to him (trīṃl lokāṃs tadvartiprāṇiṇaḥ svīyatvābhimānena hetunā—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly). Ck and Ct understand the phrase snehāt paśyati, "he looks upon from affection," to mean "he viewed with an eye filled with satisfaction (saṃtoṣayuktacakṣuṣā paśyati sma)."

6. "Knowing righteousness and proper conduct" dharmajñaś ca kṛtajñaś ca: Literally, "knowing dharma and knowing action." All translators consulted who share this reading, with the exception of Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 898—"dutiful"), understand kṛtajña in its other sense of "grateful."

"the entire earth" pṛthivīṃ sarvām: V3, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M1–7,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sphītām, "prosperous or thriving," for sarvām, "entire."

"single-mindedly" susamāhitaḥ: Literally, "well composed."

7. "And the roots and fruits that were produced were succulent" rasavanti prasūtāni mūlāni ca phalāni ca: We read the term prasūtāni as a participle. It can, however, also be read nominally to mean "anything produced or born." In this context, it can be taken in its secondary meaning of "flowers." D8,10,11,T2,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the roughly synonymous prasūnāni, which most translators who share this reading understand in its meaning of "flowers." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 606), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 597) and Benoît (1999, p. 1394), understands the adjective rasavanti, "succulent," to modify only phalāni, "fruits." The syntax of the line, however, makes this improbable.

8. "That great being's land" pṛthivī . . . mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "the earth of the great [one]."

"brought forth crops without cultivation" akṛṣṭapacyā: Literally, "ripening [though] unploughed." See 1100*, following notes to 7.65.15; 1101*, following notes to 7.65.16; 1107*, following notes to 7.65.18; 7.65.20; and notes.

9. "For austerity is the greatest happiness" tapo hi paramaṃ sukham: D1,4,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saṃmoham itaratsukham, "pleasure in other things is [mere] delusion." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the compound itaratsukham to refer to sensual pleasure (viṣayasukham—so Ct; Cg similarly). Ct and Cr understand the term saṃmoha, "delusion," to mean "causing delusion (saṃmohakaram—so Ct; Cr similarly)."

10. "as supreme ruler" parameśvaram: The word parama- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D5,7,10,11,T,M3,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead madhureśvaram (D5 -aḥ). The commentators differ as to how to interpret this reading. Ck and Ct understand the term to be an appositional karmadhāraya in which madhura- is the son's name, so that the compound means "He who was named Madhura and was the ruler (madhuraś cāsau tannāmakatvād īśvaras tam—so Ct; Ck similarly)." Cr understands the term to mean that he was the lord or best among those who speak sweetly, that is to say, he himself was extremely sweet spoken (madhurāṇāṃ madhuravaktṝṇām īśvaram atimadhuravācam ity arthaḥ). Cg proposes two alternatives. According to the first, which is similar to Ct's, the compound means "sweet, that is, gentle, and the ruler (madhuraḥ saumyaś cāsāv īśvaraś ca madhureśvaras tam)." Alternatively, Cg takes the term to mean the ruler of the city of Madhurā (madhurāyā nagaryā īśvaraṃ vā). Dutt (1894, p. 1887), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 587), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 898) all understand the son's name to be Madhureśvara. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 606), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 597), and Benoît (1999, p. 1395) understand the term to mean, similarly to Cg's second alternative, "the king of Madhurā."

"he performed" upātiṣṭhat: B1,2,4,D6,7,10,11,G2,M2,4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the contextually synonymous samātiṣṭhat.

"deeply troubling" tāpayan: Literally, "burning or paining."

12. "Vṛtra has conquered the worlds" lokā vṛtreṇa nirjitāḥ: Literally, "the worlds have been conquered by Vṛtra." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead lokāḥ sarve vinirjitāḥ, "all the worlds have been conquered."

"to oppose" bādhitum: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śāsitum, "to control or chastise."

13. "continue . . . O Lord of the gods" bhūya eva sureśvara: Literally, "once again . . . O Lord of the gods." T1,2,G2,M3,10, and KK and VSP read instead bhūya evāsureśvaraḥ, "once again that lord of the asuras [i.e., Vṛtra]."

"as long as the worlds may endure" yāval lokā dhariṣyanti: Literally, "so long as worlds will maintain or sustain." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all add the phrase "the collectivity of living beings (bhūtajātam)" to serve as the object of the normally transitive verbal root √dhṛ (bhūtajātam iti śeṣaḥ—Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly).

"will remain under his control" asya vaśānugāḥ: Literally, "[the worlds, which] have gone to his control." Ck and Ct understand, "[To the phrase] 'under his control' one should add the words 'all of us the hosts of the gods will be' (tāvad asya vaśānugāḥ sarve vayaṃ devagaṇā bhaviṣyāma iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly)." This would lend the line the sense "for so long all of us, the host of the gods, will be under his control."

14. "immensely powerful Lord" mahābala: Literally, "O immensely powerful [one]." T1,G1, and KK and VSP read instead the accusative singular mahābalam, which would then modify Vṛtra.

"could not survive" na bhavet: Literally, "he would not exist." Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "The meaning is 'He would not live' (na jīved ity arthaḥ)." Cr similarly glosses, "The meaning is 'He would perish' (vinaśyed ity arthaḥ)."

"if you were angry at him" kruddhe tvayi: Literally, "when you are angry." We agree with Cr, who notes that the phrase is an elliptical locative absolute (sati saptamī). He glosses, "when you are angry (tvayi kruddhe sati)."

15. "ever since" yadā . . . / tadā prabhṛti: Literally, "when . . . from then on."

16. "Immensely illustrious Lord" sumahāyaśaḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–7,9–11,T3,4,G3,M4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead susamāhitaḥ, "composed or single-minded." This is a nominative singular as opposed to the vocative singular of the critical reading.

"it is only through your action" tvatkṛtena: Literally, "through your action." Cg and Ct add the word "protection" (rakṣaṇeneti śeṣaḥ) and understand the phrase to mean "through protection performed by you." GPP, alone among the printed editions consulted, separates the sequence into two words, tvatkṛte na. This appears to be a typographical error, but Ck definitely makes the same division. Despite the claim of the critical apparatus that Ck reads with the critical edition, he similarly seems to separate tvatkṛte and na. He understands that we must add a second na and takes the phrase to mean "Unless there is no action, that is to say, protection, done by you, then the world will not be . . . (tvatkṛteti [sic] neti rakṣaṇe neti śeṣaḥ)."

"free from dissolution" ajaram: Literally, "unaging or free from decay." Ś2,D1,4, 6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead arujam, "free from suffering or illness."

17. "the gods, denizens of heaven" divaukasaḥ: Literally, "the heaven-dwelling [ones]." See notes to 7.5.23.

"to them" eṣām: Literally, "of them." Ñ2,V2,3,B1,2,D6,7,10,11,T2,M4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press avoid the hiatus of the critical reading by reading teṣām, "of them." KK and VSP read instead tv eṣām, "but of them."

18. "to these great divinities" eṣāṃ mahātmanām: Literally, "of these great ones."

"This feat is impossible for others" asahyam idam anyeṣām: Literally, "it is impossible or unbearable for others." The phrase is ambiguous, and the commentators and translators differ in their interpretations. We understand the unexpressed modificand of the adjective asahyam to be the feat of killing Vṛtra. This allows the adjective asahyam to be taken as a sāmānyanapuṃsaka and the term anyeṣām to refer to those other than Viṣṇu. Among the commentators, Cr's interpretation most closely approximates ours in that he takes the modificand of asahyam as "that matter or subject in the form of the daitya (idam daityarūpaṃ vastv anyeṣām asahyam)." Ck, Cg, and Ct, however, understand the term asahyam in the sense of "unbearable or intolerable" and take it to refer to the assistance to be rendered to the gods, which would be intolerable to others, that is to say, to the asuras. Still, they argue, the gods implore Viṣṇu to act. (anyeṣām idam asahyam. anyeṣām asurāṇāṃ yady api tvatsāhyam asahyam athāpi tat kuru—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly.) Among the translators consulted, Dutt (1894, p. 1888) and Gorresio (1870, p. 259—whose text reads aśakyam for asahyam) understand the passage as we do. Others follow the interpretation of Ck, Cg, and Ct.

Sarga 76

1. Cs believes that the sarga break and Rāma's need to encourage Lakṣmaṇa to finish his story can be explained by the notion that Rāma, who already knows what is to be known, desires to hear the rest out of his special affection for his brother. He thus speaks to Lakṣmaṇa, who has broken off his account in embarrassment, thinking, "In my childishness, I have told something that need not have been told to one who is omniscient." (sarvajñāya mayā śaiśaveṇa kiṃcid udañcitaṃ nodañcanīyam iti lajjayoparataṃ lakṣmaṇaṃ viditavedyo 'pi premaviśeṣeṇa śrotukāmo rāma āha vṛtraghātam iti.)

"Rāma, the destroyer of his foes" śatrunibarhaṇaḥ: Literally, "the destroyer of foes." The proper name has been added.

"of Lakṣmaṇa . . . to him" lakṣmaṇasya . . . lakṣamaṇam: Literally, "of Lakṣmaṇa . . . [to] Lakṣmaṇa." D6,11,T1,2,G3,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read suvrata, "O you of excellent vows," for lakṣmaṇam, "to Lakṣmaṇa." The vocative now refers to Lakṣmaṇa.

2. "Lakṣmaṇa" lakṣmaṇam: D5–7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative suvrataḥ, "one of excellent vows," which then refers to Lakṣmaṇa.

"increaser of Sumitrā's joy" sumitrānandavardhanaḥ: The word -ānanda- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"resumed his narration" bhūya eva kathayāmāsa: Literally, "once again he narrated."

"that celestial tale" kathāṃ divyām: The phrase is ambiguous. Among the commentators consulted, Cs is the only one who appears to comment on the meaning of the adjective divya. He understands that the story is celestial or divine because of its serving the purpose of advancing the matter at hand, i.e., the aśvamedha [as opposed to the rājasūya] (prakṛtopayogitayā divyām). Translators fall into two groups. The first group simply translates literally, understanding that the story is divine or celestial (Gorresio 1870, p. 259; Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 607; and Gita Press 1998, vol. 2, p. 899). In a similar vein, Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 597) renders, "his exalted theme." The members of the second group, that is, Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 588) and Benoît (1999, p. 1395), understand the term divyām to mean "belonging to or concerning inhabitants of the celestial world."

3. "and of all the gods, denizens of heaven . . . to all of them" sarveṣāṃ ca divaukasām /. . . devān . . . sarvān: Literally, "and of all the heaven-dwelling [ones] . . . to all the gods." There has been no indication in the previous passage of the gods' having spoken. In the previous sarga it is Indra alone who approaches and addresses Viṣṇu (see 7.75.11–18). Cr, the only commentator to address this issue, observes: "Viṣṇu, having heard thousand-eyed [Indra's] words, [spoken] in the midst of the gods, replies to the gods (divaukasāṃ madhye sahasrākṣavacaḥ śrutvā viṣṇur devān uvāca)." On the term divaukasām, see notes to 7.5.23.

4. "long" pūrvam: Literally, "long ago or previously." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the adverb here to mean prior to Indra's and the gods' request for his killing (yuṣmābhis tadvadhaprārthanāt pūrvam).

"to the very great Vṛtra" vṛtrasya sumahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of very great Vṛtra." B2,D6,9–11,T3,M2,4,9,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vṛtrasyeha mahātmanaḥ, "of great Vṛtra here." V1,M6, and KK and VSP read instead vṛtrasya tu mahātmanaḥ, "and of great Vṛtra."

"surely" vai: D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar emphatic particle hi, "indeed."

5. "I must certainly fulfill your ultimate desire" avaśyaṃ karaṇīyam . . . bhavatāṃ sukham uttamam: Literally, "the unexcelled happiness of you, sirs, must certainly be accomplished."

"whereby you shall slay Vṛtra" yena vṛtraṃ haniṣyatha: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sahasrākṣo vadhiṣyati, "the thousand-eyed [one] will kill." Cr fills out the elliptical pāda by supplying an object, here the name Vṛtra (vṛtram iti śeṣaḥ)." KK and VSP read instead yena vṛtro nihanyate, "by which Vṛtra is slain."

6. "I shall divide myself into three parts." tridhābhūtaṃ kariṣye 'ham ātmānam: Literally, "I shall make myself threefold." As the context will make clear and the commentators explain, the idea is that Viṣṇu will divide himself, that is to say, his inherent energy, into three parts. (tredhābhūtaṃ tredhāvibhaktam. ātmānaṃ svatejomūrtim—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Ñ2,V3,B2,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous tredhābhūtam, "become threefold," for tridhābhūtam. Ś,V1,3,B3,4,D1–7,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous parasmaipada form kariṣyāmi, "I will do," for ātmanepada form kariṣye 'ham. KK and VSP read hy ātmānam for ātmānam in order to avoid the hiatus.

"thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣaḥ: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

"will kill" haniṣyati: Ñ2,V,B1,3,4,D1,3–5,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,3,8,9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous vadhiṣyati, "he will kill."

7. "Let one portion enter" eko 'ṃśaḥ . . . yātu: Literally, "Let one portion go to." Ś,Ñ,V, B3,4,D5,6,10,11,T,G1,2,M3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous compound ekāṃśaḥ for eko 'ṃśaḥ.

"Indra Vāsava" vāsavam: Literally, "Vāsava." The proper name "Indra" has been added for the sake of clarity.

"and the third the earth" tṛtīyo bhūtalam: As the role of the earth, unlike those of Indra and his vajra, in the destruction of Vṛtra is not made clear in the text, the commentators explain that the third portion of Viṣṇu's energy enters the earth for two reasons. The first is to provide it with the power to bear the body of the falling Vṛtra, and the second is to protect the earth itself up until the removal of Indra's sin of brahman-slaying (brahmahatyā) as a consequence of the killing of Vṛtra. (patadvṛtradehadhāraṇārtham ity arthaḥ. indrasya vṛtrahananajabrahmahatyānivṛttiṃ yāvad bhūlokarakṣaṇārthaṃ cety api bodhyam—so Ct; Cv, Ck and Cg similarly). Cs explains that it is for the firm establishment [of the earth] up until the return of Indra after the removal of [his] sin of brahmahatyā (brahmahatyānirharaṇānantaram indrāgamanaparyantaṃ sthirāsthityai). See Introduction, "Structure," pp. 119–30.

"After that, Śakra will slay Vṛtra." śakras tato vṛtraṃ haniṣyati: D5,7,10,11,T2,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yātu, "let [the third portion] go," for śakraḥ, "Śakra," lending the line the sense: "Let the third enter the earth, then he will kill Vṛtra." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tadā, "then," for tataḥ, "after that or because of that." D6,7,T1,2,G3,M1–4, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read the synonymous vadhiṣyati, "he will kill," for haniṣyati.

9. "May blessings be upon you." bhadraṃ te 'stu: Literally, "May there be auspiciousness for you." Cs understands the gods to be requesting a blessing upon themselves from Viṣṇu (te sakāśān no 'smabhyaṃ bhadram astu). See notes to 6.6.4 and Tubb 2006.

"O supremely noble Lord" paramodāra: Literally, "O extremely noble [one]." Cs believes that the gods address Viṣṇu in this way in order to express the fact that such power actually resides in him (tādṛśaṃ sāmarthyaṃ tvayi vartata iti vaktuṃ tathā saṃbodhayanti paramodāreti).

"endow Vāsava" vāsavam . . . bhajasva: Literally, "grant to Vāsava." Cs understands the expression to be an elliptical reference to the three recipients of Viṣṇu's energy, that is, Indra, the vajra, and the earth (vāsavam indraṃ tatsaṃbandhinaṃ vajraṃ bhūmiṃ ceti tritayaṃ bhajasva).

10. "the great gods" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "the great [ones]."

"thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣa-: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

"the forest" tad araṇyam: D6,1,4,7–9, and GPP and NSP read instead tadāraṇyam, "then [they proceeded to] the forest."

11. "engaged in austerities" tapantam: Literally, "practicing austerities." B4,D2,4,9,T1,M3, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous tapyantam.

"Suffused with blazing energy" tejasā bhūtam: Here the polysemic term bhūta, normally, "being or existing," needs to be understood in its sense of "consisting of or joined with." We agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who all gloss "pervaded (vyāptam)."

"seemed as if to consume the three worlds and scorch the very heavens" pibantam iva lokāṃs trīn nirdahantam ivāmbaram: Literally, "as if drinking the three worlds, as if burning up the sky."

12–13. "And at the mere sight of that foremost of asuras" dṛṣṭvaiva cāsuraśreṣṭham: Literally, "and having just seen the foremost of asuras."

"just as they were thinking" teṣāṃ cintayatāṃ tatra: Literally, "then or on that occasion as they were thinking." The phrase must be read as a ṣaṣṭhī sataḥ, or genitive absolute.

"How will we not suffer defeat?" kathaṃ na syāt parājayaḥ: Literally, "How would there not be defeat?"

"thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣaḥ: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

"with both hands" bāhubhyām: Literally, "with two arms or forearms." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pāṇibhyām, "with two hands." Cs, concerned that the divine vajra should be seen as sullied by the unclean left hand of Indra, offers an interesting analysis. " 'By two hands' is meant 'two right hands,' one being the hand invested with the portion of Viṣṇu, the other being his [Indra's] own hand. That is the meaning, because the great vajra, which is also a portion of the Lord, is not to be touched with the left [hand]. In the absence of a portion of the Lord, an arm, even though they be many, could not do anything. But given his grace, one [hand] alone would be sufficient. This explanation is the correct one. That is the real meaning. (pāṇibhyām antarniviṣṭaviṣṇvaṃśapāṇir eka ekaḥ svapāṇir iti dakṣiṇābhyāṃ pāṇibhyām ity arthaḥ. mahato vajrasya sabhagavadaṃśasya vāmāspṛśyatvāt. bhaved bhagavadaṃśābhāve bāhur bahur apy akiṃcidkaraḥ. tadanugrahe caika evālam iti vyākhyānam idaṃ samañjasam iti bhāvaḥ.)" Cs concludes by citing in support of this verse ṚV 10.60.12a (= AV 4.13.6a): "This hand of mine is blessed or fortunate (ayaṃ me hasto bhagavān iti śruteḥ)." Geldner (1951–1957, vol. 3, p. 225) notes that this verse is probably a later addition.

14. "As it fell on Vṛtra's head, that fearsome weapon blazed, as it were, with great flames like the fire at the end of time. Seared by that weapon, the whole world was terrified." kālāgnineva ghoreṇa dīpteneva mahārciṣā / prataptaṃ vṛtraśirasi jagat trāsam upāgamat: Literally, "By that terrible [thing], as if blazing brightly with great flames like the fire of kāla, on Vṛtra's head, the world, burned, went to terror." The verse as constituted in the critical edition is elliptical and awkward, as it lacks both a noun to refer to Indra's weapon and a verbal element to connect it with the locative vṛtraśirasi. Pāda c, prataptaṃ vṛtraśirasi, "seared . . . on Vṛtra's head," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. The clause is elliptical, and to make sense of it one must add some participle like patatā, "falling," to modify the similarly elided subject vajreṇa (see note below). D10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead patatā vṛtraśirasā, lending the last line the sense "the world was terrified by Vṛtra's head as it was falling." Ck, Cg, and Ct are uncomfortable in ascribing to Vṛtra's head the adjectives and similes in pādas a and b (kālāgnineva ghoreṇa dīpteneva mahārciṣā ["with its great flames, was as if blazing like the fire of kāla"]). They therefore understand an implicit phrase in which those terms apply to the vajra. They take the term vajra to refer to the action of cutting or severing caused by the vajra. It is because of this severing by the vajra that

Vṛtra's head is falling and thus terrifying the world. Ct explains, "By the vajra, which was blazing and filled with great flames and so resembled a flaming ball of iron, etc., that is to say, by the severing by the vajra that caused the falling of Vṛtra's head because of which [head] the world was terrified (dīptena dīpyamānena mahārciṣā mahārciṣmadayaḥpiṇḍādisadṛśena vajreṇa vajrakṛtacchedena hetunā patatā vṛtraśirasā jagat trāsam upāgamat—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cr makes no mention of the vajra and seems comfortable with ascribing the adjectives, etc., to the falling head (ghoreṇa kālāgnineva patatā vṛtraśirasā jagat trāsaṃ bhītim upāgamat). Cs reads the verse rather differently. He takes jagat, "the world," as the adhikaraṇa or locus of the participle patatā and understands the unexpressed term indraḥ, "Indra," to be the subject of the verbal phrase trāsam upāgamat, "he went to terror." In other words, he sees that Indra is terrified by Vṛtra's head as it falls to the earth. This, he argues, is the self-evident reading of the following verse, and the broad-minded ones must excuse his supplying the name "Indra" to fill the ellipsis. (jagat prati patatā śiraso nimittenendras trāsam upāgamat. uttaragranthasvārasyād indra ity adhyāhāramātraṃ kṣāmyantu mahāntaḥ.)

"that fearsome weapon" ghoreṇa: Literally, "by that fearsome [thing]." The critical reading lacks any substantive to serve as the subject of the participle prataptam, "seared." One must understand the reference to be to the vajra mentioned in the previous verse.

"blazed, as it were" dīpteneva: Literally, "as if blazing." KK and VSP read instead taptenaiva, "fiercely burning." Ck and Cg gloss this reading as "blazing (dīpyamānena)," and Cg additionally notes the critical reading as a variant.

15. "unimaginable" asaṃbhāvyam: Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr understand the term to mean that the killing of an innocent person who was sitting quietly practicing asceticism is improper (asaṃbhāvyam anaparādhinas tapyatas tūṣṇīṃ sthitasya vadham anucitam—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly). Cr adds, "and because [Vṛtra] was a brahman as well (brāhmaṇatvena ca)."

"fled to the ends of the earth" jagāmāśu lokasyāntam: Literally, "he swiftly went to the end of the world." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that out of his fear of the sin of brahmahatyā, Indra flees to a region of darkness, beyond the light of the world (lokālokāt paraṃ tamaḥpradeśaṃ jagāma brahmahatyābhiyā palāyito 'bhūt). Cs, referring to the version of the tale in the Bhāgavatapurāṇa (6.13.14–15), understands that Indra went into a lotus stalk in the Mānasa lake. (mānasasarovarasthanālīkanālam. bhāgavatokteḥ.) Compare 7.77.3.

16. "the sin of brahmahatyā pursued him" tam . . . brahmahatyā . . . anugacchati: Literally, "brahmahatyā follows him." Ct notes that Indra is followed by some form of divinity personifying brahmahatyā (tam indram anugamanam tadabhimānidevatārūpeṇa). Cv, Ck, Cg, and Ct explain why, in killing the demon, Indra has committed the sin of killing a brahman. This is so, they observe, because Vṛtra is the son of the brahman sage Tvaṣṭṛ and therefore is, himself, a brahman. Ct adds that Vṛtra was born as a brahman from the āhavanīya fire during the course of the sacrificial offering carried out by his father, Tvaṣṭṛ, whose [other] son [Triśiras] had been killed by Indra (indrahataputreṇa tvaṣṭrā muninā putrecchayā svāhendraśatrur vardhasveti home kṛta āhavanīyāj jāto vṛtro brāhmaṇa iti). See ŚatBr 1.6.3.6–11 and TaiS 2.4.12.1. See, too, MBh 5.9–18 and Mahābhāṣya 1.2.24. On brahmahatyā in the Uttarakāṇḍa, see Introduction, "Structure," pp. 119–30.

17. "Their enemy had been slain, but since they had lost Indra" hatārayaḥ pranaṣṭendrā devāḥ: Literally, "the gods whose enemy had been slain [and] whose Indra or leader had been lost or vanished."

"the foremost in the three worlds" tribhuvanaśreṣṭham: D6,7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tribhuvaneśānam, "the Lord of the three worlds."

"saying": The word has been added for the sake of continuity.

18. "You are the highest refuge, O God." tvaṃ gatiḥ paramā deva: D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tvaṃ gatiḥ parameśāna. This variant is ambiguous, as it can be read either as tvaṃ gatiḥ paramā īśāna, "you are the highest refuge, O Lord," or as tvaṃ gatiḥ parameśāna, "you are the refuge, O Supreme Lord." All translators consulted who share this reading have chosen the latter interpretation.

"You are Lord and the firstborn of the world." pūrvajo jagataḥ prabhuḥ: Ck and Ct justify the expression by citing the common vedic utterance "I am the firstborn of cosmic order [ṛta] (ahaṃ asmi prathamajā ṛtasya)." See, for example, ṚV 10.61.19; AV 6.122.1; TaiBr 2.8.8.1; TaiA 9.10.6; TaiU 3.10.6; Nṛsiṃhapūrvatāpanyupaniṣad 2.4; Āraṇyasaṃhitā 1.9; and Nirukta 14.2. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read pitā, "father," for prabhuḥ, "lord." Ck and Ct are the only commentators to remark on this reading. Ct understands the term to mean that the Lord is Hiraṇyagarbha, who is the embodiment of the primordial cause [of all] (evaṃ kāraṇamūrtir hiraṇyagarbha eva). Ck, in keeping with his ongoing orientation toward Brahmā (see note to 5.1.177), understands that Viṣṇu is the Lord Prajāpati, that is, Virāṭ, who is the son of the great guru Brahmā. Therefore, he is one who is lord of the three streams of all beings, which are uniquely produced from him, and thus he is the primordial cause. (śrīgurubrahmaputro virāḍ bhagavān prajāpatir ata eva nijaikasṛjyasakalabhūtatrisrotasām pitaivaṃ kāraṇamūrtiḥ.)

19. "You have slain Vṛtra" hataś cāyaṃ tvayā vṛtraḥ: Literally, "This Vṛtra has been slain by you." Cr correctly notes that we should understand this statement as a reference to Viṣṇu's having made Indra the instrument of the killing and that therefore he should be responsible for effecting his liberation (yatas tvayā vṛtro hata indreṇa ghātito 'to vāsavaṃ brahmahatyā bādhata atas tasya bādhasya mokṣaṃ vinirdiśa).

"declare the means for his liberation" mokṣaṃ tasya vinirdiśa: We agree with Cs, who understands the genitive pronoun to refer to Vāsava and the term mokṣam to refer to the method or means of liberation. (tasya vāsavasya. mokṣaṃ mocanaprakāram.) Cr, as noted above, takes the pronoun to refer to the affliction (tasya bādhasya). KK and VSP read the feminine ablative/genitive tasyāḥ for tasya, thus making the pronoun refer to the sin of brahmahatyā. This would lend the line the sense "Please . . . declare the means for liberation from it or from her."

20. "Let Śakra sacrifice to me alone." mām eva yajatāṃ śakraḥ: Ck and Ct expand upon this simple sentence, reading it to say, "Let Śakra sacrifice to me, who am the specific or embodied [sakṣāt] divinity of the aśvamedha, although I am to be sacrificed to with the full complement of fire sacrifices, starting with the agnihotra and ending with the aśvamedha (mām aupāsanāgnihotrādyaśvamedhāntāśeṣayajñayajanīyaṃ viśiṣyāśvamedhasya sākṣād daivataṃ mām eva śakro yajatām)." Ct justifies this interpretation by quoting the common vedic formula "svāhā to Indra" and other mantras that indicate that Viṣṇu is, in fact, the inner-controlling spirit of the various divinities addressed during the vedic sacrifice (indrāya svāhetyādimantraiś ca tattaddevatāntaryāmy aham eva tattatpadair bodhya iti bhāvaḥ). Ck continues his efforts to identify Viṣṇu as Brahmā-Prajāpati. Cs glosses, " 'Let him sacrifice' means 'let him worship with the aśvamedha, etc.' (yajatām aśvamedhādibhiḥ pūjayatu)."

21. "Indra, the chastiser of Pāka" pākaśāsanaḥ: Literally, "the chastiser of Pāka."

"with the . . . aśvamedha" hayamedhena: Literally, "with the hayamedha." The text commonly uses this synonymous term for the aśvamedha. See notes to 7.50.14.

"free from fear" akutobhayaḥ: V1,2,B4,D9,T4,M4,6,7, and KK and VSP read instead the accusative akutobhayam, which would then modify "lordship (indratvam)."

"the lordship of the gods" devānām indratvam: Literally, "the state of being Indra of the gods." The term is, no doubt, chosen as a play on Indra's name.

22. "When he had instructed the gods . . . with this speech" saṃdiśya devānāṃ tāṃ vāṇīm: Literally, "having commanded that speech of the gods." The term saṃdiśya, "having commanded," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D6,7,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read tāṃ vāṇīṃ devānām by transposition.

"which was like the nectar of immortality" amṛtopamām: D10 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press add ca, "and," reading cāmṛtopamām.

"the Lord of the gods, being lauded" deveśaḥ stūyamānaḥ: KK 1905 and 1913 read instead deveśastūyamānaḥ, "being praised by the lords of the gods." The variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"heaven" triviṣṭapam: The term can refer either to Indra's heaven or to heaven in general. Here, the term must refer to heaven in general, as it would be unusual to have Viṣṇu return to Indra's heaven. See 6.90.5–7; 7.26.35; 7.41.20; and notes, where the term refers to Indra's heaven. But compare 7.19.26 and 3709*, lines 5, 6, and note 16, following notes to 6.116.90.

Sarga 77

1. "thus" tathā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"began to tell . . . saying" upākramat: Literally, "he began." D10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous pracakrame, "he began." We follow Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, who all supply the infinitive vaktum, "to speak."

2. "overwhelmed with the sin of brahmahatyā" brahmahatyāvṛtaḥ: Literally, "covered or enveloped by brahmahatyā."

"was unable to regain consciousness" saṃjñāṃ lebhe na: Literally, "he did not obtain consciousness." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Indra is like someone possessed by an evil spirit (grahagrastavat). Ck and Ct continue, noting that he was like someone who [whose mind—so Ck] was under the power of another (paravaśacitto 'bhūd ity arthaḥ—so Ck; paravaśo 'bhūd ity arthaḥ—so Ct). Cg says that the meaning is that Indra had lost his splendor (aprakāśo 'bhūd ity arthaḥ), while Cr understands that he could not obtain mental well-being (saṃjñāṃ svasthacittatāṃ na lebhe).

3. "the ends of the earth" antam . . . lokānām: Literally, "the end of the worlds." Compare 7.76.15.

"he lay there" tatrāvasat: Literally, "he dwelt there."

"unconscious and insensate" naṣṭasaṃjño vicetanaḥ: Literally, "whose consciousness was destroyed or lost [and] insentient." The terms are virtually synonymous here, and no commentator attempts to distinguish them.

"writhing like a serpent" veṣṭamāno yathoragaḥ: Cs glosses veṣṭamānaḥ as "with his limbs contracted (saṃkucasvāṅgaḥ)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 609) understands the verb √veṣṭ in its sense of "to molt or shed the skin." He renders, "pareil à un serpent qui change de peau." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 599), who translates, "resembling a serpent that is casting its slough." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous iva, "like," for yathā.

4. "Now after thousand-eyed Indra had vanished" atha naṣṭe sahasrākṣe: Literally, "now when the thousand-eyed [one] had vanished."

"in a terrible state" udvignam: Literally, "terrified." Ck, Cg, and Ct agree that the world is in a sorry state because of the absence of a king (arājakatvāt). The lack of a king is regarded throughout the epic and śāstraic literature as the cause of chaos. See, for example, 2.61.7–25 and notes (especially verses 8ff.) and MBh 12.67–68.

"The earth looked devastated" bhūmiś ca dhvastasaṃkāśā: Literally, "and the earth [was] one having a destroyed appearance."

"parched" niḥsnehā: Literally, "devoid of moisture." Ct explains "not moist because of the drought rooted in the absence of Indra (indrābhāvamūlāvṛṣṭyānārdrā)." It will be recalled that Indra is regarded as the god of the rains. Cr sees a logical cause and effect relationship linking the various difficulties the world faces in the absence of Indra. He says: "When the thousand-eyed one had vanished, that is to say, when he was not seen, the world entered a terrible state and therefore became parched and therefore had its forests desiccated and therefore looked devastated (sahasrākṣe naṣṭe 'dṛṣṭe sati jagad udvignam abhavad ata eva niḥsnehāta eva śuṣkakānanāta eva dhvastasaṃkāśā bhūmir abhavat)."

5. "Ponds, lakes, and rivers were empty of water" niḥsrotasaś cāmbuvāhā hradrāś ca saritas tathā: Literally, "bearers of water and ponds and rivers were devoid of water." We take the term srotas, normally, "current," in its sense of "water." The term ambuvāha normally means "rain cloud." And although that meaning is possible here, the context, with its listing of terrestrial bodies of water, seems to better support taking the term in its sense of "pond or lake." No translator or commentator shares this reading. D10 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead te sarve tu, lending the line the sense "And all the lakes and rivers were empty of water." D7 and KK and VSP read instead the virtually synonymous ca te sarve.

6. "was wasting away" kṣīyamāṇe: Literally, "was diminishing or perishing."

"performed" samupānayan: Literally, "they assembled or brought together." We follow Ck, Cg, and Cr, who understand the verb here in the sense of "they performed or accomplished (saṃpādayan—so Ck; saṃpādayanti sma—so Cg; akurvan—so Cr)." Ct, apparently noting that the gods do not actually perform the sacrifice until verse 8 below, glosses, "They announced or made known, that is to say, they remembered. (āvedayan. smṛtavanta iti yāvat.)"

7. "proceeded together" sahitā jagmuḥ: Literally, "they went together." D6,7,10,11, T1,2,G2,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samupājagmuḥ, "they proceeded together toward or approached."

"where Indra lay" yatrendraḥ: Literally, "where Indra [was]."

8. "thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣam: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

"dazed by the sin of brahmahatyā" mohitaṃ brahmahatyayā: Literally, "dazed by brahmahatyā." D6,7,10,11,T2[?],3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read āvṛtam, "overwhelmed," for mohitam, "dazed."

"that lord of the gods" deveśam: Commentators and translators differ as to which divinity is being referred to here. The normal understanding would be that the gods make Indra the yajamāna, or patron, of the sacrifice so that he would be its principal beneficiary. On the other hand, since he will remain in a semicomatose state until the completion of the rite, some commentators and translators take the reference to be to Viṣṇu. Ck and Cg unambiguously understand the reference to be to Viṣṇu (viṣṇum ity arthaḥ). In this they are followed by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 590). Cr understands that the gods place Śakra, i.e., Indra, at their head precisely because he is overwhelmed with the sin of brahmahatyā (te devāḥ śakraṃ brahmahatyāsamāvṛtaṃ dṛṣṭvāta eva puraskṛtyāśvamedhaṃ pracakrire). In this he is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1890), Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 901), and Benoît (1999, p. 1397). Ct is unable to decide between the two and so glosses, "the lord of the gods, that is, either Viṣṇu or Indra (taṃ deveśaṃ viṣṇum indraṃ vā)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 609) and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 599) retain the ambiguity of the original, as do we.

"performed" pracakrire: T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead upākraman, "they began or undertook."

9. "a very grand . . . of great Mahendra" sumahān mahendrasya mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "a very great . . . of great, great Indra." Note the author's play on the adjective mah- ant, "great." We normally render mahendra as "great Indra." Here, however, to avoid the redundancy we have left the epithet untranslated.

"proceeded" vavṛdhe: Literally, "it increased or prospered." D10,11,M2,4,6–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the facilior vavṛte, "it proceeded or took place." The root √vṛdh is sometimes confused with the root √vṛt in the epic literature (MW, s.v. √vṛdh).

10. "at the conclusion of the sacrifice" yajñasamāptau: D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M1,5,8,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the locative absolute (sati saptamī) construction yajñe samāpte, "when the sacrifice had been completed."

"Brahmahatyā herself approached the great ones" brahmahatyā mahātmanaḥ / abhigamya: Literally, "having approached those great ones, Brahmahatyā." The term mahātmanaḥ here is somewhat ambiguous. It can be taken as we have done, following Cr, the only commentator to remark upon it, as the accusative plural, referring to the assembled gods (mahātmano devān). It can also be read as either the ablative or genitive singular "from or of the great one," referring to Indra. The ablative is understood in the translations of Gorresio (1870, p. 262), Dutt (1894, p. 1890), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 600), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 590), the idea being that Brahmahatyā issues forth from or leaves Indra's body. The genitive is understood in the translation of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 609), the idea being that the brahmahatyā of great Indra approaches [the gods]. He translates, "le Brahmanicide du magmanime (Indra) s'approchant (des Dieux)." Benoît (1999, p. 1397) understands, "le brahmanicide s'approcha du noble dieu et lui demanda." But this rendition cannot be supported by the grammar.

11. "then" tataḥ: KK and VSP read the more or less synonymous tadā, "then."

"You must divide yourself by yourself into four parts" caturdhā vibhajātmānam ātmanā: Compare the similar story in the Taittirīyasaṃhitā (2.5.1.1–7), where the sin of brahmahatyā, which Indra incurs through killing Viśvarūpa, is divided into three parts, which are accepted, respectively, by the earth, the trees, and women.

"O unassailable lady" durāsade: Literally, "O one who is difficult or dangerous to be approached."

12. "with whom it was impossible to abide" durvasā: Literally, "hard to live with or difficult to house." Ct glosses, "possessing a residence that produces misery (duḥkhajanakavāsavatī)." Cg glosses, "for whom it is or was impossible to reside in great Indra (mahendre durvasā). Cr appears to understand the epithet as if it were, in fact, durvāsā, glossing, "endowed with damaged or spoiled clothing (duṣṭavastrayuktabrahmahatyā)."

"in their presence" saṃnidhau: B2,D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, and the commentaries of Cv, Ck, Cg (as a variant), and Ct read instead saṃdadhau, "she brought together or united." Ck, Cg (as a variant reading), and Ct all gloss, "she accomplished the fourfold division (caturdhā vibhāgaṃ saṃpāditavatīty arthaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly)." Cr understands, "she resolved upon a residence (sthānaniścayaṃ cakāra)."

"somewhere else" anyatra: Literally, "elsewhere." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand, "someplace other than great Indra (anyatra mahendrād anyatra—so Ck and Cg; Ct and Cr similarly)."

13. Following 13ab, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1221*]: "For the four months of the rains, as a crusher of pride,[1] wandering at will[2] . . . (caturo vārśikān māsān darpaghnī kāmacāriṇī)."

[1] "as a crusher of pride" darpaghnī: Literally, "destroying pride." Ck, Cg, and Ct supply "of sinners" (pāpinām iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Ct; Cg similarly).

[2] "wandering at will" kāmacāriṇī: KK and VSP read instead kāmavāriṇī, "possessing desirable waters." Cg adds the words "for those wishing to bathe" (snātum icchatām iti śeṣaḥ). Cg notes the critical reading as a variant.

For 13cd, V2,B3,4,D6,7,10,11,S substitute a passage of two lines [1223*]: "And, without a doubt, impossible to abide with,[1] I will dwell at all times[2] with one portion[3] in the earth. I tell you this truthfully.[4] (bhūmyāṃ sarvam ahaṃ kālam aṃśenaikena durvasā / vasiṣyāmi na saṃdehaḥ satyenaitad bravīmi vaḥ)"

[1] "impossible to abide with" durvasā: On the interpretation of this term, see note to verse 12 above. D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the redundant sarvadā, "always." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 590) attempts to avoid the redundancy by translating, "at all times and in all seasons."

[2] "I . . . at all times" sarvam ahaṃ kālam: D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous ahaṃ sarvakālam.

[3] "with one portion" aṃśenaikena: D6,7,10,11,T,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ekenāṃśena by transposition.

[4] For reasons we are unable to determine Dutt (1894, p. 1891) appears to read this verse or some variation of it as containing the term ūṣara, "saline soil." He therefore renders, "By my second portion, I shall live perpetually on lands as Ushara." He supplies a footnote in which he defines Ushara as "A spot with saline soil." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 600), no doubt in imitation of Dutt, translates, "With another quarter undoubtedly I shall dwell perpetually in the earth as Ushara." He, too, provides a footnote: "Ushara—Saline soil." No printed edition consulted or any manuscript cited in the critical apparatus has anything remotely like this term.

14. "as for my third portion, with that" yo 'yam aṃśas tṛtīyo me: Literally, "that portion of mine that is third." The verse is elliptical. We follow Cr, who inserts the instrumental pronoun tena, "with that," to complete the syntax.

"for three nights" trirātram: The reference here is to three nights per month during which a man must avoid intercourse and other forms of contact with menstruating women. See Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 802–5. See, too, TaiS 2.5.1.4–5, where one-third of Indra's guilt takes the form of menstruating women. Cf. ManuSm 4.40–42, where the evils of contact with a menstruating woman are enumerated. See 7.72.2 and notes. Dutt (1894, p. 1891), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 600), and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 590) all include in their translations the information that the period of three days refers to three nights per month. All northern manuscripts as well as the editions of Lahore and Gorresio substitute a passage [1224*], or variants of it, in which the period is expressed as four days rather than three nights and makes a specific reference to menstrual impurity.

"as a crusher of their pride" darpavighātinī: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term to mean "removing or destroying the pleasure of sexual intercourse with men (puruṣa-saṃbhogasukhahāriṇīti bhāvaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly)." The reference is clearly to the three-day prohibition on intercourse with menstruating women.

15. "I will possess" saṃśrayiṣye: Literally, "I will attach [myself] to or I will approach."

"those who . . . kill" hantāraḥ . . . ye: Literally, "[those] who [are] killers." Ck and Ct understand this to be a reference to "those who, under the color of royal authority, etc., do injury, curse, or cause blood to flow and, by the maxim 'How much more so (kaimutika),' actually kill." They cite a passage, attributed to the śruti, to the effect that so long as one causes blood to flow or touches a sinner or a polluting substance (menstrual blood?), for so many years he would not know the world of the Pitṛs. Therefore, one should not revile a brahman, harm him, or shed [his] blood. (ye rājasthānādau ghātaṃ kurvanti dhikkārādi kurvanti lohitādisrāvaṃ kurvanti kaimutikanyāyenaiva ye prāṇa-viyogaṃ kurvanti . . . yo lohitaṃ karad yāvataḥ praskannaṃ pāṃsūn saṃgṛhṇāt. tāvat saṃvatsaraṃ pitṛlokaṃ na prajānāt. tasmād brāhmaṇāya nāpaguren na nihanyān na lohitaṃ kuryād iti śruteḥ.) Cr merely glosses, "those who strike (tāḍayitāraḥ)."

"intentionally" prekṣāpūrvam: Literally, "with forethought or premeditation." D6,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3,5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (except Cm) read instead mṛṣāpūrvam, "wrongfully." Ct glosses, "with false doctrine (mṛṣāvādapūrvam)," while Ck glosses, "with the doctrine of illusion (māyāvādapūrvam)." Cr understands, "having recourse to false doctrine (mithyāvādam āśrityety arthaḥ)."

"innocent" adūṣakān: Literally, "non-offending or non-corrupting." Ck and Ct take the term to refer to those who are devoid of any offending or corrupt actions through their adherence to an alternate path, that of Brahman, the knowledge of Brahman, brahmans, and the world of Brahman, that is to say, those who have firm belief in those things. (brahmabrahmavidyābrāhmaṇabrahmalokānāṃ mārgāntarāvalambena dūṣaṇakaraṇarahitān. uktapadārtheṣu dṛḍhaviśvāsān.) Cr glosses, "those who are free from criticism of those who teach the greatness of the vedas, etc. (vedamāhātmyādyuddeśakadūṣaṇarahitān)."

16. "May you prosper according to your desire." sādhayasva yathepsitam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the relative pronoun yat for the adverb yathā, yielding yadīpsitam, which would lend the phrase the sense "May you obtain whatever you wish."

17. "thousand-eyed Indra" sahasrākṣam: Literally, "the thousand-eyed [one]."

"and purified of sin" pūtapāpmā ca: KK and VSP read instead sa ca pūtātmā, "and he [became] pure."

18. "Once thousand-eyed Indra had regained his position" sahasrākṣe pratiṣṭhite: Literally, "When the thousand-eyed [one] was established."

"that sacrifice" yajñam: Ct and Cr understand that the term here refers to Viṣṇu himself (yajñaṃ viṣṇum).

19. "the power" prabhāvaḥ: V2,D6,7,10,11, and KK and VSP read instead prasādaḥ, "grace." Cs, the only commentator to remark on prabhāva, glosses, "greatness (māhātmyam)."

"with the aśvamedha" hayamedhena: Literally, "with the hayamedha." The text commonly uses this synonymous term for the aśvamedha. See notes to 7.50.14.

Following verse 19, Ñ2,V2,B,D7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1227*]: "When the great king, whose valor and might were equal to those of Indra, had heard Lakṣmaṇa's unsurpassed and extremely charming words, he was pleased at heart and attained delight (iti lakṣmaṇavākyam uttamaṃ nṛpatir atīva manoharaṃ mahātmā / paritoṣam avāpa hṛṣṭacetāḥ sa niśamyendrasamānavikramaujāḥ //)."

The meter appears to be mixed: pādas ac consist of ten syllables of the viyoginī type, while pādas bd consist of thirteen syllables of the puṣpitāgrā type.

Sarga 78

1. "speech . . . spoken . . . speech . . . responded . . . words" uktaṃ vākyaṃ vākya- . . . / pratyuvāca . . . vacaḥ: Note the play on the derivatives of the word √vac, "to speak."

"smiled" prahasan: Literally, "smiling." Ck, Cg, and Ct believe that Rāma smiles because Lakṣmaṇa has told him about the greatness of the aśvamedha, as one might someone who did not already know it (aśvamedhamāhātmyam ajānānaṃ pratīva lakṣmaṇas tadvaibhavam uktavān iti bhāvena hāsaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly).

2. "It" etat . . . yat: Literally, "this . . . which." V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the emphatic particle eva for etat.

"entirely" aśeṣeṇa: Literally, "without remainder." Cs notes that the term should be construed with both [the killing of Vṛtra and the benefits of the sacrifice] (aśeṣeṇety ubhayānvayi).

"the benefits of the aśvamedha" vājimedhaphalam: Literally, "the fruits of the vājimedha." The term vājimedha is a common synonym of aśvamedha. Compare 7.50.14.

3. "I have heard" śrūyate: Literally, "it is heard."

"extremely righteous" sudhārmikaḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–4,8,9,12,T3,4, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead mahāyaśāḥ, "of great renown or greatly illustrious."

"Bāhli" bāhli-: Bāhli is the ancient Sanskrit name for the Balkh region, which is today the northern region of Afghanisthan.

4. "greatly illustrious" mahāyaśāḥ: G2 and KK and VSP read instead sudhārmikaḥ, "extremely righteous."

"as if it were his son" putravat: The idea must be that the king treated his subjects with paternal care.

5–6. "daiteyas, the great asuras" daiteyaiḥ . . . mahāsuraiḥ: The terms asura and daiteya are often used interchangeably, although they are not necessarily always precisely coextensive in their meanings. Thus the phrase could also be translated as "the great asuras, the sons of Diti." V2,D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahādhanaiḥ, "of great wealth," lending the pāda the sense "and the extremely wealthy daiteyas."

7. "For" hi: D5,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead [a]pi, "also or even."

"of the Bāhlīkas" bāhlīkānām: V3,D5,7,11,T1,2,M3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bāhlīkeśaḥ, "the lord of the Bāhlīkas." D9 and KK and VSP read the slight variant bāhlikeśaḥ. See note to verse 3 above.

"supremely exalted" paramodāraḥ: Our interpretation is similar to that of Cs, who glosses, "supremely lofty or exalted (paramotkṛṣṭaḥ)."

8. "in the charming month of Caitra" caitre manohare māsi: Caitra is the first month of spring, roughly corresponding to mid-March through mid-April. D5–7,10,11,T1,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous māse, "in the month," for māsi. Cs understands that the month is charming because of the splendor of the season (ṛtumāhātmyena). Cf. 7.80.8 and notes.

"conducted a hunt" pracakre . . . mṛgayām: Literally, "he made or undertook a hunt." Normally, the term mṛgayā is governed by a verb of motion such as √gam, √kram, or √car.

9. "even after killing them" hatvaiva: Literally, "just having killed." As Ct and Cr note, we are to read the emphatic particle eva in the sense of api, "even though." (hatvaiva. hatvāpīty arthaḥ.)

10. "Slaughtering ten thousand animals of various kinds, the great king wandered" nānāmṛgāṇām ayutaṃ vadhyamānaṃ mahātmanā /. . . upacakrame: Literally, "ten thousand animals of various kinds were being slaughtered by the great [one] . . . he approached."

"Mahāsena" mahāsenaḥ: Literally, "he of the great army." As Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr note, this is an epithet of Skanda, the leader of the host of the gods. The story of his birth is told at Bālakāṇḍa sarga 35. The story is popular and is known to numerous textual traditions. See, for example, ŚivaP [Rudrasaṃhitā] 4.1–2, MBh 3.213–216; MatsyaP 146; VāmaP 31; VarāP 25; KumāSaṃ 9–11; etc.

11. "But there the . . . Lord of the god among gods" tasmiṃs tu devadeveśaḥ: D2,5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasmin pradeśe deveśaḥ, "in that region, the Lord of the gods." GPP and NSP both read the vocative deveśa, "O Lord of the gods," for the nominative deveśaḥ. This reading is entirely implausible in the context, as it is out of the question that Rāma, who is the narrator here, would address his younger brother with such a term. We believe that this reading originated as a typographical error in one of these editions (most probably the 1907 first edition of NSP) and was copied by the other. The critical apparatus does not know such a variant.

12. "There, near a mountain waterfall, Umā's lord . . . in his desire to delight" umeśaḥ . . . /. . . priyacikīrṣuḥ sa tasmin parvatanirjhare: Literally, "he, Uma's lord . . . desiring to delight in a waterfall on or of a mountain." D5–7,10,11,T2,G1,3,M3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the present participle san, "being [one who desires]," for saḥ, "he." This is the one occurrence of the epithet umeśa, "Umā's lord," in the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa. Compare 7.6.24 and notes, where the use of the term umāpati is discussed. See, too, verse 16 below.

"whose banner bears the lord of cattle" gopatidhvajaḥ: Literally, "having the lord of cows for a flag." As Ct notes, the term gopatidhvajaḥ is a kenning for Śiva's more familiar epithet vṛṣabhadhvajaḥ, "whose banner is the bull." It is noteworthy that in this passage, in which the great virile ascetic transforms himself into a female, the epithet chosen for him is so strongly insistent on his virility.

"had turned himself into a woman" kṛtvā strībhūtam ātmānam: Literally, "having made himself of the nature of a woman." The syntax of the sentence is defective in that there is no finite verb to resolve the gerund. Ct supplies the rather weak "he stood or was (tiṣṭhatīti śeṣaḥ)." Cr resolves the dependent clause by construing the verse syntactically with verse 11, thus making ramayāmāsa, "he made love to," the finite verb (ātmānaṃ strīrūpaṃ kṛtvā . . . ramayāmāsa ślokadvayam ekānvayi). Ś1,Ñ2,V2 (first time),B4,D2,9–11,M8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read strīrūpam for strībhūtam, lending the phrase the sense "having made himself one having the form or appearance of a woman." Ck offers an idiosyncratic explanation of the mechanism whereby Śiva transforms himself. He says: "The assumption of a feminine form [is accomplished] primarily through the predominance of radiance belonging to Rudra, whose essence is fire consisting of heat and blazing energy (ātmānaṃ strīrūpaṃ kṛtvety uṣṇatejomayāgnitattvasya rudrasya prabhāpradhānena strīrūpaparigrahaḥ)." Gender transformation is a common motif in the epic and purāṇic literature, with the story of Ila being perhaps the most widely retold episode involving this motif. For a discussion of this theme and additional references to versions of the story, see R. Goldman 1993.

13. "And whichever . . . in that region of the forest" ye ca tatra vanoddeśe: Literally, "and those who [were] there in the region of the forest." D5–7,10,11,T1,G1,M2, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yatra yatra vanoddeśe, "in whichever place in that region of the forest."

"creatures . . . bore a masculine gender" sattvāḥ puruṣavādinaḥ: Literally, "creatures possessing the masculine speech." The expression is certainly an unusual one. The commentators understand the term vāda, "speech," here in the sense of "name or designation." Thus Cv understands, "possessing a masculine term (puruṣaśabdavantaḥ)." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "Those of whom the speech, that is to say, the designation, is 'a male,' that is to say, those things that are designated by a word in accordance with their having the masculine gender. (puruṣavādinaḥ puruṣa iti vādo vyapadeśo yeṣāṃ te. puṃliṅgavattvena śabdavācyā ye padārthāḥ santi—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.)" Cr explains: "The meaning is 'Those that are characterized by names indicating maleness.' 'Creatures' means 'animals, etc., that have masculine names.' (puruṣavādinaḥ puṃbodhakanāmaviśiṣṭā ity arthaḥ. sattvā mṛgādayaḥ puruṣanāmānaḥ.)"

"along with everything else that was there" yac ca kiṃcana tat sarvam: Literally, "and whatever [there was], all that." The phrase is ambiguous. It can refer to everything that was not a sattva, "creature," i.e., inanimate objects that would be conceptualized as masculine in gender and/or linguistic gender, or to all creatures that were of the neuter gender. Cv, Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the reference to be to all other creatures that are designated by the neuter gender (anyac ca yac ca kiṃcana napuṃsakaliṅgavācyam asti tat sarvam—so Cg; Cv, Ck, and Ct similarly). Cr simply glosses, "whatever thing, all that (yat kiṃcana vastu tat sarvam)."

"came to have a feminine gender" nārīsaṃjñaṃ babhūva: Literally, "it became one with a feminine name." Here again, the reference is to actual as well as linguistic gender. Ck, Cg, and Ct explain: "All that became appropriate to refer to by words in the feminine gender, that is to say, having a feminine appearance (tat sarvaṃ nārīsaṃjñaṃ strīliṅgaśabdavācyatvārhaṃ strīveṣaṃ babhūva—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cv simply understands, "became female (strībhūtam)." Cr glosses, "characterized by femaleness (nārītvaviśiṣṭam ity arthaḥ)."

Following 13ab, D5–7,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–4,8,9,12,T3,4, and Lahore and Gorresio substitute for 13cd, a passage of one line [1230*]: "And the trees that had masculine names all became female[1] (vṛkṣāḥ puruṣanāmānas te sarve strījanābhavan)."

[1] "all became female" te sarve strījanābhavan: Literally, "they all became womenfolk." The sequence strījanābhavan is printed as a single unit in the critical apparatus, suggesting that the editors understand the application of double sandhi here (strījanāḥ + abhavan), whereas Cr understands the sequence to be strījanā bhavan, that is to say, with elision of the preterite augment of the imperfect, which he supplies (strījanā bhavan abhavan). Cr sums up the passage, including 1230*, by saying: "By the employment of the terms vādin, 'possessing the designation,' and nāman, 'name,' it is suggested that it is well known that even the names of all these [creatures] came to be characterized as being feminine (vādināmaśabdayor upādānena sarveṣāṃ nāmāny api strītvaviśiṣṭatvena prasiddhāni babhūvur iti sūcitam)."

14. "At that very juncture" etasminn antare: Cr glosses, "At that juncture, that is to say, at the time that had as its character [rūpa] the feminization of all [creatures] (etasmin sarveṣāṃ strībhavanarūpe 'ntare samaye)."

15. "And there . . . he saw that" sa dṛṣṭvā: Literally, "he, having seen." Here again, as at verse 12 above, a dependent clause governed by a gerund is not resolved by a finite verb. We have therefore been forced to read the gerund as if it were finite. As in the previous occurrence, Cr attempts to normalize the grammar by inserting a finite verb of being, in this case avartata, "he was." See notes to verse 21 below.

"birds" -pakṣiṇam: Ñ2,D3,T1,G3,M1–4,10, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous -pakṣikam.

"as well as his attendants had become women" sānugam . . . strībhūtam: Literally, "[he] together with his attendants [was] one who became female." D5–7,10,11,T3,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP transpose the two terms and substitute strīkṛtam, "made female," for strībhūtam, "became female."

16. "in such a condition" tathāgatam: Literally, "[he had] gone thus." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, the sense is "had attained such a condition (tathāvasthāṃ prāptam)." Cr glosses the phrase as "having seen himself made feminine, as approaching destruction (vidhvaṃsānugam ātmānaṃ strīkṛtaṃ dṛṣṭvā)."

"he became immensely distressed" tasya duḥkhaṃ mahat tv āsīt: Literally, "and of him there was great unhappiness." Ś,V3,D5–8,10–12,T3,G2,M1,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute the more or less synonymous ca, "and," for tu, "and or but."

"Umā's lord" umāpateḥ: On the use of this epithet in the Rāmāyaṇa, see notes to 7.6.24. Compare verse 12 and notes above.

17. "black-throated Śiva" śitikaṇṭham: Literally, "the black-throated [one]."

18. "That beneficent . . . as he was a granter of boons" varadaḥ . . . varadaḥ svayam: Literally, "the granter of boons, the granter of boons himself." The sequence varadaḥ svayam is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. There is no escaping the blatant repetitiveness of the verse. Cr, the only commentator to address the two occurrences of the term varadaḥ, attempts to differentiate the two occurrences by understanding the underlying root of the upapada in the first occurrence as derived from the root √dā, "to give," and the second occurrence as derived from the root √do, "to cut or destroy." He thus glosses the first as "a granter of a boon" and the second as "the destroyer of what one desires" (varado varasya dātā . . . varada īpsitavināśakaḥ san). On the etymology of the name Nārada, see notes to 1.1.1 and 3309*, note 1, following notes to 6.108.5. Other translators consulted who share this reading either do as we have done in taking one of the terms to mean "beneficent" or "magnanimous" (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 611; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 601; and Benoît 1999, p. 1399) or ignore one of the terms (Dutt 1894, p. 1893; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 592; and Gita Press 1998, vol. 2, p. 902).

"illustrious" mahāyaśāḥ: D5–7,10,11,T3,4,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead maheśvaraḥ, "Maheśvara."

19. "Gentle prince of excellent vows, choose any boon" saumya varam varaya suvrata: Literally, "O gentle [one], choose a boon, O [one] of excellent vows!" Note the alliteration of "s" and "v."

20. "grief-stricken" śokārtaḥ: KK and VSP read instead duḥkhārtaḥ, "afflicted with misery."

"denied" pratyākhyātaḥ: As Cr notes, we have to add the words "with respect to the acquisition of manhood" (puruṣatvaprāpter iti śeṣaḥ). Cs similarly glosses, "denied with the words 'with the exception of manhood' (puruṣatvam ṛta iti nirākṛtaḥ)."

"by the great God" mahātmanā: Literally, "by the great [one]."

"but since he had become a woman, he would accept no" na sa jagrāha strībhūtaḥ: Literally, "he, who had become a woman, did not take or accept." G1 and KK and VSP read ca, "and," for saḥ, "he." D5–7,10,11,T2,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the virtually synonymous strībhūto 'sau na jagrāha, "he, who had become a woman, did not take or accept."

21. "stricken with still greater grief" śokena mahatā: Literally, "with great grief." The phrase is elliptical here, and we agree with Cr that some participle should be supplied. He adds, "characterized by (upalakṣitaḥ)." Our assumption here is that Ila, already grief-stricken over his transformation, as noted in verse 20 above, is more so now that his appeal has been rejected by Śiva.

"wholeheartedly" sarveṇaivāntarātmanā: Literally, "with [his] entire inner faculty." Cr glosses, "with total effort (nikhilaprayatnena)." Ct understands, "with his inner faculty consisting of mind, intellect, and consciousness (manobuddhyabhimānalakṣaṇena sarveṇāntaḥkaraṇena)."

"prostrated himself" praṇipatya: Literally, "having prostrated." Ct adds, "with [all] eight limbs (sāṣṭāṅgaṃ)." The idea here is complete prostration in which the supplicant lies flat on his face with his arms extended before him. The eight limbs are usually considered to be the two feet, two knees, two hands, chest, and head (Apte s.v. aṣṭāṅga). Here, once again, we see a sentence in which a gerund must function as a finite verb in the absence of any actual finite verbal form. As before, Cr attempts to remedy the grammatical problem by inserting a finite verb of being, avartata, "he exists." See notes to verse 15 above.

"the great Goddess" mahādevīm: D5–7,11,G2,3,M2,4,6,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead umāṃ devīm, "the goddess Umā." This reading creates a hiatus between praṇipatya and umām. M5 and KK and VSP insert the particle hi, "for or indeed," before the word umām to avoid the hiatus.

"and said" The phrase has been added as a transition to Ila's direct speech in the following verse.

22.* "You are the most beautiful woman in all the worlds." lokānām asi bhāminī: The reading of the critical text is lokānām asi bhāmini, "O beautiful lady of the worlds, you are." The verse as constituted by the critical editors is defective in that it has no nominative noun or epithet to serve as the predicate of the finite verb asi, "you are." All other references to the Goddess in the critical reading are in the vocative. We have therefore been forced to emend the verse by substituting the nominative bhāminī in keeping with the reading of D5,10,11,T2–4,G,M1,7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP. The majority of manuscripts have at least one nominative in the verse.

"O gentle Goddess, the vision of whom is never in vain, I appeal to you. Homage to you." amoghadarśane devi bhaje saumye namo 'stu te: Literally, "O Goddess! O [one] of unfailing vision! O gentle [one]! I turn to or worship [you]. Let there be homage to you." Ś1,2,Ñ1,V1,2,B,D7,10,T2–4,M2,4,10, and GPP and NSP read the nominative singular devī, "Goddess," for the vocative devi, "O Goddess." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP for pāda d (saumye namo 'stu te) read instead bhaja saumyena cakṣuṣā, "turn to me with a gentle eye." Ck, Cg, and Ct explain the phrase to mean "Resort to me, that is to say, show your grace to me with an eye of grace (anugrahacakṣuṣā māṃ bhajānugṛhāṇa)." Cr glosses, "Turn to, that is, look upon, me with a gentle eye (saumyena cakṣuṣā māṃ bhaja paśyety arthaḥ)."

23. "what was in the heart" hṛdgatam: Literally, "gone to the heart." Cr glosses, "intention (abhiprāyam)."

"with the approval of Rudra" rudrasya saṃmatā: Literally, "approved by [lit., 'of'] Rudra." We believe that the phrase is intended to indicate that the Goddess will not offer any boon without the approval of her husband. Compare 6.116.69 and note where Sītā hesitates to give her pearl necklace to Hanumān without first securing Rāma's tacit consent. This is also the interpretation of Dutt (1894, p. 1893), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 592), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 903). On the other hand, the participle saṃmatā can be read more statically to mean "respected or esteemed." This is the reading offered by Gorresio (1870, p. 265), who renders, "pregiata da Rudra." In this he is apparently followed by Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 611), who translates, "De Rudra dont elle était (l'épouse) vénérée," and Benoît (1999, p. 1399), who offers, "vénérée par Rudra." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 602), apparently taking his cue from Roussel's inserted term l'épouse, ignores the adjective and translates, "the consort of Rudra."

24. "The God will be the granter of half of the boon, and similarly I will be of the other half. Therefore you may choose half of womanhood and half of manhood for as long as you wish." ardhasya devo varado varārdhasya tathā hy aham / tasmād ardhaṃ gṛhāṇa tvaṃ strīpuṃsor yāvad icchasi //: The syntax of the verse is elliptical, defective, ambiguous, and somewhat opaque. A literal rendering would read: "The God [is] a boon granter of half, and I of half the boon as well. Therefore you must take half of woman and man, to the extent you desire." Pādas cd are especially ambiguous. The commentators and translators interpret in two ways, depending on how they understand the obscure and grammatically irregular compound strīpuṃsoḥ, "of woman and man" (samāsājantanipātābhāva ārṣaḥ—so Cg; Cr similarly). Ct and Cr explicitly understand the compound to refer to the genders of Umā and Rudra, respectively, and thus read the second line to mean: "Of woman and man, that is to say, of us two, to the extent that you desire a boon, you must take half of it from me. The word 'from me,' must be supplied. (strīpuṃsoḥ strīpuṃsayor āvayor yāvad varam icchasi tasyārdhaṃ tvaṃ gṛhāṇa matta iti śeṣaḥ—so Cr; Ct similarly.)" Ck and Cg appear to understand, as we do, that the compound refers to the nature of the boon, which concerns both maleness and femaleness, each of which will be granted for half of the time by the two divinities, respectively. Thus the idea is that the goddess is telling Ila to choose half of the boon he wishes, i.e., the restitution of his manhood, from her. (strīpuṃsor ardhasya . . . puruṣatvaprāptirūpe vare 'rdhasya devo varado dātā. ardhasyaivāhaṃ dātrī. tasmāt tvaṃ matto 'rdhaṃ gṛhāṇa. yāvad icchasi yad icchasi—so Cg; Ck similarly.) The outcome, as will be seen in the following verses, is that Ila will get to choose to spend half his/her time as a man and half as a woman. Translators choose one or the other of these positions. The former is followed by Dutt (1894, p.

1893) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 592), while the latter is followed by Gorresio (1870, p. 265) and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 903). The translations of Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 611) and Benoît (1999, p, 1399) appear to conform to the latter view but are themselves somewhat ambiguous, while Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 602), who as usual appears to be following Roussel, translates in such a way as to fall more clearly into the former camp.

"and similarly" tathā: Literally, "in the same fashion." D6,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tava, "of you."

25. "most marvelous" adbhutatamam: D5–7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead adbhutataram, "the still more marvelous."

26. "then may I once again be a man for a month, after having become a woman for a month" māsaṃ strītvam upāsitvā māsaṃ syāṃ puruṣaḥ punaḥ: Literally, "having entered into the state of a woman for a month, for a month, may I again be a man." The idea, of course, is that Ila will alternate genders on a monthly basis. Cs understands that Ila has considered the idea of his becoming literally half man and half woman at the same time as impossible or dishonorable, and so proposes the arrangement of alternating genders month by month (ekadaivārdhāṅgasya strītvam astrītvam ardhāṅgasyety asaṃbhāvitam iti matvā vyavasthāṃ svayam evāha—māsam iti).

27. "It shall be so" evam etad bhaviṣyati: V2,D5–7,11,G1,2,M1,2,5,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead evam eva bhaviṣyati, "It shall be just so."

28. Ck, Cg, Ct, Cr, and Cs note that in this verse the goddess spontaneously grants Ila an additional boon. Only Cr indicates, however, the purpose of this additional favor. He claims that the additional boon is for the purpose of preventing Ila's regret [presumably over having lost his previous gender or, perhaps, the choice of that particular boon] (tasya paścāttāpanivāraṇāya varāntaram apy āha—rājann iti.) Compare 7.80.12 and notes.

"your having been a woman . . . your ever having been a man" strībhāvam . . . pauruṣam: Literally, "the state of a woman . . . manhood."

"and . . . in the following month" cāparaṃ māsam: V3,D5–7,10,M4,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less contextually synonymous ca paraṃ māsam, "and in the next month."

29. Apropos of this verse, Cs indulges in a lengthy comment in which he summarizes the complex variants of the Ila/Ilā/Sudyumna legend as they are found in the Bhāgavatapurāṇa, the Mahābhārata, the Harivaṃśa, and the Bālabhārata of Agastya. He closes by remarking that the only way those of little imagination can be satisfied with such variation is to ascribe it to the variations in histories as they recur in different cosmic eras (ity atroktiś ca kalpabhedenety alpamatibhir abhidhātuṃ yogyaṃ nāparathā gatir iti saṃtoṣṭavyam).

"having been . . . would . . . become" bhūtvā . . . /. . . abhavat: Literally, "having become, he became." We have rendered abhavat as a continuative to indicate that the gender alternation continues beyond the first two months.

"named Ilā" ilā: Literally, "Ilā."

"the most beautiful woman in the triple world" trailokyasundarī: Compare 7.79.5 and note.

Sarga 79

1. "the story of Ila" tāṃ kathām ilasaṃbaddhām: Literally, "that tale connected with Ila." D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read aila- for ila-. The commentators who read this variant, which substitutes the derivative adjective aila, "pertaining to Ila," explain it in different ways. Cr understands the adjective aila to refer elliptically to the history of Ila (ailasaṃbaddhām ilacaritasaṃbandhinīṃ kathām). Cs understands that we must take the taddhita derivative in the sense of the base word "Ila/Ilā." He explains: "The word 'aila' is formed by the taddhita suffix aṇ, but has the sense of the base form. In other words, the reference is to the story connected with Ilā. (aileti svārthe 'ṇ. ilāsaṃbandhinīṃ kathām.)"

2. "of the particular situation" tasya bhāvasya: Literally, "of that state or condition." Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct gloss, "the state of [being both] a woman and a man (strīpūṃsabhāvasya—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cm similarly)." Cr is more specific, glossing, "of the state which has the quality of femininity in the same locus as masculinity (tasya bhāvasya puruṣatvasamānādhikaraṇastrītvadharmasya)."

3. "endure his misfortune" vartayāmāsa durgatim: Literally, "he/she lived out misfortune." Ñ2,V1,3,D7,9–11,T2,G,M4,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative singular durgatiḥ, which lends the phrase the sense "How did that unfortunate king live while he was a woman?" Cs notes that the king is unfortunate because of the impropriety of a woman's coming and going outside (bahirgamanāgamanānupayuktastrībhāvāt).

"On the other hand" vā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead saḥ, "he."

4. "how it had fared" yathāgatam: Literally, "how it had gone." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yathāgamam. Ck and Ct gloss, "suitable to the circumstances or conformable to that particular state (yathāprāptam)." Cr adds the noun vṛttam, thus understanding, "the mode of life conformable to that condition."

5. "the most beautiful woman in the world" strī . . . lokasundarī: Literally, "a woman, who was the beautiful [one] of the world." Compare 7.78.29, where Ilā is said to be trailokyasundarī, "the [most] beautiful woman in the triple world." Ck and Ct take the term loka here in its sense of "people," glossing, "[more] beautiful than people, that is to say, than all womenfolk (lokebhyaḥ sarvastrīlokebhyaḥ sundarī—so Ck; Ct similarly)."

"she passed that very first month" tam eva prathamaṃ māsam: Literally, "that very first month." Here, as elsewhere in this kāṇḍa, the author neglects to provide a finite verb. Cr is the only commentator who takes the trouble of providing one, adding, "she passed (gamayāmāseti śeṣaḥ)."

"who had previously been his attendants" ye 'sya pūrvaṃ padānugāḥ: T1 and KK and VSP read instead ye ca pūrvapadānugāḥ, "and [those] who were the previous attendants."

6. "Soon" āśu: Literally, "swiftly or immediately."

"she . . . wandered on foot deep into that forest" tat kānanaṃ vigāhya . . . vijahre . . . /. . . padbhyām: Literally, "Having plunged into that forest, she wandered with [her] two feet."

7. "having left . . . behind" saṃtyaktvā: D6,G1,2,M3,5,8,9 and KK and VSP read instead sā tyaktvā, "she having abandoned." This is no doubt a correction of the ungrammatical gerund of the critical reading.

"mounts" vāhanāni: Literally, "conveyances." Compare the Mahābhārata's tale of Bhaṅgāśvana, another king who is turned into a woman and who, consequently, has great difficulty mounting his horse (see MBh 13.12, esp. verses 11–15).

"throughout" samantataḥ: Literally, "on all sides or all around."

"a broad mountain meadow" parvatābhogavivare: Literally, "in an expansive opening of the mountain." The precise sense of this compound is obscure. The commentators understand the term ābhoga in its sense of expansion or extension, glossing, "broad or extended [area] (vistāraḥ)." Ct thus understands the phrase to mean "an ābhoga of the mountains is a broad expanse; in an interval of that means in an area between or in the midst of the mountains (parvatānām ābhogo vistāras tasya vivare parvatamadhyapradeśe)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 612) evidently takes ābhoga in its sense of "winding or curving," rendering, "dans ce val sinueux." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 603), who translates, "in the winding vale," and Benoît (1999, p. 1400), who offers, "dans ce vallon qui sinuait entre les pentes de la montagne." Gorresio (1870, p. 266) renders, "per la vallea dell' ampia regione che s'appella Parvatâ." He notes (1870, p. 331) that he follows here the explanation of his commentator (Cl), who glosses, "bhoga is a broad area named Parvatā. In an opening or clearing of that (parvatā nāma bhogo vistāras tasya vivare)."

8. "not far from the mountain" parvatasyāvidūrataḥ: Ck, Cg, and Ct all note that this region is some distance from the mountain upon which Ila had been turned into a woman. They further stress that the phrase, by referring to a different region, explains why Budha, who will be introduced in the following verse, has not been similarly transformed. (avidūrato yatra strītvaprāptis tasyāvidūrata ity arthaḥ. anyadeśatvād budhasya strītvāprāptir iti bhāvaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly.)

"extraordinarily beautiful" suruciraprakhyam: Literally, "having a very lovely appearance."

"frequented by flocks of various birds" nānāpakṣigaṇāyutam: Literally, "endowed with hosts of various birds." T4 and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous nānāpakṣigaṇair yutam.

9–10. "Ilā . . . spied" dadarśa sā ilā: KK and VSP read instead dadarśa sā tv ilā to avoid the hiatus. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"Soma's son . . . like the full moon newly risen" somasutam . . . pūrṇaṃ somam ivoditam: Literally, "the son of Soma, like full Soma, arisen." Among the meanings of the polyvalent term soma are "the moon" and its presiding deity, Soma. D7,T4, and KK and VSP read the synonymous pūrṇasomam, "full moon," for pūrṇaṃ somam.

"blazing with the effulgence of his body" jvalantaṃ svena vapuṣā: Literally, "blazing with his own body or beauty."

"Engaged in severe and difficult austerities there in the midst of the water, he was glorious, unfettered, and in the full flush of youth." tapantaṃ ca tapas tīvram ambhomadhye durāsadam / yaśaskaraṃ kāmagamaṃ tāruṇye paryavasthitam //: These lines constitute verse 10 of verses 9 and 10. The two verses constitute a single sentence in the original. We have broken it into two for the sake of clarity. Determining the precise sense of verse 10 is complicated by the fact that several of the adjectives used can apply either to Budha himself or to the austerities (tapas) in which he is engaged. This is particularly so in the case of durāsadam, "difficult to approach or difficult to accomplish," and yaśaskaram, "glorious or producing glory," while a third, kāmagamam, literally, "going at will," is somewhat ambiguous. Thus the lines could equally well be rendered literally as "and [him] who was unapproachable, conferring glory, moving at will, situated in youth, [was] performing severe penances in the middle of the water," or "and [him] who was performing austerities that were severe, difficult to accomplish, [and] productive of glory, [and him] who was situated in youth and moving at will." Any reasonable combination of these constructions is also possible. We have taken durāsadam, "difficult to approach," as modifying tapaḥ, "austerities," in pāda a and yaśaskaram "glorious," as modifying budham, "Budha," in 9b.

We take the compound kāmagamam to modify budham. Its precise meaning here is somewhat unclear. It could mean that the sage is utterly detached from all worldly ties and wanders about freely or that, through his supernormal ascetic powers, he is able to travel at will through the worlds, air, etc. Gorresio, the only translator whose text reads kāmagamam with the critical edition, understands, as do we, rendering, "moventesi a sua posta," using the somewhat archaic term posta in its sense of "volition or will." D6,7,10, 11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāmakaram, "granting wishes." This variant, like the two adjectives mentioned above, can also equally apply to the sage or his austerities. Curiously, Cr, the only commentator to remark on this verse, glosses, "indifferent or independent (nirapekṣam)," which would seem to be a better gloss for the critical reading.

The final adjectival phrase, "in the full flush of youth (tāruṇye paryavasthitam)," is also subject to variation. D7,10,11,3,M1,4,8,10, and GPP and NSP read instead kāruṇye paryavasthitam, "devoted to or intent upon compassion."

11. "Together with her companions" saha taiḥ: Literally, "together with those [men]." KK and VSP read instead sahagaiḥ, "with the companions [who had previously been men]."

"she . . . ruffled" sā . . . kṣobhayāmāsa: Literally, "she agitated." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that we should supply the phrase "through play or sport (krīḍayeti śeṣaḥ)."

"O delight of the Raghus" raghunandana: The singular vocative seems odd in that Rāma has been addressing both Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata. See verse 1 above. See, too, notes to 7.81.24.

12. "afflicted by the arrows of Kāma" kāmabāṇābhipīḍitaḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V1,D,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kāmabāṇavaśaṃ gataḥ, "fell under the power of the arrows of Kāma."

"Unable to control himself" nopalebhe tadātmānam . . . tadā: Literally, "then he did not get possession of the self then." The adverb tadā, "then," occurs in both pādas c and d, each of which is a separate sentence. We have combined the sentences and dropped one occurrence of the adverb to avoid redundancy. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term ātman here in its vedāntic sense of the indwelling universal spirit. They gloss, "He did not attain meditation on the ātman (ātmadhyānaṃ na prāptavān ity arthaḥ)." These commentators further understand the phrase to mean that Budha's mind has yielded to the control of desire and infatuation [Cg—desire only]. (kāmamohaṃ ca paravaśacitto 'bhud ity arthaḥ—so Ck; Cg and Ct similarly.) Cr understands the term ātman in its sense of "the body" and glosses, "He did not take possession of, that is, remember, his own body (ātmānaṃ svaśarīraṃ nopalebhe sasmāra)."

"he began to tremble" cacāla ca: Literally, "and he shook." We read the perfect as inceptive. V3,D1,4,6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sa cacāla, "he shook," while T3,M7, and KK and VSP read saṃcacāla, "he shook." Cr glosses, "he moved about unsteadily or staggered to and fro (itas tato babhrāma)."

13. "Ilā, whose beauty exceeded any in the triple world" ilām . . . trailokyābhyadhikāṃ śubhām: Literally, "beautiful Ilā, greatest in the triple world." B2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the similar ilām . . . trailokyād adhikāṃ śubhām, "more beautiful than the triple world."

"he fell to thinking" cintāṃ samabhyatikrāmat: Literally, "he came upon the thought." Cg, the only commentator to remark upon this reading, adds the phrase "with regard to Ilā" and explains, "The meaning is 'He had a thought relating to Ilā.' (ilāyām iti śeṣaḥ. ilāviṣayakacintāṃ prāpta ity arthaḥ.)" D7,10,11,G2,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read cittam, usually "mind," for cintām, "thought." Here, however, it must be understood as synonymous with cintām. Ck and Ct gloss the phrase similarly to Cg.

"who surpasses even a goddess" devatādhikām: Literally, "greater than a devatā." The word devatā refers to any divinity.

14. "endowed with such beauty" rūpeṇaitena śobhitā: Literally, "beautified with this beauty." Ś,Ñ2,V2,3,B1,2,4,D6–8,10–12,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous rūpeṇānena śobhitā.

15. "not the wife of another" nānyaparigrahā: Literally, "the property or wife of another." Ś,Ñ2,V3,B2,4,D,T,G3,M1,3,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more normative masculine nānyaparigrahaḥ. Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss this variant as "[she being] devoid of the state of being the property or wife of another (anya-parigrahatvarahitā)."

"With this thought in mind" iti buddhiṃ samāsthāya: Literally, "having had recourse to such [iti] thought."

"he came out of the water to the shore" jalāt sthalam upāgamat: Literally, "he approached dry land from the water." Ś1,2,V3,B3,4,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead jalāt kūlam upāgamat, "he approached the bank from the water."

16. "Once he had caught his breath" so 'śramaṃ samupāgamya: Literally, "[he] having approached the state of being without fatigue." The critical reading is extremely poorly attested, and we render it here with some hesitation. If we are to take it at face value, the idea must be that Budha, after his trembling in the water, having waded or swum to the edge of the lake and climbed out of the water, is somewhat fatigued or breathless and must take a moment to recoup. Only six M (4–9) manuscripts appear to share this reading. All other manuscripts collated for the critical edition read the word āśramam, "[his] ashram." The ashram would presumably be Budha's. Thus, for example, Ñ2,V2,B1,D7, 10,11,G2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āśramaṃ samāgamya, "having reached [his] ashram." The choice of the critical editors is yet another example of their disproportional reliance on the Malayalam manuscripts. See Introduction, "Text," pp. 203–9.

"that righteous sage" saḥ . . . dharmātmā: Literally, "that righteous [one]."

"then . . . to four of the young women" catasraḥ pramadās tataḥ: Literally, "then to four young women." V2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tatas tāḥ pramadottamāḥ, "then to those splendid young women."

17. "the righteous sage" dharmātmā: Literally, "the righteous [one]."

"this woman, the most beautiful in the world" lokasundarī: Literally, "the beautiful [one] of the world." See note to verse 5 above.

"And why has she come here?" kim artham āgatā ceha: Literally, "and for what purpose has she come here?" Ñ2,B1,2,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read caiva for ceha, lending the phrase the sense "And why, indeed, has she come?"

"the truth" satyam: D5–7,10,11,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarvam, lending the phrase the sense "Tell me everything."

18. "And when those women had heard" śrutvā tu tāḥ striyaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous śrutvā striyaś ca tāḥ by transposition with a substitution of ca for tu.

"sweet, with its sweet syllables . . . with sweet voices" madhuraṃ madhurākṣaram /. . . madhurayā girā: Note the repetition of the adjective madhura, "sweet." Only Ct among the commentators attempts to disambiguate the first two occurrences of the term madhura, "sweet." The first, he believes, refers to speech that is free from any sounds discordant to the ear, such as might be created through sandhya (diphthongs), etc. He takes the second to refer to speech free from sounds such as retroflex sounds, etc. (madhuraṃ sandhyādikṛtaśrutikaṭutvarahitam. madhurākṣaraṃ ṭavargādirahitam.) Ct is evidently referring to the well-known distinction of poetic style that contrasts the Vaidarbhī style, which uses, among other techniques, consonants that are considered to be sweet as opposed to the harsher diction of Gauḍī style. See Sāhityadarpaṇa 626–627 and Kāvyaprakāśa 1.41–53. (mādhūryavyañjakair varṇai racanā lalitātmikā / avṛttir alpavṛttir vā vaidarbhī rītir iṣyate // 626 Sāhityadarpaṇa of Viśvanāthakavirāja).

19. "This fair-hipped lady continues to be our leader. Lacking a husband . . ." asmākam eṣā suśroṇī prabhutve vartate sadā / apatiḥ . . . [asau]: Literally, "This fair-hipped woman always exists in the lordship of us. She, who is without a husband . . ." As the following verse suggests, several of the terms in this verse are obscure in a way that speaks to the ambiguous and confusing gender identity of Ila/Ilā. Another way of reading the verse might be "Although no longer a king (apatiḥ), this fair-hipped woman continues to be our ruler (prabhutve vartate)." It is the enigmatic nature of the statement that forces the perplexed Budha to resort in verse 20 below to the supernatural āvartinī vidyā to enable him to make sense of the women's obscure words and the unprecedented situation of the woman he wishes to marry. Cr understands that Ilā has been elected or designated by the women as their permanent leader (asmākaṃ prabhutve 'smannirūpitasvāmitve sadā vartate). See notes to verse 20 below.

"she wanders" aṭaty asau: Note the pronoun asau, which could be either masculine or feminine. Ñ,V1,2,B,D1–7,9–11,T3,4,M6–8, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead calaty asau, "she/he wanders about."

"through the depths of the forest" kānanānteṣu: The term is somewhat ambiguous, as it can refer to the interior regions of the forest or its outskirts. We have chosen the former, as it better conforms to the reference in verse 6, where Ilā and her party are said to plunge deep into the forest.

20. "speech with its obscure wording" vākyam avyaktapadam: Literally, "speech whose words were unclear." Among the commentators consulted, Cg and Cr read with the critical edition. They, however, understand the term to refer to the poor or unclear enunciation on the part of the women. Thus Cg glosses the term avyaktapadam as "having unclear syllables (aspaṣṭākṣaram ity arthaḥ)," while Cr glosses, "speech devoid of clear articulation (prakaṭitavṛttarahitaṃ vākyam)." Ñ2,V2,D5,10,11,T1,G,M2,3,5–7,10, and Gorresio, GPP, and NSP read āvyaktapadam, "having very clear or manifest words," for avyaktapadam, "having unclear words." Ck and Ct gloss this reading as "[speech] in which the words were perfectly clear (āsamantād vyaktāni padāni yatra tat)." We believe that this reading, which makes little sense in the context, is itself an attempted gloss on the poorly understood phrase. Among the translators consulted, Gorresio (1870, p. 267), Dutt (1894, p. 1895), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 614), and Benoît (1999, p. 1401) follow the reading and interpretation of Ct. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 603) omits the term entirely. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 905), while reading with Ct, translates "unmanifest." We believe that only Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 594) understands the phrase correctly, translating, "those ambiguous words." For a discussion of the ambiguity of the women's words, see notes to verse 19 above.

"the twice-born Budha" sa dvijaḥ: Literally, "the twice-born [one]." The term dvija, "twice-born," most commonly refers to a brahman in the epic. Here, however, as Cg points out, we must understand the term to refer to a kshatriya, i.e., Budha, who is one of the dynasts of the somavaṃśa, "the lunar race [of kings]." (dvijaḥ kṣatriyo budhaḥ.) Benoît (1999, p. 1401) renders, "le brâhmane." In fact, the text is somewhat confusing about Budha's social class. At 7.80.12 he is referred to as a rājarṣi, "royal seer," a term that is largely restricted to kings who have abandoned the household life for a path of spirituality. On the other hand, at 7.80.16, Ila addresses Budha as a brahman, "O brahman."

"recited the sacred āvartinī spell" vidyām āvartinīṃ pūṇyām āvartayata: As becomes apparent in the following verse, this particular spell enables its user to acquire knowledge that is obscure. Ck and Ct understand that this spell is the saṃ[sāṃ—so Ck] vartavidyā (collection or apprehension spell) and that its name is a synonym for the sāṃgrahaṇī spell, which, according to Ck, is associated with the Yajurveda. It is perhaps associated with the sāṃgrahaṇī iṣṭi, the practice of which enables the officiant who desires a village to acquire possession of one. (yājurvedikī sāṃgrahaṇī paryayanāmikā sāṃvartavidyāsti—so Ck; Ct similarly.) See TaiS 2.3.9.2 and TaiBr 3.8.1.1. See, too, Renou 1954, p. 183. Cr glosses, "the spell that informs one of things that are unknown (ajñānārthabodhinīṃ vidyām)." Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the spell is for the sake of the purpose at hand, which is to be accomplished through that vidyā alone (tadvidyaikasādhyaprakṛta prayojanārtham iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). V1,B1,2,4,D2,6,9–11,M1,3, and

GPP and NSP read the present indicative (laṭ) āvartayati, "he recites," for the imperfect (laṅ) āvartayata, "he recited."

21. "had thus come to know" viditvā: Literally, "having known." Ck and Ct ascribe Budha's knowledge to his yogic meditation (dhyānayogataḥ). Cg similarly notes that it is through the great virtue of his yoga practice (yogamāhātmyād iti śeṣaḥ). Perhaps the idea is that Budha employs yogic meditation to recall the āvartinī spell, as indicated in the preceding verse.

"the . . . matter" artham: Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss, "the tale or history (vṛttāntam)."

"entire" nikhilam: D10,11,T4,G2,M2,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous sakalam.

"just as it had come about" yathāgatam: V2,3,B2,D10–11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the similar yathā tathā, "in just such a way."

"all those women" sarvā eva striyas tāḥ: Ck and Ct note that we should supply the phrase "other than Ilā" (ilāvyatiriktā iti śeṣaḥ), while Cg suggests supplying the phrase "Ilā's companions (ilāsahacarīḥ)."

22. "Here the fortunate kiṃpuruṣas dwell on the slopes of the mountain." atra kiṃpuruṣā bhadrā avasañ śailarodhasi: Literally, "Here the fortunate kiṃpuruṣas dwelt on the slope of the mountain." The kiṃpuruṣas or the kinnaras (see 7.80.3) are a class of semidivine beings, both male and female, represented in the poetic literature as a happy race who dwell on the heights of the Himalayas. They are sometimes represented as having the heads of horses and the bodies of humans. Compare KumāSaṃ 1.14. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead atra kiṃpuruṣīr bhūtvā śailarodhasi vatsyatha, "Having become kiṃpuruṣa women, you shall dwell here on the slope of the mountain." KK and VSP read the synonymous kiṃpuruṣībhūtvā for kiṃpuruṣīr bhūtvā, a variant not noted in the critical apparatus. It is not perfectly clear in the critical reading whether the region in question was once populated by these happy beings and is now about to be repopulated by a new generation of kiṃpuruṣas created through the supernatural power of Budha or whether Ilā's female attendants are now simply to join the existing band of kiṃpuruṣas, which is suggested by the variant reading kiṃpuruṣīr bhūtvā.

"You too shall dwell on this mountain, and so you must arrange your living quarters." vatsyathāsmin girau yūyam avakāśo vidhīyatām: Literally, "You shall dwell on this mountain, [and] a space must be arranged." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āvāsas tu girāv asmiñ śīghram eva vidhīyatām, "A dwelling must be quickly arranged on the mountain." Ck, Cg, and Ct, who all read the variant āvāsaḥ, "dwelling," specify "leaf huts, etc. (uṭajādiḥ)."

23. "you shall surely obtain kiṃpuruṣas as your husbands" kiṃpuruṣāṇ nāma bhartṝn samupalapsyatha: Ck, Cg, and Ct specify that the meaning is that the women will have to seek out these husbands and then obtain them (anviṣya prāpsyathety arthaḥ).

24. "No sooner had that large group of women heard" tāḥ śrutvā . . . bahvyaḥ: Literally, "those many [women] having heard." KK and VSP read tām, "that," for tāḥ, "those [women]," in which case the pronoun refers to vācam, "speech." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vadhvas, "young women," for bahvyaḥ, "many."

"that speech" vācam: Literally, "the speech." D6,7,10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead striyaḥ, "the women."

"They . . . inhabited that mountain" upāsāṃcakrire śailam: The verb upa √ās most commonly means "to worship, serve, or attend upon" but may, as here, have the sense of "to settle or inhabit." Ck, Cg, and Ct take the upasarga upa separately as an adverb in the sense of "near to." Thus they understand the phrase to mean "They made their dwelling near the mountain." (śailam upa śailasamīpa āsāṃcakrire—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Cr simply glosses, "they entered (viviśuḥ)."

"in many different places" bahudhā: Literally, "variously or in many ways." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bahulāḥ, "numerous [women]."

1. "Then" tadā: Ś,D6–8,10,11,G1,2,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tathā, "thus."

"had heard about how those women had become kiṃpuruṣas" śrutvā kiṃpuruṣotpattim: Literally, "having heard the origin of the kiṃpuruṣas." Most of the translators consulted have understood the compound in its literal meaning, but, as the commentators point out, this is not the correct interpretation, since it is not a question of the origin of the race of kiṃpuruṣas but of the miraculous transformation of Ilā's now-female companions into kiṃpuruṣa women. As Ck, Cg, and Ct note: "The term 'origin of the kiṃpuruṣas' means 'the origin of those women as belonging to the race of kiṃpuruṣas' (kiṃpuruṣotpattiṃ kiṃpuruṣajātitvena tāsāṃ strīṇām utpattim—so Ct and Cg; Ck similarly)."

"And . . . they both said" cābrūtām ubhau: D11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous but augmentless form ca brūtām. Ck glosses the correct augmented form abrūtām (brūtām abrūtām). Ct glosses brūtām with the corresponding ātmanepada form rendered in GPP, NSP, and the apparatus as abruvatām, which is perhaps a replicated typographical error for abruvātām.

2. "resumed" bhūya eva . . . kathāyāmāsa: Literally, "once more he narrated."

"of Prajāpati's son Ila" prajāpatisutasya: Literally, "of the son of Prajāpati."

"saying": The word has been added.

3. "Budha, the foremost of seers" ṛṣisattamaḥ: Literally, "the foremost of ṛṣis." See notes to verse 12 below.

"all of those kinnara women" sarvās tāḥ . . . kiṃnarīḥ: As Ck and Cg note, the reference is to those women other than Ilā (sarvāsāṃ ilāvyatiriktānām).

"had dispersed" vidrutāḥ: Literally, "[they (fem.)] had fled or run away." Ñ,V1,3,D7,9–11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vihṛtāḥ, "[they (fem.)] dispersed or diverted [themselves]." Ct, who accepts this variant, glosses, "departed (gatāḥ)" and notes the critical reading as a variant. Cr understands the term to mean "carefree (vijvarāḥ)."

"smiled gently" prahasann iva: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the particle iva to have the sense of eva, lending the phrase the sense "smiling broadly." Ck and Cg understand that Budha's smile derives from the access of desire [for Ilā] (Ck, Cg) that he has experienced because of the departure of the other women (Cg) (sarvāsām ilāvyatiriktānāṃ vidrutatvād dhāsaḥ kāmavikāramūla eva—so Cg; sarvāsām ilāvyatiriktānāṃ hāsaḥ kāmavikāramūla ivaiva—so Ck). Ct believes that he smiled broadly because of his having gotten rid of the rest of the women through his own cleverness (prahasann eva sarvāsāṃ svabuddhyā nirākaraṇāt prahāsaḥ).

4. "O fair-faced woman" surucirānane: Literally, "O one of very lovely face."

"Please love me with devotion" bhajasva mām . . . bhaktyā: Literally, "Love me with love or devotion."

"with tender regard" snigdhena cakṣuṣā: Literally, "with an affectionate eye."

5. "who was cut off from her own retinue in that deserted place" śūnye svajanavarjitā: Literally, "who was devoid of her own people in that empty place." Ñ2,V,B,D2,3,7,9,10,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the locative svajanavarjite, which would then modify śūnye, "a deserted or desolate place or forest." This lends the phrase the sense "in that deserted place, which was devoid of [her] own people."

"that great planetary divinity of lovely radiance" surucira prakhyam . . . mahāgraham: Literally, "that great planet of very lovely radiance." We follow Ck and Cg here, who gloss "the god of a planet (grahadevam)" for mahāgraham. The idea here, of course, is that Budha, son of Soma, the moon god, is regarded as the divinity of the planet Mercury. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the somewhat redundant mahā-prabham, "of great radiance," for mahāgraham.

6. "I do as I please" ahaṃ kāmakarī: Literally, "I am one who acts according to desire." B1,4,D5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ahaṃ kāmacarī, "I am one who moves or acts according to desire." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss this reading as "independent (svatantrā)."

"gentle sir" saumya: Literally, "gentle [one]." There is also a play on words here, as the adjective can also mean "lunar" or "descendant of Soma."

"I am at your disposal" tavāsmi vaśavartinī: Literally, "I am one who acts according to or exists in your will or control."

7. "that wonderful response" tad adbhutaprakhyam: Literally, "that which appeared wonderful." Cr adds the word "speech (vacanam)." Compare 7.82.7.

"overcome with excitement" harṣasamanvitaḥ: Literally, "endowed with excitement or delight." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous harṣam upāgataḥ, "attained or approached excitement."

8. "was passionately making love" ramayato 'tyartham: Literally, "was excessively or intensely making love."

"the month of Mādhava" mādhavo māsaḥ: This is the second month of spring, commonly call Vaiśākha, which corresponds to April–May. The chronology is not entirely clear. In sarga 78, it appears that Ila's encounter with Śiva and Pārvatī that led to his being transformed into a woman and his boon to alternate genders on a monthly basis took place in the preceding month of Caitra. Moreover, at 7.79.5 he/she is said to have passed his/her first month as a woman, apparently referring to the month Caitra (tam eva prathamaṃ māsam). However, if that were the case, according to the conditions of the boon/curse, Ila/Ilā should have resumed a masculine form during the month of Mādhava. Perhaps the idea is that even though the original transformation took place in Caitra, the curse/boon is to been seen as taking effect from the first day of Mādhava, during which time Ilā becomes the lover of Budha. See 7.78.8 and notes and 7.78.29.

9. "after a full month . . . whose face was like the full moon" māse . . . saṃpūrṇe pūrṇendusadṛśānanaḥ: Literally, "when the month was full . . . whose face was like the full moon." Note the play on pūrṇa, "full."

"Ila, Prajāpati's . . . son" prajāpatisutaḥ: Literally, "Prajāpati's son."

"awoke in their bed" śayane pratyabudhyata: Literally, "he awoke in bed." The idea, as the commentators indicate, is that Ila has suddenly awakened in his original male body. Cs explains, "Maleness had come back (puṃstvam āgatam)." Cr offers, "He recognized his own true nature (svasvarūpam ajānāt)."

10. "King Ila" rājā: Literally, "the king."

"engaged in austerities" tapyantam: Literally, "[him] engaging in austerities." Ñ1,V1,3,D2,6,9–11,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous variant tapantam.

"standing without any support" nirālambam: Literally, "having no prop or support."

11. "I came" praviṣṭo 'smi: Literally, "I entered."

"Where in the world" kva nu: Literally, "Where indeed?"

"those followers of mine" te māmakāḥ: Literally, "those belonging to me." Ck, Cg, and Ct all explain that Ila asks because he has no recollection of the events that led to his transformation into a woman, etc. (ilo vismṛtasvastrītvādivṛttāntaḥ pṛcchati). Recall that at 7.78.28, the goddess announces that Ila/Ilā, when in one gender, will not remember his/her life in the opposite gender.

12. "of the royal seer" rājarṣeḥ: On the confused social status of Budha, see 7.79.20 and notes; verse 1 above; verse 16 below; and notes.

"who had lost his memory" naṣṭasaṃjñasya: Literally, "of him whose consciousness had been destroyed." Normally, the term is used in the sense of "unconscious," but the context here requires us to understand it to refer to Ila's amnesia concerning his transformation into a woman and his month of lovemaking with Budha. Ck and Cg understand Ila's amnesia to be a result of the power of Gaurī's curse (gaurīśāpavaśād iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly). Ct, on the other hand, sees it as a result of the power of the goddess's grace (devīprasādavaśād iti bhāvaḥ). See 7.78.28 and notes and notes to verse 11 above.

"Budha responded" pratyuvāca: Literally, "he responded or replied."

"beguiling words" śubhaṃ vākyam: Literally, "charming or auspicious words." Given the context in which we see that Budha is engaging in outright mendacity, we feel that the word "beguiling" with its senses of both charm and deception is appropriate.

"with his resonant voice" parayā girā: Literally, "with his superb voice or speech."

13. The commentators, disturbed, no doubt, at the idea of a royal seer telling lies, ascribe Budha's mendacity to the power of the curse of either Śiva or Pārvatī. Thus Ck says that Budha's deceptive speech is in order to be in conformity with the curse of the goddess (māyāvacanam īśvarīśāpānurodhanārtham). Ct, who claims to be quoting Ck, however, seems to understand that Budha lies in conformity with the words of the Lord, i.e., Śiva (māyāvacanam īśvaravākyānurodhenety katakaḥ). Cg takes the latter view, explaining, "The fraudulent speech is in conformity with the curse of Girīśa, i.e., Śiva (chadmavacanaṃ girīśaśāpānurodhārtham)."

"by a massive hailstorm" aśmavarṣeṇa mahatā: Literally, "by a great shower of stones." Given the context in which Ila is supposed to have taken shelter from severe weather, we believe that the term should be taken in its sense of "hailstorm." In this we are in agreement with Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 605), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 595), Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 906) and Benoît (1999, p. 1402). Gorresio (1870, pp. 268–69), Dutt (1894, p. 1896), and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 614) take the compound literally.

14. "Take heart, bless you." samāśvasihi bhadraṃ te: This formulaic phrase is found three time in the Sundarakāṇḍa (5.34.2; 5.48.4; and 5.62.26). Compare 5.62.30, where a slight variant of this phrase is found (samāśvasihi suvrata).

"For you may dwell here" vasa ceha: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead nivaseha, "You may dwell here."

"free from fear and anxiety" nirbhayo vigatajvaraḥ: Literally, "as one devoid of fear [and] as one whose anxiety is gone."

15. "but saddened at the death of his retainers" dīno bhṛtyajanakṣayāt: Literally, "despondent because of the destruction of retainer or servant-folk." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead dīno bhṛtyakṣayād bhṛśam, "greatly saddened at the destruction of the retainers." It should be recalled that Ila's retainers were actually first transformed into women (7.78.15) and then into kiṃpuruṣīs (7.79.24).

"immensely illustrious" mahāyaśāḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāmatiḥ, "of great intellect."

"splendid" śubham: Ñ1,D1,3–5,T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead tataḥ, "then."

16. "I shall renounce my kingdom, for, deprived of my retainers, I cannot continue even for a moment. You must please grant me permission, brahman." tyakṣyāmy ahaṃ svakaṃ rājyaṃ nāhaṃ bhṛtyair vinākṛtaḥ / vartayeyaṃ kṣaṇaṃ brahman samanujñātum arhasi //: The sense of Ila's words is a matter of sharp disagreement among commentators and translators. We read the verse, as does Cr, to mean that Ila has resolved to abdicate his kingship because he is unable to continue it after the loss of his retainers. As the following verses demonstrate, he has decided to pass the throne on to his son and remain in the forest with Budha, of whom he will, in alternate months, be the lover and companion. In this reading, it appears that Ila is requesting Budha to grant him permission to stay in the forest. Cr glosses: "Deprived of my retainers, I cannot carry on for even an instant. Therefore I will abandon my kingship. Thus please grant permission. (bhṛtyair vinākṛto 'haṃ kṣaṇam api na vartayeyam ataḥ svakaṃ rājyam ahaṃ tyakṣyāmi. ataḥ samanujñātum arhasi.)" This reading is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1897), Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 595), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 906). These three translators, however, all understand Ila to be saying that he cannot survive even for a moment without his retainers. This interpretation is, perhaps, too strong, given the context, in which Ila/Ilā continues to dwell happily in the forest. We, therefore, understand the verb na vartayeyam, "I would not exist or continue," to mean that he would not continue to live as king. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cs, however, read the verse in a completely different sense. They understand the king to be saying that even though he is deprived of his retainers, he cannot abandon his kingship. Therefore, stating that he cannot remain [in the forest] even for a moment, he asks Budha to grant him leave to depart. These commentators accomplish this reading by manipulating the text of the verse. They insert the particle api after the word "deprived (vinākṛtaḥ)" to lend the phrase the sense "even though deprived." They then add the participial phrase "while dwelling here" and read the negative particle "na" a second time, thus taking it with both finite verbs. This would lend the verse the sense "I will not abandon my kingdom even though I am deprived of my retainers. I cannot remain even for a moment. Brahman, please give me leave." (bhṛtyair vinākṛto 'py ahaṃ svakaṃ rājyāṃ na tyakṣyāmi tyaktuṃ na śaknomi. iha vasāna iti śeṣaḥ. etad evāha he brahman! kṣaṇam api na vartayeyam. naña ihāṇukarṣaḥ. tasmān māṃ gamanāya samanujñātum arhasi—so Cg; Ck, Ct, and Cs similarly.) Among the translators consulted, Gorresio (1870, p. 269), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 615), Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 605), and Benoît (1999, p. 1402) render following this interpretation. This difference in interpretation is strengthened by the ambiguity of the following two verses (17–18), where the commentators are similarly at odds as to whether Ila wishes to stay in the forest or return to his kingdom. It is not clear why the majority of the commentators appear to read this verse in a manner so seemingly at odds with the force of the narrative unless it is that they are discomfited by the idea of the righteous monarch choosing to abdicate his kingdom to dally as a woman with the forest sage.

The use of the term brahman, "O brahman," here and in the following verse introduces uncertainty as to Budha's social class or varṇa. On Budha's social status, see 7.79.20 and notes and compare verses 1 and 12 above and verse 17 below.

17. "O brahman" brahman: See notes to verse 16 above.

"he will take over my kingdom" sa me rājyaṃ prapatsyate: In keeping with the disagreement noted above as to whether Ila wishes to return to his kingdom or remain in the forest, the commentators read his intentions in discussing the royal succession differently. Cr, with whose interpretation we agree, understands Ila's comments as a response to an implicit objection concerning how the kingdom will be governed when he renounces the kingship. The reply is that Śaśabindu will take over the kingdom and govern it. (nanu tyāge prajāpālanaṃ kathaṃ bhaviṣyatīty ata āha suta iti. śaśabindur iti khyāto mama suto 'sti. sa suto rājyaṃ prapatsyate prāpya pālayiṣyati.) In keeping with their earlier interpretation, Ck, Cg, and Ct, however, take Ila's statement to be indicative of Ila's longing for kingship and concern that should he not return, his son will take over the kingdom. (uktam eva rājyotkaṇṭhāpradarśanāyāha. suta iti prapatsyate. mama rājyaṃ pratigamanābhava iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) Cs, who agrees that Ila wants to return to his kingdom, disagrees as to the reasons for the return. According to Cs, Ila is discussing the customs of succession in his lineage and argues that his son can legitimately (as yuvarāja) take over the kingdom while he, Ila, is still enjoying the prime of life, but he will not do so on his own. In other words, Cs argues, Ila is saying that unless and until Śaśabindu knows what is happening with his father, there will be, in effect, no king. Cs then calls our attention to the two qualities of Śaśabindu that Ila has ascribed to his son, that he is "devoted to dharma (dharmaparaḥ)" and "immensely illustrious (mahāyaśāḥ)." He then quotes Ct's comment on the verse, noting that it is completely contrary to the essence of these modifiers and, with his usual acerbic wit when referring to Ct, urges the learned to figure out this conundrum for themselves. (pāraṃparyāgatāṃ svamaryādāṃ kathayati. suta iti. sa me bhuktavataḥ pravayaskasya sakāśād eva rājyaṃ prapatsyate. na svasvātantryeṇa kariṣyati. madvārtāvittiparyantam arājakaprāyaṃ bhaved iti bhāvaḥ. putrasya svavaśavartitopapādakaṃ dharmaparo mahāyaśā iti viśeṣaṇadvayam. nāgojibhaṭṭas tūktam eva rājyotkaṇṭhāpradarśanāyāha suta iti. mama rājyaṃ pratigamanābhāva iti śeṣa iti vyācaṣṭe. tatraitad viśeṣaṇadvayaṃ na svarasasaṃlagnam iti vindavo vidāṃ kurvantu.)

18. "For I cannot bear to go there and speak those dreadful words to the happy wives of my retainers, O sage of immense blazing energy." na hi śakṣyāmy ahaṃ gatvā bhṛtyadārān sukhānvitān / prativaktum mahātejaḥ kiṃcid apy aśubhaṃ vacaḥ //: Literally, "Having gone, I will not be able to reply with any inauspicious speech to retainers' wives, who are endowed with happiness, O [one] of immense blazing energy." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read hitvā, "having abandoned," for gatvā, "having gone." Our understanding of the verse, in keeping with the interpretation of Cr, as above, is that Ila cannot bear the thought of returning to his capital where he would have to break the terrible news of what he believes to have been the death of his retainers to their otherwise happy wives. Recall that in verse 13 above, Budha falsely informed Ila that his retinue had been annihilated by a hailstorm. All translations consulted understand, mistakenly in our opinion, that the compound bhṛtyadārān is a dvandva in the sense of "retainers and wives." This makes little sense, as Ila believes his retainers to have been killed and is thus unwilling to confront their widows, who would have remained behind in the capital and are ignorant of their fate. Cr comments, "If one were to object that you should remain here permanently, the response would be, 'Having gone to, that is, having reached, the happy wives of my retainers, I would not be able to reply to them with unhappy words.' (nanu ihaiva nityaṃ tiṣṭhety ata āha nahīti. sukhānvitān bhṛtyadārān hitvā prāpyāsukhaṃ vacaḥ prativaktuṃ na śakṣyāmi.)" Note that, in keeping with his and our understanding of the passage, Cr takes the gerund hitvā, normally, "having abandoned," to be derived from the third gaṇa root √hā in the sense of "to go to" or "reach." Ck, Cg, and Ct read this variant quite differently, in keeping with their understanding of Ila's intentions. They believe him to be saying that he cannot bear to remain where he is, in the forest, and thus abandon his happy retainers and wives, who have remained behind in his home country. This being the case, they believe, he is instructing Budha not to utter any unwelcome words to him in the form of an order that he remain there [in the forest]. (sukhānvitān deśasthān bhṛtyadārān hitvāhaṃ na śakṣyāmi. iha sthātum iti śeṣaḥ. yad evam ato māṃ prati kiṃcid apy aśubham iha vāsaniyogalakṣaṇāniṣṭaṃ vaktuṃ nārhasīti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) In this interpretation, the compound bhṛtyadārān must refer to the wives and [surviving] retainers of the king. All translations consulted, with the exception of Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 906), generally follow this interpretation. The translation offered by Gita Press appears to combine the two interpretations and, in fact, makes little sense, rendering, "Having lost my attendants and spouses, who were happy, O powerful one, I shall not be able to say anything inauspicious."

19. "comfortingly" sāntvapūrvam: Literally, "filled with consolation." Since Budha's words are in such contrast to Ck's, Cg's, and Ct's interpretation of Ila's words in the previous verse, Ck and Ct attempt to rationalize the difference by arguing that the sage is trying to conciliate Ila by asking him to remain in the forest only for a short time. (sāntvapūrvaṃ tava kiṃcitkālavāsena sukhaṃ bhaviṣyatīty evaṃ vādapūrvaṃ ta iha vāso rocatām ity uvāca—so Ck; Ct similarly.)

"uttered these extraordinary and wonderful words" paramam adbhutam . . . uvāca: Literally, "he said [something] excellent [and] wonderful." We understand with Ck and Ct that the adjectives modify an unexpressed term for speech (vacaḥ). Ck and Ct explain that the extraordinary words are marvelous, as they are predictive of the accomplishment of wonderful actions that are yet to come (adbhutam āgamyādbhutakarmasiddhijanakaṃ paramaṃ vacaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly).

"Please choose to remain here." vāsas ta iha rocatām: Literally, "May a dwelling here be pleasing to you."

20. "here" iha: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP and NSP read instead the somewhat awkward adya, "today or now."

"When you have dwelt . . . for a year" saṃvatsaroṣītasya . . te: Literally, "of you who [will] have dwelt for a year." On the duration of Ila/Ilā's stay with Budha, see verse 25 below and notes and 7.81.2 and notes.

21. "When Ila had heard" śrutvā: Literally, "Having heard."

"he made up his mind to stay just as that exponent of the doctrine of Brahman had urged" vāsāya vidadhe buddhiṃ yad uktaṃ brahmavādinā: Literally, "he set his mind toward dwelling as had been said by the exponent of the doctrine of Brahman."

22. "he . . . made love" saḥ . . . ramayati: Literally, "he makes love." Despite the masculine pronoun, the referent is to Ila when he is a woman, Ilā. Cr adds the phrase "to Budha" (budham iti śeṣaḥ).

"lovely" śubhā: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead sadā, "always, constantly," which is redundant with aniśam, "constantly," in pāda b.

"for one month . . . in alternate months" māsam . . . māsam: Literally, "for a month, for a month." Recall that the terms of Pārvatī's curse/boon were that Ila/Ilā should alternate genders on a monthly basis. See 7.78.24.

"as a man" puruṣabhāvena: Literally, "through or with the state or condition of a man."

"he set his mind on righteousness" dharmabuddhiṃ cakāra saḥ: Literally, "he made a dharma-mind." Note how the concept of dharma here seems to be held in opposition to Ila's sexual relations with Budha.

23. "in the ninth month" navame māse: In light of the unusual circumstances of this pregnancy, the commentators struggle to explain how insemination, gestation, and birth can take place over a period in which the mother has been female only in every other month. Different explanations are proposed. Cv notes that by saying "in the ninth month," the text indicates that through the course of the transformations of gender, Ila recovers his manhood in the tenth month. In other words, he suggests that Ila/Ilā has been in the feminine gender throughout the nine months of the pregnancy. He asks how indeed an embryo can enter someone who is in the state of maleness. He responds that alternatively we might understand that whatever person has the characteristic marks of femaleness, such as [long] hair, breasts, etc., can conceive and bear a child all during the period of the ninth month. (navame māsīti vacanaṃ paryāyakrameṇa daśame māsi puṃbhāvaprāpteḥ. nanu garbhaḥ puṃbhāve kva viśati. stanakeśādistrīlakṣaṇāni yatra yatreti yat kiṃcid evaṃ navame māsi garbhasya dhāraṇaṃ prasavaś ceti vā parikalpyate.) Ck and Cg avoid the problem by arguing that we are to understand that Ilā gave birth to her son immediately after insemination, just as women such as Satyavatī (Yojanagandhī) gave birth to sons such as Vyāsa when impregnated by men such as Parāśara. (ilā somasutāt sutaṃ janayāmāseti. yojanagandhyādiḥ parāśarāder vyāsādim iva niṣekānantaram eveti jñeyam—so Cg; Ck similarly.) On Satyavatī and the birth of Vyāsa, see MBh 1.57.56–71. Ck, moreover, specifies that by the expression "in the ninth month" is meant "in the month that had reached the fifth alternation [as a female]" [four months having been spent as a man] (evaṃ tataḥ . . . navame māsīti pañcamaparyāyaprāptimāsa ity arthaḥ). Ct argues that there is no problem here if we imagine that Ila/Ilā has been pregnant all along for nine months, but that, even though the fetus was there, through the force of Pārvatī's boon, it did not manifest itself because that very boon provides for Ila/Ilā's ignorance of his/her monthly gender transformations. Moreover, the fetus does not manifest itself during periods of maleness. Ct concludes by quoting Cm, who does not accept this position but argues, in a way similar to the position of Ck and Cg, that even though Ilā and Budha have been having sexual relations all along, it is only in the ninth month that she suddenly both conceives and delivers her child. (navame māsīti na caivaṃ madhye puruṣatvāvasthāyāṃ garbhadarśanena pūrvāvasthāsmaraṇabhāvarūpapārvatīvarānyathābhāvāpattiḥ. tadvarabalād eva vidyamānasyāpi garbhasyānenājñānam iti kalpanenādoṣāt. etadanupapattyaiva budhasya samāgamam ārabhya navame māsi sadya eva garbhagrahaṇaprasavāv iti tīrthaḥ.) Cs proposes that the swelling [of the woman's belly] occurs only in each of the [alternate] months of femaleness, while it is hidden in the alternate [months of maleness]. But we are to understand that the pregnancy did not proceed in the manner described in the Mahābhārata, where the pregnancy continues through the nine months [of being a female], which constitute half of a longer period of eighteen months. As an alternative, Cs proposes that it is possible that the embryo continued to grow unseen and unnoticed through the force of Pārvatī's boon [of amnesia]. (navame māsy ekasmin strītvamāse vṛddhiḥ. aparasminn antardhānam. aṣṭādaśamāse tadardhanavamāsī saṃpattir iti bhāratoktaprakāreṇa na kramata iti mantavyam. athavā pārvatīvareṇa vidyamānasyāpy apratibhānaṃ garbhasyāntarvṛddhiś ca saṃbhavata iti yathāvasthitanavame māsi sutaṃ janayāmāsa.)

"the child of her own body" ātmajam: Literally, "born of the body or the self." This term is generally used in the general sense of "child" or, here, "son," but as this would be redundant with the synonymous term sutam, "child, son," in pāda b, and as we believe the author intends to stress the strange fact of the child's being born from an alternately male and female parent, we have translated more literally. Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D1–4,6–12,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ūrjitam, "mighty," which avoids the seeming redundancy.

24. "As soon as . . . was born" jātamātram: V3,D10,11,M4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous jātamātre.

"who looked just like Budha" budhasya samavarṇābham: Literally, "who was similar in appearance to Budha." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the similar budhasya samavarṇaṃ ca, "and having an appearance similar to Budha's." This variant creates a hiatus between ca and the following ilā. We and other translators who share the critical reading or this variant understand the phrase to mean that Purūravas is the image of his father. But the verse is somewhat ambiguous in this respect, and one can simply construe budhasya in pāda c with pituḥ, "of the father," in pāda b. This permits Ck, somewhat plausibly, to understand that the child resembles his mother (mātṛsamākāram). This idea is represented only in the translation of Benoît (1999, p. 1403), who understands the term varṇa here in its sense of the four social orders of āryan society. He thus renders, "kṣatriya comme sa mère."

"placed . . . in his father's hands" pitur haste nyaveśayat: Literally, "she caused [him] to enter the hand of the father." T2, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous compound pitṛhaste, "into the father's hand," for pitur haste. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the phrase to mean that Ilā entrusts her son to Budha for the purpose of performing the various rites of passage, or saṃskāras, such as the investiture with the sacred thread (upanayanādikṛtyārthaṃ nyaveśayat sthāpitavatī—so Cg). Ñ1,B1,D5,T1,4,G1,M3,5,7, and Ck and Ct read instead the similar nyavedayat, "she offered or presented," for nyaveśayat, "she caused to enter."

25. "after comforting the lord of men" samāśvāsya narādhipam: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sa vai saṃvatsarāntaram, lending the phrase the sense "he, indeed, up until the [next] year." Ck and Ct understand this phrase to mean "for the three months anticipated [by Budha] remaining until the advent of the following year (saṃvatsarāntaraprāptyapekṣitāvaśiṣṭamāsatrayaparyantam)." The idea here is that these are the three months that remain following the nine months of Ila/Ilā's pregnancy. This period will conclude Ila/Ilā's year of residence with Budha (see verse 20 above and notes) and will be mentioned again in the following sarga (7.81.2). Cm understands similarly but adds the verbal phrase "he nourished him (vardhayāmāsa)," thus indicating that Budha nurtured his son as well as entertaining his guest. Cm observes that we understand this meaning from the fact that it will be stated [in the next sarga] that the son [Purūravas] will enter the city together with Ila, who will be freed from his curse of periodically becoming a woman (paścāt strīśāpavimuktenelena saha putrasyāpi purapraveśasya vakṣyamāṇatvād iti bhāvaḥ).

1. "of Purūravas" tasya: Literally, "of him."

2. "When . . . had dwelt with him for a year . . . then" saṃvatsaram athoṣitā: Literally, "had dwelt then for a year." At 7.80.20 Budha had proposed that Ila/Ilā remain with him for one year. The commentators make it clear that the question is directed to Ila/Ilā's activities after the year has passed (saṃvatsarāt param iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly). See 7.80.20,25 and notes.

"she, the beloved of Soma's son" sā priyā somaputrasya: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ilā sā somaputrasya, "She, Ilā, of the son of Soma." Ct and Cr attempt to deal with the awkward syntax by adding the word "in the vicinity (samīpe)" to construe with the genitive, lending the phrase the sense "she, Ilā, in the vicinity of the son of Soma."

"what did she do" akarot kim: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the question to relate to the issue of royal succession. According to them, the meaning of the brothers' question is whether Purūravas, who was born after Ilā's/Ila's other son, Śaśabindu, inherited the kingdom or not (purūravasaḥ śaśabindoś ca tatputratayā paścājjātapurūravaso rājyam abhūn na veti praśnārthaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). Thus, for these commentators, the question speaks to the vexed issue of the displacement of the eldest heir to the throne, which so bedevils royal succession in both epics. See R. Goldman 1978 and van Buitenen 1973, pp. xvii–xix.

"just as it happened" tattvataḥ: Literally, "truthfully."

3. "he continued" punar uvāca: Literally, "he spoke again or further."

"the story of Prajāpati's son" imāṃ prajāpatisute kathām: Literally, "that story with regard to the son of Prajāpati." Ct and Cr understand, as do we, the locative in the sense of "with reference to or on the subject of (tadviṣaye—so Cr; Ct similarly)." Ś,D7,8,10–12,M4, and GPP and NSP oddly read the neuter singular pronoun idam, "this or that," for the feminine singular pronoun imām, "this or that."

4–5. "Then" tataḥ: B1,2,T1,G1,M3, and KK and VSP read instead tathā, which would then be read as a conjunction with the names of the sages (i.e., "as well as the sage Durvāsas").

"after heroic Ila had once again become a man" puruṣatvaṃ gate śūre: Literally, "when the hero had gone to manhood."

"the delightful Pramodana" pramodanaṃ modakaram: The term modakaram, "producing joy or delight," is almost certainly meant as an epithet of Pramodana and was no doubt chosen more for its echoing effect than for any specific quality of the sage. Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 616), perhaps influenced by Monier-Williams (s.v. modakara), whose dictionary takes the term as the name of a sage, takes it as an additional proper noun. In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 606) and Benoît (1999, p. 1433). Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 907) does this as well.

6. "the eloquent sage" vākyajñaḥ: Literally, "a knower of speech."

"well composed through his self-control" dhairyeṇa susamāhitaḥ: D6,7,10,11,T2, G3,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the accusative plural susamāhitān, "well composed," for the nominative singular susamāhitaḥ, making the phrase refer not to Budha but to his guests.

"all of whom perceived the highest truth" sarvān . . . tattvadarśinaḥ: D7,10,11,M1,5,8,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the nominative singular tattvadarśanaḥ, "having a vision of the highest truth," making the phrase refer to Budha rather than his companions.

7. "You all know what happened to him." jānītainaṃ yathābhūtam: Literally, "you [all] know him as he has become." Ck and Ct explain that the compound yathābhūtam means that he has acquired the dual condition of both woman and man, which was brought about through the command of the Lord [Śiva] (yathābhūtam īśvarājñayānubhavasiddhaṃ strīpuṃsarūpaprakāradvayaṃ prāptam enaṃ jānīta—Ct; Ck similarly). Cr explains, "You all know which condition he obtained; we must supply the phrase '[You all know] through [your] yogic power' (yad dharmaṃ prāptaṃ jānīta yogabalenety śeṣaḥ)." Cg glosses simply, "the story of Ila (ilasya vṛttāntam)."

"Now you must do what would be best for him." śreyo hy asya vidhīyatām: Literally, "And let the best for him be arranged." D6,7,10,11,M7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read atra, "here or in regard to this," for asya, "of him." Cr glosses the declensional form asmin, "with regard to this or him."

8. "of immense blazing energy" sumahātejāḥ: V2,D1,4,6,7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu mahātejāḥ, "and [the one] of great blazing energy."

"arrived at the ashram together with some eminent twice-born brahmans" tam āśramam upāgamat /. . . dvijaiḥ saha mahātmabhiḥ: Literally, "along with great twice-born ones." Ñ2,D11,M1,6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tad-, "his," for tam, "that." D6,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dvijaiḥ saha mahātmabhiḥ /. . . tam āśramam upāgamat by transposition.

9. As Cr notes, Rāma is specifying the names of the eminent brahmans mentioned in the previous verse (dvijānāṃ nāmāni nirdiśann āha pulastya ityādibhiḥ). As Benoît (1999, p. 1730) remarks in a note to this verse, the names Kratu, Vaṣaṭkāra, and Oṃkāra are themselves evocative of vedic ritual.

"came to" upāgaman: Literally, "they approached." Ś2,V1,B4,D1,2,4,5,8,10,11,G3,M1, 2,4,5,7, and KK and VSP read instead the singular upāgamat, "he [i.e., Oṃkāra] approached."

"the ashram" tam āśramam: B2,M1, and GPP and NSP read instead tad-, "his."

10. "for the lord of Bāhli" bāhlipateḥ: Literally, "of the lord of Bāhli." See 7.78.3 and note.

"they then individually offered advice" pṛthag vākyam athābruvan: Literally, "individually they then spoke speech." D6,7,10,11,T,G3,M2–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the plural vākyāni [vākyāny athābruvan] for vākyam.

11. "Twice-born brahmans" dvijāḥ: Literally, "O twice-born [ones]."

12. "other than bull-bannered Śiva" antareṇa vṛṣadhvajam: Literally, "excluding the one with a bull for his banner." D6,7,10,11,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous antarā vṛṣabhadhvajam.

"And indeed . . . is as dear to that great God" priyaś caiva mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "and indeed dear to or beloved of the great [one]." This verse, with its superimposition of Śaivite devotionalism onto the vedic sacrificial religion, arouses the theological and sectarian passions of the commentators, which have lain largely dormant since the end of the Yuddhakāṇḍa. The issue is basically this. The aśvamedha, often regarded as the crest-jewel of royal vedic sacrifices, is nowhere in the vedic literature said to be particularly directed toward or beloved by Śiva, who, at least in his standard purāṇic characterization, is actually excluded from the vedic sacrifice of his father-in-law, Dakṣa. See, for example, MBh 12.274.2–58; KūrmaP 1.14.4–97; DevīBhāP 7.30; etc. See, too, Bālakāṇḍa 65.9 and notes. The commentators attempt to rationalize this seeming disconnect in various ways. Ck, Cg, and Ct all agree that Śiva is named because he is the only deity with the power to remove the curse, which he himself issued (see 7.78.11–16), and that, moreover, the aśvamedha is pleasing to him because it is pleasing to all divinities. (vṛṣabhadhvaja eva svakṛtaśāpanivartanasamarthas tatprītiś cāśvamedhena sarvadevatāprītikareṇaiva—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly.) These commentators similarly agree that the reason there is no sacrifice greater than the aśvamedha is that it has the power to expiate all the sins of kings up to and including the killing of a brahman. (nāśvamedhāt paro yajñaḥ. rājñāṃ brahmahatyāntasarvapāpanivartakatvād iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Cg and Ck similarly.) See notes to 7.75.2. These three commentators, however, begin to differ in their understanding as to why the aśvamedha should be particularly dear to Śiva. Ct, responding to an objection as to why this should be so, argues that although the sacrifice is particularly dear to Prajāpati, who is its presiding deity, it is not wrong to associate it with Śiva because of the fact that Prajāpati, when he is in the state of being Hiraṇyagarbha, the golden embryo of the universe, is also considered to be Rudra, i.e., Śiva. (nanv aśvamedhena kathaṃ vṛṣabhadhvajasaṃtoṣo 'ta āha—priya eva mahātmanaḥ. yady api prajāpatidaivatyatvāt prajāpatiprītikaraḥ sa tathāpi hiraṇyagarbhāvasthāviśeṣasyaiva rudratvān na doṣaḥ.) Cg agrees that the aśvamedha is particularly pleasing to its principal deity, Prajāpati, but allows that since it also delights all of the divinities, it can be said to please Śiva as well. He notes, however, that in reality, according to the vedic declaration that "Viṣṇu is the sacrifice (= Kauṣītakibrāhmaṇa 4.2; TaiBr 1.2.5.1; AitBr 1.15.4; cf. TaiS 1.7.4.4)," the aśvamedha is for the propitiation of the presiding deity of the sacrifice, i.e., Viṣṇu. That is to say, according to the statement made earlier by Lakṣmaṇa, the aśvamedha is designed to propitiate Viṣṇu (see 7.76.20–21). Moreover, Cg continues, in the propitiation of Viṣṇu, Hara (Śiva) is also pleased. It is only, Cg argues, in order to praise the aśvamedha for its quality of expiating the killing of a brahman that Rāma repeats what Lakṣmaṇa had said. He continues that one must reject the idea that repeating what Lakṣmaṇa said regarding the propitiation of Viṣṇu, now with regard to the propitiation of Śiva, suggests that he is attempting to express the superiority of Śiva with respect to Viṣṇu. In fact, Cg concludes, Rāma's comments are made merely in order to demonstrate the fact that the aśvamedha can expiate the sin of killing a brahman. (yady api prajāpatidevatākaḥ prajāpatiprītikaro 'śvamedhas tathāpi sarvadevatā prītikaratvād asya rudraprītikaratvam api siddham. vastutas tu yajño vai viṣṇur iti śrutivacanād yajñapuruṣārādhanam aśvamedhaḥ. viṣṇvārādhanam ity upakrame lakṣmaṇoktyā viṣṇvārādhanam evāśvamedhaḥ. tadārādhanatvenaiva harasyāpi priyatvam. prakṛtabrahmahatyāvārakatvena tasya praśaṃsārthaṃ punar api rāmeṇa tadviṣayārthavāda uktaḥ. etena yat kenacid uktaṃ lakṣmaṇena viṣṇvārādhanayajñe prastute punā rāmeṇa rudrārādhanatvapradarśanaṃ viṣṇvapekṣayā rudrādhikyasya pratipādanārtham iti taddūrotsāritam. brahmahatyāvārakapradarśanārthatvād rāmoktasya.) Ck's arguments as to why Śiva should be associated with the aśvamedha are somewhat different from those put forward by Cg and Ct, other than the shared notion that, as the one who uttered the curse, he must be the one to undo its effect. Ck now raises the question as to why Kardama proposes the performance of the aśvamedha, since it is unlikely to gratify Śiva. His response is that it is pleasing to that great one (Śiva) since, even though its presiding divinity is Prajāpati and it is therefore pleasing to that divinity and grants one access to Prajāpati's world of the Brahmaloka, still it is highly pleasing to great Rudra, since he [Śiva], in his form as the three vedic sacrificial fires, is the instrument of the accomplishment of all sacrifices (?), up to and including the aśvamedha. Ck validates this statement by quoting two vedic phrases that state, respectively, that Rudra, indeed, is the sacrificial fire and that Rudra is both the sacrificial fire and the agent of what is properly sacrificed. (vṛṣabhadhvajaprītyabhāvyatvāt katham aśvamedhena yajanam ity āha. priyaṃ caiva mahātmana iti. yady api prajāpatidevatākaḥ prajāpatiprītikaraḥ prājāpatyabrahmalokapradaś cāthāpi mahātmano rudrasya ca paramapriyam eva tadyajñam aśvamedhāntasarv . . . (?) yāgasādhanatvaṃ tretāgnisvarūpatvād. rudro vā eṣa yad agnir [yathā] rudro 'gniḥ sviṣṭakṛd ityādeḥ.) The first quote, rudro vā eṣa yad agnir yathā, is found at TaiS 5.4.10.5. The phrase appears to be a partial quotation of the popular vedic saying "devo 'gniḥ sviṣṭakṛt," "the god Agni is the agent of what is properly sacrificed." See, for example, Vājasaneyīsaṃhitā 21.58a, 28.22a, 28.45a; ŚatBr 2.2.3.25; TaiBr 2.6.10.6a, etc. Cs, who is no partisan of Śiva, proposes his own characteristically idiosyncratic interpretation of the phrase "beloved of the great one (priyaś caiva mahātmanaḥ)." According to him, the epithet refers either to Brahmā or to Viṣṇu. Cs argues that the Śaivite epithet "bull-bannered (vṛṣa[bha]dhvajam)" is used since Śiva, as the author of the curse, must appeal to the grace of Hari (Viṣṇu) to rescind it, not because he (Śiva) is the preeminent divinity. (mahātmano brahmaṇo viṣṇor vāyaṃ yajñaḥ priyaś ca. rudrasya śāpadātṛtvāt taddvārā śrīhariprasāda āsādanīya iti vṛṣabhadhvajam ity uktir na tu paramamukhyatayeti mantavyam.)

13. "the unassailable God" durāsadam: Literally, "the unassailable or unapproachable [one] or the difficult to be accomplished [thing.]" In this context, the term can plausibly refer either to Śiva as the recipient of the sacrifice or to the sacrifice itself. Cr, the only commentator to address the term, takes it in the latter sense. He glosses, "Let us offer the aśvamedha, difficult to accomplish (durāsadam aśvamedhaṃ yajāmahe)." In this opinion he is followed by Dutt (1894, p. 1898), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 616), and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 606). We, however, believe that the adjective is intended to refer to Śiva, for whom the term serves as one of his epithets, since otherwise the logical connection with the previous verses is weakened or lost. In this opinion we are in agreement with Gorresio (1870, p. 271) and Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 597). Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 907) and Benoît (1999, p. 1404) omit the term from their translations.

"those bulls among twice-born brahmans" dvijarṣabhāḥ: Literally, "the bulls among twice-born [ones]."

14. "The royal seer" rājarṣiḥ: D6,T3,4,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the genitive singular rājarṣeḥ, thus making the term somewhat awkwardly refer to Saṃvarta, who appears to be a brahman. See verses 4–5 above. See 7.18.3 and notes, where Saṃvarta is identified as a brahman-seer and the brother of Bṛhaspati.

"Marutta" maruttaḥ: Earlier in the Uttarakāṇḍa, while offering a sacrifice to Śiva, Marutta is challenged by Rāvaṇa. Marutta is about to engage in battle with the rākṣasa lord but is dissuaded from this course by his guru, Saṃvarta. See 7.18.2–17; see, too, notes to 7.18.2.

"disciple" śiṣyaḥ: As is made clear at 7.18.2–17, Saṃvarta is Marutta's guru and officiating priest. For some reason, Cr understands that Marutta is Saṃvarta's son, but this goes against the entire vedic, epic, and purāṇic tradition, and, in any case, a king would not normally be the son of a brahman (marutta iti vikhyātaḥ saṃvartasya sutaḥ).

"Saṃvarta" saṃvartasya: See 7.18.2–17, and especially notes to 7.18.3.

"performed the sacrifice" yajñaṃ samupāharat: The idea here is, no doubt, that Marutta is serving as the yajamāna on behalf of Ila. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand the phrase to mean that Marutta gathered all the necessary materials and implements for (Ila's—so Ct) sacrifice (ilayajñāpekṣitasaṃbhāram upāhṛtavān ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly).

15. "and the greatly illustrious Rudra was supremely gratified" rudraś ca paraṃ toṣam ājagāma mahāyaśāḥ: Literally, "and the greatly illustrious Rudra came to the highest satisfaction." T1,2,G3,M3,6, and KK and VSP read jagāma sumahāyaśāḥ, lending the line the sense "and the very greatly illustrious Rudra went to the highest satisfaction." Continuing his effort to downgrade the importance of Śiva relative to Viṣṇu and Brahmā, Cs takes the conjunction "and (ca)" to imply that those two divinities were also pleased by the sacrifice and states that, moreover, we should understand that they were gratified proportionally in their order of importance, that is to say, first Hari, next Brahmā (Hiraṇyagarbha), and last Śiva. (rudraś ceti śabdāt paramamukhyamukhye śabdavācyah arihiraṇyagarbhaharāṇāṃ prītiṃ taratamato 'bhipraiti.)

16. "upon the completion of the sacrifice" yajñasamāptau: V2,B3,D6,7,10,11,T2,4,G1,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yajñe samāpte, "when the sacrifice was completed."

"Umā's lord" umāpatiḥ: On the use of this epithet in the Rāmāyaṇa, see notes to 7.6.24.

"said the following with regard to Ilā" uvācedam ilāṃ prati: Literally, "he spoke this with reference to Ilā." D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead uvāca ilasaṃnidhau, "he spoke in the presence of Ila." Note the hiatus and the change of gender. The actual gender of Ila/Ilā in this sarga is a bit ambiguous. Starting at 7.80.25 and continuing up until the present verse (see verses 4–5 and 7) it is clear that Ila is once again a male. Here and below at verses 18 and 19, the king is referred to by his feminine name Ilā. This is probably to avoid the awkwardness of petitioning Śiva to turn a man into a man.

"to . . . those . . . twice-born brahmans" dvijān: Literally, "to the twice-born [ones]."

17. "with the aśvamedha" hayamedhena: Literally, "with the hayamedha." The text commonly uses this synonymous term with the aśvamedha. See notes to 7.50.14.

"foremost of twice-born brahmans" dvijasattamāḥ: Literally, "foremost of twice-born [ones]."

"for this lord of Bāhli" bāhlipateḥ: KK and VSP read instead bāhlīpateḥ. See 7.78.3 and notes.

18. "As the Lord of the gods . . . him" deveśe . . . deveśam: Literally, "as the Lord of the gods [was speaking] . . . [propitiated] the Lord of the gods."

"those twice-born brahmans" dvijās te: Literally, "those twice-born [ones]."

"further propitiated" prasādayanti: Literally, "they propitiated or entreated." Ck and Ct argue that some specific propitiation is necessary in order for Śiva not to repeat his earlier statement to Ilā at 7.78.19 that she might choose any boon except the restoration of manhood. (deveśaṃ prasādayanti sma. puruṣatvaṃ vinānyaṃ varaṃ vṛṇīṣveti pūrvavad yathā na vadet tathā viśiṣya prasannam akurvann ity arthaḥ.)

19. "delighted at heart, Rudra" prītamanā rudraḥ: Ñ,V1,2,B3,D1–7,9–11,T3,4,M1,2,4,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prīto mahādevaḥ, "pleased, Mahādeva."

"restored his manhood" puruṣatvaṃ dadau punaḥ: Literally, "He gave manhood again."

"the immensely illustrious god" sumahātejāḥ: Literally, "the immensely illustrious [one]."

20. "Once the aśvamedha had been completed" nivṛtte hayamedhe tu: Literally, "and when the hayamedha had ceased." See notes to 7.50.14. B1,2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the synonymous ca, "and," for tu.

"and Hara had vanished" gate cādarśanaṃ hare: Literally, "and when Hara had gone to invisibility." KK and VSP read instead gataś cādarśanaṃ haraḥ, "and Hara disappeared."

"all those . . . twice-born brahmans departed" dvijāḥ sarve agacchan: Literally, "the twice-born [ones] went." Note the hiatus. D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,2,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead divjāḥ sarve te 'gacchan, "all those twice-born [ones] went," while KK and VSP read instead dvijāḥ sarve hy agacchan, "indeed, all the twice-born [ones] went," to avoid the hiatus.

"farsighted" dīrghadarśinaḥ: Compare notes to 7.65.10.

21. "King Ila" rājā: Literally, "the king." See notes to verse 16 above.

"having left Bāhli" bāhlim utsṛjya: As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, Ila has left Bāhli under the governance of his eldest son, Śaśabindu, as foretold by Ila at 7.80.17 (jyeṣṭhaputraśaśabindvadhiṣṭhitam iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg and Ct; Ck similarly).

"Pratiṣṭhāna" pratiṣṭhānam: See 7.51-7*, verse 19 (= App. I, No. 8, lines 295–296) and notes.

"in the middle country" madhyadeśe: This term refers to the region lying between the Himalayas in the north and the Vindhyas in the south, Vinaśana in the east and Prayāga in the west (himavadvindhyayor madhyaṃ yat prāgvinaśanād api / pratyag eva prayāgāc ca madhyadeśaḥ sa kīrtitaḥ //). See ManuSm 2.21.

22. "But as for . . . he became king in Bāhli" tu . . . rājāsīd bāhlyām: D10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ca rājarṣir bāhlim, "and that royal seer . . . Bāhli," while KK and VSP read the synonymous tu rājarṣir bāhlim. This variant is elliptical, as it lacks a verb. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all supply the verb "he inhabited or settled in" (adhyuvāseti śeṣaḥ).

"Ila . . . in Pratiṣṭhāna" pratiṣṭhāna ilaḥ: Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11,T3,G1,2,M2–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pratiṣṭhāne ilaḥ. Note the irregular sandhi and the hiatus.

"was king" rājā: We carry over the phrase "he was (āsīt)" from pāda a. Ck and Ct, whose variant in pādas ab shows no verb, as noted above, supply "he dwelt (uvāseti śeṣaḥ)." Cr inserts the participle sthitaḥ, "he stayed or abided," which he further glosses as "was very firmly established (atipratiṣṭhitaḥ)."

23. "In time" kāle: Cg understands, "at the time of the death of his body (śarīrāvasānakāle)."

"inherited Pratiṣṭhāna" pratiṣṭhānaṃ prāptavān: Literally, "he acquired Pratiṣṭhāna."

24. "O bulls among men" puruṣarṣabhau: Literally, "O you two bulls among men." The dual is appropriate, as it marks the conclusion of Rāma's remarks to the question of Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata in verses 1–2 above. V1,D7,10,11,T4,G3,M6, and GPP and NSP, however, read instead the singular puruṣarṣabha, "O bull among men." See notes to 7.79.11.

"Ila, having been a woman" strībhūtaḥ: Literally, "[he] being a woman." D6,10,11, and GPP and NSP read instead strīpūrvaḥ, "[he] previously a woman." Cs glosses this variant as "having previously become a woman (pūrvaṃ strītvena jātaḥ)."

"regained his manhood" pauruṣaṃ lebhe: Literally, "he acquired manhood."

"and other things that were difficult to obtain" yac cānyad api durlabham: Literally, "also which other thing [that is] hard to obtain." Cr understands this to refer to additional boons beyond the recovery of manhood and the attainment of Brahmaloka (pauruṣaṃ brahmalokam anyad api yad durlabhaṃ tal lebhe). Cg understands similarly (yac cānyad iti. uktabrahmalokād ity arthaḥ).

Sarga 82

2–3. "once I have summoned" samāhūya: Literally, "having summoned or invited." Ñ1,V,D1–7,9–11,T3,4,M1,6–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samānīya, "having assembled."

"Vasiṣṭha, Vāmadeva, Jābāli, Kaśyapa" vasiṣṭhaṃ vāmadevaṃ ca jābālim atha kaśyapam: These are four of the eight brahmans who perform Rāma's rājyābhiṣeka at 6.116.55–

56. See also 7.65.4–5 and notes. Vasiṣṭha and Vāmadeva are mentioned at the very beginning of the epic as the two principal officiating priests of the Ikṣvāku household (1.7.3). Ñ1,B,D7,T3,G2,3,M, and Gorresio, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kāśyapam, "descendant of Kaśyapa," for kaśyapam, "Kaśyapa."

"twice-born brahmans" dvijān: Literally, "twice-born [ones]."

"who are experts in the aśvamedha" aśvamedhapuraskṛtān: Literally, "accompanied by or occupied with the aśvamedha." We follow Ck, Ct, and Cr, who gloss, "competent in the offering of the aśvamedha (aśvamedhaprayogasamarthān)." Cg similarly glosses, "skilled in the offering of the aśvamedha (aśvamedhaprayogakuśalān ity arthaḥ)." See 6.116.55–56. "with great concentration" samādhinā: Literally, "with concentration." Ct glosses, "through the state of having a mind that is attentive (sāvadhānacittatayā)." Cr glosses, "characterized by a mind that is focused on a single point (ekāgracittenopalakṣitaḥ)."

"endowed with all the auspicious signs" lakṣaṇasaṃpannam: Cr glosses, "characterized by the signs indicating suitability for being released (utsarjanayogyalakṣaṇaviśiṣṭam)."

4. "Lakṣmaṇa, acting quickly" tvaritavikramaḥ: Literally, "he of swift strides or pace." The compound is commonly used as a stock adjective for heroes. When used in this way, we generally render "swift-striding." See 6.113.2 and notes. Here, however, the context indicates that Lakṣmaṇa is immediately carrying out his brother's instructions, and we have rendered accordingly.

"those twice-born brahmans" dvijān: Literally, "the twice-born [ones]."

"presented them to Rāghava" darśayāmāsa rāghavam: Literally, "he caused [them] to see Rāghava" or possibly "he caused Rāghava to see [them]."

6. "Cupping his hands in reverence . . . then" prāñjalis tu tato bhūtvā: Literally, "And having then become one whose hands were cupped in reverence." D6,7,10,11,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the minor variant prāñjaliḥ sa tadā bhūtvā, "then he, having become one whose hands were cupped in reverence."

"those foremost among the twice-born brahmans" dvijasattamān: Literally, "the foremost among twice-born [ones]."

"addressed . . . in words concerning the aśvamedha that were in keeping with righteousness" uvāca dharmasaṃyuktam aśvamedhāśritaṃ vacaḥ: Literally, "He spoke words connected with dharma and that related to the aśvamedha." M3 and KK and VSP read instead ācacakṣe 'śvamedhasya hy abhiprāyaṃ mahāyaśāḥ, "The greatly illustrious one told of [his] intention regarding the aśvamedha." Ck and Cg propose remedying the awkward syntax by supplying the phrase "with regard to the performance" to construe with the genitive of aśvamedha. (aśvamedhasyeti. anuṣṭhānaviṣayakam iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck and Cg.) Cg further notes the critical reading as a variant (uvāca dharmasaṃyuktam aśvamedhāśritaṃ vaca iti ca pāṭhaḥ).

Following verse 6, D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [1266*]: "And[1] when they had heard that [speech] of Rāma and had done homage to bull-bannered Śiva,[2] all the twice-born brahmans[3] celebrated the aśvamedha in the obligatory manner[4] (te tu rāmasya tac chrutvā namaskṛtvā vṛṣadhvajam / aśvamedhaṃ dvijāḥ sarve pūjayanti sma nityaśaḥ //)."

[1] "And" tu: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the contextually synonymous api.

[2] "to bull-bannered Śiva" vṛṣadhvajam: Literally, "to the one having the bull as his banner or the bull-bannered [one]." On this epithet see 7.81.12 and notes. Apropos of this verse, Ck and Cg renew with increased vigor their efforts to eliminate Śiva as a recipient of the vedic sacrifice. In this context, unlike that of the aśvamedha initiated by Kardama on behalf of Ila/Ilā in the previous sarga, where Śiva, as the one who pronounced Ila's/

Ilā's curse had to be propitiated (see 7.81.12 and notes), there is no particular association of Śiva with the aśvamedha in general. Ck, in keeping with his Brahmaite proclivities, understands the reference here, as he has in the past, to be to "four-faced Rudra," i.e., Brahmā (caturmukharudraḥ). See notes to 5.1.177; 127*, note 5, following notes to 6.7.15; 6.59.82; and 6.62.28 and notes. Cg clearly continues an articulation of his strong Vaiṣṇava bias and anti-Śaiva attitude. Compare, for example, his comments on 1.42.17 and notes. Cg goes so far as to claim that the reference to the worship of vṛṣadhvaja, "the bull-bannered [one]," here and in the previous sarga is ironic (solluṇṭhanaṃ vacaḥ) and that it actually excludes any propitiation of Rudra. As Cg claims, there is not even the slightest connection of Rudra with the vedic sacrifice, which is dedicated to other divinities, as Rudra himself is unworthy of any sacrifice and is to be worshiped only by śūdras. Cg argues that, in fact, it is well known that if anyone has any contact with him [Śiva] during the course of a sacrifice, there must be a purification through sipping water, etc. Ck argues similarly on this point. Both commentators cite TaiS 3.1.4.1[a], which appears to indicate that the term paśupati, "lord of beasts or sacrificial victims," a common epithet of Śiva, is really a reference to Agni, who is the divinity connected to all sacrifices (imáṃ paśúṃ paśupate te adyá badhnāmy agne sukṛtásya mádhye = TaiS 3.1.4.1[a] = Mānavaśrautasūtra 1.8.3.1[a]). (vṛṣadhvajaṃ namaskṛtveti. solluṇṭhanaṃ vaca ilavad rudrārādhanaṃ vihāyety arthaḥ. kardamakṛtayāgasyevāsya rudrāt prayojanagandhābhāvāt paradevatām uddiśyāśvamedhaṃ kartum udyuktā iti bhāvaḥ. rudras tu sarvayajñānarhaḥ śūdrārādhya. yajñamadhye ca tatprasaṅge 'pa upasparśanādiprayaścittasya prasiddhatvāt. imáṃ paśúṃ paśupate te adyá badhnāmy agna ityādi śrutis tv agner eva yajñānvayapratipādikā—so Cg.) Cg continues that Rudra was not to be worshiped during the sacrifice performed by Kardama. But rather what was stated was that Rudra was pleased because of the state of worshiping his chosen divinity in the form of Viṣṇu. (kardamakṛtayajñasya nārādhyo rudraḥ. kiṃtu svābhimatadevatārūpaviṣṇvārdhanatvena prīto rudra ity ucyate.) As he did earlier (see notes to 7.81.12), Cg concludes by claiming that, in fact, Viṣṇu is the supreme divinity in connection with sacrifice or that they [the brahmans] actually worshiped Viṣṇu because of his having granted a boon to Rudra. As for Rāma, he performed the aśvamedha just as it was done before [i.e., by Kardama without reference to Śiva]. (upakrame tatpūrvasargeṣu yajño vai viṣṇur ity uktarītyā viṣṇor ārādhyatvasamarthanāt. yadvā viṣṇudattavaratvād rudrasya. viṣṇum apūjayan. rāmas tv aśvamedhaṃ yathāpūrvam akarot.)

[3] "twice-born brahmans" dvijāḥ: Literally, "the twice-born [ones]."

[4] "in the obligatory manner" nityaśaḥ: The term normally means "eternally or constantly," but this meaning makes no sense in the context. We take the term to be an adverb derived from the adjective nitya in its sense of "obligatory," as applied to ritual or rules, as opposed to kāmya, or "optional." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarvaśaḥ, here "fully or completely."

7. The sequence of verses is peculiar, as—against the normal practice of the authors—no actual words of the brahmans are quoted either in the critical edition or in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, or VSP. Most northern manuscripts and printed editions (Ś,Ñ,V,B, D1–5,8,9,12, as well as Lahore and Gorresio) substitute a passage of one line [1268*] for 7cd: "In response to the king's thought pertaining to the aśvamedha, [the brahmans] cried, 'Excellent! Excellent!' (aśvamedhamataṃ rājñaḥ sādhu sādhv iti cābruvan)." In addition, D3 inserts a passage of six lines [1267*] following verse 6, in which the brahmans encourage Rāma to carry out the proposed aśvamedha and praise its power to purify one of all sins.

"the wonderful words . . . on the part of the eminent . . . twice-born brahmans" dvijamukhyānāṃ vākyam adbhutadarśanam: Literally, "the wonderful-looking speech of the foremost of the twice-born [ones]." Compare 7.80.7 and notes on a similar visual metaphor for speech.

8. "Having secured their approval" vijñāya tu mataṃ teṣām: Literally, "having learned their thought or approval." D7,10,11,T3,M4,5,7,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vijñāya tat karma teṣām, "having learned that action of theirs." Ct and Cr understand the term karma here to refer either to the brahmans' agreement to perform his [Rāma's] sacrifice (tatkarmakaraṇāṅgīkāram—so Ct) or the undertaking or performance of the aśvamedha (aśvamedhapravṛttim—so Cr).

"Great-armed prince" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]." M3 and KK and VSP read instead drutaṃ dūtān, lending the pāda the sense "swiftly [send] messengers."

"saying to him": The phrase has been added to indicate clearly that the following verse is Rāma's message to Sugrīva.

9. "quickly" śīghram: Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,B1,2,D1–5,7–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yathā, "in such a way or in which fashion." Ct glosses this term as "in a timely fashion (yathākālam)," while Cr glosses, "as is appropriate (yathāvat)."

"with . . . their dependents" tadāśrayaiḥ: B1,2,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vanaukasām, lending pāda b the sense "and with many of the forest-dwelling [monkeys]." Ck, Ct, and Cr understand the reference to be to those great monkeys, such as Hanumān and Aṅgada, while the many [others] of the forest-dwelling monkeys refers to their host of followers. (mahadbhir haribhir hanumadādibhiḥ. bahubhiś ca vanaukasām anucararūpāṇāṃ bahubhiḥ samudāyair ity arthaḥ—so Ct; mahadbhir haribhir iti hanumadaṅgadādibhir ity arthaḥ. bahubhiś ca vanaukasām ity anucararūpāṇām iti śeṣaḥ—so Ck; Cr similarly.) Despite the frequency of the kenning vanaukaḥ, "forest-dwelling [one]," for "monkey" in books 2–6, this is its only occurrence in the Uttarakāṇḍa.

"in order to participate in this greatest of sacrifices" anubhoktuṃ makhottamam: Ck, Cg, and Ct all gloss anubhoktum as "to witness or see (draṣṭum—Cg and Ct; dṛṣṭām [sic]—Ck)." D6,7,10,11,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read mahotsavam, "the great festival," for makhottamam, "the greatest of sacrifices." T1,2,G1,3,M1–5,8,9, and KK and VSP read hy anubhoktum, "indeed to participate," for anubhoktum, "to participate," in order to avoid the hiatus.

10. "let great-armed . . . traveling swiftly, attend" mahābāhuḥ prāpnotu laghuvikramaḥ: Literally, "Let that great-armed one of light paces reach." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāyajñam āyātv atulavikramaḥ, "Let him of incomparable valor come to that great sacrifice [the aśvamedha]."

"by . . . rākṣasas, who can travel anywhere at will" rakṣobhiḥ kāmagaiḥ: Literally, "by rākṣasas, who go according to desire." See notes to 7.16.4.

11. "tiger among men" naravyāghra: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahābhāgāḥ, "the greatly fortunate [ones]." This adjective would then modify "kings (rājānaḥ)."

"to the unsurpassed sacrificial ground" yajñabhūmim anuttamām: D6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yajñabhūminirīkṣakāḥ, "[as] observers of the sacrificial ground," which would also modify the kings (rājānaḥ) in pāda a, while KK and VSP read instead yajñaṃ draṣṭum anuttamam, "to witness the unsurpassed sacrifice."

12. "you must invite" nimantrayasva: D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M2,4–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous āmantrayasva.

"those twice-born brahmans" dvijāḥ: Literally, "the twice-born [ones]."

"wholly devoted to righteousness" dharmaparāyaṇāḥ: D6,7,10,11,M1,2,4,5,7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the similar dharmasamāhitāḥ, "intent or focused upon dharma."

"who dwell in distant lands" deśāntaragatā ye: Literally, "who have gone to other countries." Cr glosses, "who have reached a distant country through the force of some purpose (prayojanavaśena dūradeśaṃ prāptāḥ)." See notes to verse 13 below.

13. "great-armed prince" mahābāho: Literally, "O great-armed [one]."

"as well as the great seers—together with their wives—who dwell in distant lands" deśāntarāgatā ye ca sadārāś ca maharṣayaḥ: Following the logic of Cr in his gloss to the previous verse (see notes to verse 12 above), the reference here would be to those great seers who have actually settled with their families in distant lands, as opposed to those who have merely traveled far for some purpose. Ś,Ñ2,V3,D6,7,10–12,G1,2,M1,2,4–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sarve, "all [those]," for ye ca, "as well as . . . who." D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dvijātayaḥ, "twice-born [brahmans]," for maharṣayaḥ, "great seers." Compare 1352* and notes, following notes to 7.87.7.

Following verse 13, D6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1274*]: "And also cymbalists,[1] actors, and dancers[2] . . . (tathaiva tālāvacarās tathaiva naṭanartakāḥ)."

[1] "cymbalists" tālāvacarāḥ: The precise meaning of the term is unclear. It occurs once in the Ayodhyākāṇḍa but only in an appendix passage (App. I, No. 6, line 26 [v.l. tālāpacarāḥ] = GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 2.3.17), three times in the Laṅkāvatārasūtra (1.1.9; 1.44.47 [twice]), and once in the Arthaśāstra (2.4.11). Here Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand the term to refer to people who, having taken up the tāla, or cymbal, earn their living by it. Ck, Cg, and Cr further understand that the term refers to a stage manager or a director of a theatrical troupe (sūtradhāra) (tālaṃ gṛhītvāvacarantīti tālāvacarāḥ sūtradhārāḥ—so Ck and Cg; Ct and Cr similarly). This latter definition has been followed only by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 598), who renders, "conductors of plays." All other translations consulted that read this line understand, presumably with Ct, that the term refers to musicians who play the cymbals ("symbols" [sic]—Gita Press [1998, vol. 2, p. 909]).

[2] "actors and dancers" tathaiva naṭanartakāḥ: Literally, "as well as actors and dancers." Ct, on the other hand, identifies the naṭas, "actors," as the sūtradhāras (naṭāḥ sūtradhārāḥ).

14. "please give instructions for a vast sacrificial enclosure" yajñavāṭaś ca sumahān . . . / ājñāpyatām: Literally, "and let a very large sacrificial ground be ordered."

"on the banks of the Gomatī" gomatyāḥ: Literally, "of the Gomatī." Ck, Cg, and Ct all note that we are to add the words "on the bank . . . of the Gomatī River" (gomatyā nadyās tīra iti śeṣaḥ). Cr understands similarly. See notes to 7.45.17.

"in the Naimiṣa forest" naimiṣe vane: The Naimiṣa forest is a sacred tīrtha, or pilgrimage spot, famed in the Mahābhārata as the place where the sauti Ugraśravas narrated the great epic at the twelve-year sacrificial session of Śaunaka (MBh 1.1.1ff.). It is interesting that Rāma should perform his great sacrifice in a location so closely associated with the Mahābhārata. Perhaps the authors of the Uttarakāṇḍa chose the site precisely to link it to the Mahābhārata narrative. Compare MBh 12.243.2, where the Gomatī River is also said to flow through the Naimiṣa forest. See Introduction, "Historicity and Sovereignty," pp. 157–68, and R. Goldman 2016.

"for it is unsurpassed in holiness" tad dhi puṇyam anuttamam: Literally, "for that is holy [and] unsurpassed." Cr observes, "since that forest is holy, therefore it is unsurpassed, that is to say, it is by far the best (hi yatas tad vanaṃ puṇyam ata evānuttamam atiśreṣṭham)."

Following verse 14, D6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of five lines [1276*]: "So, great-armed one, let the propitiatory rites[1] commence[2] all around.[1] And, delight of the Raghus, knower of righteousness,[3] let all the people, in their hundreds, having enjoyed that unsurpassed rite, the great sacrifice, in the Naimiṣa forest, return,[4] well fed, satisfied, and duly honored.[2–4] So, knower of righteousness, quickly let the people be invited.[5]"

[1] "the propitiatory rites" śāntayaḥ: Śāntis are propitiatory rites to avert the baleful influence of planets and the like. Cs explains that they are to bring about the propitiation of [malignant] planets and so forth (grahādisaumukhyāpādikāḥ).

[2] "let . . . commence" pravartantām: T2,G3,M8, and KK and VSP read instead the karmaṇi prayoga form pravartyantām, "let [them] be commenced."

[3] "knower of righteousness" dharmajña: D10,11,T1,3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the plural dharmajñāḥ, which is difficult to construe, although perhaps it is intended to refer to the singular collective noun janaḥ, "people," in line 5.

[4] "let . . . the people . . . return" pratiyāsyati . . . janaḥ: Literally, "the people will return." T2,M3, and KK and VSP read instead prītiṃ yāsyati . . . janaḥ, "the people will be pleased."

15. "And, immensely powerful prince, let a hundred thousand cartloads of the finest rice and ten thousand cartloads of sesame seeds and mudga beans go on ahead." śataṃ vāhasahasrāṇāṃ taṇḍulānāṃ vapuṣmatām / ayutaṃ tilamudgasya prayātv agre mahābala //: Literally, "Let a hundred of thousands of carts of beautiful rice and ten thousand of sesame seed and mudga beans go on ahead, O one of great strength." The commentators generally understand the term vāha-, "conveyance," to refer to draft animals, such as bullocks (balīvardādaya ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly). The commentators are similarly in agreement that the somewhat unusual adjective vapuṣmatām, "[of the] beautiful or handsome [rice]," means, when applied to rice, that the grains are unbroken (abhagnasvarūpāṇām ity arthaḥ—so Ck and Ct; Cg and Cv similarly). Cr glosses, "of superb form or body, that is to say, having none of its parts broken (praśastaśarīrāṇām acchinnāvayavānām ity arthaḥ)." Ct understands the number ten thousand also to refer to the number of draft animals (ayutaṃ vāhakapaśavaḥ).

"mudga beans" -mudgasya: Phaseolus mungo (L) or Vigna mungo (L), commonly called the urid or urad bean or black gram. Ś,Ñ2,V3,D8,12, and KK and VSP read the genitive plural, mudgānām.

Following verse 15, Ś,Ñ2,V2,3,B,D6–8,10–12,T1,3,4,G,M1–6,8–10, and Lahore (line 1 only), GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of two lines [1278*]: ". . . as well as chick peas, kulattha beans,[1] māṣa beans, and salt. And then [there should be] suitable oils[2] mixed with fragrances[3] (caṇakānāṃ kulasthānāṃ māṣāṇāṃ lavaṇasya ca / ato 'nurūpaṃ snehaṃ ca gandhasaṃkṣiptam eva ca)."

The reasons for the exclusion of this verse from the critical text are unclear, as it is represented in both the northern and southern recensions and in all subrecensions.

[1] "kulattha beans" kulasthānām: Literally, "of [those] belonging to a noble family." Ś2,V3,D6,11, and Lahore, KK, and VSP read instead kulatthānām, "of kulattha beans." This is the Dolichos uniflorus pulse, known as kutthi (also known as sem or ballar) in Hindi [http://www.lablablab.org/]. D7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kulitthānām, presumably a variant of kulatthānām. The critical reading appears to be a Sanskrit back-formation from what may have been perceived as a Prakrit tadbhava.

[2] "oils" sneham: The term can refer to oil or any unctuous or viscous fluid. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand the term broadly to refer to any of the edible liquids that would be used in the preparation or consumption of the grains and pulses previously mentioned. They gloss, "ghee, oil, milk, curds, etc. (ghṛtatailapayodadhyādikam—so Ck, Cg, and Ct; Cr similarly)."

[3] "mixed with fragrances" gandhasaṃkṣiptam: Literally, "thrown together or condensed with fragrance." The reference here may be to aromatic or flavoring agents, perhaps such things as cloves or cinnamon. Ck and Cg specify that the fragrant articles should be unground, i.e., whole (aghṛṣṭam evety arthaḥ). Cr understands the term saṃkṣipta in its sense of "reduced or condensed," noting, "fragrances lesser in amount when compared to the oily substances (snehāpekṣayālpaṃ gandham)." Cv understands, "[oils] with infused fragrances (prakṣiptagandham)."

16. 16cd = 19cd (agrato bharataḥ kṛtvā gacchatv agre mahāmatiḥ).

"immensely wise" mahāmatiḥ: The textual evidence for this line is extremely complicated and is made more difficult by the confusing manner in which it is described in the apparatus. Many manuscripts repeat the verse in various locations. GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read with the critical edition except for the substitution samādhinā, "with vigilance," for mahāmatiḥ.

"accompanying" agrataḥ . . . kṛtvā: Literally, "having placed [lit., 'made'] before [him]."

"many tens of millions in gold coins and more than a billion in silver" suvarṇakoṭyo bahulā hiraṇyasya śatottarāḥ: Literally, "many koṭis of gold, more than a hundred of silver." We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who apply koṭyaḥ (a crore or ten million) to both the gold and the silver (koṭya ity anukarṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly). We have also added the word "coins" for the sake of comprehensibility, as no unit of value is mentioned.

17–19. 19cd = 16cd (agrato bharataḥ kṛtvā gacchatv agre mahāmatiḥ).

"immensely wise" mahāmatiḥ: V3,D6,7,10,11,M1–3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāyaśāḥ, "immensely illustrious." See notes to verse 16 above.

"rows of shops along the way" antarāpaṇavīthyaḥ: Literally, "intervening rows of shops." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "'Intervening' means 'necessary here and there on the road.' The meaning is 'merchants to operate them.' (antarā mārgamadhye tatra tatrāpekṣitā āpaṇavīthyaḥ. tat pravartakā vaṇija ity arthaḥ—so Cg and Ct; Ck similarly.)"

"all the actors and dancers" sarvāṃś ca naṭanartakān: Ñ1,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nominative plural sarve ca naṭanartakāḥ, "and all the actors and dancers," which then, like the other nominative plurals at 1281* (see below), construes with the finite verb yāntu, "let them go."

"the townsfolk, young and old, twice-born brahmans in deep concentration" naigamān bālavṛddhāṃś ca dvijāṃś ca susamāhitān: Literally, "and the naigamas, the young and old, the twice-born [ones] who are well focused." As noted earlier (see notes to 7.55.5), the term naigama has several meanings that must be determined on the basis of context. In the present context, as it is associated with the terms "young and old (bālavṛddhāṃś ca)" and is set in the middle of a list of what are largely laborers, tradesmen, and performing artists, we believe that the general sense of "townspeople" is most appropriate. Cr, the only commentator to take up the term, glosses it in this instance as "those who know or are familiar with the śāstras (śāstrābhijñāḥ)." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read the nominative plurals for all forms, while KK and VSP read balavṛddhāḥ, "the strong and the aged," for bālavṛddhāḥ, "the young and old." GPP and NSP read all forms as accusative plurals except for the last, for which they have the nominative plural susamāhitāḥ, thus making it construe with 1281* (see below). According to GPP, the text of Cr retains the accusative plural, susamāhitān.

"skilled workmen, highly expert craftsmen" karmāntikāṃś ca kuśalāñ śilpinaś ca supaṇḍitān: For 18ab Ś,Ñ,V3,B1,D6–8,10–12,T1,G,M1 (reads twice),2–10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP substitute (Ś,V3,D8,12 before 17; T2 before 18cd) a passage of one line [1282*]: "workmen, carpenters,[1] highly expert craftsmen[2] (karmāntikāḥ vardhakinaḥ śilpinaś ca supaṇḍitāḥ)."

[1] "workmen, carpenters" karmāntikā vardhakinaḥ: Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the accusative plural karmāntikān vardhakinaḥ (ca kuśalān) instead of the nominative plural. This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus.

[2] "highly expert craftsmen" śilpinaś ca supaṇḍitāḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kośādhyakṣāṃś ca naigamān, "treasurers and naigamas."

"all my mothers" mātaraś caiva me sarvāḥ: The reference is, of course, to Kausalyā, Kaikeyī, and Sumitrā. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the grammatically correct mama mātṝs tathā sarvāḥ (accusative mātṝḥ for the nominative mātaraḥ).

"the princes' womenfolk" kumārāntaḥpurāṇi ca: Literally, "the inner apartments of the princes or those who live in the inner apartments of the princes." Ck and Cg understand the meaning to be the wives of Bharata, Lakṣmaṇa, and Śatrughna (bharatalakṣmaṇa-śatrughnapatnya ity arthaḥ). Ct and Cr simply understand, "the women of Bharata, etc. (bharatādistriyaḥ—so Cr; Ct similarly)."

"a golden image of my wife, fit for consecration at the sacrificial rite" kāñcanīṃ mama patnīṃ ca dīkṣārhāṃ yajñakarmaṇi: Literally, "and my golden wife fit for consecration at the sacrificial rite." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr agree that the term kāñcanīm, "golden," means "made of gold (kāñcanamayīm—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly)." This seemingly casual reference is to the legendary golden image of Sītā, which Rāma has fashioned to stand in the place of Sītā in the role of the wife of the yajamāna when he performs the śrauta rituals, such as the aśvamedha. This appears to be the first reference in the epic and, indeed, in the entire literature, to this well-known legend (see, for example, PadmaP [ĀnSS], part 4). However, Cg remarks that the whole matter of the existence of a surrogate of the wife, along with the means of making one, has been discussed in the Yuddhakāṇḍa and advises his readers to refer to that discussion. (patnyāś ca pratinidhisadbhāvādikaṃ sarvaṃ yuddhakāṇḍe saprakāraṃ nirūpitaṃ tatraiva draṣṭavyam.) However, we have found no reference to a golden image of Sītā anywhere in the Yuddhakāṇḍa or its commentaries, including Cg. The only other reference to the golden image is found here in the Uttarakāṇḍa at 7.89.4 (see notes ad loc.).The response of the commentators to this reference varies. Cr limits his comments to the ones quoted above. Ck and Cg expand slightly, explaining that the meaning is "an image or statue of Sītā fashioned of gold (svarṇamayīṃ sītāpratimām)." Cs offers an interesting perspective not only on the existence of such a golden image but on the whole issue of the exile of Sītā itself. He says: "But according to the statement 'The daughter of Janaka was visible to Rāma, but invisible to all others (rāmasya dṛṣyā sarveṣām adṛśyā janakātmajā),' it is the understanding of the gods that she is always kept close by Rāma, while it is the understanding only of the malicious people that he banished her. With this in mind, we should understand that the surrogate Sītā is always kept close to Rāma. (kāñcanīm iti. sītā tu rāmasya dṛṣyā sarveṣām adṛśyā janakātmajety ukter amaravivakṣayā rāmeṇa sā saṃnikṛṣyate. pāmaravivakṣayā viprakṛṣyata iti tadvivakṣayā samīpe pratinidhinidhāpanam iti mantavyam.)" Ct, however, engages in a fairly elaborate śāstraic debate on the propriety or impropriety of a man's using a surrogate to serve as his wife when he is in the role of a yajamāna (on this debate, see Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 684–85). Ct says: " 'Gold' means 'made of gold.' 'With respect to the consecration' means 'for the purpose of consecration.' . . . even though a wife is neither a yajamāna (patron) of the sacrifice nor its master (yajñasvāmin), since there is a prohibition on the use of a surrogate for the yajamāna (patron) and the yajñasvāmin, how could there not be a prohibition on a surrogate for the wife? Now if one were to argue this on the basis of the injunction in Āpastamba[śrauta]sūtra (24.4.1), 'a surrogate is forbidden in the case of the master, in the case of Agni, and in the case of the deity [to whom the sacrifice is offered] in regard to the recitation and the ritual,' one would be wrong. This is so because of the fact that in such matters a surrogate is permitted according to the statement 'One whose wife is in a distant land, unwanted by her husband, incapable, [and/or] refractory is authorized to use a surrogate.' And the smṛti also says, 'Other men who perform the domestic rites, having fashioned a wife made of kuśa grass, being devoted, perform the agnihotra for their entire lives. Or there may be as well one made of gold of the weight of sixteen palas or sixteen māṣas.' Then, too, there is this statement from the Viṣṇusmṛti [also found in Chandogapariśiṣṭa 3.20.9–10]: 'Even when his wife is deceased, a twice-born [brahman] does not give up the vedic [rites] but completes the sacrifice as long as he lives even [if it is] with a surrogate.' But in reality, people like that would not have a golden surrogate. The idea is that it is the real thing, just as with images of the divinity; the idea is not that it is just a mere likeness in this case, because there is no surrogacy [substitution]. Moreover, the idea that it is the real thing arises because of capacity for invocation and the skill in performance of the part of both the lord and the seers. For this very reason, it can carry out the ritual functions of the wife. Therefore, the expression 'my golden wife' is appropriate. By this, they say [that the objection in the form of the question] 'How can there be a surrogate in optional rites such as the aśvamedha?' is refuted. (*kāñcanīṃ kāñcanamayīm. dīkṣāyāṃ dīkṣānimittam . . . na ca patnyā api yajamānatvād yajñasvāmitvāc ca svāmino yajamānasya pratinidhipratiṣedhāt kathaṃ patnyāḥ pratinidhiḥ. svāmino 'gner devatāyāś ca śabdāt karmaṇaś ca pratinidhir nivṛtta ity āpastambasūtrāt svāmino yajamānasya patnyā veti cen na. yasya bhāryānyadeśasthā neṣyate patināthavā / aśaktā pratikūlā vā tasyāḥ pratinidhikriyā // ity evaṃvidhe viṣaye pratinidher anumatatvāt. anye kuśamayīṃ patnīṃ kṛtvā tu gṛhamedhinaḥ / agnihotram upāsante yāvajjīvam anuvratāḥ / sauvarṇī vā ṣoḍaśapalair māṣakaiḥ ṣoḍaśair api // iti smṛteś ca. mṛtāyām api bhāryāyāṃ vaidikīṃ na tyajed dvijaḥ / upādhināpi tatkarma yāvajjīvaṃ samāpayet // iti viṣṇusmṛteś ca. vastutas tv eṣāṃ sauvarṇī na pratinidhiḥ. devatāpratimāsv iva tattvabuddhir eva. na tu sādṛśyabuddhir atreti pratinidhitvābhāvāt. kiṃtu bhagavata ṛṣīṇāṃ cāvāhanādisāmarthyena ghaṭanakauśalena ca tattvabuddher evotpādāt. patnīkarmanivāhakatvaṃ ca tata eva. ata eva kāñcanīṃ mama patnīm iti saṃgacchate. etena kāmyeṣv aśvamedhādiṣu kathaṃ pratinidhir iti parāstam ity āhuḥ.)"

D11 and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read dīkṣāyāṃ jñāṃś ca karmaṇi, "[my wife] for the purpose of consecration and those who are knowledgeable concerning ritual," for dīkṣārhāṃ yajñakarmaṇi, "fit for consecration at the sacrificial rite." We follow Ct, who appears to understand dīkṣāyām to refer to the golden image of Sītā (dīkṣānimittam, "for the purpose of dīkṣā"). This is probably the intended construction, as the principal variant that is found in the critical apparatus and in a variety of northern and southern manuscripts, dīkṣitām, unambiguously specifies that the golden image is consecrated. The term dīkṣāyām is construed with the statue of Sītā by Dutt (1894, p. 1901), who renders, "the golden image of my wife to be initiated at the sacrifice"; Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 618), who translates, "Avec la statue en or de mon épouse pour la consécration"; and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 609), who offers, "with the golden statue of my consort for consecration." Benoît (1999, p. 1406), on the other hand, construes the term dīkṣāyām with the following phrase, jñāṃś ca karmaṇi, "who are knowledgeable concerning ritual," rendering, "et les érudits en matière de consécration." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 599) ignores the reference to consecration entirely.

Ct glosses the phrase jñāṃś ca karmaṇi, "and those who are knowledgeable concerning ritual," as "the seers who possess knowledge in relation to the sacrifice of both a philosophical and ritual nature (karmaṇi jñānakarmaviṣayajñānavata ṛṣīn)." Ct cites a verse from the Amarakośa (3.3.401) in which the term jñaḥ is defined as a learned man or Somaja (= Budha, the planet Mercury) (jño vidvān somajo 'pi cety amaraḥ).

Following 17ab ("rows of shops along the way, all the actors and dancers [antarāpaṇavīthyaś ca sarvāṃś ca naṭanartakān]"), D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1,2,4,5,8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T2 inserts following 15, a passage two lines [1281*]: ". . . and cooks, many women endowed with eternal youth. Let the soldiers, let them go on ahead with Bharata. (sūdā nāryaś ca bahavo nityaṃ yauvanaśālinaḥ / bharatena tu sārdhaṃ te yāntu sainyāni cāgrataḥ //)"

Following verse 19, Ś2,3,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press insert, while KK and VSP insert lines 1–2 only, a passage of eight lines [1285*]: "Then, foremost of men,[1] the mighty prince[2] ordered costly royal pavilions for those immensely powerful kings together with their retinues, as well as food, drink, and garments for their great retainers. [1–3] And then Bharata set out together with Śatrughna.[3][4] All the great monkey leaders,[4] then, together with Sugrīva, waited upon[5] the brahmans.[5–6] And Vibhīṣaṇa, too, accompanied by rākṣasas and many women, honored those great seers of fierce austerities.[7–8]" These lines are close variants of 7.83.5–8. See notes ad loc.

[1] "foremost of men" naraśreṣṭha: In keeping with the confused syntax of this entire sarga, it is very hard to construe the vocative here or to decide to whom it refers. It would appear that the direct address of Rāma to Lakṣmaṇa ended with verse 19 and that this insert then reverts to the generic narrator of the epic. In this case, there is no presumptive auditor for the speaker's words. Gita Press, KK, and VSP resolve the problem by reading instead the nominative singular naraśreṣṭhaḥ, in which case the referent is, no doubt, Lakṣmaṇa. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 910) understands the compound to refer to Rāma himself, but this seems unlikely, as Rāma has just finished instructing Lakṣmaṇa to make all the arrangements. Compare, however, 7.83.5 and notes.

[2] "the mighty prince" mahābalaḥ: Literally, "the one of great strength." The reference here appears to be to Lakṣmaṇa. See 1285*, note 1 above.

[3] "together with Śatrughna" śatrughnasahitaḥ: There has been no prior indication of Śatrughna's return to Ayodhyā since he was sent back by Rāma to rule in Madhurā at 7.63.14–17. There is no explicit reference to his returning to Ayodhyā for the aśvamedha. Aside from this reference and the parallel one at 7.83.6, we do not hear again about Śatrughna until the end of the epic. See 7.97.8, where Rāma sends messengers to Śatrughna to inform him of his impending departure from the earth; 7.98.1 where the messengers report to Śatrughna the events that had taken place in Ayodhyā beginning with the banishment of Lakṣmaṇa; and 7.98.12, where Śatrughna returns to Ayodhyā for the final time.

[4] "All the great monkey leaders" vānarāś ca mahātmānaḥ . . . pravarāḥ sarve: The syntax is awkward, as the terms pravarāḥ, "foremost," and sarve, "all," are separated from the noun vānarāḥ, "monkeys," and would seem to construe with the brahmans mentioned in line 6, the sense of which would be "all the foremost of the brahmans." This reading would have the brahmans, along with the monkeys, waiting upon or feeding an unspecified person or persons, which is clearly inappropriate in the cultural context. Both Cr and Cs attempt to deal with the problem. We follow Cs, who understands the adjective pravarāḥ, "foremost," to refer to the monkeys, who then wait upon the brahmans. (pravarā vānarā vānarapravarāḥ. viprāṇāṃ pariveṣaṇaṃ cakruḥ.) Cr sees the verse as having an unexpressed subordinate clause. He glosses, "the monkeys waited upon those who were foremost of the brahmans (vānarā ye viprāṇāṃ pravarās tebhyaḥ pariveṣaṇaṃ cakruḥ)."

[5] "waited upon" cakruś ca pariveṣaṇam: Literally, "and they made an attendance upon or feeding of."

1. "When Bharata's elder brother had swiftly sent ahead all the sacrificial requisites, omitting nothing, he released a piebald stallion marked with the auspicious signs." tat sarvam akhilenāśu prasthāpya bharatāgrajaḥ / hayaṃ lakṣaṇasampannaṃ kṛṣṇasāraṃ mumoca ha //: Literally, "Having quickly sent off all that without exception, the one born before Bharata released a kṛṣṇasāra horse, endowed with marks." The verse is elliptical and contains the term kṛṣṇasāra, the meaning of which is unclear in this context (see below).

"had . . . sent ahead" prasthāpya: Literally, "having sent forth." Ñ1,V1,D1–4,9, and KK and VSP read instead saṃsthāpya, "having collected or piled up."

"all the sacrificial requisites" tat sarvam: Literally, "all that." We agree with Ct, the only commentator to remark on the phrase, that the reference must be to all of the materials, implements, etc., required for the sacrifice (yāgopakaraṇaṃ sarvam ity arthaḥ).

"omitting nothing" akhilena: Literally, "without exception." The commentators are divided and sometimes uncertain themselves as to the precise meaning of the term here. We follow Ck, who understands the instrumental to be adverbial in the sense of "in such a way as to have no defect or omission (anyūnatayā)." This, then, would refer to the requisites of the sacrifice. Cr, on the other hand, supplies the words "along with the people (janena saha)," lending the phrase the sense "along with all the people." Ct offers both alternatives (akhilenānyūnatayā janena vā). All translators consulted who share the critical reading follow the interpretation of Ck.

"a piebald stallion" hayaṃ . . . kṛṣṇasāram: The term kṛṣṇasāra normally refers to the blackbuck (Antilope cervicapra). This antelope is also called kṛṣṇasārāṅga, sāraṅga, or raṅku and is a species of antelope native to the Indian subcontinent. See App. I, No. 69, note 11 [raṅku], following notes to 6.99.41. The same term is used to describe Yudhiṣṭhira's sacrificial horse at MBh 14.72.7, while the term kṛṣṇasārāṅga is used in the Śatapathabrāhmaṇa to describe one of the optional colors for a sacrificial horse according to Bhāllaveya (ŚatBr 13.2.4.3 [= etext 13.4.2.[3]). Our understanding of the term is that it refers to a horse of two colors, black and white, reminiscent of the dark and light coloring of the blackbuck. However, according to Śatapathabrāhmaṇa 13.2.4.1 (= etext 13.4.2.[2]), the horse should be omnicolored (multicolored?) (tat yat sarvarūpo bhavati). We note that, according to Śatapathabrāhmaṇa 13.2.3.1 (= etext 13.3.1.[1]), the horse was produced from Prajāpati's eye. And according to Sātyayajñi at Śatapathabrāhmaṇa 13.2.4.4, like the eye, it [the horse] should be of three colors, with its forepart black, like the iris of the eye, its hind part white, like the white of the eye, and a blaze resembling a wagon representing the pupil of the eye. (trirūpa evaiṣo 'śvaḥ syāt. tasya kṛṣṇaḥ pūrvārdhaḥ. śuklo 'parārdhaḥ. kṛttikāñjiḥ purastāt. tad yat kṛṣṇaḥ pūrvārdho bhavati. yad evedaṃ kṛṣṇam akṣṇaḥ. tad asya tat. atha yat śuklo 'parārdhaḥ. yad evedaṃ śuklam akṣṇaḥ. tad asya tat. atha yat kṛttikāñjiḥ purastāt. sā kanīnakā—ŚatBr 13.2.4.4. Commentators and translators are uncertain and divided as to the sense of the term. Ct offers two alternative explanations. In the first, he understands the term to refer to the blackbuck and takes it in this context to mean that the horse has coloration that is similar to that of that animal (kṛṣṇasāraṃ kṛṣṇasāramṛgasamānavarṇam). This interpretation is also given by Cv (kṛṣṇasāravarṇam). In Ct's second explanation, he understands the compound to be a dvandva consisting of the element kṛṣṇa, "dark or black," and sāra, "essence or excellence." He thus takes the compound to mean that the horse is both of a dark color and the most excellent of all sacrificial victims (yadvā kṛṣṇavarṇaṃ sarvayajñapaśubhyaḥ sārabhutaṃ cety arthaḥ). Cr sees the compound as a bahuvrīhi, having the sense "in which the dark color was essential, that is to say, uninterrupted (kṛṣṇo nīlavarṇaḥ sāraḥ sthiro yasmiṃs taṃ hayam)." We understand Cr to mean that the horse was completely black. Cg understands the term to mean that the horse was predominantly black, that is to say, generally of a black color. (kṛṣṇasāraṃ kṛṣṇapradhānam. prāyaśaḥ kṛṣṇavarṇam ity arthaḥ.) Cg also notes a variant kṛṣṇaśāram, "variegated or dappled with black." This reading is also noted by Cv and Cm and is recorded in the critical apparatus as the reading of M6. It is, perhaps, a scribe's attempt to improve on the awkward reading. Cs proposes another series of alternative explanations. His first explanation is that the term expresses the darkened condition of the horse because of its arduous wanderings (kṛṣṇasāraṃ tathā tīvravrajanena tattvoktir vā). His second interpretation is similar to the second interpretation of Ct. According to this, the horse is possessed of a dark color and also is excellent (kṛṣṇavarṇavantaṃ sāraṃ śreṣṭhaṃ vā). Cs offers a third interesting explanation in which the term sāra is a derivative of the root √sṛ, "to move or go," so that the compound means that the horse has gone to or obtained a dark color, but, Cs adds, only in one ear (kṛṣṇaṃ varṇaṃ sarati gacchati karṇa ekasminn iti sa tathā vā). This peculiar description, by which we understand Cs to visualize a white horse with one black ear, is reminiscent of an incident narrated twice in the Mahābhārata in which the Bhārgava sage Ṛcīka, seeking to secure a requested bride-price demanded by his prospective father-in-law, requests and receives from Varuṇa one thousand horses with this precise coloration. Perhaps Cs has this episode in mind. See MBh 3.115.12–15 and 13.4.12–15. See, too, R. Goldman 1977, pp. 18–19. Ck offers a unique interpretation of the compound, which derives its force from the legend in the Śatapathabrāhmaṇa and from Ck's theological position that Prajāpati is another term for Viṣṇu and his manifestations. According to the Śatapathabrāhmaṇa legend, Prajāpati's eye swelled, and when it fell out, it became a horse, which was called aśva because the eye swelled (aśvayat). (prajāpater akṣy aśvayat. tat parāpatat. tato 'śvaḥ samabhavat. yad aśvayat. tad aśvasyāśvatvam—ŚatBr 13.2.3.1.) Ck reads the compound kṛṣṇasāra as a dvandva, just as does Ct, but understands the first element of the compound somewhat differently. According to him, it means "having a dark color," which he says is a reference to the dark monochromatic alternate form of Viṣṇu as Lord Prajāpati. Thus, he argues, the reference to Prajāpati in the Śatapathabrāhmaṇa passage is, in fact, to Lord Kṛṣṇa. Therefore, he continues, it is because the horse originated from Kṛṣṇa's eye that it is the most excellent (sārabhūtam) of all sacrificial victims. Ck concludes by noting, like Ct, that kṛṣṇasāra is a name for the blackbuck and signifies here, too, that the horse is of the same color as that animal. (kṛṣṇasāro kṛṣṇavarṇo viṣṇvaparamūrtir bhagavān prajāpatiḥ śyāma ekarūpo bhavati. evam iva hi prajāpatir iti bhagavān kṛṣṇaḥ. tadakṣṇa utpannatvāt sarvayajñapaśubhyaḥ sārabhūtaṃ tathā hi. prajāpater akṣy aśvayat tat parāpatat tad aśvo 'bhavad y[ad?] aśvayat tad aśvasyāśvatvam iti. kṛṣṇasāraḥ kṛṣṇamṛgas tadvarṇaś ca.) On the color of the horse for the aśvamedha, see also Kātyāyanaśrautasūtra 20.1.29–35 and Lāṭyāyanaśrautasūtra 9.9.4. See, too, Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, pp. 1230–31. Translators understand variously. Gorresio (1870, p. 274) translates, "pezzato di nero," while Dutt (1894, p. 1901) renders simply, "a black horse" and Benoît (1999, p. 1406) similarly translates, "noir." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 619) offers, "tout moucheté de noir," and Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 609), following Roussel, renders, "marked with black spots." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 599), evidently following Cg, translates, "predominantly black in colour," while Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 912) similarly understands, "a horse mostly black (like the spotted deer)."

2. The commentators seem concerned by the fact that Rāma appears to assign Lakṣmaṇa as the only warrior to accompany the sacrificial horse during its wanderings. Ck, Cg, and Ct all quote a vedic passage (TaiBr 3.8.9.4) that specifies that a party of four hundred protects the horse, lest the sacrifice be ruined. Therefore the adhvaryu performs the consecration along with one hundred royal princes (catuḥśatā rakṣanti yajñasyāghātāya [= TaiBr 3.8.9.4] tathā śatena rājaputraiḥ sahādhvaryuḥ purastāt pratyañ tiṣṭhan prokṣatīti śruteḥ). Ck and Cg observe, "The meaning is 'This [practice] is for sake of the completion of the preparatory rites connected with the protection of the horse, etc.' (aśvarakṣādisaṃbandhayajñaprayoganirvartanārtham ity arthaḥ)." See Śatapathabrāhmaṇa 13.2.4.5 (= etext 13.4.2.[5]), where the text specifies that there should be four hundred (four groups of one hundred) young men to guard the horse. See Kane 1974, vol. 2, pt. 2, p. 1231.

"And then, once he had placed Lakṣmaṇa . . . in charge of the horse" lakṣmaṇam . . . aśve ca viniyujya saḥ: Literally, "and having appointed Lakṣmaṇa with reference to the horse, he." V2,B1,D5–7,10,11,T1,2,G,M3,5,6,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP and Gorresio read ca, "and," for saḥ, "he." KK and VSP read aśvatantre niyojya for aśve ca viniyujya. This lends the line the sense "having caused Lakṣmaṇa to be assigned to the horse's retinue." Although this reading is not recorded in the critical apparatus, T1,2,G1,3,M3 are recorded as reading the very similar aśvatantre niyujya, "having appointed [Lakṣmaṇa] to the horse's retinue."

"with the ṛtvij priests" ṛtvigbhiḥ: These are the principal officiating priests at a major śrauta ritual. They include the four primary officiants: the hotṛ, adhvaryu, brāhmaṇa, and udgātṛ, each of whom normally has three assistants.

"the Naimiṣa forest" naimiṣam: Literally, "to Naimiṣa." See 7.82.14 and note.

3. "great-armed Rāma" mahābāhuḥ: Literally, "the great-armed [one]."

"and he cried, 'How magnificent!' " śrimān iti ca so 'bravīt: Literally, "and he said: '[It is] majestic.' " Cr expands upon Rāma's terse comment. He says, "And he said: 'How magnificent is this region, endowed, as it is, with every good thing.' (śrimān ayaṃ deśo nikhilasaṃpattisaṃpanna ity abravīc ca.)" B4,T1,2,G3,M1,3,6, and KK and VSP read vaco 'bravīt for ca so 'bravīt, lending the line the sense "He uttered this speech: 'Magnificent.' "

4. "came from every country" ājagmuḥ sarvarāṣṭrebhyaḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āninyur upahārāṃś ca, "and they brought gifts." This would appear to be an emendation to reflect a sense of disquiet at the idea that Rāma should honor lesser kings who have brought him nothing in return.

5–8. The textual evidence for these lines is complicated and somewhat confusing. Close variants of these verses appear for the first time at 1285* (following notes to 7.82.17–19). The context there is somewhat different, as Rāma is instructing Lakṣmaṇa and Bharata, while they are all still in Ayodhyā, to make provisions for the guests. Here, however, Rāma and Bharata are now settled in the Naimiṣa forest, while Lakṣmaṇa has gone off with the sacrificial horse.

5. Compare lines 1–2 of 1285* (following notes to 7.82.17–19). D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read this verse following verse 8 of the critical edition.

"the immensely illustrious" mahādyutiḥ: B1,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead mahābalaḥ, "the immensely powerful [one]," while B4,D1,2,4,5,9,T,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead mahāmatiḥ, "the immensely intelligent [one]."

"foremost of men" naraśreṣṭhaḥ: We assume that the reference here is to Rāma, who was the subject of the previous verse. Note that in lines 1–2 of 1285* (following notes to 7.82.17–19), we assume that Lakṣmaṇa is the subject. It is also possible to understand the reference to be to Bharata, who is the subject of the following verse and would thus be the one to distribute housing, food, drink, etc., to the visitors.

"costly royal pavilions" upakāryān mahārhāṃś ca: Ñ1,V1,B3,D1–6,9–11,T1,3,4,G2,M1–4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the feminine accusative upakāryā mahārhāś ca.

6. "And Bharata, together with Śatrughna, then quickly gave food, drink, and garments to those great kings and their retinues." annapānāni vastrāṇi sānugānāṃ mahātmanām / bharataḥ saṃdadāv āśu śatrughnasahitas tadā //: Literally, "Then Bharata, accompanied by Śatrughna, quickly gave food, drink, and garments to the great [ones] together with their followers." Compare lines 3–4 of 1285*, following notes to 7.82.17–19. Śatrughna's return to Ayodhyā has not been mentioned previously, except at the parallel passage 1285*, following notes to verse 19 (see especially 1285*, note 3). D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead annapānādivastrāṇi sarvopakaraṇāni ca / bharataḥ sahaśatrughno niyukto rājapūjane //, "Bharata together with Śatrughna was charged with honoring the kings [giving them]: clothing [along with] food, drink, etc., and all the accouterments." The nominative or accusative plurals in pādas ab of this variant have no clear syntactical connection to the rest of the verse, nor do they have any verb to govern them. Cr attempts to connect the two halves of the verse by adding the gerund "having arranged for (saṃpādya)" and the participle "was there (vidyamānaḥ)," so that he reads: "Having arranged for food, etc., Bharata, who was there, was appointed to honor the kings" (annādi saṃpādya vidyamāna iti śeṣo bharato rājapūjane niyuktaḥ). Translators who read this variant understand either that Rāma honored the kings with these gifts (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 619; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 609; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 600; Benoît 1999, p. 1407) or that the gifts were simply provided without any indication of an agent (Dutt 1894, p. 1901; Gita Press 1998, vol. 2, p. 911).

7. Compare lines 5–6 of 1285*, following notes to 7.82.17–19.

"all . . . humbly waited upon the brahmans" viprāṇāṃ praṇatāḥ sarve cakrire pariveṣaṇam: Literally, "all [the monkeys], humble, made a feeding of or attendance upon the brahmans." Cv and Cg gloss the term pariveṣaṇam, "feeding of or attendance upon," as "feeding (bhojanam)." See note 4 of 1285*, following notes to 7.82.17–19. Ñ2,B4,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead pariveṣaṇaṃ ca viprāṇāṃ prayatāḥ saṃpracakrire, lending the line the sense "And dutiful, they [the monkeys] together made a feeding of or attendance upon the brahmans."

8. Compare lines 7–8 of 1285*, following notes to 7.82.17–19. See notes to verse 5 above for the placement of this verse in D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press.

"surrounded by many garlanded" sragvibhir bahubhir vṛtaḥ: Ñ2,V2,B1,3,4,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bahubhiḥ susamāhitaḥ, "[Vibhīṣaṇa] in deep concentration with many [rākṣasas]," while Ñ1,D2,12,T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read bahubhiḥ sragvibhiḥ by transposition.

"waited upon . . . as their servant" kiṃkaraḥ paryupasthitaḥ: Ñ2,B3,4,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead kiṃkaraḥ samapadyata, "he became a servant." Cr explains, "Vibhīṣaṇa became a servant, that is to say, became the agent of service, for [lit., 'of'] the seers (vibhīṣaṇa ṛṣīṇāṃ kiṃkaraḥ sevākartā samapadyatābhavat)." T1,2,G,M3, and KK and VSP read instead pūjā cakre mahātmanām, "he honored the great [seers]."

9. "the aśvamedha, commenced" hayamedho 'bhyavartata: Literally, "the hayamedha took place." The text commonly uses the term hayamedha for the aśvamedha. See notes to 7.50.14. D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the somewhat awkward hy aśvamedho hy avartata, "for, indeed, the aśvamedha took place."

"Meanwhile, the horse proceeded to wander under the protection of Lakṣmaṇa." lakṣmaṇenābhiguptā ca hayacaryā pravartitā: Literally, "And guarded by Lakṣmaṇa, the wandering of the horse proceeded." Ck, Cg, and Cm understand the term -caryā, "wandering," in its other sense of "performance or conduct," glossing the compound hayacaryā as "the performance of the aśvamedha sacrifice (hayacaryāśvamedhayāgānuṣṭhānam—so Ck and Cg)," but this strikes us as repetitive of the first line. Ct quotes Ck and Cm on this but notes that other commentators understand the compound to refer to the horse's wandering along the roads. (hayacaryāśvamedhayāgānuṣṭhānam ity artha iti tīrthakatakau. hayamārgagamanam ity artham anye.) D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the augmentless imperfect (laṅ) pravartata, "it went on or continued." Cr glosses the standard form prāvartata.

Following verse 9, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,9,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1287*]: "And such was the great summons to the sacrifice[1] on the part of that lion among kings (īdṛśaṃ rājasiṃhasya yajñapravaram uttaram)."

[1] "great summons to sacrifice" yajñapravaram uttamam: The term -pravaram here is ambiguous. Most commonly at the end of a compound it means "excellent or most outstanding of." But to take it in that sense is to render the line utterly redundant, as -pravaram means nothing other than uttamam, which follows it. Commentators struggle with the phrase. Ct simply proposes adding the verb "it was" (abhavad iti śeṣaḥ, printed incorrectly in GPP as abhayāt). He thus understands, "The yajñapravara was unsurpassed." This leaves the sense of the term -pravaram unexplained, which earns the disdain of Cs, who remarks, "In glossing, 'the yajñapravara was excellent' is Nāgojibhaṭṭa (Ct) speaking with some point in mind? This needs to be clarified. (yajñapravaram uttamam abhavad iti vyākhyan nāgojibhaṭṭaḥ kim abhiprāyeṇaivam ūcivān iti vibhāvanīyam.)" For his own part, Cs, as do we, takes the term pravara in its sense of "call to sacrifice." He explains: "With regard to that excellent call to sacrifice on the part of the lion among kings, that is to say, the foremost of kings, there was a loud cry in the form of praise: 'Here is the sacrifice.' While the hayamedha was going on, there was no cry that was not in praise of it. (rājasiṃhasya rājaśreṣṭhasyedṛśam uttamaṃ yajñapravaram uddiśyaiva śabdo mahān ayaṃ yajña iti stutirūpo 'bhavat. hayamedhe pravṛtte sati. anyas tadastutirūpo na nābhavat)" (despite Cs's triple negative). Cr attempts to finesse the problem of redundancy by understanding the term uttamam, "excellent," as a madhyamapadalopin compound whose sense is "dispelling or driving away darkness (tamonivartakam)" (uttamaṃ tamonivartakaṃ yajñapravaram). The translators consulted deal with the phrase in a variety of ways. Some ignore it altogether (thus Dutt 1894, p. 1902; Raghunathan 1982, vol. 3, p. 600; Gita Press 1998, vol. 2, p. 911). Others attempt to render both terms (Roussel 1903, vol. 3, p. 619; Shastri 1959, vol. 3, p. 609) or collapse the two terms (Benoît 1999, p. 1407).

10. "While the great king's aśvamedha was going on" hayamedhe mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "at the hayamedha of the great one." See notes to verse 9 above. We follow Cs, who fleshes out the implicit locative absolute construction (sati saptamī) (hayamedhe pravṛtte sati). See, too, Cs's comments above on 1287*, following notes to verse 9.

"Give confidently and freely" chandato dehi visrabdhaḥ: Literally, "give according to desire, [being] confident." Cs glosses visrabdhaḥ, "confident," as "unimpaired by the anxiety that Lord Rāma might criticize you for giving excessively, saying: 'Why have you acted in this way?' (visrabdho 'tidāne svāmī rāmaḥ kuta evaṃ tvayākārīti bhartsayed iti śaṅkāvikalaḥ)." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP (also Ck, Cg, Cm, and Ct) read dehi dehīti, "Give! Give!" for dehi visrabdhaḥ, "give [being] confident."

"And it was seen that the monkeys and the rākṣasas gave accordingly." tāvad vānararakṣobhir dattam evābhyadṛśyata: Literally, "What was given to that extent by the vānaras and rākṣasas was seen."

Following 10cd ("Give confidently and freely until all who ask are satisfied [chandato dehi visrabdho yāvat tuṣyanti yācakāḥ])," D6,7,10,11,T,G,M2–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert (M1 inserts line 1 following 10cd and substitutes line 3 for 11cd, and M6 inserts line 3 only after 10cd) a passage of three lines [1290*]: "All those donations[1] at the preeminent sacrifice of the great king,[2] along with various sweets made of unrefined sugar,[3] were given[1] even before the request[4] had issued from the lips of those seeking them.[1–3]"

[1] "donations . . . were given" dānāni: Literally, "gifts or donations." We have supplied the verbal phrase "were given" for the sake of intelligibility. D10,11,T1,2,G3,M2,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the participial dattāni, "were given," thus providing the missing verbal element, lending the phrase the sense "all [those things] were given."

[2] "of the great king" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the great [one]."

[3] unrefined sugar" gauḍāni: Ck and Cg gloss, "having the form of a modification of unrefined sugar (guḍavikārarūpāṇi)." Compare 1.52.4 and notes.

[4] "the request" vacanam: Literally, "words or speech." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, the words would have been in the form of "Give!" (dehīti vacanam).

11. "there" tatra: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead a second vāpi, "either . . . or."

"who was unwashed, unhappy, or underfed" malinaḥ . . . dīno vāpy athavā kṛśaḥ: Literally, "either soiled, depressed, or emaciated." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous vāpy atha karśitaḥ for athavā kṛśaḥ.

12. "that had been adorned with such an abundance of gifts" dānaughasamalaṃkṛtam: Literally, "adorned with a flood of gifts." Cs, the only commentator to discuss this sequence of words, reads it as two words, dānaughasamalam and kṛtam, "[sacrifice], tainted because of its abundance of gifts, [was] performed," rather than as a single compound. Cs reasons as follows: "They did not recall a sacrifice that was 'dānaughasamalaṃkṛtam' because, having never experienced one similar to this, they had no memory of it. A soma sacrifice previously performed by someone else was tainted by its abundance of gifts, that is to say, because of its flood, i.e., mass, of gifts, it was tainted, that is to say, defective. One should understand with regard to sacrifices that, in respect to donations, the state of being tainted occurs when there are unworthy recipients, [when] giving [is done] at the improper time, or [when there is] the intention to give things that should not be given. They remembered thus because of their experience. (dānaughasamalaṃkṛtaṃ tādṛśaṃ yajñaṃ nāsmarann etatsamasavanānubhavābhāvād eva smaraṇābhāva iti bhāvaḥ. prākkṛtam anyānuṣṭhitaṃ savanaṃ dānaughasamalaṃ dānānām oghena saṃghena samalaṃ sadoṣam. apātrebhyo vāsamaye vā deyaditsā veti sāmalyaṃ dāneṣv iti mantavyam. asmaran tathānubhavād iti bhāvaḥ.)" NSP and KK read instead nāpy āsīd kadācana, "for there had never been one." Ck and Cg, who read this variant, and Ct, who notes it, explain: "Those long-lived sages said, 'Such a sacrifice has never taken place before this.' The words ity āhuḥ, 'they said' have to be supplied. (cirajīvino munayas tādṛśaṃ yajñam itaḥ pūrvaṃ tādṛśo nāsīd ity āhur iti śeṣaḥ.)"

Following verse 12, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G1,3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while G2,M1,2,4–10 substitute for 13, a passage of two lines [1294*]: "Whoever had some need of gold received gold. A person seeking wealth received wealth, and one seeking jewels, jewels. (yaḥ kṛtyavān suvarṇena suvarṇaṃ labhate sma saḥ / vittārthī labhate vittaṃ ratnarthī ratnam eva ca //)"

13. "silver" rajatānām: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead hiraṇyānām. The word hiraṇya normally refers to gold but may refer to silver as well. Generally in contexts where gold is mentioned specifically by another of its various synonyms, hiraṇya must be taken as silver. Compare 6.101.18 and notes. Cv glosses hiraṇya as rajata, "silver," (hiraṇyasya rajatasya). Cs offers two interpretations. In the first, he takes the term literally as an adjective with the sense of "[gold (hiraṇyānām)] endowed with a beautiful color (suvarṇānāṃ śobhanavarṇopetānām.)" In the second, he glosses hiraṇyānām as silver (hiraṇyānāṃ rajatānām).

"jewels" ratnānām: T1,2,G1,M3, and KK and VSP read instead aśmanām, "precious stones."

"there appeared to be no end of them" nāntaḥ samupadṛśyate: Literally, "an end did not appear." One could understand, "there was no end [of them]." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāśiḥ samupadṛśyate, "a heap [of gold, etc.,] was seen."

14. "Such a sacrifice" īdṛśaḥ: Literally, "such a one."

"even on the part of Śakra, Soma, Yama, or Varuṇa" na śakrasya na somasya yamasya varuṇasya vā: Literally, "not of Śakra, not of Soma, or of Yama, or of Varuṇa." We understand that the reference here is to sacrifices offered by the various divinities named rather than to them. This seems to be confirmed by what appears to be a glossing on the part of manuscript (Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,8,9,12,T3,4) and printed editions (Lahore and Gorresio) of the north, which read abhavat tādṛśo yajño rāghavasya yathāvidhaḥ, "there has [never] been such a sacrifice, that is to say, of the kind [performed] by [lit., 'of'] Rāghava." T1,2,G3,M4, and KK and VSP read dhaneśasya, "of the lord of wealth [Kubera]," for somasya, "of Soma." Ś,Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–5,7–10,T4,G1,M1,10, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read ca, "and," for vā, "or."

15. "The monkeys were stationed everywhere, as were the rākṣasas" sarvatra vānaras tastuḥ sarvatraiva ca rākṣasāḥ: Literally, "The monkeys stood everywhere, and also the rākṣasas [stood] everywhere." The idea here is that the monkeys and rākṣasas were stationed in various places throughout the sacrificial area.

"clothing and wealth . . . to those who desired them" vāso dhanāni kāmibhyaḥ: Literally, "clothing [and] wealth to those having a desire." D7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M1,3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead vāsodhanānnakāmebhyaḥ, "to those having a desire for clothing, wealth, and food." KK and VSP read instead vāsodhanānnam arthibhyaḥ, "clothing, wealth, and food to those who sought [them]."

16. "It continued for more than a year and was in no way was deficient." saṃvatsaram atho sāgraṃ vartate na ca hīyate: Literally, "Then it continued for a year, together with a surplus, and it was not deficient." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the phrase saṃvatsaram . . . sāgram, "for more than a year" to mean that the aśvamedha went on for even more than a year and was performed repeatedly (saṃvatsarāt param apīti śeṣaḥ. punaḥ punar aśvamedhaḥ prāvartatety arthaḥ). Ct, however, observes that some other commentators understand simply that the consecration for a single aśvamedha (or a single consecration for the aśvamedha) continued for that period (tāvat paryantam ekāśvamedhadīkṣety anye). Cr understands the line to mean "[The sacrifice] continued for a year and more, that is to say, for somewhat more [than a year], and it was in no way deficient (na ca hīyate)," that is to say, it was not interrupted in the middle (sāgraṃ kiñcid adhikaṃ saṃvatsaraṃ vartate na ca hīyate madhye viramati)."

1. "that preeminent and marvelous" paramake 'dbhute: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca paramādbhute, "and supremely marvelous [sacrifice]."

"as has been described" tathābhūte: Literally, "being such." We agree with Ck, Cg, and Ct, who gloss, "proceeding in the manner previously described (prāguktaprakāraṃ pravṛtte—so Ck and Cg; Ct similarly)."

"the bull among the sages" munipuṃgavaḥ: Ś,Ñ1,V,B1,2,D,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bhagavān ṛṣiḥ, "the blessed seer [Vālmīki]."

"along with his disciples" saśiṣyaḥ: Cs glosses, "accompanied by his disciples, Kuśa, Lava, and the rest (saśiṣyaḥ kuśalavādiśiṣyasahitaḥ)."

"there appeared to be no end of them" nāntaḥ samupadṛśyate: Literally, "an end did not appear." One could understand, "there was no end [of them]." D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead rāśiḥ samupadṛśyate, "a heap [of gold, etc.,] was seen."

"along with his disciples" saśiṣyaḥ: Cs glosses, "accompanied by his disciples, Kuśa, Lava, and the rest (saśiṣyaḥ kuśalavādiśiṣyasahitaḥ)."

2. "heavenly" divyasaṃkāśam: Literally, "of heavenly or divine appearance." Cs understands, "resembling even [the sacrifice] that takes place in heaven (divyāt divibhavād api saṃkāśata iti sa tathā tam)."

"he had some . . . leaf huts constructed" cakāra uṭajān: Literally, "he made or built leaf huts." Note the hiatus. As Cr notes, we should understand the simplex verb here in a causative sense (uṭajān parṇaśālāś cakāra kārayāmāsa). No doubt Cr, as do we, feels that it is unlikely that Vālmīki would do the construction himself. Ck, Cg, and Ct note that the word for hut is in the plural because Vālmīki has many disciples (uṭajān iti bahuvacanaṃ bahuśiṣyatvāt—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly).

"a little apart from the encampments of the seers" ekānte ṛṣivāṭānām: Literally, "in an isolated part of the encampments of the seers." Note the hiatus. D6,7,10,11, and NSP and Cr, Ct (as pāṭha), and Cs read instead ṛṣisaṃghātaḥ, "the host of seers." GPP reads the obviously incorrect ṛṣisaṃvātaḥ, which is essentially meaningless. Nonetheless, its editors appear to stand by this reading, as their footnote number 1 (p. 3033) lists both the critical reading and that of the southern commentators as the two variants. Ct presents both readings, noting that if one accepts ṛṣivāṭānām, one must understand the phrase to mean "near the encampments of the seers." If, however, one accepts the reading ṛṣisaṃghātaḥ, Ct continues, we must understand the reference to be to the hosts of seers who came with Vālmīki. (ekānte ṛṣivāṭānām iti pāṭhe samīpa iti śeṣaḥ. ṛṣisaṃghāta iti pāṭhe vālmīkinā sahāgata ṛṣisaṃmūha ity arthaḥ.) Ck and Cg, who read ṛṣisaṃvāṭānām, offer the same explanation as Ct for this term. Cs, like Ct, understands the reading ṛṣisaṃghātaḥ to refer to the hosts of seers who arrive with Vālmīki (ṛṣisaṃghātas tena sahāgata ṛṣisaṃghaḥ). Gita Press uniquely reads ṛṣisaṃvāhānām, "of the vehicles of the seers," but this must be a misprint, as no such variant appears in the critical apparatus. In any case, Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 912) translates the compound as if it were reading ṛṣisaṃghātaḥ and understands the seers to be the ones accompanying Vālmīki. It renders: "That assembly of sages (following Vālmīki) . . ." GPP, NSP, and Gita Press all correct the hiatus and read with sandhi ekānta ṛṣi-. Cs understands the term ekānte, "in an isolated place or part," here to refer to "a place that does not suffer the disadvantage of being too crowded with people (ekānte janasaṃkulatāvikale sthale)."

Following verse 2, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ,V1,3,D2,3,8,9,12,T3,4, and Lahore continue with line 2 only following 1302*, a passage of two lines [1303*]: "In Vālmīki's lovely encampment, not far from the Gomatī, there were many carts filled with very excellent fruits and roots[1] (śakaṭā bahavaḥ pūrṇāḥ phalair mūlaiḥ suśobhanaiḥ / vālmīkivāṭe rucire gomatyā avidūrataḥ //)."

[1] "not far from the Gomatī, there were many carts filled with very excellent fruits and roots" śakaṭā bahavaḥ pūrṇāḥ phalair mūlaiḥ suśobhanaiḥ /. . . gomatyā avidūrataḥ: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śakaṭāṃś ca bahūn pūrṇān phalamūlāṃś ca śobhanān /. . . sthāpayann avidūrataḥ, which lends the line the sense "They placed many full carts and beautiful fruits and roots not too far away . . ." KK and VSP read the slight variant phalamūlaiś ca for phalamūlāṃś ca. This lends the verse the sense "They placed many beautiful carts filled with fruits and roots . . ." Cr notes that the subject of the augmentless imperfect sthāpayan is "the disciples (śiṣyāḥ)," which term he supplies (asthāpayañ śiṣyā iti śeṣaḥ). Cr understands this verse to suggest that Vālmīki did not consume what he had been given by Rāma because of his extreme affection [for Janaka and/or Sītā], which caused him to identify with the lord of Mithilā himself. (etena rāmadattaṃ tena na bhujyata iti sūcitam. tena tasyātisnehān mithilādhipatādātmyaṃ sūcitam.) Apparently Cr's idea is that Vālmīki leaves aside the food offered by Rāma since, identifying with Janaka and out of consideration for him, he would not accept anything just like Janaka. Compare UttaRāC 4.24, where Janaka expresses his outrage and RaghuVa 14.73, where Vālmīki similarly expresses his anger at Rāma.

Following 1303*, T1,2,G1,3,M3, and GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, following 7.93.3), Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś,Ñ,V,B,D1–5,8,9,12,T3,4, and Lahore and Gorresio continue after 1301*, a passage of two lines [1302*]: "Then,[1] highly honored by the king and the great sages, the supremely self-controlled Vālmīki of immense blazing energy took up residence (tataḥ supūjito rājñā munibhiś ca māhātmabhiḥ / vālmīkiḥ sumahātejā nyavasat paramātmavān //)."

[1] "Then" tataḥ: Ñ1,V1,D5,T,G1,3,M3, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead āsīt, "he was."

3–4. "Delighted" hṛṣṭaḥ: The participle in its phonological context is ambiguous, as it can equally be read as dhṛṣṭaḥ, "bold or confident," but this seems to be contextually inappropriate. Gorresio (1870, p. 276), the only translator consulted to share the critical reading, like us, renders, "tutto lieto." On the other hand, Ś1,V3,D6,10,11,T1,3,G,M4,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the dual hṛṣṭau/dhṛṣṭau, "[those two] delighted or confident," which modifies the two disciples, whom the commentators identify as Lava and Kuśa. Cs, the only commentator to remark on this variant, glosses, "[those two] endowed with firmness or courage (dhṛṣṭau dhairyaśālinau)." This seems contextually appropriate for two young boys, Rāma's sons, who are about to perform before the seers and the king. All translators consulted who render this term clearly read the term as hṛṣṭau, "[those two] delighted."

"Go and . . . sing" gatvā . . . / . . . gāyatām: Literally, "having gone, let it be sung." D7,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3,7,9,10, and KK and VSP read instead the ātmanepada dvivacana kartari vidhi liṅ form gāyethām, "you two must sing," for gāyatām, "let it be sung."

"on the royal highways and byways" rathyāsu rājamārgeṣu: The word rathyā, as a taddhita of ratha, "chariot," refers to a major road suitable for chariot traffic and is often used to indicate a main road or royal highway. However, in juxtaposition with rājamārga, "the royal highway," we believe Ct is correct in glossing, "minor or secondary roads (upamārgeṣu)."

5. "But you must especially sing" geyaṃ viśeṣataḥ: Literally, "it is especially to be sung."

"where the sacrifice is going on" yatra karma ca vartate: Literally, "where the rite is proceeding." As Ck, Cg, and Ct note, the rite referred to is the aśvamedha sacrifice. Ñ1,B4,D1,2,4,5,T3,4,M3,10, and KK and VSP read the close variant pravartate, "it continues on," for ca vartate, "and it is going on." V2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ca kurvate, lending the phrase the sense "and where they are performing [the rite]." Cr, commenting on this reading, notes that we must supply the subject "the brahmans (brāhmaṇā iti śeṣaḥ)."

6. "You must keep on singing, pausing only from time to time to eat the various sweet fruits that grow on the hilltops here." imāni ca phalāny atra svādūni vividhāni ca / jātāni parvatāgreṣu āsvādyāsvādya gīyatām //: Literally, "Let it be sung, having eaten, and having eaten these various sweet fruits produced on the mountaintops here." KK and VSP read cāsvādyāsvādya, "having eaten and having eaten," no doubt to avoid the hiatus between pādas c and d (parvatāgreṣu āsvādyāsvādya). This variant is not noted in the critical apparatus. Ck, Cg, and Ct supply "Whenever you get tired, then you should do this. The words, 'you two gentlemen' should be added. (yadā yadā śramas tadā tadaivaṃ kurutam. bhavantāv iti śeṣaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly.)" Ct explains the phrase atra . . . parvatāgreṣu, "here, on the mountaintops," as "here, on the mountaintop near our encampment (atrāsmadvāṭasamīpaparvatāgre)." D6,7,10,11,G1,M1,4,5,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the kartari dvivacana loṭ form gāyatām, "let you two sing," for the critical edition's karmaṇi lot form gīyatām, "let it be sung."

7. "For indeed . . . these fruits" phalāni vai: Literally, "indeed . . . the fruits." D6,7, 10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead phalāny atha, "now or certainly . . . the fruits."

"you will experience no fatigue" na yāsyathaḥ śramam: Literally, "you two will not go to exhaustion."

"you . . . can stay clear of the city" nagarāt parihāsyatha: Literally, "you [pl.] shall avoid the city." It is not clear why the plural rather than the dual, as was found above, is used here. The exact purpose of Vālmīki's injunction to the boys is not entirely clear, either. Perhaps he is warning his innocent ascetic disciples to avoid the corruption and debauchery of the city. Compare the remarks of the ascetics in Abhijñānaśākuntalam (1.5.10–11) and the Svapnavāsavadattam (e.g., 1.3) although in Rāma's realm such things should not be possible. The issue is confronted and perhaps explained somewhat in the variant found in T1,2,G1,2,M3, and KK and VSP and in the commentaries on this variant. These texts read instead nagarād bahir āsyathaḥ, "you [two] shall stay outside the city." On this variant, Ck, Cg, and Ct (as a pāṭha) explain, "We should add the phrase 'at night' and note that the sense is that the boys should spend the nights in a leaf hut (nagarād bahir āsyatho rātrikāleṣv iti śeṣo nagarād bahir ity uṭaja ity arthaḥ—so Ck; Cg and Ct similarly)." Again we believe that the specification to avoid the city at night suggests that the commentators, at least, see the injunction as intended to preserve the boys' innocence. V1,D6,7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead na rāgāt parihāsyathaḥ, "you [two] will not lose the beauty [of your voices]." In this we follow Ct, who explains, "And you [two] will not lose the rāga, that is to say, the sweetness [of your voices] (nāpi rāgāt kaṇṭhamādhuryāt parihāsyathaḥ)." Another possible and slightly more technical translation of this would be one such as is found in Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 913), "you shall . . . not deviate from the Rāga (musical mood)."

8. "should summon you to perform" śabdāpayet . . . śravaṇāya: Literally, "should he call for hearing." The idea is that the king may call for a command performance of the poem. We follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who gloss, "should he summon or invite (āhvayet)." One might also understand the verb in the sense of "should he cause, i.e., command, you to make a noise, i.e., sing."

"in the presence of the assembled seers" ṛṣīṇām upaviṣṭānām: Literally, "of the seated seers." The phrase is elliptical. Ct adds the word "before (agra iti śeṣaḥ)," while Cr fleshes out the phrase as "Rāma who is present in the midst of the seers (ṛṣīṇāṃ madhye vidyamāno rāmaḥ)."

"let the singing commence" tato geyaṃ pravartatām: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yathāyogaṃ pravartatām, "Let it commence according to the proper method." The term yathāyogam here can have as wide a range of meanings as the word yoga it contains. Three such meanings are particularly apposite in this context: "according to the proper method, as suits the occasion, and with your best effort." We agree with Cr that the first of these, "according to the proper method," is probably the intended meaning. He glosses, "without violating the technique of singing (gītayogam anatikramya)."

9. "With the greatest delight" vai parayā mudā: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead geyā madhurayā girā, "they are to be sung with a sweet voice."

"you must sing" geyāḥ: Literally, "[the ślokas] are to be sung."

"each day" divase: Literally, "in a day." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "day by day (divase divase)," while Cr offers, "on a single day (ekadivase)."

"according to the several tempos" pramāṇair bahubhiḥ: Literally, "with many measures." We understand the term pramāṇa, "measure," in its technical musical sense of the three tempos, that is fast (druta), medium (madhya), and slow (vilambita), as the term has been used of Lava and Kuśa's performance at Bālakāṇḍa 4.6–7 and will be used again at 7.85.2–3. (See 1.4.6–7; 7.85.2–3; and notes.) Cr glosses, "for the sake of the quarter tones (śrutis) (śrutyarthaḥ)," which does not seem to be very helpful in this context. Compare his comments to 7.85.3. Ct glosses, "with their varying number of verses (nānāsaṃkhyaślokaiḥ)." This interpretation has been followed by Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 913). Ck and Cg, in a somewhat similar vein, offer, "with their many measures of sargas (bahubhiḥ sargapramāṇaiḥ)." This latter interpretation has been taken up by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 601). Gorresio (1870, p. 276), Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 621), and Benoît (1999, p. 1408) understand similarly to us. See, too, Mallinātha on ŚiśuVa 1.10 and on KumāSaṃ 1.8.

10. "And you must not harbor even the slightest greediness" lobhaś cāpi na kartavyaḥ svalpo 'pi: Literally, "and even the smallest greed is not to be made."

"in expectation of wealth" dhanakāṅkṣayā: Literally, "with an expectation of wealth." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dhanavāñcayā, "with or through desire for wealth." It is possible here that the author is trying to counter the traditional view of professional bards, kuśīlavas, as low-caste and disreputable public performers.

"who partake of only fruits and roots" phalamūlopabhoginām: Literally, "eaters of fruits and roots." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead phalamūlāśināṃ sadā, "always eaters of fruits and roots." T1,2,M3,10, and KK and VSP read instead phalamūlopajīvinām, "subsisting on fruits and roots."

11. "you must speak thus to that lord of men, saying, 'We are disciples of Vālmīki.'" vālmīker atha śiṣyau hi brūtām evaṃ narādhipam: Literally, "and the two disciples of Vālmīki must speak thus to the lord of men." The verse is elliptical, as it lacks both a quotation marker to set off what the two boys are to say and a verb within the quote. Moreover, the critical reading shows the third person dual brūtām, "those two must say." The textual evidence is very weak for the critical reading. All northern manuscripts as well as D1–5,8,9,12 read a variant [1310*], which avoids the ellipsis and grammatical problems of the critical reading. Seven southern manuscripts (D11,T2,4,G3,M2,5,9) appear to read with the critical edition, while nine southern manuscripts (D6,10,T1,G2, M3,4,7,8,10) read the second person dual brūtam, "you two must speak," and G1 reads the synonymous prabrūtam. At best the critical reading should be considered uncertain. D6,7,10,M4,7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read vālmīker atha śiṣyau dvau brūtam evaṃ narādhipam, "You two should speak thus to the lord of men: 'Indeed, [we are] two disciples of Vālmīki.'" M3 and KK and VSP read instead āvāṃ vālmīkiśiṣyau svo brūtam evaṃ narādhipam, "You two should speak thus to the lord of men: 'We are two disciples of Vālmīki.'" Compare UttaRāC 4.22.3–5, where, when Kausalyā asks Lava whose son he is, he says he is Vālmīki's. She then rebukes him, telling him, in effect, not to say such improper things, i.e., that the ascetic Vālmīki would have a child. (kausalyā: tado kassa tumaṃ. lava: bhagavato vālmīkeḥ. kausalyā: ayi jāda kahidavvaṃ kahehi.) See 7.85.9 and notes.

12. "While playing on these . . . strings [and] their frets" imās tantrīḥ . . . sthānaṃ vā . . . / mūrcchayitvā: Literally, "having played these very sweet-stringed instruments and the place." For these technical musical terms, we follow Ck, Cg, and Ct, who understand the term tantrīḥ, normally, "stringed instrument," to refer to the strings themselves and take sthānam, "place," to refer to the row of wooden frets on the neck of the instrument, which enables the production of the various notes of the scale (imās tantrīr vināśirā ity arthaḥ . . . sthānaṃ ṣaḍjādisvarabhedasiddhaye vinādaṇḍopari kalpitaśirādhārakāṣṭhapañktirūpam—so Cg; Ck and Cg similarly). Cr appears to be reading the unattested sumadhurāsthānam and is perhaps inspired by Bālakāṇḍa 4.8, in which Lava and Kuśa are said to have sung the poem, which is replete with all the poetic sentiments (rasas). He understands the word tantrīḥ to refer to the sounds of the vinā and sthānam as the basis or locus for the many and various sweet forms of poetic sentiment. This compound, then, for Cr, in turn, becomes an adjective modifying the Rāmāyaṇa itself. (tantrīr vināsvanān . . . madhurāṇām anekavidhamadhurarasānām āsthānaṃ sthitir yasmin . . . rāmāyaṇam.) See 1.4.8 and notes. Compare 7.85.2–3 and notes. The word mūrcchayitvā, "having sounded or played," is glossed by Ck, Cg, and Ct as "having caused a pervasion of sound (nādavyaptiṃ kṛtvā)," while Cr, in keeping with his interpretation, understands, "having caused the sounds of the vinā to be produced through playing (vināsvanān mūrcchayitvā mūrcchanayā niṣpādya)."

"very melodious" sumadhurāḥ: Literally, "very sweet." We follow Ct, who glosses, "having sweet sounds (madhuraśabdāḥ)."

"and . . . as I showed you earlier" vā pūrvadarśitam: Literally, "and as previously shown." D6,7,10,11,G1,2,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, and VSP, as well as Ck, Cg, Cm, Ct, and Cr read vāpūrvadarśanam, "and in such a way that it has not previously been seen." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the compound as an adjective modifying sthānam, "row of frets," in which there is a manifestation of unprecedented sounds (apūrvadarśanam apūrvāṇāṃ svarāṇāṃ darśanaṃ yatra tādṛśasthānam—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cr, however, in keeping with his reading noted above, understands the compound in the sense of "unprecedented" to modify the Rāmāyaṇa (apūrvadarśanam adṛṣṭapūrvaṃ rāmāyaṇam). KK (both 1905 and 1913) reads vā pūrvadarśanam, "and previously seen." No commentator or translator seems to know this variant, while D6 appears to read with KK.

"you should sing" gāyetām: Literally, "let those two sing." V2,B2,D5,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the third person dual parasmaipada loṭ form gāyatām, "let those two sing," while Gita Press reads the otherwise unattested second person dual parasmaipada loṭ form gāyatam, "let you two sing." Ñ1,V1,G3,M1,4,5, and KK and VSP and Cm read instead the second person dual ātmanepada loṭ form gāyethām, "you two should sing." See notes to verse 14 below.

"confidently" vigatajvarau: Literally, "[you] two whose anxiety is gone."

13. "You must sing it from the beginning" ādiprabhṛti geyaṃ syāt: Literally, "It should be sung starting from the beginning." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand this to mean that the boys should begin with the summarized version of the Rāma story found at Bālakāṇḍa sarga 1 (saṃkṣepam ārabhyety arthaḥ). Cr, on the other hand, takes the phrase to mean "The Rāmāyaṇa is to be memorized (lit., 'known') from the beginning" and adds the words "by you," presumably using the singular collectively for the two boys (ādiprabhṛti rāmāyaṇaṃ jñeyaṃ syāt tvayeti śeṣaḥ).

"showing no disrespect for the king" na cāvajñāya pārthivam: Literally, "and not having disrespected the king." Cg and Ct understand Vālmīki to be telling the boys that when in the presence of the king, they should not act playfully and jokingly, as they might in other venues (sthalāntara iva tatsamīpe līlāparihāsādikaṃ na kartavyam ity arthaḥ). Cr, on the other hand, understands the phrase to mean that once they receive the king's summons, they should go immediately, i.e., they should not insult him by tardiness (tadāhvānena drutaṃ gatvaivety arthaḥ). Cs explains the phrase to mean that the boys are to sing without causing disrespect. The reason for this, he suggests, is that in using the term "father (pitā)" Vālmīki is indirectly informing the boys that Rāma is their father. Therefore, he continues, when in his presence, they should do nothing that indicates disrespect, such as [engaging in] any playful actions like showing their feet or teeth. (nāvajñāyāvajñām akṛtvā geyam. kuta ity ato vyājena yuṣmatpiteti bodhayati pitā hīti. atas tatsamīpe pādadantapradarśanādilīlāvajñārūpiṇī na kāryeti bhāvaḥ.)

14. "you two . . . should . . . sing" yuvām . . . gāyetām: The verb, although technically a third person dual ātmanepada loṭ, must be understood as a second person dual. Here it is quite unusually paired with a second person dual pronoun. G1,3,M2–5, and KK and VSP correct it to the expected second person dual verbal form gāyethām, "let you two sing." GPP, NSP, and Gita Press all read the second person dual parasmaipada verbal form gāyatam, "let you two sing." See notes to verse 12 above.

"and with great concentration" samādhinā: Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B3,4,D1–5,8,9,12, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead samāhitau, "[you two], well focused," while D6,7,10,11, and KK and VSP and Cr read instead samāsthitau, which here would mean something like "[you two], intent or attentive."

"to the accompaniment of both stringed and percussion instruments" tantrīlaya-samanvitam: The compound also occurs at Bālakāṇḍa 4.6–7, where Cg defines tantrī as the vīṇā and laya as the simultaneous rhythms [lit., "pausing"] of the clapping of hands, playing of flutes, and beating of drums (tantrīśabdena tantrīyuktavīṇā lakṣyate. layaśabdena talaveṇumṛdaṅgādīnām ekakālavirāma ity ucyate. tābhyāṃ samanvitam). The term laya typically refers technically to the three tempos, druta, madhya, and vilambita. Normally, the tempo is set by a percussion instrument or the clapping of hands. See 1.2.17; 1.4.6–7; 7.85.3; and notes.

15. "highly illustrious" mahāyaśāḥ: D6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the redundant mahāmuniḥ, "the great sage."

Following verse 15, D6,7,10 and S (except M6) insert a passage of two lines [1311*]: "Instructed by the sage, the two sons of Maithilī, tamers of their foes, said: 'We shall act just so!' (saṃdiṣṭau muninā tena tāv ubhau maithilīsutau / tathaiva karavāveti nirjagmatur ariṃdamau //)."

16. "having been properly prepared though the guidance of the Bhārgava, just as were the Aśvins" yathāśvinau bhārgavanītisaṃskṛtau: Literally, "just like the Aśvins, [those two were] cultivated by the guidance or polity of Bhārgava." The term saṃskṛta here is polysemic, with meanings such as "polished, well trained, initiated, or perfected." The upamāna of the simile, the two Aśvins, is somewhat obscure here. We believe that the reference is to the well-known vedic and epic story according to which the Aśvins, excluded from participation in the vedic sacrifice by the gods, who regard them as of low status through their serving as physicians among men, gain admission to the sacrifice through the clever management of the Bhārgava sage Cyavana. See ŚatBr 4.1.5 and MBh 3.121–124. On the other hand, the phrase bhārgavanīti is suggestive of the well-known nītiśāstra, or treatise on polity, attributed to the famous Bhārgava sage Śukrācārya, although in that case the reference to the Aśvins is obscure. Cg notes this reading as a variant and understands the upamāna to be the term aśvinau alone. He then reads the compound bhārgavanītisaṃskṛtau to modify kumārau, "the two princes." He thus understands the sense to be that the two princes, trained in proper conduct by the Bhārgava, i.e., Vālmīki, [passed the night like the Aśvins] (bhārgavanītisaṃskṛtāv iti pāṭhāntare tu vālmīkiśikṣitāv ity arthaḥ.). D10,11,G3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhārgavanītisaṃhitām, in which case, as suggested by Cg, Ct, and Cr, the simile is to be read as follows: "The two princes took the words of the seer to heart, just as did the Aśvins the compendium on polity of Bhārgava (bhārgavanītisaṃhitām aśvināv iva tau tāṃ vāṇīṃ hṛdaye niveśya)." These commentators are taking the reference to be to the nīti text of Śukra. However, this is doubtful, since most scholars understand that the Śukranītiśāstra can be dated to the eleventh or twelfth century of the Common Era (Sharma and Sharma 2009, p. 49). For a discussion of Vālmīki's status as a Bhārgava, see R. Goldman 1976. See notes to 1328*, note 1, following notes to 7.85.19.

"splendid" śubhām: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"filled with anticipation" samutsukau: Literally, "eager or longing." Ct explains that the boys are eager to sing [the seer's poem] in just that fashion, reflecting that they will have to do so on the following day (śvo gātavyam ity evaṃrūpāṃ gātuṃ samutsukau). Cg understands similarly.

"comfortably" sukham: D6,T2–4,G1,3,M2–10, and KK and VSP (Cg as pāṭha) read instead samam, "together," which Cg takes to be an elliptical phrase to mean that they passed the night together with the seers. (samam iti. ṛṣibhir ity arthaḥ.)

The meter is vaṃśasthavila (vaṃśastha) with a hypometric first pāda in the indravajrā meter.

Sarga 85

1. "When the night had given way to dawn" rajanyāṃ prabhātāyām: Literally, "when the night had become bright."

"the two princes" tau: Literally, "the two."

"made their oblations into the fire, eater of oblations" hutahutāśanau: Literally, "by whom the oblation eater was oblated."

"sang" abhyagāyatām: Literally, "those two sang." B3,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous upāgāyatām.

"in place after place" tatra tatra: Literally, "there [and] there." V2,D6,7 (in margin),10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sarvaṃ, "the entire [poem]," for the first tatra. The remaining tatra, "there," is glossed by Cr as "in the presence of the seers, etc. (ṛṣyādisamīpe)."

2–3. "Kākutstha heard about . . . And when he heard about" sa śuśrāva kākutsthaḥ . . . śrutvā: Literally, "that Kākutstha heard . . . having heard." Although most translators understand that Rāma has actually heard the composition, he will not, in fact, do so until verse 9 below. The situation parallels that described at Bālakāṇḍa 4.21–27, where Rāma, having found out about the two singers who had been performing on the roads and royal highways, invites them to his royal dwelling to perform before his assembly.

"that narrative of his past adventures in various lands" pūrvacaryāṃ tatas tataḥ: Literally, "the previous conduct from that and that place." Ct, who notes this as an alternate reading, explains, "The meaning is 'His own previous actions that were performed there and there, that is to say, in Ayodhyā, in the forest, and so forth' (pūrvacaryāṃ tatas tata iti pāṭhe tatas tato 'yodhyāvanādau kṛtaṃ svakīyaṃ pūrvacaritam ity arthaḥ)." One could also perhaps take the expression tatas tataḥ in the temporal sense, in which it is frequently used in Sanskrit dramas, to indicate a sequence of events, "then [and] then," to mean here "in due sequence." M10,11,T2,G3,M1,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pūrvācāryavinirmitām, "created by the ancient master," which would then modify pāṭhyajātim, "mode of recitation," in 2c. The expression is ambiguous. Ct and Cs identify the ancient master with the sage Bharata, the legendary author of the Nāṭyaśāstra, the treatise on music and drama. Cs further identifies Bharata as the author of the teachings on music. (pūrvācāryo bharataḥ. gītisamanuśāstikārtā. tadvinirmitām.) Alternatively, Cs proposes taking pūrvācārya- as a plural referring to the patriarchs of their own lineage, so that the compound might also mean "composed on the subject of these men." (pūrvācāryāḥ svamūlapuruṣādayaḥ. tadviṣaye vinirmitām iti vā.) However, given the central discourse on Vālmīki's creation of poetry, it seems more likely that the reference is to him. Cg breaks the compound so that it reads pūrvam ācāryeṇa vinirmitām, "previously composed by their master." In this case, the reference must be to Vālmīki. Translators who render this variant seem divided. Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 612) explicitly names Vālmīki, rendering, "composed by the aged Valmiki." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 602) similarly refers to Vālmīki in his translation but does not explicitly name him, translating, "the work of the singers' preceptor." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 622) is ambiguous, rendering, "oeuvre d'un ancien Maître," which leaves open the possibility that he takes the reference to be to someone other than Vālmīki. Benoît (1999, p. 1409), rendering, "composé par le vieux maître," chooses the definite article, thus referring to a specific master, probably Vālmīki. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 913) alone among the translations consulted, specifically names Bharata[muni]. Dutt (1894, p. 1904) omits the phrase.

"mode of recitation" pāṭhyajātim: Ct quotes Ck as saying, "The compound pāṭhyajāti is the scale, beginning with the note ṣaḍja, of the singing (pāṭhyajātiṃ pāṭhyasya geyasya jātiṃ ṣaḍjādisvarūpam iti katakaḥ)." Cr, who understands the phrase as a bahuvrīhi modifying a supplied "song (gāthā)," explains, "ornamented with sounds, that is, singing, in which there was the origin of a particular type of recitation, that is, of singing (pāṭhyasya gānaviśeśasya jātir utpattir yasyāṃ geyena svareṇa samalaṃkṛtām . . . tāṃ gāthām)." See Bālakāṇḍa 4.6–7 and notes.

"replete with the various tempos" pramāṇair bahubhiḥ baddhām: Literally, "It was bound with many measures." Here, too, we take the term pramāṇa in its technical sense. See 7.84.9 and notes. Ct takes the same position, commenting, "The pramāṇas are the means of the clear delineation of the sounds, that is, the tempos of fast, medium, and slow (pramāṇair dhvaniparicchedasādhanair drutamadhyavilambitāvṛttibhiḥ)." Ct offers as an alternative, "the points of articulation earlier mentioned (prāguktasthānair vā)." See Bālakāṇḍa 4.9 and notes. According to Cg, sthāna is a technical term for the organs of vocal articulation, normally numbering three, the chest, the throat, and the head, where the three types of sounds are produced, the low, the medium, and the high. (sthānāni mandramadhyatārarūpasvaratrayotpattisthānāni . . . prāṇasaṃcaraṇasthānaṃ sthānam ity abhidhīyate. uraḥ kaṇṭhaś śiraś ceti tatsvarās trividhāḥ smṛtā iti.) Compare, however, 7.84.12 and notes, where sthāna must be understood differently. Cs understands the term to refer to the means for establishing the boundary between the rising and descending notes (svarārohāvarohamaryādāsādhanaiḥ). As before, Cr understands pramāṇaiḥ to refer to "the quarter-tones (śrutyarthaḥ)." See 7.84.9 and notes. T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP, as well as Ck and Cg, read yuktām, "joined," for baddhām, "bound."

"accompanied by stringed and percussion instruments" tantrīlayasamanvitām: See 1.2.17; 1.4.6–7; 3*, following 7.63, line 23; 7.84.14; and notes.

4–5. "during an interval of the rite" karmāntare: Ct and Cr gloss, "The meaning is 'At the time of a pause in the activities of the aśvamedha' (aśvamedhaprayogānāṃ virāmakāla ity arthaḥ)." Cg explains similarly but uses a term that suggests that these events may take place at the end of the sacrifice (karmāntare 'śvamedhasya prayogāvasāne).

"assembled" samānīya: Literally, "having brought together." Ñ2,D7,10,11,T,3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samāhūya, "having summoned or invited."

"scholars" paṇḍitān: Literally, "wise men." Cr glosses, "fully enlightened ascetics (paramahaṃsāḥ)."

"townsmen" naigamān: Cr takes the term here in its sense of "those learned in the vedas (vedābhijñāḥ)." Cg, commenting below retrospectively on this word, takes the term as we do here, in the sense of "townspeople (pūrvatra paurān ity arthaḥ)." But see below notes 5 and 13 to 1315*. See, too, 7.65.2 and 7.82.17–19 and notes, where the term is used.

"grammarians, and the aged, twice-born brahmans" śabdavido ye ca vṛddhā dvijātayaḥ: Literally, "knowers of words, and [those] who were the aged, twice-born [ones]." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read vṛddhāś ca by transposition. Translators are rather divided as to how to construe the sequence. Dutt (1894, p. 1904) takes the term vṛddhāḥ nominally to refer to "all old men." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 622) applies the adjective "aged (vṛddhāḥ)" to both nouns, rendering, "D'anciens grammairiens, vieux Brah- manes." Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 612), following Roussel, offers, "aged Grammarians, venerable Brahmins . . . the twice born." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 602) appears to ignore the entire pāda. Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 913) reads all three terms together, translating, "and also those aged Brāhmaṇas who were proficient in the knowledge of words." Gorresio (1870, p. 278) takes the term as we do, rendering, "ed ogni vecchio Brahmano." Similarly, Benoît (1999, p. 1409) offers, "les grammairiens, les brâhmanes âgés."

"them all" etān sarvān: Ct remarks that through this list [of learned people] the author shows that the Rāmāyaṇa is the site of every form of knowledge without exception (etenāśeṣavidyāsthānaṃ rāmāyaṇam iti darśitam).

Following 5ab, Ñ2,D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M2,4,5,7,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (GPP reads 1315*, line 5 in brackets; NSP omits line 5) insert, while V2, B,T2,G3,M1,3 insert following verse 4, a passage of seven lines [1313*]. D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, following line 1, a passage of one line [1315*, line 1]. Following 1313*, D6,7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M2,4,5,10 continue with a passage of one line [1314*]. Following 1314*, D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, following line 1, a passage of one line [1315*, line 2]. Following 1315*, line 2, GPP (in brackets), Gita Press, KK, and VSP read a passage of one line [1316*]. The following translation of the passage will be given in the order that it appears in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP. These passages considerably expand, sometimes repetitively, the list of those invited to hear the performance of the Rāmāyaṇa. A number of the terms are technical and subject to multiple interpretations.

"and [he assembled] in his eagerness[1] the foremost among twice-born brahmans who were experts in the characteristics of musical scales[2] [1313*, line 1 = GPP 5cd; KK 5cd]; those who understood bodily signs,[3] those well versed in music,[4] and especially those who understood citrakāvya[5] [1315*, line 1 = GPP 6ab; KK 6ab]; those who understood the proper composition of words and syllables[6] and those who were well grounded in the science of metrics[7] [1313*, line 2 = GPP 6cd; KK 6cd]; those who knew the special characteristics of musical measures[8] and those who were masters of astronomy and astrology[9] [1313*, line 3 = GPP 7ab; KK 7ab]; those who knew the vedic rituals and the vedic ritual manuals,[10] as well as people knowledgeable about poetry[11][1313*, line 4 = GPP 7cd; KK 7cd]; those who knew languages,[12] those who knew the vedas,[13] and especially those who knew the naiṛkta [sic][14] [1313*, line 5 = GPP in brackets between verse 7cd and 8ab; KK 8ab]; and those logicians who were skillful in argumentation and metaphorical usage in matters of speech[15] [1313*, line 6 = GPP 8ab; KK 8cd]; those who knew the science of metrics, those who knew the purāṇas, and the foremost among the aged, twice-born brahmans[16] [1314* = GPP 8cd; KK 9ab]; those who knew moral conduct, those who knew the sūtra literature,[17] and those who were expert in singing and dance[18] [1315*, line 2 = GPP 9ab; KK 9cd]; those who knew the śāstras,[19] those who were skilled in the science of polity, and those who promulgated the essence of vedānta[20] [1316* = GPP (in brackets between 9ab and 9cd); KK 10ab].

[1] "in his eagerness" autsukyād: Literally, "from or out of anticipation." Ñ2,D10,11,G1,M1, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead utsukān, "desirous or eager," in which case the term is an adjective modifying the twice-born brahmans. Cg and Ct gloss, "eager to hear the Rāmāyaṇa (rāmāyaṇaśravaṇotsukān)."

[2] "experts in the characteristics of musical scales" svarāṇāṃ lakṣaṇajñān: Literally, "knowers of the characteristic traits of the sounds." Ct and Cg gloss, "of the notes [of the scale] beginning with ṣaḍja" for svarāṇām, "of the sounds." (svarāṇāṃ ṣaḍjādisvarāṇām.)

[3] "those who understood bodily signs" lakṣaṇajñān: Literally, "knowers of the signs or characteristic traits." Ct, Cr, and Cs gloss, "knowers of the characteristics of the science of bodily signs (sāmudrikalakṣaṇajñāninaḥ—so Cs; Ct and Cr similarly)." For discussions and examples of the Sāmudrikaśāstra, see Sundarakāṇḍa 33.15–19 and notes and Yuddhakāṇḍa 38.2*–13 and notes.

[4] "those well versed in music" gāndharvān: Ct glosses, "knowers of the science of music (saṃgītaśāstrajñān)." Cg similarly glosses, "knowers of the science of the gandharvas (i.e., music) (gāndharvaśāstrajñān)."

[5] "those who understood citrakāvya" citrajñān: Literally, "knowers of citra." The term is ambiguous. It can refer either to the graphic arts or to a type of virtuosic poetry. For the commentators' interpretation of this term, see notes to 1315*, line 2, following notes to verse 17 below. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead naigamān. This is the second occurrence of the term in the vulgate text. Here, Ct and Cr gloss the term in its sense of "townspeople (paurān)." Upon giving this alternative gloss, Cr adds that there is thus no redundancy in the passage (naigamāḥ paurā ata eva na paunaruktyam). See notes to verses 4–5 above.

[6] "those who understood the proper composition of words and syllables" pādākṣarasamāsajñān: Literally, "knowers of the joining together of words and syllables." Cr glosses, "those who understood poetics (sāhityavidaḥ)." Cg and Ct similarly explain, "those who know the conjunction, that is, the composition characterized by the conjunction of heavy and light [syllables] (gurulaghuprayogalakṣaṇaṃ samāsaṃ saṃbandhaṃ jānanti tān—so Ct; Cg similarly)."

[7] "those who were well grounded in the science of metrics" chandaḥsu pariniṣṭhitān: Literally, "those well established in meters or the vedas." Ct understands the term to refer to the vedas, by which he further understands the scientific texts that set forth the vedic meters, such as the gāyatrī. (vedeṣu gāyatryādichandaḥpratipādakaśāstreṣu—so Ct.) Cg simply glosses, "in the vedas (vedeṣu)."

[8] "those who knew the special characteristics of musical measures" kalāmātraviśeṣajñān: Literally, "knowers of the special characteristics of the measures of the art [of music]." Ñ2,V2,B1–3,G3, and Gorresio, KK, and VSP read instead kalāmātravibhāgajñān, "knowers of the divisions of the measure of the art [of music]." Cg and Ct understand this variant compound to mean "knowers of the divisions of the measures characterized by the numbers one, two, and three of the kalās, that is to say, the notes of the musical scale (kalāḥ svarās teṣāṃ mātrā ekadvitrilakṣaṇās teṣāṃ vibhāgajñān)." Cr similarly understands, "those knowledgeable about [the science of] musical measures (prastāravidaḥ)."

[9] "those who were the masters of astronomy and astrology" jyotiṣe ca paraṃ gatān: Literally, "those who had gone to the highest [levels] in jyotiṣa." The term jyotiṣa includes the sciences of both astronomy and astrology.

[10] "those who knew the vedic rituals and the vedic ritual manuals" kriyākalpavidaḥ: Literally, "those who understood the rites and ritual ordinances." Cg and Ct explain, "those who understand the rites and the kalpasūtra, which teaches them (kriyāṃ tatpratipādakam kalpasūtraṃ ca vidanti tān—so Ct; Cg similarly)."

[11] "people knowledgeable about poetry" kāvyavido janān: Literally, "people who understand poetry." D7,10,11,T2–4,G1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read kāryaviśāradān, "skillful in what is to be done." Ct, the only commentator to remark on this ambiguous expression, explains, "knowers of the particulars of those actions that needed to be done, such as insertion and removal (āvāpoddhārādikṛtyaviśeṣajñān)." This may be the basis for the Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 914) translation, "those skilled in suggesting remedial forms (of ritual)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 622) renders, "Ceux qui étaient habiles (á discerner) les causes et les effets." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 612), who offers, "those versed in discerning cause and effect." Benoît (1999, p. 1409), whose text omits 1313*, line 5, takes the term as an adjective modifying haitukān, "logicians," of 1313*, line 7. He thus reads, "les logiciens habiles á raisonner sur tout sujet en discernant les causes." Dutt (1894, p. 1905), more practically, understands, "experts in the dispatch of business."

[12] "those who knew languages" bhāṣājñān: Cg glosses, "knowers of the essential nature of eighteen languages (aṣṭādaśabhāṣāsvarūpajñān)."

[13] "those who knew the vedas" nigamajñān: T2,G1,3,M, and GPP (in brackets), Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead iṅgitajñān, "knowers of gestures or intentions." Cg glosses, "those who understood intentions (abhiprāyavidaḥ)."

[14] "and especially those who knew nairkta [sic]" nairktāṃś ca viśeṣataḥ: We can make no sense of the critical reading, and, to our knowledge, the term nairkta does not occur in the language. Perhaps the term nairkta is a mistranscription or a typographical error (in both the insert passage and its apparatus) for nairuktān, "etymologists or experts in etymology." This is, perhaps, supported by Cv, who appears to read nairuktān in his commentary, although this may be a silent emendation by the person who transcribed the text in our hands. Less plausibly, it might also be a mistake for nairṛtān, normally a kenning for rākṣasas. GPP (in brackets), Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead naigamān, which Cg glosses as "merchants (vaṇijān)."

[15] "and those logicians who were skillful in argumentation and metaphorical usage in matters of speech" hetūpacārakuśalān vacane cāpi haitukān: Cv, whom we follow, understands, as do most of the other commentators, the term haitukān to refer to tārkikas, that is to say, logicians. He further understands the adjective hetūpacārakuśalān to mean that they, through logical reasoning, are skillful in discerning secondary or metaphorical meanings. Cv notes: "Haitukas are logicians who are skilled in discerning secondary or metephorical meanins, and thus they point out, 'This is not the primary meaning; therefore, it is a figurative usage' (hetunāyaṃ mukhyārtho na bhavaty ato lakṣaṇety upacāranirūpaṇakuśalān haitukāṃs tārkikān)." Cg, who reads with the critical edition, understands these logicians to be capable of using logical argumentation even in mundane matters. (vacane cāpi kevalavyavahāre 'pi hetūpacārakuśalān yuktiprayogasamarthān. haitukāṃs tārkikān.) D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read haitukāṃś ca bahuśrutān, "deeply learned logicians," for vacane cāpi haitukān, "those logicians . . . in matters of speech." Ct's gloss of this reading is, however, very similar to that of Cg. Cr glosses similarly to Ct and Cg but concludes by saying that the meaning is "scholars of nyāya who are skillful in presenting logical arguments (hetupratipādananipuṇā naiyāyikā ity arthaḥ)."

[16] "those who knew the science of metrics, those who knew the purāṇas, and the foremost among aged, twice-born brahmans" chandovidaḥ purāṇajñān vṛddhāṃś ca dvijasattamān: The line largely paraphrases verse 5ab. Ct understands chandaḥ to refer to the gāyatrī and other vedic meters (gāyatryādi). Cr glosses, "knowers of vedic meters (vaidikachandobhijñāḥ)." Cr glosses purāṇajñān as "those possessed of knowledge of ancient matters (prācīnavastujñānavantaḥ)." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vaidikān, "vedic scholars," for vṛddhāṃś ca, "and the aged." Ct glosses the variant as "knowers of the characteristics of [all four] divisions of the vedas, etc. (vaidikapādādilakṣaṇajñān)."

[17] "those who knew moral conduct, those who knew the sūtra literature" vṛttijñān atha sūtrajñān: We understand the term vṛtti here in its sense of "moral conduct or behavior." However, it can also refer to a variety of other phenomena—grammatical, linguistic, rhetorical, etc. In addition, it can refer to commentaries, particularly on the sūtra literature. D10,11,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, and Cr and Ct read instead citrajñān for vṛttijñān, "knowers of moral conduct." See note 5 above. Cg, who appears to read the same terms but in inverted order, glosses citrajñān as "those skilled in the composition of virtuosic poetry, including such types as circular composition, etc. (cakrabandhādisahitacitrakāvyaracanānipuṇān)." Ct offers, "those who are clever in composing virtuosic verses, such as those in the shape of cow's urine, the muraja drum, etc. (gomūtramurajādicitraślokanibandhanacaturān)." For a discussion of the terms gomūtra, "cow's urine," and muraja, "the muraja drum," see Gerow 1971, pp. 175–89, especially pp. 181 and 187. Cr offers, "'Knowers of citra' refers either to those capable of producing paintings or those capable of composing virtuosic poetry (citrajñā ālekhyakaraṇe samarthāś citrakāvyakaraṇe samarthā vā)." Cg glosses merely, "knowers of the śāstras on moral behavior (vṛttaśāstrajñān)." Ct explains, "knowers of virtuous conduct through the means of dharmaśāstra (dharmaśāstramukhena sadācārajñān)." Ct explains sūtrajñān thus: "the sūtras are the sūtras on words, sentences, etc.; the term then refers to knowers of those (sūtrāṇi padavākyādisūtrāṇi tajjñān)." Cr explains, "'Knowers of the sūtra' are those who are competent in knowledge through concise expression (sūtrajñā alpoktyaiva jñānasamarthāḥ)."

[18] "those who were expert in singing and dance" gītanṛtaviśāradān: D7,10,11,T3, and GPP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous variant gītanṛtyaviśāradān.

[19] "those who knew the śāstras" śāstrajñān: Cg glosses this as "knowers of the sciences, such as grammar (vyākaraṇādiśāstrajñān)."

[20] "those who promulgated the essence of vedānta" vedāntārthaprabodhakān: Literally, "those who wake up [someone] or cause [someone] to understand the essence of vedānta." GPP reads -prakāśakān, "those who make clear," for -prabodhakān, "those who awaken or cause to understand." Gita Press reads with the critical edition.

6–7. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read verses 6, 7, and 8 following verse 10 of the critical edition.

"The delighted hosts of seers there" hṛṣṭā ṛṣigaṇās tatra: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read munigaṇāḥ sarve, "all the hosts of sages," for ṛṣigaṇās tatra, "the hosts of seers there," while D7,10,11, and KK and VSP read dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," for hṛṣṭāḥ, "delighted." See note below.

"the king and those two singers" rājānaṃ gāyakau ca tau: D6,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead paśyanti sma muhur muhuḥ, "they gazed upon [them] again and again." This variant (along with the one below) relieves verse 6 of its syntactic dependence on the finite verb ūcuḥ, "they said," in verse 7a and lends verse 6 the sense "All the delighted hosts of sages and the immensely powerful kings gazed upon [them] again and again, drinking, as it were, with their eyes (hṛṣṭā munigaṇāḥ sarve pārthivāś ca mahaujasaḥ / pibanta iva cakṣurbhiḥ paśyanti sma muhur muhuḥ // = GPP 12)." KK and VSP, like the critical edition, have no finite verb in verse 6, but the substitution of the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," for the adjective hṛṣṭāḥ, "delighted," makes the terms rājānam and gāyakau in pāda d the objects of both the gerund and the participle pibantaḥ, "drinking," thus lending the verse the sense "Having gazed at the king and the two singers, all the hosts of sages and the immensely powerful kings, drinking [them] in, as it were, with their eyes . . . (dṛṣṭvā munigaṇāḥ sarve pārthivāś ca mahaujasaḥ / pibanta iva cakṣurbhyāṃ rājānaṃ gāyakau ca tau // = KK 11)."

"with their eyes" cakṣurbhyām: Literally, "with both eyes." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the perhaps more contextually appropriate plural, cakṣurbhiḥ, "with the eyes."

"then all said to one another simultaneously" parasparam athocus te sarva eva samaṃ tataḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ūcuḥ parasparaṃ cedaṃ sarva eva samāhitāḥ [samantataḥ—KK and VSP], "and, with great concentration, they all said this to one another." Cr glosses, "with single-pointed minds (ekāgracittāḥ)." KK and VSP read samantataḥ, "on or from every side," for samaṃ tataḥ, "then . . . simultaneously." This reading is noted in the critical apparatus, but it is reported for no manuscript, and it is difficult to say on what basis the critical editors regard this as a variant, since in manuscripts the two would be written together. In our opinion, the sequence should probably be read as samantataḥ (samaṃtataḥ).

"Both of them look like Rāma, just like reflections of the same image." ubhau rāmasya sadṛśau bimbād bimbam ivoddhṛtau: Literally, "Both are similar to Rāma; the two are drawn out, like a reflection from an image." Ct understands: "The two were drawn out like another orb of the sun from the orb of the sun (bimbād raver bimbād ravibimbāntaram ivoddhṛtau)." Cr explains: "The two were drawn out like an image, that is to say, a reflection of an image, that is to say, the form of Rāma. Therefore, they were identical to Rāma. The phrase 'those two were' should be supplied. (bimbād rāmamūrter bimbaṃ pratibimbam ivoddhṛtāv ata eva rāmasya sadṛśau sta iti śeṣaḥ.)" T3,M3, and KK and VSP read utthitau, "arising from," for uddhṛtau, "drawn out."

8. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read verses 6, 7, and 8 following verse 10 of the critical edition.

Following verse 8, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press insert a passage of one line [1318*]: "And as the townsfolk and countryfolk were speaking in this fashion . . . (evaṃ prabhāṣamāṇeṣu paurajānapadeṣu ca /)."

9. "And as those assembled were conversing in this fashion" teṣāṃ saṃvadatām evam: Literally, "while they were conversing thus." D6,7,10,11,T1, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read tatra, "there," for evam, "in this fashion."

"the two young sages" tāv ubhau munidārakau: Literally, "those two boys or children of the sage." We should understand here that Lava and Kuśa belong to the sage's entourage and not, of course, that they are his sons. See verse 17 and notes below. See also 7.84.11 and notes.

10. D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read verses 6, 7, and 8 following verse 10 of the critical edition.

"ethereal musical performance" gāndharvam atimānuṣam: Literally, "that [art] belonging to the gandharvas, which was superhuman."

"because of the perfection of the singing, none of those who heard it could get enough of it" na ca tṛptiṃ yayuḥ sarve śrotāro geyasaṃpadā: Literally, "because of the perfection of the singing, all the hearers did not go to satiety." T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP read the synonymous gāna- for geya-.

11. "First, it commenced from the beginning, that is, from the sarga in which there was the meeting with Nārada. Continuing from there, they sang twenty sargas." pravṛttam āditaḥ pūrvaṃ sargān nāradadarśanāt / tataḥ prabhṛti sargāṃś ca yāvad viṃśaty agāyatām //: Literally, "First it started from the beginning, from the sarga in which there was the appearance of Nārada. Continuing from there, they sang twenty sargas." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pravṛttam āditaḥ pūrvasargaṃ nāradadarśitam [= GPP 7.94.15cd; KK 7.94.15ab], "The first sarga, which was expounded by Nārada, commenced from the beginning." Ct explains this variant as follows: "There, that is, in the singing, having begun the first sarga from the beginning, the one that was expounded by Nārada, they sang up to twenty sargas from that point. According to Tīrtha (Cm), starting with the 'Concise [saṃkṣepa]' Rāmāyaṇa, there was a singing of twenty sargas each day until the Rāmāyaṇa was completed. (tatra geye nāradadarśitaṃ pūrvasargam āditaḥ pravṛttaṃ kṛtvā tataḥ prabhṛti yāvad viṃśatisargān agāyatām. anena pratyahaṃ saṃkṣeparāmāyaṇam āditaḥ kṛtvā yāvad rāmāyaṇasamāpti viṃśatisargāṇāṃ gānam iti tīrthaḥ.) Cr, like us, understands āditaḥ, "from the beginning," to mean "at the beginning." He also refers to the epic's first sarga, in which Nārada provides a concise account of Rāma's career, as the original or source Rāmāyaṇa. (ādita ādau nāradadarśitaṃ pūrvaṃ sargaṃ mūlarāmāyaṇam ity arthaḥ pravṛttam.)

12. "to Bharata" bharatam: Ñ2,V2,B1–3,D10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bhrātaram, "to [his] brother."

13. "you must . . . give" dadasva: Ñ2,V2,B4,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous prayaccha.

"these two great singers" mahātmanoḥ: Literally, "of the two great [ones]."

"eighteen thousand gold coins" aṣṭādaśasahasrāṇi suvarṇasya: Literally, "eighteen thousands of gold." We follow Cr, who glosses suvarṇasya, "of gold," with "of gold coin (svarṇamudrāyāḥ)."

"The exertions of these two youths must not be in vain." bālayor mā vṛthā śramaḥ: B1,D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yad anyad abhikāṅkṣitam, "[and] whatever else is desired." Cr glosses, "whatever may be desired apart from that (anyat tato bhinnaṃ yad abhikāṅkṣitaṃ ca)."

Following verse 13, D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D6,7 substitute for 13cd, a passage of one line [1321*]: "And, indeed, Kākutstha immediately gave [that much] to each of the two boys (dadau sa śīghraṃ kākutstho bālayor vai pṛthak pṛthak /)."

14. "But the two . . . bards" kuśīlavau: Literally, "the [two] kuśīlavas." The term kuśīlava normally refers to itinerant bards and is no doubt the etymology upon which the names of Rāma's sons are based. On the term kuśīlava, see 7.58.4; 7.97.7; and notes, and 1.4.3 and notes. Ct and Cr understand the compound simply to mean Kuśa and Lava (kuśalavau), and this is the understanding of all translators consulted, with the exception of Benoît (1999, p. 1410), who, like us, understands, "les deux bardes." See, too, Dayal 2009 and 2011 and Thapar 2013, p. 228.

"perplexed" vismitau: Cg and Ct both understand that the boys are perplexed or astonished at the [king's] extraordinary generosity (bahupradānato vismayavantau—so Cg; Ct similarly).

"the gold" suvarṇaṃ tat: Ś,Ñ1,V1,B4,D1–4,6–12,T3,4, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "but," for tat, "the or that."

"saying: 'Of what use is this to us? ' " ūcatuḥ . . . kim aneneti: Literally, "Those two said: 'What by this?' " Cr fleshes out the idiom, glossing: "We should provide the words 'What is the use of [lit., 'with'] this gold for the two of us?' The meaning is 'There is none whatever.' (anena suvarṇena nāv āvayoḥ kiṃ prayojanam iti śeṣo na kim apīty arthaḥ.)"

15. "We are two forest dwellers" svo vanaukasau: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vanavāsinau, "two forest dwellers."

"are quite satisfied" niratau: Literally, "satisfied or delighting in." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss niratāhārau, perhaps a paranipāta compound for āhāraniratau, "who are satisfied with their food." Ct further glosses: "It amounts to saying, 'whose diet is restricted' (niyatāhārāv iti yāvat)." D6,7,G2,M5,10, and the text of Cr read niyatau, which Cr glosses as "restricted to [lit., 'by'] fruits and roots (phalamūlena niyatau niyatāhārau)."

"with this brightly shining gold" suvarṇena hiraṇyena: Literally, "with gold which is golden or which has a beautiful color." The problem here is that both survarṇa and hiraṇya have as one of their principal meanings "gold." Ct and Cr explain away the potential redundancy, but differently. Ct takes hiraṇya, normally, "gold," in the sense of "wealth," explaining: " 'With wealth in the form of gold.' That is the meaning. (suvarṇena suvarṇarūpeṇa hiraṇyena dravyeṇety arthaḥ.)" Cr, on the other hand, takes suvarṇa in its adjectival sense of "having a beautiful color" and glosses, "with gold having an extremely lovely color (suvarṇenātiśobhanavarneṇa hiraṇyena)."

16. "were filled with curiosity" kautūhalasamanvitāḥ: Cr understands: "The listeners who were characterized by hearing the marvelous stanzas as well as Rāma were greatly astonished. The verb 'were' must be supplied (āścaryagāthāśravaṇaviśiṣṭāḥ śrotāro rāmaś ca suvismitā abhavann iti śeṣaḥ)." KK and VSP read instead the synonymous kutūhalasamanvitāḥ.

17. "the origin" āgamam: Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand, "acquisition (prāptim—so Cg and Cr)." Ct is the most elaborate, glossing, "the reason for the acquisition of that [poem] on the part of Kuśa and Lava (kuśalavayos tatprāptikāraṇam)."

"asked the two" papraccha tau . . . tāv ubhau: Literally, "he asked the two, the two, both of them." The line is clearly repetitive. Ct, the only commentator to remark on this and whom we follow, attempts to soften it by seeing the repeated pronouns as an example of repetition to indicate successive or repeated action (tau tāv iti vīpsā).

"the two young sages" munidārakau: See notes to verse 9 above.

18. "What is the extent of the poem?" kiṃpramāṇam idaṃ kāvyam: Literally, "This poem has what measure?" Ck and Ct wish to assure us that Rāma had already inquired respectfully concerning the extent, etc., of what he had heard during the performance of the first twenty sargas on the first day of recitation. He [Rāma] now inquires further about how the two singers learned the poem and about the composition of the remainder of the text by the sage [with the verse] that begins kiṃpramāṇam. (prathamadivasa śrutaviṃśatisargamadhye śrutasyaiva pramāṇādyarthasyādārāt praśne punas tābhyāṃ pratipādanaṃ muninā ca tadīyottaratvena tatpratipādakagranthagrathanaṃ kiṃpramāṇam ityādi.) Cv understands the phrase kiṃpramāṇam to refer to how many ślokas, or verses, the work has (kiṃpramāṇaṃ kiyacchlokam), while Cr glosses, "measured to what extent (kiyatparimitikam)?"

"And what did the great man base it on?" kā pratiṣṭhā mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "What is the basis of that great [one]?" The phrase is ambiguous, as is the precise sense of the term pratiṣṭhā here. Cv understands the term mahātmanaḥ, "great [one]," to refer to the poet but construes pratiṣṭhā with kāvyasya, "of the poem," in pāda c. Thus he understands, "What is the basis of the great man's poem, that is to say, with reference to what subject has it been composed? (mahātmanaḥ kaveḥ kāvyasya kā pratiṣṭhā kiṃ vastv adhikṛtya kṛtam iti yāvat)." Ct, similarly, takes the term pratiṣṭhā here to refer to the basis, i.e., the subject matter of the great poet, glossing, "What is the great poet's subject?" (mahātmanaḥ kaveḥ kā pratiṣṭhā. ko viṣaya ity arthaḥ.) We agree with these two commentators that the term pratiṣṭhā here most probably refers to the subject matter of the poem. We believe this is so in light of the response given by Lava and Kuśa in the following verse (see verse 19 below), where they indicate that the poem is about Rāma's life history. Cr takes the term in the sense of "perseverance or stability," understanding the phrase to be about how long the poem will endure. He also understands the term mahātmanaḥ to refer not to the poet but to the poem itself, which he believes deserves the adjective "great" because of its having been created with such extraordinary effort. (mahātmano 'tiprayatnān niṣpannasya kāvyasya kā pratiṣṭhā kiyatkālaparyantaṃ sthitir ity arthaḥ.) Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 623), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 613) and Benoît (1999, p. 1410), understands the question to be about the residence of the poem's author ("Quelle est la résidence du sublime auteur de ce grand Kâvya?"). This translation is perhaps influenced by the variant reading mentioned below. See notes to verse 20 below and 1331*, following notes to verse 20.

"Indeed, which bull among sages is the creator of this great poem?" kartā kāvyasya mahataḥ ko vāsau munipuṅgavaḥ: Ñ2,V2,3,D1–4,9–11,T1,2,G3,M3,5–7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read kva cāsau munipuṅgavaḥ for ko vāsau munipuṅgavaḥ, lending the line the sense "And where is the bull among sages?"

19. "the two young sages" munidārakau: See notes to verse 9 above.

"your . . . has been revealed" tubhyam . . . saṃpradarśitam: Literally, "[it] was caused to be shown to you." We follow Ct, who glosses the genitive tava, "your," for the dative tubhyam, "to you," thus understanding, "it is the life story of you, [i.e., Rāma]." Cr understands, "[which] has been sent into your presence (tvatsamīpe preṣitam ity arthaḥ)." Gita

Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 915), alone among the translators consulted, takes the dative at its face value, translating, "he has revealed . . . to you."

"is present at the sacrifice" saṃprāpto yajñasaṃnidhim: Literally, "[he] has reached or arrived at the vicinity of the sacrifice." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (except Cm) read instead the synonymous saṃprāpto yajñasaṃvidham. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr (quoting Ct) note that the anusvāra in the term -saṃvidham [normally savidha, "proximity,"] is irregular and that the phrase means that the sage has arrived at the area near the sacrificial session. That is to say, he is right there. (yajñasaṃvidham. anusvāra ārṣaḥ. yajñasadaḥ savidhadeśaṃ saṃprāptaḥ. tatra tiṣṭhatīti bhāvaḥ—so Ct.)

Following verse 19, D6,7,10,11,S insert, while Ñ2,B1,2 continue following 1327*, V2,B4 insert following verse 20, and B3 inserts following 20ab, a passage of two lines [1328*]: "And it was composed by the Bhārgava ascetic[1] in twenty-four thousand verses and with one hundred ancillary tales[2] (saṃnibaddhaṃ hi ślokānāṃ caturviṃśat sahasrakam / upākhyānaśataṃ caiva bhārgaveṇa tapasvinā //)."

[1] "by the Bhārgava ascetic" bhārgaveṇa tapasvinā: The commentators are concerned as to whether this is a reference to Vālmīki as a member of the Bhārgava lineage or whether it is a metaphor. Ck and Ct note that Bhārgava was a great seer and that Vālmīki may be called Bhārgava because he is that sage's equal in the creation of poetry. Or, Ct suggests, Vālmīki is a Bhārgava himself because of his being a descendant of Pracetas. This is so because Bhṛgu is a son of Varuṇa [who is also called Pracetas]. Ct concludes by saying that some other scholars argue that Vālmīki is a Bhārgava because he is Bhṛgu's brother. (bhārgavaḥ kaviḥ. kāvyanirmāṇe tattulyenety arthaḥ. yadvā prācetasatvenāsyāpi bhārgavatvam. bhṛgor varuṇaputratvāt. bhṛgor bhrātā bhārgava ity artha ity anye.) Cg notes that by the term Bhārgava is meant someone belonging to Bhṛgu's lineage. He further notes that he [Cg] has demonstrated that there is no contradiction between Vālmīki's being a Bhārgava and being called Prācetasa in his commentary to Bālakāṇḍa 1.1. (bhārgaveṇa bhṛguvaṃśyena. vālmīker eva bhārgavatvaṃ prācetasatvaṃ cāviruddham iti darśitaṃ tapaḥsvādhyayaniratam iti ślokavyākhyāne.) Cr contents himself with simply glossing, "by Vālmīki (vālmīkinā)." For a discussion on Vālmīki's status as a Bhārgava, see R. Goldman 1976 and 2016 and S. Goldman 2015a. See also notes to 7.84.19.

[2] "with one hundred ancillary tales" upākhyānaśatam: Ck, Cg, and Ct comment that this refers to those tales the final one of which is the story of Ila/Ilā (7.78–7.81) (ilopakhyānāntam).

20. "lord of kings" rājendra: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vai rājan, "indeed, your majesty."

"it is based upon your entire life" pratiṣṭhā jīvitaṃ yāvat: Literally, "the basis is the life as long as [it is]." This somewhat elliptical comment is intended as a response to Rāma's question in verse 18 above as to the subject matter of the Rāmāyaṇa. Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand the sequence of words to be pratiṣṭhā ājīvitam, that is, "the basis is as long as life." They all agree that the reference is to the life of Rāma as the protagonist of the poem (yāvat kāvyanāyakasya jīvitaṃ tāvat—so Ck and Cg).

"your majesty, including the good and the bad" rājañ śubhāśubham: Ct, the only commentator consulted to clarify the compound śubhāśubham, "the good and the bad," explains as follows: "The basis, that is, the foundation, is the totality of the actions, good and bad, during the entire life of you, the protagonist of the poem (kāvyanāyakasya tava jīvitaṃ yāvac chubhāśubhaṃ karma tasya sarvasyātra pratiṣṭhā nibandhanaṃ vartata ity arthaḥ)." Ck and Cg understand similarly but omit the word karma, "action[s]." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, and Cr read instead rājan sarvasya vartate, which then must construe with 1331* [see below]. Despite the fact that this variant appears in GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP with no variant indicated either by the commentators themselves or by the editors, the southern commentators, with the exception of Cr, read with the critical edition. Among the translators consulted, all except Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 603) and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 915) translate with the critical reading. See notes to 1331* below.

Following 20ab, D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1330*]: "Six kāṇḍas, together with the Uttara, were composed by the great one[1] (kāṇḍāni ṣaṭ kṛtānīha sottarāṇi mahātmanā /)."

[1] "Six kāṇḍas, together with the Uttara, were composed by the great one." kāṇḍāni ṣaṭ kṛtānīha sottarāṇi mahātmanā: This line and the one that precedes it, 20ab, have provoked a lively discussion on the part of the commentators as to the correct figures for the length of the Rāmāyaṇa and the number of its chapters. Ck and Cg claim that the original intention [of the poet] was that there would be six kāṇḍas consisting of five hundred sargas, but that the word ca, "and," [of 20ab] [means] that we have to add the number of sargas in the Uttarakāṇḍa (pañcasargaśatānīti ṣaṭkāṇḍābhiprāyeṇa. cakārād uttarakāṇḍasargasaṃkhyāsamuccayaḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly). Ct understands, "There were six kāṇḍas composed in this work in addition to the Uttara. The number of its sargas was five hundred, but a greater number than that comes about in some manuscripts because of the error of scribes in dividing sargas here and there into two. Nevertheless, there still [should be] five hundred sargas and six kāṇḍas." Ct concludes by quoting Ck or Cg, without naming them, "and (ca) indicates the number of sargas in the Uttarakāṇḍa." (yāni sottarāṇi ṣaṭkāṇḍānīha kṛtāni tatsargasaṃkhyāpañcaśatānīty upalabhyamānasargasaṃkhyādhikyam. tu keṣāṃcid ekaikasya dvisargatvakaraṇena lekhakapramādāt pañcasargaśatānīti ṣaṭkāṇḍasaṃkhyā. cakārād uttarakāṇḍasargasaṃkhyāsamuccaya iti kaścid.) Cr elaborately parses the term sottarāṇi to come up with an argument that the line can be read to mean that the kāṇḍa [i.e., the Uttarakāṇḍa] adds one hundred and ten sargas to the poem or that one can simply take the term in its more standard sense as a bahuvrīhi qualifying the compound ṣaṭkāṇḍāni, "six kāṇḍas." (iha rāmāyaṇa ādiprabhṛti-ṣaṭkāṇḍāni kṛtāni tatra pañcasargaśatāni kṛtāni sottarāṇi daśādhikaśatasargaviśiṣṭottaraṃ ca kṛtāni . . . sottarāṇīty asya bahuvrīhinā ṣaṭkāṇḍānīty asya viśeṣaṇatvaṃ vā.) The GPP edition of the Vālmīki Rāmāyaṇa contains 534 sargas in the first six books and 645 sargas including the Uttarakāṇḍa (Bālakāṇḍa—77; Ayodhyākāṇḍa—119; Araṇyakāṇḍa—75; Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa—67; Sundarakāṇḍa—68; Yuddhakāṇḍa—128; Uttarakāṇḍa—111). These totals are within the range of error posited by Ct. The critical edition comes even closer. It has 506 sargas for the first six kāṇḍas and a total of 606 sargas when including the Uttarakāṇḍa (Bālakāṇḍa—76; Ayodhyākāṇḍa—111; Araṇyakāṇḍa 71; Kiṣkindhākāṇḍa—66; Sundarakāṇḍa—66; Yuddhakāṇḍa—116; Uttarakāṇḍa—100).

Following 1330*, D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T,G1,2,M2,3 (following 20),4–10 insert after 20ab, a passage of one line [1331*]: "[They, the kāṇḍas,] were composed by the seer, our guru, [and they are] your life history[1] (kṛtāni guruṇāsmākam ṛṣiṇā caritaṃ tava /)."

[1] "your life history" caritaṃ tava: Cr reads this with his variant of 20cd, pratiṣṭhā jīvitaṃ yāvat tāvat sarvasya vartate, to mean: "The story of your life, that was composed by our guru. Its longevity will last as long as the life of the whole world. The words 'that is how long' should be added. (asmākaṃ guruṇā yat tava caritaṃ kṛtaṃ tasya pratiṣṭhā yāvat sarvaṃ lokasya jīvitaṃ vartate tāvad astīti śeṣaḥ.)" This interpretation is consonant with Cr's interpretation of verse 18 (see notes to verse 18 above). See, too, notes to verse 20 above. Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 603) renders, "your history, O King: the subject of it is the whole story of your life, beginning with your birth," while Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 915) offers, "keeping in mind your deeds, which will continue till all beings live."

21. "when you are at leisure" kṣaṇībhūtaḥ: Although all printed editions printed the phrase as a single word, as if it were an example of the cvipratyayaḥ, we prefer to read it as two separate words, kṣaṇī bhūtaḥ, "being one who possesses a moment of leisure." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the term kṣaṇa in its sense of sukha, "happiness," and gloss, "being pleased or happy (sukhībhūtaḥ)," while Cr glosses kṣaṇa as utsava in its sense of "gladness or joy," understanding, "one by whom joy is obtained (labdhotsavaḥ)."

22. "And . . . having taken leave of Rāghava" cānujñāpya rāghavam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP and NSP read rāghavau, "the two Rāghavas," for rāghavam, "Rāghava." This variant (rāghavau) is somewhat ambiguous, as it can be read as either a nominative or an accusative. In the former case, it would refer, as Cr believes, to Lava and Kuśa (rāghavau kuśalavau). More probably, it refers to the boys taking their leave of Rāma and Bharata. Recall that Rāma had Bharata offer them gold at verses 12–13 above.

"their dwelling" vāsam: Literally, "the dwelling." D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous sthānam, "place or residence."

"where the bull among sages waited" yatrāsau munipuṅgavaḥ: Literally, "where the bull among sages was." Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1,3–12,T3,4,M3,6, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read yatrāste for yatrāsau, lending the pāda the sense "where the bull among sages was staying."

23. Following verse 23, Ś,Ñ1,V1,3,D1–5,7–12,T3,4, and Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1334*]: "And thus he heard that poem[1] as it was sung by the two bards.[2] It was replete with rhythm and tempo, divided into sargas, endowed with the sound of sweet notes,[3] and replete with the harmony of the sounds of both stringed and percussion instruments.[4] (śuśrāva tattālalayopapannaṃ sargānvitaṃ susvaraśabdayuktam / tantrīlayavyañjanayogayuktaṃ kuśīlavābhyāṃ parigīyamānam //)"

[1] "that poem" tat: Literally, "that."

[2] "by the two bards" kuśīlavābhyām: See notes to verse 14 above.

[3] "endowed with the sound of sweet notes" susvaraśabdayuktam: KK and VSP read instead sa svaraśabdayuktam, "he [heard] . . . [that which was] endowed with the sound of notes." D10 and Cr read sasvaraśabdayuktam, "endowed with sounds that have notes [of the scale]." On this reading, Cr notes, "endowed with sounds that are characterized by the seven notes of the scale, ṣaḍja, etc. (ṣaḍjādisaptasvaraviśiṣṭaiḥ śabdair yuktam)."

[4] "replete with the harmony of the sounds of both stringed and percussion instruments" tantrīlayavyañjanayogayuktam: Literally, "endowed with the joining or union of the manifestation of stringed and percussion instruments." See verses 2–3 and notes above. See, too, 1.4.7; 7.84.14; and notes.

The meter is upajāti.

Sarga 86

1. "kings" rājabhiḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the synonymous pārthivaiḥ.

"supremely wonderful" paramādbhutam: Cv glosses, "not experienced previously (pūrvānanubhūtam)." B4,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (except Cv) read instead paramaṃ śubham, "superb [and] beautiful."

"the . . . singing" gītam: Cs remarks, "that song as a whole and in its parts (tad gītaṃ samastaṃ vyastaṃ ca)."

"for many days" bahūny ahāny eva: Given the information earlier at 7.84.9, where it says that Lava and Kuśa are to sing twenty sargas per day (and do so at 7.85.11), and 7.85.20, where the extent of the work is said to be five hundred sargas, Rāma appears to have listened to the poem for twenty-five days. See 7.84.9; 7.85.11,20; and notes.

2–3. The critical text of verses 2–3 appears to be elliptical, as it contains no mention of the persons to whom Rāma directs his instructions in verse 3. Various manuscript traditions supply auditors; see 1341* below.

"During the singing . . . having recognized the two bards as Sītā's sons" tasmin gīte tu vijñāya sītāputrau kuśīlavau: Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that Rāma has learned that the two boys are Sītā's sons only from the singing and that no one had informed him of this previously. (gīte tu gīta eva. na tu tataḥ pūrvaṃ kasyacin mukhād ity arthaḥ.) Ct explains further that Rāma has learned that the two bards are Sītā's sons through hearing the poem, which reveals the episode in which Sītā gives birth. (tasmin gīte tasminn eva prabandhe. sītāprasavavṛttāntapratipādakakāvyaśravaṇena kuśīlavau sītāputrāv iti jñātvā.) Cr is less specific, noting only that Rāma recognized the boys during the time of the singing (gīte gānasamaye kuśīlavau sītāputrau vijñāya). Cs has a somewhat different understanding, arguing that Rāma comes to this recognition upon hearing the words [of the text] to the effect that "Sītā gave birth to two sons," and upon seeing the glances of the assembled people. He further notes that the meaning is that the idea occurs spontaneously to Rāma. (sītāsūtaitau sutāv iti vijñāya lokalocanam apekṣya jñātvā. iyam evopajñā rāmasyeti bhāvaḥ.) Cs's quote is probably a paraphrase of 7.58.1. On the term kuśīlavau, see 7.58.4 and notes and 1.4.3 and notes.

"into the presence" antikam: Literally, "to the presence." D7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M5, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press, and Ck, Cm, Ct, and Cs (as variant) read instead the locative, antike, "into the presence." Cs comments that if one takes the variant reading antike, then the syntax should be: "Go and speak my words in the presence of the blessed one" (antika iti pāṭhe gacchadhvaṃ bhagavato 'ntike madvaco brūtety anvayaḥ).

Following verse 2, D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1341*]: "Having summoned messengers who were, through their own intellect, of virtuous conduct,[1] [he said these words] (dūtāñ śubhasamācārān āhūyātmamanīṣayā /)."

[1] "Having summoned messengers who were, through their own intellect, of virtuous conduct" dūtāñ śubhasamācarān āhūyātmamanīṣayā /: Cr understands that the messengers are characterized by their own pure thoughts and are therefore people whose conduct is pure (ātmamanīṣayā svakīyaśuddhabuddhyā viśiṣṭān ata eva śuddhaḥ samācāro yeṣāṃ tān dūtān). Cs notes that by the phrase "of pure conduct" [the poet] suggests the suitability of the messengers to approach the vicinity of the great ascetic. He then understands the term ātmamanīṣayā, "through their own intellect," to refer to the self-conception of the messengers. The real meaning of this, Cs concludes, is that the messengers are at the command of others. (śuddhasamācārān dūtān. etena mahātapasvisamīpasamāpatanayogyatāṃ sūcayati. ātmamanīṣayā svadhiyā. aparapreraṇayeti bhāvaḥ.)

4. "If Sītā be of untainted conduct or if she has expiated her sin" yadi śuddhasamācārā yadi vā vītakalmaṣā: Literally, "If she is one whose conduct is pure or if she is one from whom sin has departed." As noted by Ct, Cr, and Cs, we must supply the name Sītā. Ct explains the two compounds: "If she is one on whose part a transgression never arose, or if she is one whose transgression has been nullified through residence in a penitential grove (anutpannadoṣā yadi veti. tapovanavāsena vinaṣṭadoṣā vety arthaḥ)." Cr, who, as elsewhere, denies the possibility of even any suspicion of wrongdoing on the part of Sītā, understands, "If Sītā, who is eternally exempt, that is, free from sin, has returned, then it is in order to carry out virtuous conduct, that is to say, for the performance of virtuous behavior (vītaṃ nityaṃ nivṛttaṃ kalmaṣaṃ yasyāḥ sā sītā yady āgateti śeṣas tadā śuddha[sa]mācārāya suddhasamācāraṃ pravartayituṃ sadvyavahārapravṛttyartham ity arthaḥ)." Cs takes the first term, like Ct, to indicate that Sītā may have been virtuous in her conduct from the beginning [lit., "from before"]. The second compound he takes, again like Ct, to mean "freed from sin through asceticism, specifying that she might be one whose sin that had come from living in the house of another man is now gone. (yadi śuddhasamācārā sītā prāg eva. athavā vītakalmaṣā tapasā. parasadananivāsāgatagatapātakā vā.)"

"let her . . . demonstrate her purity here" karotv ihātmanaḥ śuddhim: Literally, "let [her] make purification of herself here." Cs understands as his first alternative, with which we agree, that the term śuddhim, "purity or purification," refers to the public demonstration of her innocence. He offers, however, a unique second alternative in which he understands Rāma to be asking for Sītā to purify his mind in the sense of making it free from his uncertainty [concerning her innocence]. (ātmanaḥ śuddhiṃ niṣkalmaṣatvaprathāṃ karotu. ātmano mama manasaḥ śuddhim aḍolayamānatāṃ karotu iti vā.) Cr understands the purification of Sītā to be a reference to the ritual purification of the chief queen and the other wives of a king who performs the aśvamedha in accordance with Śatapathabrāhmaṇa 13.5.2.9–10, where the priests recite ṚV 4.39.6 (= Vājasaneyasaṃhitā 23.32), one of the Dadhikrāvan hymns, to purify the queens of the taint of the obscene and impure words that they are required to utter as part of the ritual. He says: "This very day let her perform the purification here, that is to say, in the sacrificial enclosure, by herself, that is, on her own. The meaning is 'Let her come to purification (i.e., be purified) [in that aśvamedha sacrifice].' [The word] yadi [here means] in which [the aśvamedha sacrifice] ordained by Prajāpati there is [the rite of] the purification of the wives. All this is a qualification of the sacrifice, but one should not imagine that [the words need] be supplied here. That is the intention. (divā dinam evātmanā svasaṃcāreṇeha yāgasthale śuddhiṃ karotv āgacchatv ity arthaḥ. yadi tu yadīty asya yasya prajāpatinirmitasya dāraśodhanaṃ yasmin sa tasminn iti yāgaviśeṣaṇaṃ tadā nādhyāhārakalpaneti dik.)"

"with the permission of the great sage" anumānya mahāmunim: Literally, "having asked the great sage permission." Cs, of course, identifies the sage here as Vālmīki and glosses the gerund as "having made the great seer one who approved (mahāmuniṃ vālmīkim anumānya saṃmataṃ kṛtvā)." Ct glosses, "having taken his permission (tadanumatiṃ gṛhītvety arthaḥ)." Cr, similarly, understands, "having taken his agreement (tatsaṃmatiṃ gṛhītvā)." Ck and Cg understand similarly.

5. "Then, after having determined the will of the sage and the intentions of Sītā, who may be eager to give some proof of her innocence, report to me at once." chandaṃ munes tu vijñāya sītāyāś ca manogatam / pratyayaṃ dātukāmāyās tataḥ śaṃsata me laghu //: Literally, "But having ascertained the will of the sage and the thought of Sītā, who desires to give proof, you must report to me quickly." Ñ2,V2,B2,4,D7,10,11,T3,4,G1,2,M5, 8–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read ca, "and," for tu, "but." Only Cr among the commentators devotes any thought or energy to this interesting, if elliptical, verse. He reads the verse rather differently from the other commentators and from us. He understands pratyaya, which we and all translators consulted take to mean "proof" or "demonstration," in its sense of "belief" or "faith," glossing, "The faith of the people with regard to her own residence, which had that place (i.e., Laṅkā) as its locus." He further takes the infinitive form dātu- [dātum], which we and others understand to derive from the root √dā, "to give," to be derived from the third gaṇa root √do, "to cut off." He thus does not see Sītā as being eager to give proof of her innocence but rather eager to dispel the people's belief concerning her residence in Laṅkā. This, Cr continues, means that she is eager to go to the manifest or earthly Sāketa, i.e., Ayodhyā (prakaṭasāketam). Cr states further that by instructing his messengers to ascertain both the inner thoughts (manogatam) and the will, that is, the intention, of Sītā and Vālmīki and then report quickly to him, Rāma is suggesting that Sītā has previously intimated her intentions. Cr concludes by insisting firmly that Sītā simply wishes to dispel a [false] belief about her and that it is improper, indeed impossible, to see this as a description of anything other than that. (pratyayam etallokādikaraṇakasvasthitiviṣayakajanaviśvāsaṃ dātuṃ chettuṃ kāmo 'bhilāṣo yasyāḥ sā tasyāḥ prakaṭasāketaṃ jigamiṣor ity arthaḥ. sītāyā muneś ca manogataṃ chandam abhiprāyaṃ vijñāya laghu śīghraṃ yathā bhavati tathā me śaṃsataitena sītayā svābhiprāyaḥ pūrvaṃ nivedita iti sūcitaṃ pratyayaṃ dātukāmāyā ity asyārthāntaravarṇanaṃ tu na yuktam asambhavād iti dik.) See notes to verses 6 and 13 below. See also notes to 7.88*.12 and note 4 to verse 11*, following 7.88*.13. Note his treatment of the verb √dā at notes to 7.87.15.

6. "let . . . take a solemn oath" śapatham . . . karotu: Ct explains that even though Sītā's proof of innocence was previously demonstrated in Laṅkā, still now, for the sake of Rāma's purification, that is, for the sake of the removal of the defamation through a wiping away of current malicious gossip that has arisen, she, even though innocent, must once again take an oath before all the people. The defamation of Rāma, according Ct, is that he lusts after feminine beauty. (yady api sītāśuddhir laṅkāyāṃ jñātapūrvā tathāpīdānīṃ prāptāpavādamārjanena sarvalokapūrato mamaiva strīsaundāryalubdha iti kalaṅkaśodhanārthaṃ śuddhyāpi tayā punaḥ śapathaḥ kārya ity āha śvaḥ prabhāta iti.) Cs expresses the same idea somewhat more elaborately. He says, "Even though there is no doubt [concerning Sītā's purity] because of what was said by the disembodied voice in the presence of four-faced Brahmā, etc., to the effect that she was without even the slightest hint of culpability, still, in order to shut the mouths of those malicious people who tell a different story and to wipe away the defamation concerning his [Rāma's] own lusting after her [Sītā's] beauty, she must once again take an oath. (yady apy avadyagandhavidhureti caturānanādipūrato 'śarīragirodīritatvān na saṃśayaḥ. tathāpy anyathā kathakadurjanānanabandhārthaṃ svasya tatsaundāryalubdhatākalaṅkāpakarṣaṇārthaṃ ca punaḥ śapathaḥ kartavya ity āha.)" Cs's recollection of what transpired at Lāṅkā seems oddly skewed. In the Yuddhakāṇḍa there is no mention of any disembodied voice testifying to Sītā's fidelity; instead it is Agni himself, embodied as the god of fire, who carries Sītā from the burning pyre and testifies to her virtue (6.106.4–9 and notes). Compare Mahābhārata 3.275.25ff, where Sītā's chastity is first proclaimed by a voice in the sky, which is quickly identified as that of Vāyu, the wind god. See UttaRāC 1.44, where Rāma notes that the people do not put any faith in Sītā's purification by fire since that took place far away in Laṅkā. Compare, too, PadmaP (ĀnSS) 4.55.2 and (ĀnSS) 6.271.20–22. See, too, RaghuVa 15.72, where the people of Ayodhyā put no faith in Sītā's purity, even though it was proven through the fire ordeal in Laṅkā. See also S. Goldman 2004. Cr, as above, has a radically different understanding of this verse. Basically he will not countenance any hint of impropriety on the part of either Sītā or Rāma. He therefore sees no propriety in mentioning such things as purity and oaths. In order to make his case, he parses the term śapatha, "oath," as a compound śa- + patha, that is, "the path to the highest beatitude [śam]." He explains the verse as follows: " 'For the sake of my purification' means 'for the sake of pleasing me.' When saying, 'in the midst of the assembly,' we must add the phrase 'having come into.' Maithilī must make a śapatha, that is to say, she must take a path [patha], i.e., a journey, to the highest beatitude [śam], that is, to the heavenly [lit., 'unmanifest'] Sāketa, which has the form of the supreme auspiciousness, which is the attainment of 'highest beatitude' (śa+āpa-). By this is suggested his [Rāma's] own desire to go there as well. (mama śodhanārthaṃ prasādārtham ity arthaḥ. pariṣanmadhya āgatyeti śeṣaḥ. maithilī śapathaṃ śāpaparamamaṅgalarūpā-prakaṭasāketāya pathaṃ gamanaṃ karotu. etena svasyāpi jigamiṣā sūcitā.)" See notes to verse 5 above and 13 below. See also Introduction, "Controversial Episodes," pp. 95–96. See, too, notes to 7.42.16 and 7.43.1.

7. "to the sacrificial enclosure" vāṭam: Literally, "to the enclosure." D10 and 11 and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the awkward bāḍham, "Very well!" or "assuredly." No commentator remarks on this reading. Most translators who read this variant take the term in its adverbial sense of "certainly" or "by all means." Dutt (1894, p. 1907) offers, "speedily," and Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 624) renders, "tout droit." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 614) with "straightway" and Benoît (1999, p. 1411) with "aussitôt." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 604) translates, "with alacrity." Only Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 916) appears to take the term elliptically in its common usage as an expression of assent, rendering, "nodding ascent [sic]."

"where the bull among sages was staying" yatrāste munipuṃgavaḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read yatra vai for yatrāste, lending the pāda the sense "where indeed the bull among sages [was]."

8. "Prostrating themselves" praṇamya: Literally, "having bowed down or made obeisance."

"the great and radiant sage" mahātmānaṃ jvalantam: Literally, "the great [one], who was blazing."

"they repeated" ūcuḥ: Literally, "they said."

"gentle and sweet" mṛdūni madhurāṇi ca: Only Ct glosses these adjectives. He takes the first as "not harsh" and the second as "having sweet syllables." (mṛdūny aparuṣāṇi. madhurāṇi madhurākṣarāṇi.)

9. "speech" tad bhāṣitam: Literally, "that speech or that which was spoken." KK and VSP read instead the synonymous tad vyāhṛtam.

10. "Bless you all." bhadraṃ vaḥ: Literally, "Bless you [plural]." The phrase is relatively common in the epics. See note to 6.6.4. See also Tubb 2006.

"in such a way that Rāghava is satisfied" yathā tuṣyati rāghavaḥ: V2,B2,D6,7,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vadati, "he says," for tuṣyati, "he is satisfied," lending the pāda the sense "[Sītā will do] as Rāghava says."

11. "those . . . messengers of Rāma" rāmadūtāḥ: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead rājadūtāḥ, "the messengers of the king."

"immensely powerful" mahaujasaḥ: M3 and KK and VSP read instead the accusative singular mahaujasam, which must then construe with rāghavam in pāda c.

"all repeated" sarve . . . babhāṣire: Literally, "all spoke." D3,5,10,11,G2,M10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read sarvam for sarve, which then modifies munivākyam in pāda d, lending that pāda the sense "they spoke (i.e., repeated) the entire speech of the sage." M3 and KK and VSP read kṣipram, "quickly or immediately," for sarve, "all."

12. "of the great sage" mahātmanaḥ: Literally, "of the great [one]."

"he addressed . . . saying" abhyabhāṣata: Literally, "he spoke."

13. "and anyone else who so desires" yaś caivānyo 'bhikāṅkṣate: Literally, "and another who wishes or desires." The syllable -bhi- in [a]bhikāṅkṣate is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. D10,11,T2,G,M9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read [a]pi for [a]bhi, lending the phrase an indefinite sense "whoever else desires." Ck, Cg, and Ct all understand the reference to be to those who have cast aspersions on Sītā's chastity. Ct explains: " 'Whatever other person' refers to anyone who has ascribed faults to Sītā. The meaning is 'Let whatever person who desires an oath witness it.' (yaś cānyo 'pi sītāyāṃ doṣāropakartā yo 'pi śapatham ākāṅkṣate so 'pi paśyatv ity arthaḥ.)" Ck and

Cg express this idea more strongly. They gloss the phrase "and whatever other person" as "whatever wicked, vulgar person who prattles wickedly, he, too, that is the meaning." (yaś caivānyo 'pīti. yaś ca pāpī pāpajalpaḥ [-jalpakaḥ—so Ck] prākṛtaḥ so 'pīty arthaḥ.) As before (see notes to verses 5 and 6 above), Cr refuses to acknowledge the idea that anyone could doubt Sītā's purity or that she would be required to swear to it. He glosses, "Let the holy ones, Vasiṣṭha, and so on, together with their disciples, the lords of men, and anyone else who wishes, let them all witness Sītā's śapatha, that is to say, the journey to Sāketa of which Sītā is the subject (saśiṣyāḥ bhagavanto vasiṣṭhaprabhṛtayo narādhipāś cānyo yaḥ kāṅkṣate so 'pi sītāśapathaṃ sītākartṛkasāketagamanaṃ paśyantu)." See notes to 7.86.5.

14. "there arose . . . a great cry of 'Excellent!' " sādhuvādo mahān abhūt: Literally, "There was a great utterance, 'sādhu!' " The term -vādaḥ, "utterance," is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. As Cs notes, we should understand that there is an implied quotation mark, "iti," setting off the word sādhu (sādhv iti vādaḥ sādhuvādaḥ). Compare 7.87.10.

15. "great" mahātmānaḥ: M3 and KK and VSP read instead the accusative singular mahātmānam, which would then modify rāghavam, lending the phrase the sense "the kings . . . praised great Rāghava."

"Only you . . . and no one else on earth would do such thing" upapannam . . . tvayy eva bhuvi nānyataḥ: Literally, "It is fitting in you alone, not from any other on earth." Cr explains: "Only in you is it fitting, that is to say, proper. We must supply the phrase, 'the bringing back of Sītā.' The adverb anyataḥ, 'from another,' should be read as the locative, 'in another.' (tvayy evopapannaṃ yuktaṃ sītānayanam iti śeṣaḥ. anyato 'nyasmin.)" Cs similarly corrects the adverb to the locative pronoun (nānyato nānyasmin).

16. "he said, 'It shall take place tomorrow.' " śvobhūta iti: Cr fleshes out the elliptical expression, saying, "Tomorrow, that is to say, on the next day, in this fashion Sītā's arrival shall take place. Having made this decision, Rāghava dismissed everyone. (śvobhūta āgāmidivasa evaṃ sītāgamanaṃ bhaviṣyatīti niścayaṃ kṛtvā rāghavaḥ sarvān visarjayāmāsa.)"

Following verse 16, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ2 continues after 1344*, and V2,B continue after 1343*, a passage of four lines (consisting of four pādas) [1345*]: "Once the magnanimous lion among kings had thus arrived at this decision[1] that the oath should take place on the following day, he dismissed all those great sages and kings (iti saṃpravicārya rājasiṃhaḥ śvo bhūte śapathasya niścayam / visasarja munīn nṛpāṃś ca sarvān sa mahātmā mahato mahānubhāvaḥ //)."

[1] "decision" niścayam: D7 and KK and VSP read instead niścayaṃ vai, adding the extra syllable in an attempt to correct the meter. The text of Cr apparently adds tad in a similar attempt (see footnote number 5 to verse GPP 7.95.17) (niścayaṃ vai iti go [Cg] [pāṭhā]. niścayaṃ tad iti rā [Cr] pā[ṭhā]).

This appears to be a gāthā, or irregular type of meter.

Sarga 87

1. "went to the sacrificial enclosure" yajñavāṭagataḥ: Ś1,Ñ2,V2,3,B,D5,6,9–11,T1,2, M3,5,8,9, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead yajñavāṭaṃ gataḥ, "[he] went to the sacrificial enclosure."

"summoned" śabdāpayati: Literally, "he calls or addresses." We follow Cg, Ct, and Cr, who gloss, "he summoned or invited" (āhvayati sma—so Cg; Ct and Cr similarly)."

2–5. "of prolonged austerities" dīrghatapāḥ: D7,10,11,M6,8, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead dīrghatamāḥ, the name of another well-known sage, Dīrghatamas.

"Agastya" agastyo 'tha: Literally, "and Agastya." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead pulastyo 'pi, "and Pulastya."

"Bhārgava" bhārgavaḥ: It is not clear which member of this illustrious gotra is intended here. The commentators are silent.

"of great austerities" mahātapāḥ: Ñ2,V2,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G2,3,M1,3–5,7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead mahāyaśāḥ, "greatly illustrious."

"the Bhārgava Cyavana" bhārgavaś cyavanaś caiva: V2,D6,7,10,11,G1,M2,4,5,7,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead gargaś ca cyavanaś caiva, "and Garga and Cyavana as well."

"and Agni's son Suprabha" agniputraś ca suprabhaḥ: The reference or references are somewhat obscure. The two terms could refer to a single person or to two individual sages, and either term could be a modifier of the other. Translators treat the sequence variously. Gorresio (1870, p. 282), with whom we agree, renders, "e Suprabha figlio d'Agni (il fuoco)." Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 625) renders, "l'illustre Agniputra." In this he is followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 615), who translates, "the illustrious Agniputra," and Benoît (1999, p. 1412), who understands, "l'étincelant Agniputra." Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 605) and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 917) are ambiguous. The former offers, "Suprabha, the son of Agni (the Fire-god)," and the latter, "the son of Agni, the lustrous one." Dutt (1894, p. 1908) apparently reading "va" for "ca" renders, "Agni's son Vasuprava [sic]."

"many . . . sages" munayo bahavaḥ: Ñ2,V2,B,D7,10,11,T,G2,M1,3,5–7,10, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead bahavo munayaḥ by transposition.

"as well as . . . those kings, tigers among men" rājānaś ca naravyāghrāḥ: D7,10,11,T3,4,M6,9 (T3,4,M6,9 first time), and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kautūhalasamāviṣṭāḥ, "who were seized by curiosity," i.e., filled with eager anticipation.

Following verse 4, D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while T3,4 continue after 1348*, a passage of one line [1349*]: "and Nārada, Parvata, and greatly illustrious Gautama (nāradaḥ parvataś caiva gautamaś ca mahāyaśāḥ)."

Following 1349*, GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, between GPP 7.96.5ab and cd), Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue with a passage of one line [1350*]: "Kātyāyana, Suyajña, and that treasure-store of asceticism Agastya (kātyāyanaḥ suyajñāś ca hy agastyas tapasāṃ nidhiḥ)."

6. "all of those great ones . . . assembled" samājagmur mahātmānaḥ sarva eva: D6,7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarva eva samājagmur mahātmanaḥ by transposition.

7. "And kshatriyas, vaiśyas, and śūdras" kṣatriyāś caiva vaiśyāś ca śūdrāś caiva: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead kṣatriyā ye ca śūdrāś ca vaiśyāś caiva, "and those who were kshatriyas, śūdras, and vaiśyas."

"to witness Sītā's oath" sītāśapathavīkṣārtham: Literally, "for the purpose of witnessing Sītā's oath." As before, Cr glosses, "for the purpose of witnessing the journey to the unmanifest Sāketa, of which Sītā is the subject (sītākartrīkāprakaṭasāketagamanadarśanārtham)." See note to 7.86.5.

Following 7ab, D6,7,10,11,T1,3,4,GM1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while M6 inserts following verse 6, a passage of one line [1352*]: "and brahmans of fierce vows who had gone to different lands[1] (nānādeśagatāś caiva brāhmaṇāḥ saṃśitavratāḥ)."

[1] "who had gone to different lands" nānādeśagatāḥ: The idea is that these brahmans had returned from distant lands to attend the aśvamedha. Note that T1,G1,3,M3,5,8 read nānādeśāgatāḥ, "who had come from various lands." Compare 7.82.13 and notes.

Following 1352*, GPP (in brackets, unnumbered, between GPP 7.96.8ab and cd), Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [1353*]: "and others who were devoted to [spiritual] knowledge, devoted to ritual practice, and devoted to yoga (jñānaniṣṭhāḥ karmaniṣṭhā yoganiṣṭhās tathāpare)."

8. "Vālmīki, the foremost of sages" munivaraḥ: Literally, "the foremost of sages."

"they had all assembled . . . and were as motionless as if they had been turned to stone" samāgataṃ sarvam aśmabhūtam ivācalam: Literally, "everyone who had assembled was motionless as if become stone." Several of the commentators and translators take the word acala, which we understand in its adjectival sense of "unmoving," in its common sense as a kenning for "mountain." But this then leads to the rather tautologous sense of "a mountain turned to stone." Cr adds the phrase "the mass of the people (janajātam)" to provide a modificand for the singular sarvam. Cv glosses, "as motionless as if made of stone (aśmakṛtam iva niścalam)." Ct glosses the simile as "as motionless as a mountain" and notes that the figure is used for the sake of demonstrating [the crowd's] eager anticipation (aśmabhūtam ivācalaṃ parvatavan niścalaṃ kautukadarśanārtham).

"in this fashion" tathā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tadā, "then."

"he . . . entered" samupāgamat: Literally, "he approached."

9. "Thinking only of Rāma" kṛtvā rāmaṃ manogatam: Literally, "having made Rāma one who had gone to the heart or mind." Compare the usage of manogatam, "intention," at 7.86.5.

"Sītā followed" sītā sānvagacchat: Literally, "she, Sītā, followed." B1,D6,10,11, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, and Gita Press omit the pronoun sā, "she," reading with hiatus sītā anvagacchat. KK and VSP read instead sītā tv anvagacchat, "and Sītā followed." This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"choked with tears" bāṣpagalā: Literally, "tear-throated." D6,7,10,11,T2,G2,M6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead bāṣpakalā, "inarticulate through tears."

10. "When those assembled saw Sītā coming . . . like Śrī following Brahmā" tāṃ dṛṣṭvā śrīm ivāyāntīṃ brahmāṇam anugāminīm /. . . sītām: Literally, "Having seen her, Sītā, coming like Śrī following Brahmā." The verse is very poorly constructed. The grammatical subject of the gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," is actually "the cry of 'Excellent!' (sādhuvādaḥ)," mentioned in pāda d. We must understand that the intention is that the assembled crowd is the subject. Ck, alone among the commentators, remarks on this reading and thus seeks to explain the mythological allusion in the upamā, since the goddess Śrī is normally associated with Viṣṇu and not, as in this verse, with Brahmā. He alludes to an unnamed upaniṣad according to which Ramā (i.e., Śrī) and Umā are, respectively, the oldest and youngest daughters of the primordial Brahmā. So, for him, the idea is that the sight of Sītā following the venerable sage Vālmīki is like that of the goddess Śrī following her father. (brahmāṇam anuyāntīṃ śrīm iveti. ādibrahmāṇo jyeṣṭhakaniṣṭhaputryau ramome. tathopaniṣattattvaṃ ramāṃbikā . . .) GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tāṃ dṛṣṭvā śrutim āyāntīm, lending the line the sense "Having seen her [Sītā], the veda (śruti), coming, following Brahmā." This reading is not noted in the critical apparatus. The simile is defective in this reading, as it lacks the expected dyotakaśabda iva, "like." Ct and Cr both add this in their glosses. Ct explains: "By means of this simile, the absolute infallibility [lit., 'authoritativeness'] of both Sītā and the vedas is demonstrated through their total absence of faults (anayopamayā sītāyāḥ śruteś ca sakaladoṣarāhityena pramāṇatvaṃ darśitam)." Cr understands that the term śruti here is formed with the zero suffix in the sense of conduct or behavior, thus suggesting that Sītā acts like the vedas (i.e., infallibly). Or, Cr suggests, the term may be used metaphorically (śrutiśabda ācārakvibantaprakṛtikartṛkvibanto lākṣaṇiko vā). KK and VSP read instead dṛṣṭvā śrutim ivāyāntīṃ, thus providing the otherwise missing dyotakaśabda. For another comparison of Sītā to the vedas, see 5.13.36 and S. Goldman 2003.

"there arose a great cry of 'Excellent!' " sādhukāro mahān abhūt: Literally, "there was a great sound of 'sādhu!' " Ś,Ñ,V,B,D,T3,4,M1, and Gorresio, Lahore, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous sādhuvādaḥ, "the utterance 'sādhu!' " for sādhukāraḥ, "the word [lit., 'making (the sound)'] 'sādhu!' " See note to 7.86.14.

11. "a great cheer burst forth" halahalāśabdaḥ . . . ābabhau: Literally, "the sound 'halahalā' appeared." The term is frequently used, as at Ayodhyākāṇḍa 14.23, to describe a celebratory cheer, but it may also describe a cry of lamentation, as at Ayodhyākāṇḍa 35.27, or any loud or confused sound, as at Sundarakāṇḍa 56.54. Here, on the basis of the preceding and following verses, it appears that the spectators, who had been grieving in the absence of Sītā, are now cheering her return. Cr, on the other hand, who reads the variant noted below and is the only commentator to remark on the term, understands that the assembled guests who utter this cry do so because of their extreme grief produced by the sight of the abandoned Sītā (duḥkhajanmano viyuktasītādarśanajanitaduḥkhotpatter viśālena vistāreṇātiśokena cākulitātmanāṃ vyākulacittānāṃ sarveṣām ṛṣiprabhṛtīnāṃ halahalāśabda ābabhau). Only Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 917) is unambiguous regarding the nature of the cry, rendering, "Then the sound of Halahalā (sighs of sorrow) arose there among all those who were agitated by great sorrow arising out of suffering." Benoît (1999, p. 1413) appears to force the language of the verse to read very much like Cr's gloss, translating, "Tous ceux qui souffraient de la douleur de voir la reine plongée dans les malheurs firent entendre une formidable ovation." See, too, 7.32.32 and notes. See also 2.14.23; 2.35.27; 2.75.12; and 5.56.54, where the term is also used.

"who had been overwhelmed with a vast grief born of sorrow" duḥkhajena viśāleṇa śokenākulitātmanām: Literally, "of those whose minds were overwhelmed with a vast grief born of sorrow." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read duḥkhajanmaviśālena for duḥkhajena viśālena, lending the line the sense "of those whose minds were overcome with grief, which was vast because it was produced from sorrow." See comments above. Ct glosses, "whose minds or inner faculties were agitated by grief (śokena . . . kṣubdhāntaḥkaraṇānām)." This seemingly innocuous gloss arouses the ire and derision of Cs, who takes Ct to task for what he regards as the mistaken usage of the participle kṣubdha instead of the form he regards as appropriate, which is the participle with the iṭ āgama, kṣubhita. Cs cites the grammatical literature, specifically Pā 7.2.18 and Siddhāntakaumudī 3058, according to which the term kṣubdha principally refers to a "churning stick" and, by secondary usage, as in the expression kṣubdho rājā, to the condition of being "banished or expelled." Cs rules out both of these undesirable usages in this context and notes that if we were to take kṣubdha in its secondary sense, it would constitute a denigration of the venerable brahmans assembled—as in such expressions as "like a wife," which, by secondary usage, is taken in its sense of "the wife of a śūdra or outcaste"—and thus imply an inversion of the status relationship between them and Rāma. Cs precedes this diatribe with his own gloss, which is quite similar to that intended by Ct. He glosses, "whose minds were wavering or disturbed." (ākulitātmanāṃ calacittānām. ākulitātmanāṃ kṣubdhacittānām [sic] iti nāgojibhaṭṭaḥ. tan na. manthanadaṇḍa eva vācye iḍabhāvo 'nyatra kṣubhita ity ukteḥ. na ca kṣubdho rājetyādivad idam āgamaśāstrasyānityatvād vā kṣubdha iva kṣubdhaḥ patnīva patnī vṛṣalasyetyādivad upacārād upapadyata iti vācyam. te ca prāñco mānanīyā iti teṣām asya ca mahān vyatyāsa iti naivaṃ prayojyam.)

12. "Some cried . . . others . . . still others there cried" kecit tu . . . cāpare / . . . tu tatrānye . . . cābruvan //: Literally, "some . . . and others . . . while others there said."

" 'Excellent, Sītā!' . . . 'Excellent, Rāma!' " sādhu sīteti . . . sādhu rāmeti: Ñ1,V1,3,D1–7,9–11,T,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sādhu rāmeti . . . sādhu sīteti by transposition.

"and" tu: D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G3,M3,6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ca, "and."

"cried 'Excellent! Excellent!' " sādhu sādhv iti cābruvan: V1,2,B,D1,4–7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead prekṣakāḥ saṃpracukruśuḥ, lending the line the sense "[other] spectators cried out together." Cr understands that the various factions of the crowd are respectively praising the ways in which Rāma, Sītā, and the two of them collectively have acted. (kecid dhe rāma tvayā sādhu kṛtam iti kecid dhe sīte tvayā sādhu kṛtam iti cānye prekṣakā ubhau he sītārāmau yuvābhyāṃ sādhu kṛtam iti ca saṃpracukruśuḥ.)

13. "strode into the midst of the mass of people" madhyaṃ janaughānāṃ praviśya: Literally, "having entered the middle of the floods or crowds of people." Ś,Ñ,V,D2,6–12,T3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead madhye janaughasya praviśya, "having entered into the midst of the flood or crowd of people."

"spoke in this fashion" iti hovāca: We read iti in its adverbial sense of "thus or in this fashion."

14. "Here . . . is Sītā" iyam . . . sītā: Literally, "This [is] Sītā."

"of strict vows" suvratā: The term -vratā is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"who practices righteousness" dharmacāriṇī: The term is also used in the sense of "a virtuous wife."

"Even though she had done no wrong, she was abandoned by you" apāpā te parityaktā: Literally, "without sin or wrongdoing, she was abandoned by you." V1,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gītā Press read instead apavādāt parityaktā, "she was abandoned because of a malicious rumor." T1,2,G,1,3,M3, and KK and VSP as well as Cm and Ct read instead the plural apavādaiḥ parityaktā, "because of malicious rumors she was abandoned." Cr, who, as always, will countenance not the slightest imputation of wrongdoing, or even the suspicion of wrongdoing, with regard to Sītā, takes the term apavāda, "malicious talk or rumor," here to mean "out of fear of untimely sexual intercourse, etc., which is condemned in the śāstras (apavādāc chāstraninditāsamayavyavāyādibhīteḥ.)" Cr is referring to his earlier idiosyncratic argument that Rāma sends Sītā away not because he or anyone else suspects her of infidelity but rather to keep himself from having intercourse with her during her pregnancy. See notes to 7.43.1.

15. "proof of her innocence" pratyayam: Literally, "proof or demonstration." See 7.86.5 and notes. See, too, verse 20 and notes below.

"to you of solemn vows, Rāma" tava rāma mahāvrata: Literally, "of you, O Rāma, O one of great vows."

"you who are fearful of the malicious rumors among the people" lokāpavādabhītasya tava: Literally, "of you who are frightened of the malicious rumors of the people." Cr continues his defense of Sītā's reputation. He understands the verse to be saying that Sītā will now, in Rāma's presence, reverse or take back (dāsyate) her decision, arrived at on her own, with regard to remaining here in this world. Cr argues, as in the previous verse, that Rāma is fearful of the condemnation of apavāda, that is to say, the world's condemnation of untimely sexual intercourse, [a condemnation] that is found in the world (loke), that is to say, in the śāstras. (lokāpavādabhītasya loke śāstre yo 'pavādo 'samayavyavāyādinindā tasmād bhītasya tavāgre sītā pratyayaṃ svakartṛkehalokasthitiviṣayakaniścayaṃ dāsyate nivartayiṣyate.) See notes to 7.43.1 and notes to 7.86.5 (note particularly Cr's similar treatment of the verb √dā / √do there). Note that here, as at 7.86.5, Cr understands the verb, here dāsyate, as derived not from the root √dā, "to give," but from √do "to cut," glossing, "she will take back" (dāsyate nivarayiṣyate). See, too, verse 20 and notes below.

"You must permit her to do so." tām anujñātum arhasi: Literally, "You ought to permit her."

16. "And" ca: Ñ1,V1,3,D10,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tu, "and or but."

"here are Jānakī's two sons" imāu . . . jānakīputrau: Literally, "these two are the [two] sons of Jānakī."

"born as twins" ubhau yamajātakau: Literally, "the two born as twins." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr express interest in parsing the compound yamajātakau, no doubt to make it clear to Rāma that Sītā has not been pregnant twice. Cr puts it thus: "The term yamajātakau [means] 'born in the state of being twins,' that is, 'in being a pair,' that is, 'those two whose birth is defined by taking place at a single time.' (yamajātakau yamatvena yugmatvena jātam ekakālāvacchedena janma yayos tāv ubhau.)" The others are similar but not as elaborate.

"These two unassailable boys are your sons as well." sutau tavaiva durdharṣau: Literally, "The two unassailable sons are yours indeed."

17. "I am the tenth son of Pracetas" pracetaso 'haṃ daśamaḥ putraḥ: Ck and Cg both add the term aurasaḥ, meaning "legitimate and biological son." Ct adds the same term but offers as an option the idea that Vālmīki belongs to the tenth generation descended from Pracetas (yadvā pracetaso daśamaḥ saṃtānaparamparayā putro 'patyam).

"I do not recall ever uttering an untrue statement." na smarāmy anṛtaṃ vākyam: Literally, "I do not remember an untrue speech." Cr expands upon the elliptical statement, glossing, "I do not remember any speech of my own that was an untrue speech. The meaning is 'I have never uttered a falsehood.' (anṛtaṃ vākyaṃ svavacanaṃ naiva smarāmi. anṛtaṃ kadācin noktam ity arthaḥ.)" Ck, Cg, and Ct explain that Vālmīki is saying that he has never even thought of a falsehood, let alone uttered one (anṛtaṃ vākyam ahaṃ manasā na smarāmi. kathanaṃ tu dūrata eveti bhāvaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly). Ct, reading the variant imau (see below), adds that because of this, Rāma must understand that Vālmīki's statement that the two boys are his (Rāma's) sons is perfectly true (ata imau tava putrakāv iti madvākyaṃ satyam eva jānīhīti śeṣaḥ). Ct and Cr understand that it is because Vālmīki is a descendant of the seer Pracetas that he cannot recall, i.e., never uttered, a falsehood (ahaṃ pracetaso . . . putro 'to 'nṛtaṃ vākyaṃ svavacanaṃ naiva smarāmi—so Cr; Ct similarly).

"Thus, these two" tathemau: D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead imau tu, "and these two."

18. "Just as Maithilī is innocent, so may I enjoy their fruits." tasyāḥ phalam upāśnīyām apāpā maithilī yathā: KK (= 7.96.21cd) and VSP (= 7.96.21cd) read yadi maithilī, "if Maithilī," for maithilī yathā, "as Maithilī." D10,11, and GPP (= 7.96.20cd), NSP (= 7.96.21cd), and Gita Press (= 7.96.21cd) read instead tasyāhaṃ phalam aśnāmi apāpā maithilī yadi, "I will enjoy the fruit of that if Maithilī is innocent," which then construes with 1359* (see below). Note the subtle, but crucial, semantic shift between the critical edition's reading of yathā, "just as," which more forcefully asserts Sītā's innocence as compared to the variant's yadi, "if," which allows for the possibility of its being called into question.

Following 18ab, V2,D7,10,11, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP (= GPP, NSP, Gita Press 7.96.19cd; = KK, VSP 7.96.20cd) insert, while Ś,Ñ,V1,3,B1,3,4,D1–5,8,9,12,T3,4 substitute for 18cd (Ñ1,V1,B4,D2–4,12 read twice), a passage of one line

[1358*]: "May I not enjoy the fruit thereof if Maithilī is guilty (nopāśnīyāṃ phalaṃ tasyā duṣṭeyaṃ yadi maithilī)."

Following 1358*, Ñ1,V1,2,B1,3,4,D2–4,7,10–12,T3,4 (Ñ1,V1,B4,D2–4,12 after first occurrence), and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while Ñ2,V2,B2 insert after 18, D6 inserts after 18ab, T1,2,G,M2–7,9,10 insert after 18cd first occurrence, and M1 inserts after verse 19, a passage of one line [1359*]: "Never before [have I committed] an offense in thought, act, or speech (manasā karmaṇā vācā bhūtapūrvaṃ na kilbiṣam)."

The commentators, of course, read the passage as a unit: "I have performed austerities for many thousands of years.[18cd] May I not enjoy the fruit thereof if Maithilī is guilty. [1358*] Never before [have I committed] an offense in thought, act, or speech.[1359*] If Maithilī is innocent, may I enjoy the fruits of that [the fact that I have not committed an offense].[18cd, with variants]"

Ct introduces the passage as Vālmīki's oath regarding Sītā's conduct or good character (atha sītācaritraṃ prati muninā śapathakaraṇaṃ bahuvarṣeti). Cr understands Vālmīki to be showing the extraordinary degree of his compassion for Sītā (sītāyā dāyalutvātiśayaṃ bodhayitum āha bahv iti). The idea here is that the sage has such confidence in Sītā's virtue that he is willing to stake the entire fruits of his millennia-long asceticism on it. Cv and Cg gloss their reading of the critical edition's 18cd as "just as the enjoyment of the fruits of asceticism is certain, so is it that Sītā is innocent. (yathā tapasaḥ phalabhogo niścitas tatheyam apāpety arthaḥ.) Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr, commenting on 1359* and their variant of 18cd, understand the genitive neuter pronoun tasya to stand for Vālmīki's never having committed an offence (tasya kilbiṣānācaraṇasyety arthaḥ—Ck and Cg; Ct and Cr similarly). Ct notes that Vālmīki's vow here suggests that even the forbidden renunciation of the fruits [of asceticism] is righteous when it is accompanied by a solemn vow (anena saṃkalpapūrvaniṣiddhatyāgo 'pi dhārmāyeti sūcitam).

19. This verse is problematic and obscure, even by the standards of the Uttarakāṇḍa.

"When . . . I had scrutinized Sītā . . . I realized, 'She is blameless' " vicintya sītāṃ śuddheti: Literally, "having considered Sītā, 'She is blameless.' " D6,7,10,11,G3,M7, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read the nominative sītā for the accusative sītām, lending the phrase the sense "having perceived, 'Sītā is blameless or innocent.' "

"at the rapids in the wilderness" vananirjhare: It will be recalled that Lakṣmaṇa had abandoned Sītā on the southern bank of the Ganges at 7.46.3, and it is there that Vālmīki first encounters her at 7.48.6. There is no mention there of cascades or rapids but only of the bank of the river (jāhnavītīram). Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 918) appears to be recalling this in its translation, "I took her from the bank of the river in the hermitage."

"with regard to her five senses and her mind as the sixth" pañcasu bhūteṣu manaḥṣaṣṭheṣu: Literally, "in the five bhūtas, which have manas as their sixth." Commentators and translators differ in their understanding of the phrase. Ck, Cg, and Ct understand pañcabhūteṣu to refer to the five senses, hearing, etc. (pañcasu bhūteṣu śrotrādipañcendriyeṣu). We tentatively concur. But these commentators do not specify whose senses, Sītā's or Vālmīki's, are intended. Translators who interpret with them understand the reference to be to Vālmīki's senses, through the use of which he has determined Sītā's innocence—so Roussel (1903, vol. 3, p. 626), followed by Shastri (1959, vol. 3, p. 616) and Benoît (1999, p. 1413). Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 606) understands the phrase similarly, but paraphrases it somewhat euphemistically, offering, "Feeling in every fiber of my being." Such a reading is possible, we believe, but undesirable, as it more or less suggests that the sage has had close sensory contact with Sītā. We believe instead that the sage has, through his supranormal knowledge, determined that she is pure in mind, body, and spirit. Cr, whose reading of the passage is radically different from that of anyone else, takes the reference to be to the well-known pañcamahābhūtas, or the five elements of the material universe, as they were understood in early India, that is to say, earth, water, fire, air, and ether. He, however, idiosyncratically reading the unattested manaḥsṛṣṭeṣu, "created by mind," for manaḥṣaṣṭheṣu, "having manas, mind, for their sixth," takes the reference to be to the elements of the physical environment. He glosses as follows: "As I was wandering among the five elements, earth, etc., that were created by mind, that is to say, by Brahmā's inner sense faculty, having considered, 'Sītā is blameless,' that is, 'she is an agent of purity' . . . (manasā brahmaṇo 'ntarindriyeṇa srṣṭeṣu pañcasu bhūteṣu pṛthivyādiṣu paryaṭito 'haṃ sītaiva śuddhā śuddhikartrīti vicintya)." Several translators similarly understand the reference to be to the five elements but understand them to be the constituent elements of Sītā's body plus her mind or spirit—so Gorresio (1870, p. 283), Dutt (1894, p. 1909), and Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 918). Gorresio supports his reading with note 99 on page 332.

"I took her in" nyagṛhṇām: Literally, "I restrained or held back." Ñ1,V1,D1–7,10, 11,T3,4,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the first person perfect jagrāha, "I seized or took." Cr, aware of the fact that the perfect is technically reserved for descriptions of events not directly witnessed by the speaker and that therefore the first person perfect is only to be used for events that take place when the speaker is intoxicated or not fully conscious, observes that we are to understand that even though the object of the action of taking, i.e., Sītā, was present before him, it was as if he were not present because of his tremendous excess of joy (jagrāhānandasyātiśayāt pārokṣyaṃ grahaṇakarmatvaṃ tu pratyāsat[t]yā sītāyā eveti bodhyam).

20. "She . . . will give proof of her innocence to you, who are fearful of the malicious rumors among the people" iyam . . . lokāpavādabhītasya dāsyati pratyayaṃ tava: Cr alone comments on the verse, giving the same idiosyncratic explanation that he did on verse 15. See notes ad loc.

Following verse 20, Ñ2,V2,B,D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ś3 (in margin) continues following 1361*, a passage of four lines [1362*]: "Therefore, son of the foremost of men, here she is, the one[1] whom I determined[2] to be of a pure nature[1] through my divine sense of sight, she whom you, your mind clouded by the malicious rumors among the people,[3] abandoned, even though you loved her dearly and knew her to be blameless (tasmād iyaṃ naravarātmaja śuddhabhāvā divyena dṛṣṭiviṣayeṇa mayā pradiṣṭā / lokāpavādakaluṣīkṛtacetasā yā tyaktā tvayā priyatamā viditāpi śuddhā //)."

[1] "the one . . . of a pure nature" śuddhabhāvā: Cr glosses, "characterized by intentions that are entirely free from any contact with deceit (kāpaṭhyasaṃsārgaśūnyābhiprāyaviśiṣṭā)."

[2] "I determined" mayā pradiṣṭā: Literally, "[she] was pointed out or indicated by me." Cr explains: "She was pointed out by me, that is, she was known to be one who gives rise to extremely good fortune, that is, known. By this is suggested that I [i.e., Vālmīki] tended to her for my own well-being. (sā mayā pradiṣṭā prakṛṣṭabhāgyasaṃpādikā viditā jñātā. etena svakalyāṇārtham eveyaṃ mayā seviteti sūcitam.)" KK and VSP read instead tadā praviṣṭā, "then she was [made] to enter [lit., 'she was entered']." This extremely awkward reading would have to be understood to mean either "who has been caused to enter [the sacrificial assembly]" or, as it appears to have been understood by Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 606), "and so I took her to my hermitage."

[3] "your mind clouded by the malicious rumors among the people" lokāpavādakaluṣīkṛtacetasā . . . tvayā: Cr reverts to his interpretation of the similar expression at verse 15 and 20 above. See notes ad loc.

The meter is vasantatilakā.

Sarga 88

1. "Sītā, who resembled a goddess" tāṃ devavarṇinīm: Literally, "her, who possessed the beauty or luster of a divinity." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read varavarṇinīm, "of fair complexion or outstanding beauty," for devavarṇinīm.

"there, in the midst of the assembled people" jagato madhye: Literally, "in the midst of the people." See verse 4 and notes below.

2. "But your blameless words . . . are proof enough for me" pratyayo hi mama . . . tava vākyair akalmaṣaiḥ: Literally, "for, by means of your blameless words, of me there is faith or proof." D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the facilior tu, "but," for hi, "for." Ct explains the verse as follows: "Let it be so, even though proof of innocence was given in Laṅkā in the presence of the gods and asuras [sic] and, through the force of your words in the form of an oath, there has been proof enough for me. Still, O illustrious brahman, it should be just as you say, that is, let her give proof of her innocence (evam etad yady api laṅkāyāṃ surāsurasaṃnidhau pratyayo dattas tava vākyaiś ca śapatharūpair mama pratyayo jāta eva tathāpi he mahābhāga brahmaṃs tvaṃ yathā vadasi tad evam eva pratyayaṃ karotv ity arthaḥ)." Cr explains, "O brahman, by means of your blameless, that is, void of any contact with blame, words, faith (pratyaya), that is, the belief regarding Sītā's power, has been produced. The word '[there] is' should be added. Therefore, let it be just as you say. (he brahmann akalmaṣaiḥ kalmaṣasaṃsargarahitais tava vākyaiḥ pratyayaḥ sītāprabhāvaviṣayakaviśvāso 'stīti śeṣaḥ. ato yathā tvaṃ vadasi tad etad evam eva.)" Ck and Cg explain: "Just as you say, 'she will give proof (of her innocence),' the meaning is '[she will do so] on her own.' The meaning here is that it is to be done just in that way. [And to indicate that for her] to act in this way is not for the sake of convincing me [of her innocence], he says the verse beginning with pratyaya, 'proof (= verse 2).' One must add the words 'has been generated' by your words, that is, by the words of your previously stated oath: 'For many years, etc. (= 7.87.18).' (yathā vadasīti. pratyayaṃ dāsyatīty evam ātmanety arthaḥ. etad evam eva kartavyam ity arthaḥ. evaṃkaraṇaṃ ca na mama viśvāsārtham ity āha—pratyayo hīti. jāta eveti śeṣaḥ. tava vākyair iti. bahuvarṣetyādinā prāguktaśapathavākyair ity arthaḥ.)"

3. "Moreover" hi: B1–3,D5–7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1–7,9,10, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead ca, "and." KK and VSP read instead tu, "but or however," which is not noted in the critical apparatus.

"Vaidehī had already given" datto vaidehyā: Literally, "[was] given by Vaidehī." Ct, who reads dattaḥ with the critical edition, comments on verses 2 and 3 together. See notes to verse 2 above for his comments. D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead vṛtto vaidehyāḥ, "Vaidehī's [proof] took place." Cr glosses, "[was] done (kṛtaḥ)," for his variant vṛttaḥ.

"long ago in the presence of the gods" purā . . . surasaṃnidhau: The reference is, of course, to Sītā's agniparīkṣā as described at Yuddhakāṇḍa sargas 104–106. Cr offers yet another idiosyncratic interpretation, which concerns itself only with the current events. He understands the term sura-, normally "god," in its sense of "learned or wise person" and takes it as a reference to those assembled at Rāma's aśvamedha. He argues that they are called sura because of their great liberality in sharing their knowledge with others. Cr further interprets the term pratyaya, "proof [of innocence]," to refer to Sītā's well-known faith in the auspicious destiny [-kalyāṇa-] of the virtuous. (surasaṃnidhau surāṇāṃ parajñānapradatvenātidāninām bhavatāṃ saṃnidhau . . . yā vaidehī tayā vaidehyā puraiva pratyayaḥ sajjanakalyāṇaviśvāsaḥ vṛttaḥ kṛtaḥ.)

"But although I knew Sītā to be innocent . . . I nonetheless abandoned her out of fear of the people" seyaṃ lokabhayāt . . . apāpety abhijānatā / parityaktā mayā sītā: Literally, "She, this Sītā, was abandoned by me who realized, 'She is innocent,' out of fear of the people." Cr understands: "Even though by me it was known that Sītā was without sin, that is to say, was someone who removed sin, she was abandoned by me out of fear of the people, that is to say, out of fear of the śāstras, and she was not brought back until the present moment. That is the meaning. (sītāpāpā pāpanivartikety abhijānatāpi mayā lokabhayāc chāstrabhītes tyaktaitāvatkālaparyantaṃ nānītety arthaḥ.)" For Cr's understanding of Rāma's fear of transgressing the śāstras, see notes to 7.87.15,20.

"please, sir, forgive me" tad bhavān kṣantum arhati: Literally, "let the respected sir forgive that."

Following 3ab, Ś,Ñ,V1,2,B,D2,3,5–12,T3, and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D1–4 continue after 1365*, a passage of one line [1366*]: "And an oath was made there;[1] because of that she was made to enter my house[2] (śapathaś ca kṛtas tatra tena veśma praveśitā)."

[1] "And an oath was made there" śapathaś ca kṛtas tatra: D2,9, and KK and VSP read tu, "and or but," for ca, "and." The reference is once again to the events at and following the agniparīkṣā (see above). However, as above, Cr once again understands śapatha, "oath or solemn vow," to refer to Sītā's [impending] departure for the auspicious [heavenly world of Sāketa]. For this reason [i.e., her faith in the auspicious destiny of the virtuous—see above], there, that is, at that very time, a śapatha, that is, a departure for the auspicious [world of Sāketa], is undertaken (tena hetunā tatra samaya eva śapatho maṅgalagamanaṃ kṛtaḥ). See note to 7.86.5.

[2] "because of that she was made to enter my house" tena veśma praveśitā: Literally, "by that she was made to enter the house." Cr pointedly glosses the causative participle praveśitā, "she was caused or made to enter," with the corresponding simplex praviṣṭā, "she entered," thus giving agency to Sītā rather than to Rāma.

Following 1366*, D5–7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP continue, while T1,2,G,M insert following 3ab, a passage of one line [1367*]: "The malicious rumor among the people is persistent because of which Maithilī was abandoned[1] (lokāpavādo balavān yena tyaktā hi maithilī)."

[1] "The malicious rumor among the people is persistent because of which Maithilī was abandoned." lokāpavādo balavān yena tyaktā hi maithilī: Literally, "the malicious rumor among the people is powerful on account of which Maithilī was abandoned." Ct understands the line to be a response to an unexpressed question to the effect that if Sītā had already given proof of her innocence, why should there be another proof? He explains Rāma's answer as follows: "The malicious rumor among the people on account of which Jānakī was abandoned was very persistent. Therefore, in order to dispel it, there has to be a repeated proof of innocence. That is the meaning." Ct then argues that line 3cd is a response to a question as to whether Rāma himself, like the people, has doubts concerning Sītā. Rāma's reply is that he does not, but that, even though he knew she was innocent, he abandoned her because of his fear of the people. (kim arthaṃ tarhi punaḥ pratyayakaraṇaṃ tatrāha loketi. yena lokāpavādena jānakī tyaktā sa lokāpavādo balavān, atas tannivṛttaye punaḥ pratyayakaraṇam iti bhāvaḥ. tavāpi lokavad evāsyāṃ śaṅkāsti kiṃ tatra nety āha. seyam iti. apāpety abhijānatāpi mayā lokabhayāt tyaktā.) Cr once again rises to Sītā's defense. He understands this verse to be in response to the unexpressed question as to why, if Sītā was the object of Rāma's passionate love, he abandoned her up until this time. He then reverts to his understanding of the term lokāpavāda, which we, along with other commentators and translators, take to be a reference to malicious rumors among the people, to refer to the śāstraic injunction alluded to earlier

[i.e., against sexual intercourse with a pregnant woman]. It is this, according to Cr, that Rāma fears. (nanu bhavadatiprītiviṣaya iyaṃ sītaitāvatkālaparyantaṃ tvayā kathaṃ tyaktety ata āha loketi. yena maithilī tyaktā sa lokāpavādaḥ śāstraninditakarmabhayaṃ balavān ardhaṃ pṛthak.) See Cr's comments in notes to 7.87.15,20.

4. "these two bards" kuśīlavau: On the term kuśīlava, see 7.58.4 and 1.4.3 and notes.

"So let me show my affection toward Maithilī once she has proven that she is blameless in the midst of the people assembled here." śuddhāyāṃ jagato madhye maithilyāṃ prītir astu me: Literally, "May my affection be upon Maithilī, who is blameless, in the midst of the people." The idea here is that Rāma, although he has never given up his love for Sītā, is unwilling to show it until she has satisfied the people through a public demonstration. The verse lends itself to a slightly different interpretation. If one takes the phrase śuddhāyāṃ maithilyām as an elliptical absolutive (sati saptamī) and the term prīti in its sense of "joy or satisfaction," one can understand the line to say, "Once Sītā has been shown to be [lit., 'is'] blameless before the people, I will be satisfied." This interpretation is, in fact, the one given by Dutt (1894, p. 1910). Cr reads the syntax of the verse somewhat differently. He understands: "I acknowledge my two sons, Kuśa and Lava, who are born to Maithilī, who is blameless before the people; therefore, I am delighted (jagato madhye śuddhāyāṃ maithilyāṃ me putrau kuśīlavau jātāv ahaṃ jānāmy ato me prītir astv asti)." Cs understands, "Let there be affection toward Maithilī once she is shown to be blameless by means of a solemn oath witnessed publicly." Cs then argues that this suggests that Rāma is thinking: "May I not become the recipient of the gossip of evil-minded people who believe that [I accepted her] out of affection, thinking, 'Ignoring her offense, Rāma, infatuated by her beauty and youth, has taken Rāmā [i.e., Sītā] back.' (jagataḥ samakṣaṃ kṛtaśapathena śuddhāyāṃ maithilyāṃ mama prītir astu. anena tatkṛtaino na pratilakṣya lāvaṇyatāruṇyavyāmohito rāmo rāmāṃ jagrāhety āgrahagrahagṛhītadurātmajanavacanabhājanatā na mama syād iti sūcyate.)"

5–6. "placing Grandfather Brahmā at their head" pitāmahaṃ puraskṛtya: Literally, "having placed the grandfather in front."

"the Viśvedevas, the hosts of the Maruts" viśvedevā marudgaṇāḥ: KK and VSP read instead hy aśvinau samarudgaṇāḥ, "the Aśvins [and the gods], along with the hosts of Maruts." On Viśvedevas, see notes to 7.27.3–4.

"the Aśvins, the seers, the gandharvas, the troupes of the apsarases" aśvināv ṛṣigandharvā apsarāṇāṃ gaṇās tathā: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP omit this line.

"the sādhyas" sādhyāḥ: See notes to 7.27.3–4.

Following 5ab, D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while Ñ2,B2 continue following 1370(B), and T1,2,G1,3,M3,6 continue following line 1 of 1370, a passage of one line [1368*]: "They all assembled[1] for the oath[2] of Sītā (sītāyāḥ śapathe tasmin sarva eva samāgatāḥ)."

[1] "They all assembled" sarva eva samāgatāḥ: KK and VSP read instead mahendrādyā mahaujasaḥ, "Those immensely powerful ones, who had Mahendra as their foremost."

[2] "for the oath" śapathe: Literally, "at the oath." Ck, Cg, and Ct all explain, "at the occasion of the oath (śapathaprasaṅga ity arthaḥ)." Cr, of course, reverts to his unique understanding of the term śapatha in this context, arguing once more that the gods, having recognized the intention of both Rāma and Sītā with respect to Sītā's departure for the heavenly [lit., "unmanifest"] Sāketa, assembled (śapathe sītākartrīkāprakaṭasāketagamane rāmasya sītāyāś cābhiprayaṃ vijñāya sarve surasattamāḥ samāgatāḥ). See notes to 7.86.5.

For 6cd [the Aśvins, the seers, the gandharvas, the troupes of the apsarases], T1,2,G3,M3, and KK and VSP substitute, while Ś,Ñ,V,B,D2,5,8,9,12,M6, and Lahore and Gorresio substitute for 6ef, a passage of one line [1369*]: "The gandharvas and apsarases all assembled (gandharvāpsarasaś caiva sarva eva samāgatāḥ /)." Following verse 6, D6,7,10,11,12 (line 1 only after verse 7),T1–3,T4 (line 3 only following verse 2),G,M1–5,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of four lines [1370*]: ". . . [as well as] the great serpents, the great birds, and the perfected beings—they all were delighted at heart.[1][1] When Rāghava had seen the gods and seers, he spoke once more:[2] 'The blameless words of the seer are proof enough for me, O foremost among the gods.[2][3] So let me show my affection toward Vaidehī once she has proven that she is blameless in the midst of the people assembled here.[3][4]'"

[1] Following line 1, Ñ1,V1 (marg.),2, B,D12,T2, and Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert, while D7,10,11, and GPP and NSP insert following 1370* and D2,9 insert following 1369*, a passage of one line [1370(A)*]: "Excited about Sītā's oath,[a] they all assembled (sītāśapathasaṃbhrāntāḥ sarva eva samāgatāḥ /)."

[a] "Excited about Sītā's oath" sītāśapathasaṃbhrāntāḥ: Literally, "excited or agitated by Sītā's oath." Ct explains that the gods, etc., were agitated, that is to say, intent upon or respectful with regard to witnessing Sītā's oath. (sītāśapathe taddarśane saṃbhrāntāḥ. ādṛtā ity arthaḥ.) Cr similarly glosses "being intent or respectful" for saṃbhrāntāḥ, with, of course, his understanding that the compound sītāśapatha- refers to her departure for the heavenly Sāketa (sītāśapathe 'prakaṭasāketagamane saṃbhrāntā ādṛtāḥ santaḥ). See note to 7.86.5. Cs explains: "The word sambhrāntāḥ [means] respectful with regard to or intent upon or [it may mean] their minds were agitated at the thought, 'Why are they undertaking this again?' (saṃbhrāntāḥ sādarāḥ punaḥ kim ayam ārambha iti bhrāntasvāntā vā)."

[2] "The blameless words of the seer are proof enough for me, O foremost among the gods." pratyayo me suraśreṣṭhā ṛṣivākyair akalmaṣaiḥ: Compare 2cd, which is a close variant. D7,10,11,M4, and GPP and NSP read naraśreṣṭha, "O best among men," which would then refer to Vālmīki, for suraśreṣṭhāḥ, "O foremost among the gods."

[3] "So let me show my affection toward Vaidehī once she has proven that she is blameless in the midst of the people assembled here." śuddhāyāṃ jagato madhye vaidehyāṃ prītir astu me: This line = 4cd above, with the substitution of vaidehyām, "toward Vaidehī," for maithilyām, "toward Maithilī."

7. "Vāyu, god of wind" vāyuḥ: Literally, "Vāyu." Compare 6.4.41 and notes, where the wind is similarly described.

"foremost of gods" suraśreṣṭhaḥ: Ck, unhappy with the identification of Vāyu as the supreme god, understands that here he is a manifestation of the four-faced sovereign divinity [Brahmā] (suraśreṣṭho vāyuḥ samrāccaturmukhamūrtiḥ). For Ck's well-known Brahmaite tendencies, see especially notes to sargas 99–100. Ct understands the epithet to refer to the fact that the wind god [as dwelling in all living things] is the witness to all auspicious and evil acts (sarvapuṇyapāpasākṣī).

"auspicious, pleasant" śubhaḥ puṇyaḥ: Cm and Ct explain these two terms as referring, respectively, to the coolness and gentleness of the wind (śubhapuṇyaśabdau śaityamāndyopalakṣaṇaparau—so Cm; Ct similarly).

"bearing a heavenly fragrance" divyagandhaḥ: Ct understands the phrase to mean that the wind is bearing the fragrance of the heavenly sandalwood and floral garlands that are on the bodies of all the gods who are present (saṃnihitasarvadevaśarīravartidivyacandanamālyagandhaḥ).

"refreshed the entire mass of people" taṃ janaugham . . . hlādayāmāsa sarvataḥ: Literally, "he completely refreshed the mass or flood of people." KK and VSP read instead the irregular neuter taj janaugham for taṃ janaugham, "the mass of people." This variant is not noted by the editors of the critical edition.

8. "assembled" samāhitāḥ: The syllable -hi- is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition. Ñ,V,B1,2,4,D1,2,4,5,8,9,12,T1,2,G2,3,M1–3,6,10, and KK and VSP read instead the synonymous samāgatāḥ.

"witnessed" nirīkṣante: Literally, "they witness." Cm glosses, "they considered or regarded (vicārayantīty arthaḥ)." V3,B4,D5,10,11,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the imperfect niraikṣanta, "they witnessed."

"that inconceivable and almost miraculous thing" tad adbhutam ivācintyam: Literally, "that inconceivable [thing], which was as if miraculous." Ck, Cg, and Ct agree that the reference is to the manifestation of the divine wind mentioned in verse 7 above. Cv seems to agree, but our version of his text is largely illegible. Ck understands that since Vāyu manifested himself as the bearer of divine fragrance for no apparent reason and refreshed the mass of people simply to manifest his own presence, that manifestation of Vāyu appeared to have an inconceivable cause, just as it would have long ago in the Kṛta Yuga, and that is how all the people regarded it. (nirhetukadivyagandho bhūtvā svasāṃnidhyadyotanāya taṃ janaughaṃ hlādayāmāsa. ata evādbhutam acintyam acintyahetukaṃ tadvāyusvarūpaṃ yathā pūrvaṃ kṛtayuge tathā tadānīṃ sarve mānavā nirīkṣante sma.) Cg understands similarly to Ck. Ct notes that the touch of the wind with its heavenly fragrance was just then in the Tretā Yuga exactly as it was in the Kṛta. Ct adds that the particle iva, "as if," indicates that even though this phenomenon was not really miraculous, given the presence of Rāma, nevertheless, to the eyes of ordinary people (i.e., the people from various countries), it seemed miraculous (pūrvaṃ yathā kṛtayuge divyagandhavāyusparśanaṃ tathā tretāyām apy abhūd ity arthaḥ. rāmasāṃnidhyād anāścaryam api sādhāraṇadṛṣṭyāścaryam itīvaśabdaḥ). Cr, however, understands that the inconceivable event that was as miraculous as if it were in the Kṛta Yuga was nothing other than Sītā's impending departure in her own body for Sāketa, and it was this that the people who had assembled previously from all countries witnessed (acintyaṃ cintayitum aśakyaṃ kṛtayuga ivādbhutaṃ tat sītākartrīkasadehasāketagamanaṃ sarvarāṣṭrebhyaḥ pūrvam āgatā mānavā niraikṣanta). See note to 7.86.5.

9. Ct introduces this verse by saying that at that point, Sītā, who was really eager to enter her true home, having seen the people of the fourteen worlds assembled in one place, [and] under the pretext of an oath in order to suppress the malicious rumors, speaks (tataḥ sītā caturdaśabhuvanasthajanān ekatra militān dṛṣṭvāpavādaparihārāya śapathavyājena svapadaṃ praveṣṭukāmāha—sarvān iti). The fourteen worlds mentioned by Ct refer to the seven higher worlds (bhū, bhuvas, svar, mahas, janas, tapas, and satya or brahma) and the seven lower worlds (atala, vitala, sutala, rasātala, talātala, mahātala, and pātāla) (Apte s.v. loka).

"who was clad in ochre garments" kāṣāyavāsinī: Literally, "she who possessed ochre garments." Ct glosses, "wearing the clothing suitable for asceticism (tapasy ucitavāsodhāriṇī)." Cr understands, "kāṣāya-, that is to say, ascetics who wear ochre or reddish garments. The meaning is 'Those who live in the vicinity of ascetics. Sītā lives [that life], that is to say, she who has that character spoke.' (kāṣāyeṣu kaṣāyaraktavastradhāriṣu. tapasvisamīpeṣv ity artho vasati tacchīlā sītābravīt.)"

"cast down her eyes" adhodṛṣṭiḥ: Ct understands that this attitude is appropriate to the state of being utterly devoted to one's husband (pātivratocitādhodṛṣṭiḥ).

"lowered her face" avāṅmukhī: Ct observes that Sītā's face is lowered because she is gazing at the earth for the purpose of begging [the earth] to open for her (vivarayācanāya mahīnirīkṣaṇārthaṃ cāta evāvāṅmukhī).

10. "As I have never even thought of" yathāham . . . manasāpi na cintaye: Literally, "just as I do not think even with my mind."

"any man other than Rāghava" rāghavād anyam: Literally, "another [man] than Rāghava."

"so may Mādhavī, the goddess of the earth, open wide for me" tathā me mādhavī devī vivaraṃ dātum arhati: Literally, "in that way should the goddess Mādhavī give me an opening." The use of the feminine noun mādhavī for the earth goddess is quite unusual. This is the only example of it in this sense in the critical text of the Rāmāyaṇa (the only other occurrence of the term is at 4.1.36, where it is the name of a plant). It is perhaps for this reason that the editors of the critical edition mark the term as uncertain despite its overwhelming textual evidence. Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cl[?] (see Gorresio 1870, p. 182 and note 123, p. 332) all identify the goddess as the earth goddess who is the wife of Mādhava, which is, in turn, an epithet of Viṣṇu (mādhavī devī mādhavapatnī bhūdevī—so Ck, Ct, and Cl[?]; Cg similarly). Cr understands that the earth goddess is given this epithet because she is supported by Mādhava (mādhaveno[d]dhṛtā). Ck and Ct explain that even after so long a time of separation, Sītā was exhausted by the distress involved in protecting her fidelity to her husband. Thus Mādhavī, the earth goddess, should make a hole, that is to say, opening, in order to bring her suffering to an end. (cirakālaviyoge 'pi pātivratyaparipālanakleśakhinnāyās tajjanitaparamaduḥkhasamāptaye punar api bhuvaṃ praveṣṭuṃ mādhavī devī . . . vivaraṃ randhraṃ dātum arhati—so Ct; Ck similarly). Cr offers an unusual perspective. Eager, as always, to suggest that there is no hint of tension, disagreement, or unhappiness between Rāma and Sītā, he understands Sītā's request to be that the earth goddess should give her a vivara, that is to say, a splendid (-vara) throne or flying palace (vi[māna]-) [in order to ascend to Sāketa]. He believes that the goddess Mādhavī is being compared to Sītā in that she, too, has never thought of anyone other than Rāma and that the force of this simile is to suggests that the earth goddess, too, understands Rāma's inner thoughts. Thus, Cr concludes, Sītā's request is fully consonant with Rāma's wishes, and, therefore, it is suggested that the earth should resolve [to act accordingly]. (yathāhaṃ rāghavād anyaṃ manasāpi na cintaye tathā mādhavī mādhaveno[d]dhṛtā devī pṛth[i]vī rāghavād anyaṃ na cintayaty ato vivaraṃ vimānaśreṣṭham ity artho dātum arhaty etenopamālaṃkāreṇa pṛthivyā api rāmamanoveditrītvaṃ sūcitaṃ tenedaṃ prārthanaṃ rāmābhipretyam eveti tvayāpi niścīyatām iti dhvanitam.) Cr's glossing of vivaram, normally "fissure, hole, or opening," as "excellent throne or flying palace," is apparently accomplished by first positing a normative compound vimānavaram, "excellent chariot," from which the syllables -māna- are elided to yield "vivaram." He does this, no doubt, in anticipation of verse 11, where a magnificent throne (siṃhāsanam uttamam) does indeed emerge from the earth.

Following verse 10, Ñ,V,B2–4,D2,3,5 (line 1 only),6,7,10,11,T,G,M1–5,7–10 insert a passage of two lines [1372*]: "As I have focused[1] on Rāma in thought, deed, and speech,[1] so may Mādhavī, goddess of the earth, open wide for me.[2] And as what I am saying is true and as I have known no other man than Rāma,[3][2] so goddess of the earth, open wide for me.[4] (manasā karmaṇā vācā yathā rāmaṃ samarthaye / yathaitat satyam uktaṃ me vedmi rāmāt paraṃ na ca //)"

[1] "I have focused" samarthaye: Literally, "I think about." Ñ2,V1,2,B2,3,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead samarcaye, "I honor." As in his interpretation of verse 10, Cr here understands that the earth goddess, too, honors Rāma, just as does Sītā (yathāhaṃ rāmam eva samarcaye tathā devī samarcayaty ato dātum arhati).

Cm and Ct are at great pains to demonstrate that Sītā's entrance into the earth and consequent separation from Rāma, far from being an expression of rebellion, are, in fact, entirely consonant with Rāma's wishes. They do this by referring to the purāṇic legend according to which Viṣṇu's earthly incarnations are a punishment inflicted through a curse by the sage Bhṛgu, whose wife Viṣṇu had slain in order to protect the gods, when she, employing the Bhārgava's legendary mṛtasaṃjīvanī vidyā, was reviving the asuras that had been slain in battle. According to some versions of this story, Viṣṇu willingly accepts this punishment, including the painful loss of his wife when he is in a human form. See, for example, PadmaP (ĀnSS) 2(Bhūkhaṇḍa).121; MatsyaP 47.94–113; and R. Goldman 1977, pp. 35–49. Ct argues that Sītā's undertaking to return to her own realm [the earth], just like her going to Vālmīki's ashram, is done with her knowledge of the intention of Rāma. The idea is that Rāma has accepted the separation from his wife during his incarnation as Upendra, i.e., Viṣṇu, in the world of men, in keeping with the desire of Bhṛgu and has also accepted the oath taken by Vālmīki. Thus, Ct concludes, we are to understand that there is no inclination on Sītā's part to go against Rāma's wishes. Ct then notes that the violent burst of anger that Rāma displays following Sītā's disappearance, when he threatens to destroy the earth, is merely an acting out of his human incarnation and thus there is no [narrative] flaw. (ayaṃ svapadapraveśodyogaḥ sītāyā bhṛguprārthanayopendrāvatāre mānuṣe loke 'ṅgīkṛtapatnīviyogasya prāguktāsmadrītyāṅgīkṛtatadarthavālmīkiśāpasya ca rāmasyābhiprāyajñānād eva vālmīkyāśramagamanavad iti na rāmapratikūlācaraṇaprasaktiḥ sītāyā ity bodhyam. anantaraṃ rāmasya bhūmināśaparyantaṃ kopodayas tu manuṣyāvatāranaṭanamātram ity adoṣaḥ.) For Rāma's threat to destroy the earth, see sarga 88* and notes (= App. I, No. 13).

[2] Following line 1, Ñ,V1,2,B2–4,D2,3,6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M1–4,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP repeat 10cd ("so may Mādhavī, the goddess of the earth, open wide for me [tathā me mādhavī devī vivaraṃ dātum arhati]"). Cr notes that Sītā repeats herself here out the extremity of her joy (harṣātiśayāt punas tad evāha—manaseti).

[3] "as I have known no other man than Rāma" vedmi rāmāt paraṃ na ca: Cr argues that this phrase suggests that Sītā's throne or flying palace (vimāna), which is about to appear, will be established in/on the earth itself (etenāgamanakālakasītāvimānaṃ pṛthivyām eva sthāpitam iti sūcitam). Compare notes to verse 10.

[4] Following line 2, Ñ2,V2,B2–4,D6,7,10,11,T,G1,3,M2–4,7–10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP repeat 10cd ("so may Mādhavī, the goddess of the earth, open wide for me [tathā me mādhavī devī vivaraṃ dātum arhati]"). See notes to 1372*, note 2, above.

11. "And as Vaidehī was thus taking this oath" tathā śapantyāṃ vaidehyām: Ck, Cg, and Ct all remark that Sītā has taken her oath three times, since that is in accordance with the reading of the southern commentators and Gorresio (triḥ śapantyām). Cr, who has all along taken the term śapatha, "oath," in his own idiosyncratic way (see notes to 7.86.5), is disturbed by the participial form śapantyām here. He rationalizes the use of the form by glossing the participle as "making known her own wishes" and explaining that the sense of [to swear an] oath is inappropriate here because the participle is in the parasmaipada (whereas, according to Cr, the use of the verb √śap in its sense of "to swear [an oath]" should be in the ātmanepada). (śapantyāṃ svābhiprāyaṃ bodhayantyāṃ satyām . . . śapatharūpo 'rthas tv atra na yujyate parasmaipadatvānāpatteḥ.)

"a miraculous thing occurred . . . an unsurpassed, heavenly throne" prādur āsīt tad adbhutam /. . . divyaṃ siṃhāsanam anuttamam: Literally, "There was manifested a miracle . . . a heavenly, unsurpassed lion's seat." We follow Ct in understanding adbhutam independently to mean a miraculous occurrence. (adbhutaṃ prādur āsīt. kiṃ tad adbhutaṃ tatrāha.) Cr, on the other hand, understands adbhutam as yet another adjective modifying siṃhāsanam, while he takes divyam, "heavenly," to mean "suitable for pleasure and extraordinary," lending the line the sense for him "a miraculous, and unsurpassed throne, suitable for pleasure, arose" (adbhutam āścaryajanakam anuttamamaṃ sarvaśreṣṭhaṃ bhūtalād utthitaṃ divyaṃ vihārayogyaṃ . . . siṃhāsanaṃ . . . prādur āsīt). Cr further glosses, "a flying palace characterized by a lion's seat (siṃhāsanaṃ siṃhāsanaviśiṣṭavimānam)." See Cr's comments at notes to verse 12 below.

12. "It was borne on the heads of great serpents" dhrīyamāṇaṃ śirobhiḥ . . . nāgaiḥ: Literally, "[It was] being supported by nāgas with [their] heads." Ct, perhaps to disambiguate the term nāga, which can also mean elephant, specifies that these are of the class of beings that include the great serpents such as Takṣaka (nāgais takṣakādibhiḥ). See Cr's comments below.

"adorned with every jewel" sarvaratnavibhūṣitam: D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the instrumental plural divyaratnabhūṣitaiḥ, "adorned with celestial jewels," which would then modify nāgaiḥ, "by great serpents." Ct apparently feels that this supernatural event requires purāṇic corroboration. He quotes five and one-half verses from the Padmapurāṇa (ĀnSS) 6(Uttarakhaṇḍa).271.28–33ab (= VSP 6.244.29–34ab), in which Sītā's miraculous descent into Rasātala is described somewhat more elaborately. In that passage, as in the critical reading, it is the throne itself, not the nāgas, that is described as adorned or made of various jewels (nānāratnamayaṃ pīṭham). In the Padmapurāṇa, however, the throne is carried by Garuḍa. See Cr's comments below.

"it was celestial with its celestial beauty" divyaṃ divyena vapuṣā = 7.67.12c. Cr, continuing his comments on the previous verse, observes: "A lion-throne, that is to say, a flying palace that was characterized by a lion-throne, appeared. It was celestial, that is to say, quite other than ordinary, and it was borne by nāgas, who were characterized by celestial beauty, on their heads, which were adorned with celestial jewels. (divyaṃ prākṛtavilakṣaṇaṃ divyena vapuṣopalakṣitair nāgair divyaratnavibhūṣitaiḥ śirobhir dhrīyamāṇaṃ siṃhāsanaṃ siṃhāsanaviśiṣṭavimānaṃ prādur āsīt.)" See Cr's comments at notes to verse 11 above.

13. "Then Dharaṇī, the goddess of the earth, who was on that throne, took Maithilī in her arms and, greeting her with words of welcome, seated her upon it." tasmiṃs tu dharaṇī devī bāhubhyāṃ gṛhya maithilīm / svāgatenābhinandyainām āsane copaveśayat //: Literally, "And upon it, the goddess Dharaṇī, having taken Maithilī with her two arms and having greeted her with a welcome, caused her to sit on the seat." This passage is textually very close to Padmapurāṇa (ĀnSS) 6(Uttarakhaṇḍa).271.29 (= VSP 6.244.30), quoted by Ct.

14. "At the sight of Sītā entering Rasātala while seated on that throne, . . . a . . . celestial shower of blossoms rained down upon her" tām āsanagatāṃ dṛṣṭvā praviśantīṃ rasātalam / puṣpavṛṣṭiḥ . . . divyā sītām avākirat: Literally, "having seen her who had gone to the seat, entering . . . a celestial shower of blossoms covered Sītā." The syntax is awkward because it makes the shower of blossoms the subject of the gerund "having seen (dṛṣṭvā)." Ct understands the term divyā, "celestial," to mean "originating in heaven." He remarks that the shower of blossoms is produced as a result of the delight [of the gods] at the thought, "After this the arrival of the Lord as well will soon occur." (divyā svargabhavā. ataḥ paraṃ bhagavato 'py āgamanaṃ śīghram iti saṃtoṣeṇa puṣpavṛṣṭiḥ.)

15. "a . . . cry of 'Excellent!' " sādhukāraḥ: Literally, "the utterance of 'sādhu!' " The term -kāraḥ is marked as uncertain by the editors of the critical edition.

"you who demonstrate such virtuous conduct" yasyās te śīlam īdṛśam: Literally, "of you of whom there is such virtuous conduct." The syntax is awkward. Cr attempts to amend it by adding a noun. He interprets: "Of whom, that is to say, of you, there is such virtuous conduct, of her, that is to say, of you, this was an excellent, excellent act. The word 'act' must be supplied. (yasyās ta īdṛśaṃ śīlaṃ tasyās tava sādhu sādhu kṛtyam iti śeṣaḥ)."

16. "hovering in the sky" antarīkṣagatāḥ: Literally, "[those who] had gone to the atmosphere."

"Sītā's entrance into the earth" sītāpraveśanam: Literally, "Sītā's entrance."

17. "could not get over their amazement" vismayān noparemire: Literally, "They did not desist from amazement." Ct glosses, "They did not cease, that is to say, they did not become ones who desisted from amazement, that is to say, from expressions of praise rooted in that miracle (vismayād āścaryamūlakābhivandanavyavahārān noparemire noparatā babhūvuḥ)." Ck and Cg similarly understand, "They did not cease, that is to say, they did not become ones who desisted from the activity of proclaiming their recollection of that miracle (vismayād āścaryābhijñāvedanavyavahārān noparemire noparatā babhūvuḥ—so Cg; Ck similarly)."

18–19. "fixed and moving" sthāvarajaṅgamāḥ: The compound is commonly employed in the epic to indicate all the beings or contents of the universe. Ct understands the compound here in the sense of sentient and insentient beings. This, in turn, raises the problem of how insentient beings could react emotionally to the departure of Sītā. This Ct explains by arguing that on this extraordinary occasion, even insentient beings became sentient and were thus delighted at the thought that Sītā's infamy was gone. (sarve sthāvarajaṅgamāś cetanācetanāḥ. tatrācetanā api sasaṃjñā bhūtvā sītāyā ayaśo gatam iti saṃhṛṣṭā babhūvuḥ.) Ck and Cg also understand that all beings were delighted at the thought that Sītā's infamy was no more, but they do not go so far as Ct in suggesting that this event has lent temporary consciousness to inanimate beings. Cs understands that the immobile beings could experience joy through the means of their indwelling presiding spirit (sthāvarāṇām abhimānidvārapraharṣaḥ). For a similar notion regarding nonhuman creatures speaking, see notes to 7.40.13. See, too, 1485*, note 4, following 7.99.19, where Ct discusses how non-moving and/or insentient beings are able to follow Rāma in his departure to heaven.

"some were lost in thought" dhyānaparāyaṇāḥ: Cs understands them to be thinking, "Oh what a splendid imitation [of humanity]! (aho viḍambanam iti)." See, for example, BhāgP 10.3.31, where the term viḍambanam is used in a similar sense.

"stupefied" acetanāḥ: Literally, "without consciousness." Ñ1,V1,3,D3,5,7,10,11,M2,3, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the synonymous acetasaḥ. Ck, Cg, and Ct (reading acetasaḥ) gloss, "unconscious (visaṃjñāḥ)."

20. "They all assembled to witness Sītā's entrance into the earth." sītāpraveśanaṃ dṛṣṭvā teṣām āsīt samāgamaḥ: Literally, "Having seen the entrance of Sītā, there was a coming together of them." We believe the sentence is most intelligible if we understand the awkward gerund dṛṣṭvā, "having seen," as an infinitive in the sense of "to see." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand that all the beings, sages, etc., were linked or bound together by the emotions of joy, etc. Ct notes: "Having witnessed the entrance of Sītā, there was a coming together, that is to say, a binding together on the part of those, that is, the sages, etc. One should add the phrase 'by means of joy, etc.' (sītāpraveśanaṃ dṛṣṭvā teṣāṃ munyādīnāṃ samāgamaḥ saṃbandha āsīt. harṣādibhir iti śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cs understands similarly.

"And for that moment the entire world was completely transfixed." taṃ muhūrtam ivātyarthaṃ sarvaṃ saṃmohitaṃ jagat: Literally, "For that moment, it was as if all the world was extremely stupefied." D6,7,10,11,M10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read samam, "together," for sarvam, "all." We tend to agree with Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr in taking the particle iva, "as if or like," in the emphatic sense of "eva" and reading it with the adjective saṃmohitam, "transfixed or stunned." (saṃmohitam iva saṃmohitam eva).

Cs offers a theological explication of the entire sarga. "If one were to ask the question, 'Why would the lord of Ayodhyā go to such trouble when he was not going to be reunited with Maithilī again?' that would be wrong. You must understand that this was done to remove the malicious rumors among the people regarding Jānakī. Her earlier descent into the world was arranged by the goddess of her own free will; how much more so is this sending her back merely divine play? (maithilīmelanābhāve punar iyān āyāsaḥ kutaḥ saṃpādanīyo 'yodhyādhyakṣeṇety cen na. jānakīviṣayajanāpavādāpanuttyā ity avehi. punar eva hi ca pūrvaṃ svato 'pi lokagamanaṃ kāminyā vihitam iti tāṃ prākpreṣayitum iyaṃ līleti.)"

Sarga 88 (Appendix I, No. 13)*

Following sarga 88, all manuscripts collated for the critical edition include an entire sarga, Appendix I, No. 13, a passage of fifty-five lines (= Lahore 7.100 [pp. 325ff.]; Gorresio 7.105; GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 7.98). The relegation of this passage to the apparatus, despite its universal attestation, has been explained by Shah on what we consider to be rather unconvincing grounds. In his introduction (1975, p. 29), Shah argues that the passage is "an early interpolation." He believes that the sarga represents a narrative incongruity, since in it Rāma, who is always represented as true to his vows, fails to follow through on his vow to destroy the earth goddess, who has taken Sītā away. Instead, Rāma permits himself to be pacified by Brahmā and the gods. Shah's argument seems extremely weak, especially in light of the fact that in the Araṇyakāṇḍa (sargas 60–63), Rāma similarly threatens to destroy the world when he discovers that Sītā has been abducted by Rāvaṇa but withdraws the threat when he is pacified by Lakṣmaṇa. For a discussion of Rāma's display of destructive rage in the Araṇyakāṇḍa, see Pollock 1991, pp. 55–67. Compare also Rāma's violent rage against the uncooperative god of the ocean in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.14–15). Here Rāma threatens to dry up the ocean with his arrows and actually launches an attack but is immediately pacified when the god of the ocean appears and conciliates him.

Shah concludes his discussion of this passage by claiming that without it the narrative continuity between sargas 88 and 89 "is not hampered and appears in better order" (p. 29). This is, of course, a rather subjective judgment and hardly stands up to scrutiny. For without this passage, the critical edition jumps unceremoniously from the dramatic disappearance of Sītā to Rāma's mundane activities following the end of his sacrifice without any mention of Rāma's reaction to what must be the emotional and dramatic high point of the kāṇḍa. For these reasons we believe strongly that the excision of the passage from the critical edition was inappropriate, and we have therefore emended the text by restoring it to its rightful place, as it is found in all manuscripts and printed editions of the poem consulted for the critical apparatus.

We have followed the numbering of the verses as they appear in GPP and have supplied the line numbers as provided by the critical apparatus following each verse.

1. "all the people" sarvamānavāḥ: V1,D6,7,10,11,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sarvavānarāḥ, "all the monkeys."

"cried out, 'Excellent! Excellent!' " cukruṣuḥ sādhu sādhv īti: Cr argues that the fact that the spectators celebrate Sītā's descent into the earth suggests that they, too, were aware of the intention of Sītā and Rāma [to depart to Sāketa] (etena te 'pi sītārāmābhiprāyābhijñā iti dhvanitam). Ck and Ct note the irregular length of the "ī" in īti. (sādhu sādhv īti dīrgha ārṣaḥ). Cr quotes Ct on this point.

2. "Leaning on his wooden staff" daṇḍakāṣṭham avaṣṭabhya: Literally, "having leaned on a piece of wood that was a staff." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr explain the compound as meaning "a piece of wood in the form of a staff (daṇḍarūpaṃ kāṣṭham)." Ct and Cr further note that this would be the staff made of udumbara wood (Ficus racemosa or glomerata; common names include 'Indian fig tree, cluster tree, or goolar fig'), which Rāma (as the consecrated yajamāna of the aśvamedha) would be expected to hold until the point in the sacrifice at which the soma is purchased (dīkṣitena somakrayaparyantaṃ dhāraṇīyam audumbaraṃ daṇḍam avaṣṭabhyety arthaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly). Ck and Ct add that Rāma has to support himself in this way because he is weakened by the force of his grief (etad avaṣṭambhaḥ śokaglānivaśāt).

"profoundly heartbroken" suduḥkhitaḥ: Literally, "very distressed or pained." Cr, normally loath to ascribe suffering to Rāma, nonetheless glosses: "He was characterized by suffering because of the rapid departure of Sītā, who had just returned after a long time (suduḥkhitaś cirakālād āgatasītāyā drutaṃ gamanena duḥkhaviśiṣṭa āsīt)."

3. "shedding copious tears" bahuśaḥ bāṣpam utsṛjan: Cs remarks that Rāma shed copious tears even though he was perfectly happy. This, he says, suggests that all of this was done in imitation of ordinary humans. (bahuśaḥ pūrṇasukho 'pi bāṣpam utsṛjan. anena lokānukaraṇārtham idam iti sūcyate.)

4. The verse is syntactically and lexically rather challenging.

"Grief such as I have never before felt seems to want to grip my heart right here." abhūtapūrvaḥ śoko me manaḥ spraṣṭum ihecchati: Literally, "an unprecedented grief here wishes to take hold of or touch my mind or heart." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead abhūtapūrvaṃ śokaṃ me manaḥ spraṣṭum ivecchati, "My mind or heart seems to want to take hold of or touch an unprecedented grief." Cr comments that by saying this, Rāma is suggesting that it is his conviction that Sītā will remain with her mother for a long time (etena cirakālaṃ mātṛsannidhau sītā sthāsyatīti rāmaniścayaḥ sūcitaḥ).

"just now" tadā: Literally, "then or at that time." Given the contrast with the adverb purā, "previously," in line 9 (= verse 5ab) below, the term refers to what has just occurred, i.e., Sītā's disappearance into the earth. Ñ,V1,B4,D2,5,9–11,T2–4,M7, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead yathā, "just as."

"just as did Lakṣmī from Indra" lakṣmīr ivāsataḥ: We can see no other way to interpret the form asataḥ here than as the ablative singular of an obscure epithet of Indra, Asant (Apte, MW, PW, s.v.). See Trikāṇḍaśeṣa 1.1.56. The mythological reference here is not completely clear but appears to be the same one mentioned in the commentaries of Ck, Cm, and Ct at 6.24.27, where Rāma's recovery of Sītā is likened to Indra's recovery of Lakṣmī, who was being held by the daityas. D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead śrīr iva rūpiṇī, "who was like Śrī incarnate." The phrase can also plausibly be read to mean "who is as beautiful as Śrī," and this interpretation is found in the translations of Raghunathan (1982, vol. 3, p. 608) and Benoît (1999, p. 1415).

5. "she was carried away and concealed" sādarśanam . . . nītā: Literally, "she was led to invisibility." V1,D7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read sītā, "Sītā," for nītā, "was carried off." This removes the verbal element from the phrase. Ct and Cr, who read this variant, must supply the participle gatā, "she went," which they construe with their variant laṅkām (see below), and they read adarśanam adverbially (so Cr), lending the line the sense "Previously, Sītā had gone to Laṅkā in such a way that she was invisible." (purā sītādarśanaṃ yathā bhavati tathā laṅkām gateti śeṣaḥ—so Cr; Ct similarly).

"on the Laṅkan shore of the great ocean" laṅkāpāre mahodadeḥ: D2,4,11,G1,M4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead laṅkām (laṅkā [sic]—so GPP) pāre mahodadeḥ "to Laṅkā on the far shore of the great ocean."

"how much more easily might I do so from the depths of the earth" kiṃ punar vasudhātalāt: Literally, "how much more so from the surface of the earth."

6. "O Vasudhā, goddess of earth!" vasudhe devi: Literally, "O Vasudhā, O goddess."

"so that you will know who I truly am" yathā mām avagacchasi: Literally, "in such a way that you understand or know me." The idea here appears to be that Rāma is threatening the earth goddess on the basis of his superhuman power. This is the position of Ct, who understands that the earth goddess already knows Rāma's (i.e., Viṣṇu's) power from prior experience. He glosses, "The meaning is that you especially know my strength in connection with my boar incarnation, etc. (madbalaṃ varāhāvatārādau tvam eva jānāsīty arthaḥ)." The reference is, of course, to Viṣṇu's incarnation as the cosmic Varāha (varāhāvatāra), or boar, who lifted the earth from the depths of the primordial ocean. See, for example, MBh 3.141; 12.202,339–340; BhāgP 3.13–19; VarāP 113–115; and Viṣṇu P 1.4.3–11,25–29,45–49. See also notes to 6.105.12. See, too, notes to Prakṣipta II, sarga 3.7 and 7.94.5–6.

7. "Granted" kāmam: Cr understands the adverbial term here to refer to Janaka's ploughing to his heart's content. He reads the verse as follows: "While Janaka was ploughing to his heart's content, ploughshare in hand, Maithilī arose from you. Therefore, you are indeed my mother-in-law. What is suggested here is that for that very reason it is not proper for you to carry her off. (phālahastena kāmaṃ yatheṣṭaṃ karṣatā janakena tvatsakāśān maithily uddhṛtāto mama tvaṃ śvaśūr evaitena tvayāpahartuṃ na yogyeti vyañjitam.)"

"you are my mother-in-law" śvaśūr mamaiva tvam: Cs seems almost to take a skeptical attitude toward the legend of Sītā's birth. He says, "According to the old rumor among the people, you are the mother of my wife (prāglokapravādo mama patnīmātā tvam iti)."

"for" hi: V2,3,D6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead tu, "but or and."

"she was adopted" uddhṛtā: Literally, "she was raised up or rescued."

"plough in hand" halahastena: V2,D6,7,10,11,T4, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the more or less synonymous phālahastena, "ploughshare in hand."

"was ploughing" kṛṣatā: Literally, "by [him] who was ploughing." Ñ2,V,B,D1,6,7,9–11,T3,4,M7–9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the verb as a first gaṇa rather than a sixth gaṇa root, karṣatā, "by [him] who was ploughing." The reference is to Janaka's having found Sītā in a ploughed furrow of his sacrificial enclosure as he was clearing the field. See 1.65.14–15.

8. "you must . . . open wide for me" vivaram . . . prayaccha me: Literally, "Give me an opening." Compare 7.88.10 and notes. Here, too, as at 7.88.10, Cr idiosyncratically understands the term vivaram to mean "an excellent flying chariot or palace." Here he glosses, "a type of flying palace that would enable me to come into her presence (vivaraṃ tatsannidhiprāpakavimānaviśeśam)." Ct understands that the meaning is "so that having entered, I might stay with her (praviśya tayā saha sthātum iti bhāvaḥ)."

"I must be with her" vaseyaṃ sahitas tayā: Literally, "I would dwell together with her."

"whether it be in the underworld known as Pātāla or in the highest heaven" pātāle nākapṛṣṭhe vā: Literally, "in Pātāla or on the back of heaven."

9–10ab. "I have been driven mad" matto 'ham: Literally, "I am mad." Compare the elaborately described grief, madness, and rage of Rāma over the abduction of Sītā at 3.58–62 and Pollock's analysis in his introduction to the Araṇyakāṇḍa (Pollock 1991, pp. 55–67).

"This very day . . . not" nādya: D10,11,T1,2,G3,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead na me, lending the phrase the sense "if you do not give back to me."

"just as she was" tathārūpām: Literally, "having a form in this way." D7,10,11,M6, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the nearly synonymous yathārūpām, "having a form in which way."

"I shall destroy you entirely" vidhamiṣyāmi te hy aham: Literally, "for I will destroy your." The critical reading is elliptical, as it lacks a substantive to serve as a direct object of the verb "I will destroy (vidhamiṣyāmi)." We understand the missing term to be the earth in its physical form, as distinct from the goddess earth, to whom Rāma is addressing his words. D6,7,10,11,M2,4,5, and GPP and NSP read vyathayiṣyāmi, "I will shake," for vidhamiṣyāmi, "I will destroy." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sthitim, "residence or abode," thus providing the missing substantive.

10cd. "let everything in this world be once more nothing but water" sarvam āpo bhavatv iha: Literally, "let everything here become the waters." Rāma is referring to the common trope of creation and destruction found in the literature from the vedas onward, according to which the material world emerged from a primordial, undifferentiated ocean and will return to that state at the time of universal destruction. D6,7,10,11,T3, 4,M1,2,4,5,6,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the plural bhavantu for the critical edition's singular bhavatu, lending the phrase the sense "Let the waters become everything here." Cs explains: "The meaning of the phrase 'the waters will become' is 'I will make it [the earth] dissolve into the waters' (āpo bhavantu jalalīnāṃ kariṣyāmīti bhāvaḥ)."

11. "As Kākutstha, the delight of the Raghus . . . was speaking . . . to him" bruvati kākutsthe . . . /. . . raghunandanam: Literally, "as Kākutstha was speaking . . . [Brahmā said], to the delight of Raghus." D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous ātmanepada participle bruvāṇe for the parasmaipada bruvati.

12. Ck and Ct set this and the following verse in the context of their ongoing theological discussion concerning the suffering of Rāma. The question arises here because, although Rāma was obliged to act, think, and suffer as an ordinary human in order to maintain the truth of Brahmā's boon to Rāvaṇa, he was freed from that obligation upon killing the rākṣasa. Why then, these commentators wonder, does he need to be reminded of his divine nature yet again? They frame the verse with the question as to how there might be a dissipation of suffering on Rāma's part at this point (so Ct; Ck "How is it that Rāma still has this suffering?"). The idea, according to Ct, is that the suffering is rooted in the [earlier] need to act out ignorance of his own inherent nature, but that now Rāma is being urged to act in remembrance of his true nature. Both commentators quote Bṛhadaraṇyakopaṇiṣad 4.4.12, which says, "If a man knows the true self, in the form of the knowledge, 'I am that,' then desiring what and for the desire of what would he torment his own body." Ct continues, saying that this is because all of Rāma's actions that were rooted in his taking on the condition of a human, that is to say, actions up until the killing of Rāvaṇa and the performance of the aśvamedha, are now completed. Thus there is no benefit to be had in continuing to play out the occlusion of his true nature. (nanu katham idānīṃ saṃtāpāpagama iti [katham saṃtāpa idānīṃ mamety—so Ck] cet tasya svatattvājñānanaṭanādimūlakatvāt. svatattvasmaraṇanaṭanam eva kurv ity āha—smara tvaṃ pūrvakaṃ bhāvam iti . . . ātmānaṃ ced vijānīyād ayam asmīti puruṣaḥ. kim icchan kasya kāmāya śarīram anusaṃjvared iti śruteḥ . . . mānuṣabhāvamūlarāvaṇavadhāśvamedhayāgāntasarvakṛtyānāṃ nivṛttatvenedānīṃ tattvāvaraṇanāṭanena phalābhāva iti bhāvaḥ—so Ct; Ck somewhat similarly.)

"You must not torment yourself." na saṃtāpaṃ kartum arhasi: Literally, "You ought not make pain."

"Remember your immemorial nature" smara tvaṃ pūrvakaṃ bhāvaṃ: Literally, "You must remember the primal or earlier state of being." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the reference to be to Rāma's true nature, that is, as Viṣṇu (pūrvakaṃ svabhāvaṃ viṣṇutvam ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly). Cr, however, in keeping with his wider interpretation of the departure of Sītā, understands that Rāma should not suffer because he should remember his previous intention, which took the form of sending [Sītā] to the heavenly Sāketa (tvaṃ pūrvakaṃ bhāvam aprakaṭasāketapreṣaṇarūpasvābhiprāyam . . . smarātaḥ saṃtāpaṃ kartuṃ nārhasi). See notes to 7.86.5. Ck understands that the reference is to the Yuddhakāṇḍa (6.105.10ff.), where Brahmā and the gods remind Rāma of his true nature. (smara tvam ityādi pūrvakaṃ vairājavaiṣṇavamartyamānuṣopagrahaparigrahāt pūrvasiddhaṃ tathātmānaṃ mānuṣaṃ manye ityādinā.)

"our counsel" mantram: Literally, "counsel." Cg and Ct understand the term to refer to Viṣṇu's deliberations with the gods at the time of his incarnation (mantraṃ devaiḥ sahāvatārāya kṛtaṃ vicāram—so Cg; Ct similarly). Ck takes the reference to be to the gods' declaration of the divine nature of Rāma in the Yuddhakāṇḍa (mantram . . . ādityahṛdayādhyāyopadiṣṭas taṃ ca mantraṃ smara). See App. I, No. 65, following notes to 6.93.27. Cr does not specify the occasion on which Rāma's conversation with the gods took place. He glosses simply, "the conversation with us (mantram asmābhiḥ saha bhāṣaṇam)."

Following line 24 (= 12cd), B1–3,D6,7,10,11,S (except M6) insert, while V2 inserts following 25, a passage of one line [10*]: "I do not need to remind you, great-armed one, you who are unsurpassed[1] (na khalu tvāṃ mahābāho smārayeyam anuttamam)."

[1] "I do not need to remind you . . . you who are unsurpassed" na khalu tvām . . . smārayeyam anuttamam: Literally, "I should by no means remind unsurpassed you." Ck, Cg, and Ct are concerned about the seeming incongruity of reminding an omniscient divinity of his own true nature. Ct understands, "I am not asking you to remember as if you had forgotten your true nature (vismṛtatattvam iva smaraṇaṃ kurv iti na prārthayāmi)." Ck similarly notes, "There would not be a forgetting of the true nature on your part (tattvavismaraṇaṃ te na bhaviṣyati)." Cg tersely comments, "I am not going to remind you—because of [your] omniscience, that is the meaning. (tvām ahaṃ na smārayeyam. sarvajñatvād iti bhāvaḥ.)"

13. "that you are an unassailable incarnation of Viṣṇu" durdharṣaṃ smara tvaṃ janma vaiṣṇavam: Literally, "you must remember the unassailable Vaiṣṇava birth." The phrasing here is rather obscure, but the intent seems clear: Brahmā is reminding Rāma that he is, indeed, a manifestation of Viṣṇu. Ct understands the phrase to mean "You must remember that your essential self is that of Viṣṇu, who has taken birth in this world. The meaning is that you should perceive this through inner contemplation." Ct goes on to note that up until this point, for the purpose of carrying out his mission, Rāma has taken the position that he was a man and acted that out, but he should now give that up. (vaiṣṇavam ātmānam iha janma prāptavantaṃ smara. dhyānena paśyety arthaḥ. etāvatparyantaṃ kāryanirvāhāya maṇuṣyo 'ham iti dhyānena tathābhāvaṃ nāṭitavān apīdānīṃ tat tyajety arthaḥ.) According to Ck, who, as elsewhere, seems to put forward a Brahmaite perspective, Brahmā is telling Rāma that his human birth, which has been an ocean of misery, was a form of himself [i.e., Brahmā], that is to say, of the unborn, self-existent Brahmā, who is the only truly existent one. That form is the basis for [Rāma's] acceptance of the body that is the gross physical form of cosmic Viṣṇu. [This form was accepted] freely by [Viṣṇu], who took three strides under his own power. The meaning is 'This is not your true form; rather, it is my form, which is without birth, without death, fearless, destructive of arrogance, and which is your true form.' (idam mānuṣaṃ duḥkhodadhibhūtaṃ janma cājasya svayaṃbhuvo brahmaṇo matto 'nanyatattvasyāpi vaiṣṇavaṃ svaśaktitripadā viśuddhaye svecchayā sthūlavirāḍviṣṇūpagrahasvīkāramūlaṃ smara. nedaṃ tava svarūpam api tv ajam amṛtam abhayaṃ mānadaṃ māmakaṃ rūpam eva tattāttvikarūpam ity arthaḥ.) Cr understands that Rāma is being urged to remember his own manifestation through his birth, which was connected with the petition [of the gods] to Viṣṇu. Cr believes that this instruction (i.e., smara, "you must remember") suggests that it would not be appropriate for Rāma to depart without having completed the sacrifice that is currently in progress. (vaiṣṇavaṃ viṣṇuprārthanāsaṃbandhijanma svaprādurbhāvaṃ ca smaraitena saṃkalpitayāgaṃ saṃtyajya bhavato gamanaṃ nocitam iti sūcitam.) Cr's idea, no doubt, is that but for the necessity of completing the sacrifice, Rāma would have departed for heavenly Sāketa together with Sītā. Ñ,V1,2,B4,D2,6,10, 11,T,G2,M1–6,8,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the vocative durdharṣa, "O unassailable one," for durdharṣaṃ, "unassailable [incarnation]."

Following verse 13 (= line 25), D,6,7,10,11,S insert a passage of three lines [11*]: "For Sītā, who is free from impurity,[1] virtuous, and was devoted to your primordial self,[2] has happily entered the world of the great serpents[3] through the power of her penances, which were focused on you.[1–2] And, without any doubt, you will rejoin her once again in heaven.[4][3]"

[1] "who is free from impurity" vimalā: Ct glosses, "inherently devoid of all faults or censure." He explains that the meaning is that in reality Sītā is not different from Rāma. (vimalā svata eva sarvāvadyaśūnyā. vastutas tasyās tvadabhinnatvād iti bhāvaḥ.)

[2] "who was devoted to your primordial self" tava pūrvaparāyaṇā: Literally, "she who is devoted to the previous in your case." The commentators try to unpack this awkward phrase. Ct glosses, "longing to obtain your primordial nature (tava prakṛtiprāptisamutsukā)." Cr glosses, "she of whom the highest place of refuge is in you alone, the primordial one, that is to say, the one who is prior to all beings (pūrvasmin sarvādibhūte tvayy eva param ayanaṃ yasyāḥ sā sītā)." Cg glosses, "devoted to your primordial nature" and then notes that the meaning is that "she is longing to obtain your primordial nature." (tava pūrvabhāvapravaṇā. tava prakṛtiprāptisamutsukety arthaḥ.)

[3] "the world of the great serpents" nāgalokam: Ct is uncomfortable with the idea that Sītā has actually plunged into the netherworld of Pātāla, the subterranean world of the snakes. He explains: "Under the pretext of going to the world of the serpents, she happily went to the nāgaloka, that is to say, Viṣṇu's world. (nāgalokagamanavyājena nāgalokaṃ viṣṇulokaṃ sukhaṃ prāyāt.)" Cr understands the reference to be to the underworld but notes that the term suggests the house of the presiding goddess of the earth, which is in that world (nāgalokaṃ prāyād agād etena tasminn eva loke pṛthivyabhimānidevatayā gṛham astīti sūcitam). Perhaps Cr is referring to Viṣṇu's resting place on the cosmic serpent Śeṣa.

[4] "in heaven" svarge: Ck and Ct understand the reference to be to the highest heaven, which is the Brahmaloka (svarga eva parasvarge brahmaloka eva . . . nānyatra)." Cr, characteristically, understands the reference to be to Sāketa (see note to 7.86.5). Cs, on the other hand, understands the reference to be to Vaikuṇṭha, the eternally blissful world of Viṣṇu (svarge nityasukharūpe vaikuṇṭhe).

14. "in the midst of this assembly" asyāḥ pariṣado madhye: D6,7,10,11,T3,4,M5,7,8, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead asyās tu pariṣanmadhye. This reading creates a syntactical problem for those commentators who share it, as the construction of the genitive feminine pronoun asyāḥ is difficult to construe. Ck, Ct, Cr, and Cs resolve the problem by taking the pronoun retrospectively to refer to Sītā and construe it with the term saṃgamaḥ, "union," in 11*, line 3. Ct seems to propose an alternative reading in which he takes pariṣat not as the first member of a tatpuruṣa compound but as a genitive feminine singular that has lost its declensional ending, in which case it can agree with the pronoun asyāḥ (pariṣad iti luptaṣaṣṭhyantam). Cs, deriding Ct's fear of construing the pronoun in more than one syntactical unit, mockingly quotes Ct, claiming that the latter's argument is an effort to provoke a fight. (pariṣanmadhye sadomadhye. anena naikadeśānvayabhayato luptaṣaṣṭhyantato 'rarīkārakāraṇaka āyāso nāgojibhaṭṭapakṣa iveti jñeyam.)

16. "Vālmīki has rendered" vālmīkinā kṛtam: Literally, "[has been] done by Vālmīki." Ck, Cg, and Ct remind us that Vālmīki knows the past, present, and future (trikālajñena).

Cg additionally notes that Vālmīki was able to compose his poem through the grace of Brahmā (madanugrahāt), recalling the passage at Bālakāṇḍa 2.29–41.

"starting from the time of your birth" janmaprabhṛti te: Literally, "beginning from the birth of you."

"your experiences of joy and sorrow" sukhaduḥkhopasevanam: Literally, "the pursuit of happiness and unhappiness." Cs understands the joy to be inherent to Rāma's nature, while the sorrow was merely demonstrated to mislead people. (sukhasya svābhāvikasya. duḥkhasya janamohanārthaṃ pradarśitasya.)

"and even" caiva: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ceha, "and here." Cg, Ct, and Cr all understand the referent to be the poem itself (iha kāvye—so Cg and Ct; Cr similarly).

"what is yet to come" bhaviṣyam uttaram: Literally, "the conclusion which is the future or the future which remains." At verse 20 below (lines 37–38), the text makes it clear that the term uttara is to be understood as the name of the remaining section of the poem. See, too, verses 20 (= lines 37–38) and 23 (= lines 43–45) below and lines 54–55 of App. I, No. 13, at the opening of sarga 89 and notes, for similar passages. Ñ,V,B2–4,D1–7,9–11,T1,3,4,G2,3,M3,5–7,9, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead the nearly synonymous compound bhaviṣyaduttaraṃ. T2 and KK and VSP read instead bhaviṣyaty uttaram, "the subsequent [events] that will occur." Ck, Cg, and Ct understand the reference to refer to events in Rāma's career that will transpire after the death of Sītā (sītopasaṃhārād uttaraṃ ca yat te caritaṃ bhaviṣyati—so Ck, Cg, and Ct).

17. "Rāma Rāghava; for no one other than you deserves to enjoy such poetic fame" rāma . . . / na hy anyo 'rhati kāvyānāṃ yaśobhāg rāghavād ṛte //: Literally, "O Rāma, for no other [man] except for Rāghava deserves [to be] the enjoyer of the fame of poems." Ck, Cg, Ct, and Cr explain that no one else deserves to be the enjoyer of the fame that is made known through poetry, that is to say, deserves to be the hero of a poem. Therefore, these commentators continue, because of the lack on the part of others of virtues that are to be described, even today all poets generally have recourse to the history of Rāma. (tvatto rāghavād ṛte 'nyaḥ kāvyānāṃ yaśobhāk kāvyaprakāśyayaśobhāk kaścid api nārhati. kāvyanāyakatām iti bhāvaḥ. anyeṣāṃ varṇanīyaguṇaśūnyatvāt sarve kavayo 'dyāpi rāmacaritam eva prāyeṇāśrayanti.—so Ct; Ck, Cg, and Cr similarly.) Cs observes that the word for poem is in the plural for the purpose of indicating the existence of the innumerability of the virtues [of Rāma] that are to be described (kāvyānāṃ varṇanīyaguṇānām agaṇeyatvavittyai bahuvacanam).

18. Ck and Ct argue that this verse expresses the greatness of the poem by informing us that it was commissioned by Brahmā himself, who is the greatest of all beings (asya kāvyasya mahattvaṃ sarvamahatā mayaiva parigrahād ity āha—śrutam iti—so Ct; Ck similarly). Cr believes that Brahmā utters the verse in anticipation of Rāma's objection as to how, since the poem includes the end of his own life, Brahmā could know about it (nanu matparyavasānakam evedam iti tvayā kathaṃ jñātam ity ata āha śrutam iti).

"Moreover" tu: D7,10,11,M2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead te, "your." Ct glosses this variant by providing the phrase "this poem concerning you (ta etat tvatsambandhīdaṃ kāvyam)."

"a long time ago" pūrvam: Ck and Ct understand that Brahmā had heard the poem long ago directly from the lips of the goddess of poetry (pūrvaṃ śrutaṃ kāvyarūpiṇyā devyā mukhād evety śeṣaḥ—so Ct; Ck similarly).

"It is utterly truthful" satyavākyam: Literally, "having true utterances." Cr understands, "in which the utterances are true (satyāni vākyāni yasmiṃs tat)."

"it obscures nothing" anāvṛtam: Literally, "unobscured or uncovered." Cg understands the term to mean that the poem is devoid of the obscurity of ignorance (anāvṛtam ajñānāvaraṇarahitam). Ck and Ct understand, "devoid of prattle grounded in ignorance (avidyāmūlapralāparahitam)." Cr reads the term more strongly still as meaning that the poem actually destroys or banishes the shroud of ignorance (ajñānāvaraṇanāśakam).

19. "including the remaining events that are yet to come" śeṣaṃ bhaviṣyam: Literally, "the future remainder." Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "the remainder whose subject is what is yet to be (bhaviṣyadviṣayaśeṣaṃ śeṣam—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cr understands the reference to be to the Rāmāyaṇa, which informs one of the events belonging to the future that have been thus far left out of what has been heard (śeṣaṃ śravaṇād avaśiṣṭaṃ bhaviṣyaṃ bhaviṣyatkālakacaritabodhakarāmāyaṇam). Interestingly, Cr believes that the reference here is meant to suggest a request that henceforth Rāma is to comport himself in accordance with what is contained in the latter portion of the poem (etenetaḥ prabhṛty etad anusāreṇaiva kartavyam iti prārthanā sūcitā).

20. "most illustrious prince of immense blazing energy" mahāyaśaḥ . . . mahātejaḥ: Literally, "O one of great fame. O one of great blazing energy."

"together with the seers here" atra . . . ṛṣibhiḥ sārdham: Ct believes that the reference is to the seers who reside in Brahmā's world (brahmalokasthair ṛṣibhiḥ).

"the great remainder of this poem known as the Uttara" uttaraṃ nāma kāvyasya śeṣam /. . . uttamam: Ct explains that this is the remainder of the poem and that its name is the Uttara (uttarākhyo yaḥ kāvyasya śeṣaḥ). Cg explains, "the poem known as the Uttarakāṇḍa, which is the remainder (uttarakāṇḍākhyakāvyaṃ śeṣabhūtam)." Ck understands similarly to Cg. On the term Uttara, compare verses 16 (= lines 29–30) and 20 (= lines 37–38) above, 23 (= lines 43–45) below, and lines 54–55 of App. I, No. 13, at the opening of sarga 89; and see notes.

21. "by anyone other" na . . . anyena: Ct understands the exclusion to include Lakṣmaṇa, etc. (lakṣmaṇādinety arthaḥ), while Cr applies it to Bharata (bharatādidvārety arthaḥ). Ck and Ct take the exclusivity to express extreme reverence for the Lord and note that one should understand that it is because of the fact that this portion of the poem deals with his incarnation. (evaṃ bhagavataḥ paramādaraḥ. kāvyasya svāvatāraviṣayatvād iti bodhyam—so Ct; Ck similarly.) This is in keeping with Ct's preamble to his comments on the verse, where he notes that this portion of the poem is not to be heard by everyone because of its extremely esoteric nature (atirahasyatvāc ca nāyam aṃśaḥ sarvaiḥ śrotavya ity āha—neti). Cr understands the exclusion to suggest that Brahmā has observed Rāma's great weariness [with his earthly incarnation] (etena rāmasya mahān khedo brahmaṇāvilokita iti śūcitam).

"than the great seers and you, hero, who are the supreme seer" ṛte maharṣibhir vīra tvayā vā paramarṣiṇā: D10,11, and GPP, NSP, and Gita Press read instead paramarṣiṇā [sic] vīra tvayaiva raghunandana, "by you alone, heroic delight of the Raghus, who are the supreme seer." KK and VSP read instead paramaṃ [sic] ṛṣiṇā, which would lend the sense "the supreme [section] by the seers." Both variants have incorrect sandhi, and neither is attested in the critical apparatus. Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss paramarṣinā (paramarṣiṇā—Ck, Cg), "the supreme seer," as "supreme royal seer (paramarājarṣiṇā)." Cr glosses, "by you alone who are omniscient (sarvajñena tvayaiva)."

22. "together with Vāsava and the gods" devaiḥ saha savāsavaiḥ: Literally, "together with the gods, who were accompanied by Vāsava." D10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sabāndhavaiḥ, "together with [their] kinsmen," for savāsavaiḥ, "together with Vāsava."

23. "returned, since their hearts were set upon it, to hear the Uttara" nyavartanta . . . uttaraṃ śrotumanasaḥ: Literally, "having their hearts or minds on hearing the Uttara, they returned." We understand, with Ck, Cg, and Ct, that the seers in question are those who were summoned by Rāma to witness Sītā's proof of innocence at the sacrificial session at 7.87.1–5 (ye ca tatreti yajñasadasi). We further understand, with Ct and Cr, that these seers, having accompanied Brahmā to his world, now return to Rāma's presence in their desire to hear the recitation of the Uttarakāṇḍa (brahmaṇā saha calitā api punar nivṛttā ity arthaḥ—so Ct; Cr similarly). Among the translators consulted, only Gita Press (1998, vol. 2, p. 921) shares this understanding with us. All others who read with the critical edition understand the verb nyavartanta to mean that the seers remained behind when Brahmā and the gods departed. But this appears to force the meaning of the verb. B4 and the text of Gorresio (7.105.25) read instead nyavasan, "they dwelt or stayed there." On the term Uttara, see verses 16 (= lines 29–30) and 20 (= lines 37–38) above; lines 54–55 of App. I, No. 13, at the opening of sarga 89; and notes.

24. "of the God of gods" devadevasya: KK and VSP read instead devadevena, "by the God of gods."

25. "the sages" munayaḥ: V2,D6,7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead ṛṣayaḥ, "the seers."

"the inhabitants of Brahmā's world" brahmalaukikāḥ: D10,11,M5, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead the more or less synonymous karmadhāraya compound brāhmalaukikāḥ.

"have set their hearts on hearing" śrotumanasaḥ: Literally, "having their hearts or minds on hearing." See notes to verse 23 above.

26. "those two bards" kuśīlavau: On the term kuśīlava, see 7.58.4, 1.4.3, and notes.

"quickly" āśu: Ñ2,B1,D6,7,10,11,T3,M4,7,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead atha, "then."

"assembly" janaugham: Literally, "the flood or mass of people."

"Rāma . . . retired to the sacrificial hall" karmaśālām upāgamat: Literally, "he approached the sacrifice-hall." Ñ2,D7,M3, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP, and the commentaries of Ck and Cg read parṇaśālām, "leaf hut," for karmaśālām, "sacrificial hall." Cr reads with the critical edition, while Ct offers both options as variant readings. Ck, Cg, and Ct note that by the word parṇaśālā we must understand that Rāma now, at the conclusion of the sacrifice and after the disappearance of Sītā, no longer in a state of consecration, moves together with his two sons to a more convenient location, that is to say, to Vālmīki's leaf hut. (parṇaśālām upāgamad iti. yajñāvasāna eva sītāntardhānāt tataḥ paraṃ dīkṣārāhityena sthalāntarasya sugamatvāt putrābhyāṃ saha vālmīkiparṇaśālām eva rāmaḥ prāptavān ity arthaḥ—so Cg; Ck and Ct similarly.)

Following line 51, D7,10,11, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert a passage of one line [17*]: "And as he grieved over Sītā, the night passed[1] (tām eva śocataḥ sītāṃ vyatītā ca śarvarī)."

[1] "And . . . passed" vyatītā ca: KK and VSP read instead the perfect (liṭ) vyatīyāya, "[the night] passed."

Following line 51, all manuscripts insert five additional lines (lines 52–56), which correspond to verses 1–3ab of Lahore 101; Gorresio 106; and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 99. These verses are translated at the beginning of the following sarga.

Sarga 89

Prior to verse 1, all manuscripts and Lahore, Gorresio, GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP insert five additional lines (Appendix I, No. 13, lines 52–56), which correspond to verses 1–3ab of Lahore 101; Gorresio 106 (lines 52–55 only); and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP 99. See notes to sarga 88* for a discussion of the critical evidence to support the inclusion of this passage.

*Appendix I, No. 13, lines 52–53. "Rāma assembled the great sages. Then he said to his two sons" samānīya mahāmunīn / . . . rāmaḥ putrāv uvāca ha: Literally, "having assembled the great sages, Rāma said to [his] two sons."

"Now sing, setting all cares aside." gīyatām aviśaṅkābhyām: Literally, "Let it be sung by [you two] who are without care." Ck and Ct understand that Rāma is urging his sons to abandon both their anxiety concerning their being his sons and their suffering because of the separation from their mother (aviśaṅkābhyāṃ matputratvaviṣayaśaṅkārahi tābhyāṃ mātṛviyogaduḥkharahitābhyāṃ ca—so Ct; Ck similarly). Cg, substituting vā, "or," for ca, "and," understands that these are two options, i.e., that the sons are either anxious or bereaved. Cs also offers two alternatives. The first, similar in part to that of Ck, Cg, and Ct, is that Rāma is urging the boys to free themselves from worry as to how they will be able to sing now that they know that they are Rāma's sons. The second is that Rāma urges them to be free from any anxiety as to how, in light of the fact that the narration of what is to come [i.e., the Uttarakāṇḍa] contains both desirable and undesirable events, they should tell the story in the presence of the king. (aviśaṅkābhyāṃ viditatatputrakatvābhyām. kathaṃ gātavyam iti śaṅkāśūnyābhyām. bhaviṣyantyāṃ kathāyām iṣṭaduriṣṭacaritasya sattvāt kathaṃ svāmisamīpe tatkathanam iti śaṅkārahitābhyām iti vā.)

*Appendix I, No. 13, lines 54–55. "the venerable great seers" maharṣiṣu mahātmasu: Literally, "the great, great seers." We have substituted the term "venerable" for our normal translation of the word mahātman, "great," to avoid the awkward repetition in English. KK and VSP read brahmarṣiṣu, "the brahman-seers," for maharṣiṣu, "the great seers."

"that poem, the Uttara, which related future events" bhaviṣyad uttaraṃ kāvyaṃ: Literally, "the poem that is future [and] latter." On the term Uttara, see 7.88*.16 (lines 29–30), 20 (lines 37–38), and 23 (lines 43–45), and notes.

*Appendix I, No. 13, line 56–7.89.1. "then" tadā: D10,11,M2, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead tasya, "of that [sacrifice]."

"Vaidehī" vaidehyām: D6,7,10,11,T4,M5,7,9, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read instead sītāyām, "Sītā."

"by virtue of her perfect fidelity" satyasaṃpadā: Literally, "through the perfection or wealth of truth." The idea here is the typically Indic one according to which people are able to perform miracles on the strength of their perfect adherence to their "truth," that is to say, the perfect conduct of their assigned role in life. See Brown 1940, 1968, and 1972 and Hopkins 1932. Ck, Cg, and Ct gloss, "through her own supernatural power of truth (svasya satyavaibhavena—so Ct; Ck and Cg similarly)." Cr understands similarly as well.

"No longer able to see Vaidehī" apaśyamāno vaidehīm: Literally, "[Rāma], not seeing Vaidehī." Cs glosses the irregular ātmanepada participle apaśyamānaḥ with the normative parasmaipada form apaśyan, "[Rāma], not seeing."

"He was completely overwhelmed by grief" śokena paramāyattaḥ: Literally, "he was made supremely dependent by grief." The phrase is rather awkward. Ś,V1,D1–5,8–12,M6,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read paramāyastaḥ for paramāyattaḥ, lending the phase the sense "supremely pained by grief."

"could get no peace of mind" na śāntiṃ manasāgamat: Literally, "he did not go to tranquility with his mind."

2. "he had the hosts of eminent brahmans dismissed, laden with wealth" janaughaṃ brahmamukhyānāṃ vittapūrṇaṃ vyasarjayat: Literally, "he had the crowd of people of the most eminent of brahmans dismissed full of wealth." V2,B4,D1,4,6,7,10,11,T3,4, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read the synonymous vipramukhyānām, "of eminent brahmans," for brahmamukhyānām. Ś2,V1,B1,3,D6,7,10,11,T1,2,G,M1,3,10, and GPP, NSP, Gita Press, KK, and VSP read vittapūrvam, "preceded or accompanied by wealth," for
